Objection 2: Further, a man who commits fornication with several women gives more evidence of incontinence than one who has several wives successively. Yet in the first case a man does not become irregular. Therefore neither in the second should he become irregular.

Objection 3: Further, if bigamy causes irregularity, this is either because of the sacrament, or because of the carnal intercourse. Now it is not on account of the former, for if a man had contracted marriage by words of the present and, his wife dying before the consummation of the marriage, he were to marry another, he would become irregular, which is against the decree of Innocent III (cap. Dubium, De bigamia). Nor again is it on account of the second, for then a man who had committed fornication with several women would become irregular: which is false. Therefore bigamy nowise causes irregularity.

I answer that, By the sacrament of order a man is appointed to the ministry of the sacraments; and he who has to administer the sacraments to others must suffer from no defect in the sacraments. Now there is a defect in a sacrament when the entire signification of the sacrament is not found therein. And the sacrament of marriage signifies the union of Christ with the Church, which is the union of one with one. Therefore the perfect signification of the sacrament requires the husband to have only one wife, and the wife to have but one husband; and consequently bigamy, which does away with this, causes irregularity. And there are four kinds of bigamy: the first is when a man has several lawful wives successively; the second is when a man has several wives at once, one in law, the other in fact; the third, when he has several successively, one in law, the other in fact; the fourth, when a man marries a widow. Accordingly irregularity attaches to all of these.

There is another consequent reason assigned, since those who receive the sacrament of order should be signalized by the greatest spirituality, both because they administer spiritual things, namely the sacraments, and because they teach spiritual things, and should be occupied in spiritual matters. Wherefore since concupiscence is most incompatible with spirituality, inasmuch as it makes a man to be wholly carnal, they should give no sign of persistent concupiscence, which does indeed show itself in bigamous persons, seeing that they were unwilling to be content with one wife. The first reason however is the better.

Reply to Objection 1: The multitude of several wives at the same time is a multitude simply, wherefore a multitude of this kind is wholly inconsistent with the signification of the sacrament, so that the sacrament is voided on that account. But the multitude of several successive wives is a multitude relatively, wherefore it does not entirely destroy the signification of the sacrament, nor does it void the sacrament in its essence but in its perfection, which is required of those who are the dispensers of sacraments.

Reply to Objection 2: Although those who are guilty of fornication give proof of greater concupiscence, theirs is not a so persistent concupiscence, since by fornication one party is not bound to the other for ever; and consequently no defect attaches to the sacrament.

Reply to Objection 3: As stated above, bigamy causes irregularity, because it destroys the perfect signification of the sacrament: which signification is seated both in the union of minds, as expressed by the consent, and in the union of bodies. Wherefore bigamy must affect both of these at the same time in order to cause irregularity. Hence the decree of Innocent III disposes of the statement of the Master (Sent. iv, D, 27), namely that consent alone by words of the present is sufficient to cause irregularity.

ARTICLE 2. Whether irregularity results from bigamy, when one husband has two wives, one in law, the other in fact?

Objection 1: It would seem that irregularity does not result from bigamy when one husband has two wives at the same time, one in law and one in fact. For when the sacrament is void there can be no defect in the sacrament. Now when a man marries a woman in fact but not in law there is no sacrament, since such a union does not signify the union of Christ with the Church. Therefore since irregularity does not result from bigamy except on account of a defect in the sacrament, it would seem that no irregularity attaches to bigamy of this kind.

Objection 2: Further, if a man has intercourse with a woman whom he has married in fact and not in law, he commits fornication if he has not a lawful wife, or adultery if he has. But a man does not become irregular by dividing his flesh among several women by fornication or adultery. Therefore neither does he by the aforesaid kind of bigamy.

Objection 3: Further, it may happen that a man, before knowing carnally the woman he has married in law, marries another in fact and not in law, and knows her carnally, whether the former woman be living or dead. Now this man has contracted marriage with several women either in law or in fact, and yet he is not irregular, since he has not divided his flesh among several women. Therefore irregularity is not contracted by reason of the aforesaid kind of bigamy.

I answer that, Irregularity is contracted in the two second kinds of bigamy, for although in the one there is no sacrament, there is a certain likeness to a sacrament. Wherefore these two kinds are secondary, and the first is the principal kind in causing irregularity.

Reply to Objection 1: Although there is no sacrament in this case there is a certain likeness to a sacrament, whereas there is no such likeness in fornication or adultery. Hence the comparison fails.

This suffices for the Reply to the Second Objection.

Reply to Objection 3: In this case the man is not reckoned a bigamist, because the first marriage lacked its perfect signification. Nevertheless if, by the judgment of the Church, he be compelled to return to his first wife and carnally to know her, he becomes irregular forthwith, because the irregularity is the result not of the sin but of imperfect signification.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether irregularity is contracted by marrying one who is not a virgin?

Objection 1: It would seem that irregularity is not contracted by marrying one who is not a virgin. For a man's own defect is a greater impediment to him than the defect of another. But if the man himself who marries is not a virgin he does not become irregular. Therefore much less does he if his wife is not a virgin.

Objection 2: Further, it may happen that a man marries a woman after corrupting her. Now, seemingly, such a man does not become irregular, since he has not divided his flesh among several, nor has his wife done so, and yet he marries a woman who is not a virgin. Therefore this kind of bigamy does not cause irregularity.

Objection 3: Further, no man can become irregular except voluntarily. But sometimes a man marries involuntarily one who is not a virgin, for instance when he thinks her a virgin and afterwards, by knowing her carnally, finds that she is not. Therefore this kind does not always cause irregularity.

Objection 4: Further, unlawful intercourse after marriage is more guilty than before marriage. Now if a wife, after the marriage has been consummated, has intercourse with another man, her husband does not become irregular, otherwise he would be punished for his wife's sin. Moreover, it might happen that, after knowing of this, he pays her the debt at her asking, before she is accused and convicted of adultery. Therefore it would seem that this kind of bigamy does not cause irregularity.

On the contrary, Gregory says (Regist. ii, ep. 37): "We command thee never to make unlawful ordinations, nor to admit to holy orders a bigamist, or one who has married a woman that is not a virgin, or one who is unlettered, or one who is deformed in his limbs, or bound to do penance or to perform some civil duty, or who is in any state of subjection."

I answer that, In the union of Christ with the Church unity is found on either side. Consequently whether we find division of the flesh on the part of the husband, or on the part of the wife, there is a defect of sacrament. There is, however, a difference, because on the part of the husband it is required that he should not have married another wife, but not that he should be a virgin, whereas on the part of the wife it is also required that she be a virgin. The reason assigned by those versed in the Decretals is because the bridegroom signifies the Church militant which is entrusted to the care of a bishop, and in which there are many corruptions, while the spouse signifies Christ Who was a virgin: wherefore virginity on the part of the spouse, but not on the part of the bridegroom, is required in order that a man be made a bishop. This reason, however, is expressly contrary to the words of the Apostle (Eph. 5:25): "Husbands, love your wives, as Christ also loved the Church," which show that the bride signifies the Church, and the bridegroom Christ; and again he says (Eph. 5:23): "Because the husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the head of the Church." Wherefore others say that Christ is signified by the bridegroom, and that the bride signifies the Church triumphant in which there is no stain. Also that the synagogue was first united to Christ as a concubine; so that the sacrament loses nothing of its signification if the bridegroom previously had a concubine. But this is most absurd, since just as the faith of ancients and of moderns is one, so is the Church one. Wherefore those who served God at the time of the synagogue belonged to the unity of the Church in which we serve God. Moreover this is expressly contrary to Jer. 3:14, Ezech. 16:8, Osee 2:16, where the espousals of the synagogue are mentioned explicitly: so that she was not as a concubine but as a wife. Again, according to this, fornication would be the sacred sign [sacramentum] of that union, which is absurd. Wherefore heathendom, before being espoused to Christ in the faith of the Church, was corrupted by the devil through idolatry. Hence we must say otherwise that irregularity is caused by a defect in the sacrament itself. Now when corruption of the flesh occurs outside wedlock on account of a preceding marriage, it causes no defect in the sacrament on the part of the person corrupted, but it causes a defect in the other person, because the act of one who contracts marriage terminates not in himself, but in the other party, wherefore it takes its species from its term, which, moreover, in regard to that act, is the matter as it were of the sacrament. Consequently if a woman were able to receive orders, just as her husband becomes irregular through marrying one who is not a virgin, but not through his not being a virgin when he marries, so also would a woman become irregular if she were to marry a man who is not a virgin, but not if she were no longer a virgin when she married ---unless she had been corrupted by reason of a previous marriage.

This suffices for the Reply to the First Objection.

Reply to Objection 2: In this case opinions differ. It is, however, more probable that he is not irregular, because he has not divided his flesh among several women.

Reply to Objection 3: Irregularity is not the infliction of a punishment, but the defect of a sacrament. Consequently it is not always necessary for bigamy to be voluntary in order to cause irregularity. Hence a man who marries a woman, thinking her to be a virgin, whereas she is not, becomes irregular by knowing her carnally.

Reply to Objection 4: If a woman commits fornication after being married, her husband does not become irregular on that account, unless he again knows her carnally after she has been corrupted by adultery, since otherwise the corruption of the wife nowise affects the marriage act of the husband. But though he be compelled by law to pay her the debt, or if he do so at her request, being compelled by his own conscience, even before she is convicted of adultery, he becomes irregular, albeit opinions differ on this point. However, what we have said is more probable, since here it is not a question of sin, but of signification only.

ARTICLE 4. Whether bigamy is removed by Baptism?

Objection 1: It would seem that bigamy is removed by Baptism. For Jerome says in his commentary on the Epistle to Titus (1:6, "the husband of one wife") that if a man has had several wives before receiving Baptism, or one before and another after Baptism, he is not a bigamist. Therefore bigamy is removed by Baptism.

Objection 2: Further, he who does what is more, does what is less. Now Baptism removes all sin, and sin is a greater thing than irregularity. Therefore it removes irregularity.

Objection 3: Further, Baptism takes away all punishment resulting from an act. Now such is the irregularity of bigamy. Therefore, etc.

Objection 4: Further, a bigamist is irregular because he is deficient in the representation of Christ. Now by Baptism we are fully conformed to Christ. Therefore this irregularity is removed.

Objection 5: Further, the sacraments of the New Law are more efficacious than the sacraments of the Old Law. But the sacraments of the Old Law removed irregularities according to the Master's statement (Sent. iv.). Therefore Baptism also, being the most efficacious of the sacraments of the New Law, removes the irregularity consequent upon bigamy.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Bono Conjug. xviii): "Those understand the question more correctly who maintain that a man who has married a second wife, though he was a catechumen or even a pagan at the time, cannot be ordained, because it is a question of a sacrament, not of a sin."

Further, according to the same authority (De Bono Conjug. xviii) "a woman who has been corrupted while a catechumen or a pagan cannot after Baptism be consecrated among God's virgins." Therefore in like manner one who was a bigamist before Baptism cannot be ordained.

I answer that, Baptism removes sin, but does not dissolve marriage. Wherefore since irregularity results from marriage, it cannot be removed by Baptism, as Augustine says (De Bono Conjug. xviii).

Reply to Objection 1: In this case Jerome's opinion is not followed: unless perhaps he wished to explain that he means that a dispensation should be more easily granted.

Reply to Objection 2: It does not follow that what does a greater thing, does a lesser, unless it be directed to the latter. This is not so in the case in point, because Baptism is not directed to the removal of an irregularity.

Reply to Objection 3: This must be understood of punishments consequent upon actual sin, which are, or have yet to be, inflicted: for one does not recover virginity by Baptism, nor again undivision of the flesh.

Reply to Objection 4: Baptism conforms a man to Christ as regards the virtue of the mind, but not as to the condition of the body, which is effected by virginity or division of the flesh.

Reply to Objection 5: Those irregularities were contracted through slight and temporary causes, and consequently they could be removed by those sacraments. Moreover the latter were ordained for that purpose, whereas Baptism is not.

ARTICLE 5. Whether it is lawful for a bigamist to receive a dispensation?

Objection 1: It would seem unlawful for a bigamist to be granted a dispensation. For it is said (Extra, De bigamis, cap. Nuper): "It is not lawful to grant a dispensation to clerics who, as far as they could do so, have taken to themselves a second wife."

Objection 2: Further, it is not lawful to grant a dispensation from the Divine law. Now whatever is in the canonical writings belongs to the Divine law. Since then in canonical Scripture the Apostle says (1 Tim. 3:2): "It behooveth . . . a bishop to be . . . the husband of one wife," it would seem that a dispensation cannot be granted in this matter.

Objection 3: Further, no one can receive a dispensation in what is essential to a sacrament. But it is essential to the sacrament of order that the recipient be not irregular, since the signification which is essential to a sacrament is lacking in one who is irregular. Therefore he cannot be granted a dispensation in this.

Objection 4: Further, what is reasonably done cannot be reasonably undone. If, therefore, a bigamist can lawfully receive a dispensation, it was unreasonable that he should be irregular: which is inadmissible.

On the contrary, Pope Lucius granted a dispensation to the bishop of Palermo who was a bigamist, as stated in the gloss on can. Lector, dist. 34.

Further, Pope Martin [Martinus Bracarensis: cap. xliii] says: "If a Reader marry a widow, let him remain a Reader, or if there be need for it, he may receive the Subdiaconate, but no higher order: and the same applies if he should be a bigamist." Therefore he may at least receive a dispensation as far as the Subdiaconate.

I answer that, Irregularity attaches to bigamy not by natural, but by positive law; nor again is it one of the essentials of order that a man be not a bigamist, which is evident from the fact that if a bigamist present himself for orders, he receives the character. Wherefore the Pope can dispense altogether from such an irregularity; but a bishop, only as regards the minor orders, though some say that in order to prevent religious wandering abroad he can dispense therefrom as regards the major orders in those who wish to serve God in religion.

Reply to Objection 1: This Decretal shows that there is the same difficulty against granting a dispensation in those who have married several wives in fact, as if they had married them in law; but it does not prove that the Pope has no power to grant a dispensation in such cases.

Reply to Objection 2: This is true as regards things belonging to the natural law, and those which are essential to the sacraments, and to faith. But in those which owe their institution to the apostles, since the Church has the same power now as then of setting up and of putting down, she can grant a dispensation through him who holds the primacy.

Reply to Objection 3: Not every signification is essential to a sacrament, but that alone which belongs to the sacramental effect, and this is not removed by irregularity.

Reply to Objection 4: In particular cases there is no ratio that applies to all equally, on account of their variety. Hence what is reasonably established for all, in consideration of what happens in the majority of cases, can be with equal reason done away in a certain definite case.

OF THE BILL OF DIVORCE

Prologue

We must now consider the bill of divorce, under which head there are seven points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the indissolubility of marriage is of natural law?
- (2) Whether by dispensation it may become lawful to put away a wife?
- (3) Whether it was lawful under the Mosaic law?
- (4) Whether a wife who has been divorced may take another husband?
- (5) Whether the husband can marry again the wife whom he has divorced?
- (6) Whether the cause of divorce was hatred of the wife?
- (7) Whether the reasons for divorce had to be written on the bill?

ARTICLE 1. Whether inseparableness of the wife is of natural law?

Objection 1: It would seem that inseparableness of the wife is not of natural law. For the natural law is the same for all. But no law save Christ's has forbidden the divorcing of a wife. Therefore inseparableness of a wife is not of natural law.

Objection 2: Further, the sacraments are not of the natural law. But the indissolubility of marriage is one of the marriage goods. Therefore it is not of the natural law.

Objection 3: Further, the union of man and woman in marriage is chiefly directed to the begetting, rearing, and instruction of the offspring. But all things are complete by a certain time. Therefore after that time it is lawful to put away a wife without prejudice to the natural law.

Objection 4: Further, the good of the offspring is the principal end of marriage. But the indissolubility of marriage is opposed to the good of the offspring, because, according to philosophers, a certain man cannot beget offspring of a certain woman, and yet he might beget of another, even though she may have had intercourse with another man. Therefore the indissolubility of marriage is against rather than according to the natural law.

On the contrary, Those things which were assigned to nature when it was well established in its beginning belong especially to the law of nature. Now the indissolubility of marriage is one of these things according to Mt. 19:4,6. Therefore it is of natural law.

Further, it is of natural law that man should not oppose himself to God. Yet man would, in a way, oppose himself to God if he were to sunder "what God hath joined together." Since then the indissolubility of marriage is gathered from this passage (Mt. 19:6) it would seem that it is of natural law.

I answer that, By the intention of nature marriage is directed to the rearing of the offspring, not merely for a time, but throughout its whole life. Hence it is of natural law that parents should lay up for their children, and that children should be their parents' heirs (2 Cor.

12:14). Therefore, since the offspring is the common good of husband and wife, the dictate of the natural law requires the latter to live together for ever inseparably: and so the indissolubility of marriage is of natural law.

Reply to Objection 1: Christ's law alone brought mankind "to perfection" [Heb. 7:19] by bringing man back to the state of the newness of nature. Wherefore neither Mosaic nor human laws could remove all that was contrary to the law of nature, for this was reserved exclusively to "the law of the spirit of life" [Rm. 8:2].

Reply to Objection 2: Indissolubility belongs to marriage in so far as the latter is a sign of the perpetual union of Christ with the Church, and in so far as it fulfills an office of nature that is directed to the good of the offspring, as stated above. But since divorce is more directly incompatible with the signification of the sacrament than with the good of the offspring, with which it is incompatible consequently, as stated above (Question 65, Article 2, ad 5), the indissolubility of marriage is implied in the good of the sacrament rather than in the good of the offspring, although it may be connected with both. And in so far as it is connected with the good of the offspring, it is of the natural law, but not as connected with the good of the sacrament.

The Reply to the Third Objection may be gathered from what has been said.

Reply to Objection 4: Marriage is chiefly directed to the common good in respect of its principal end, which is the good of the offspring; although in respect of its secondary end it is directed to the good of the contracting party, in so far as it is by its very nature a remedy for concupiscence. Hence marriage laws consider what is expedient for all rather than what may be suitable for one. Therefore although the indissolubility of marriage hinder the good of the offspring with regard to some individual, it is proportionate with the good of the offspring absolutely speaking: and for this reason the argument does not prove.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether it may have been lawful by dispensation to put away a wife?

Objection 1: It seems that it could not be lawful by dispensation to put away a wife. For in marriage anything that is opposed to the good of the offspring is against the first precepts of the natural law, which admit of no dispensation. Now such is the putting away of a wife, as stated above (Article 1). Therefore, etc.

Objection 2: Further, a concubine differs from a wife especially in the fact that she is not inseparably united. But by no dispensation could a man have a concubine. Therefore by no dispensation could he put his wife away.

Objection 3: Further, men are as fit to receive a dispensation now as of old. But now a man cannot receive a dispensation to divorce his wife. Neither, therefore, could he in olden times.

On the contrary, Abraham carnally knew Agar with the disposition of a husband towards his wife, as stated above (Question 65, Article 5, ad 2,3). Now by Divine command he sent her away, and yet sinned not. Therefore it could be lawful by dispensation for a man to put away his wife.

I answer that, In the commandments, especially those which in some way are of natural law, a dispensation is like a change in the natural course of things: and this course is subject to a twofold change. First, by some natural cause whereby another natural cause is hindered from following its course: it is thus in all things that happen by chance less frequently in nature. In this way, however, there is no variation in the course of those natural things which happen always, but only in the course of those which happen frequently. Secondly, by a cause altogether supernatural, as in the case of miracles: and in this way there can be a variation in the course of nature, not only in the course which is appointed for the majority of cases, but also in the course which is appointed for all cases, as instanced by the sun standing still at the time of Josue, and by its turning back at the time of Ezechias, and by the miraculous eclipse at the time of Christ's Passion [Jos. 10:14; 4 Kgs. 20:10; Is. 38:8; Mt. 27:15]. In like manner the reason for a dispensation from a precept of the law of nature is sometimes found in the lower causes, and in this way a dispensation may bear upon the secondary precepts of the natural law, but not on the first precepts because these are always existent as it were, as stated above (Question 65, Article 1) in reference to the plurality of wives and so forth. But sometimes this reason is found in the higher causes, and then a dispensation may be given by God even from the first precepts of the natural law, for the sake of signifying or showing some Divine mystery, as instanced in the dispensation vouchsafed to Abraham in the slaying of his innocent son. Such dispensations, however, are not granted to all generally, but to certain individual persons, as also happens in regard to miracles. Accordingly, if the indissolubility of marriage is contained among the first precepts of the natural law, it could only be a matter of dispensation in this second way; but, if it be one of the second precepts of the natural law, it could be a matter of dispensation even in the first way. Now it would seem to belong rather to the secondary precepts of the natural law. For the indissolubility of marriage is not directed to the good of the offspring, which is the principal end of marriage, except in so far as parents have to provide for their children for their whole life, by due preparation of those things that are necessary in life. Now this preparation does not pertain to the first intention of nature, in respect of which all things are common. And therefore it would seem that to put away one's wife is not contrary to the first intention of nature, and consequently that it is contrary not to the first but to the second precepts of the natural law. Therefore, seemingly, it can be a matter of dispensation even in the first way.

Reply to Objection 1: The good of the offspring, in so far as it belongs to the first intention of nature, includes procreation, nourishment, and instruction, until the offspring comes to perfect age. But that provision be made for the children by bequeathing to them the inheritance or other goods belongs seemingly to the second intention of the natural law.

Reply to Objection 2: To have a concubine is contrary to the good of the offspring, in respect of nature's first intention in that good, namely the rearing and instruction of the child, for which purpose it is necessary that the parents remain together permanently; which is not the case with a concubine, since she is taken for a time. Hence the comparison fails. But in respect of nature's second intention, even the having of a concubine may be a matter of dispensation as evidenced by Osee 1.

Reply to Objection 3: Although indissolubility belongs to the second intention of marriage as fulfilling an office of nature, it belongs to its first intention as a sacrament of the Church. Hence, from the moment it was made a sacrament of the Church, as long as it remains such it cannot be a matter of dispensation, except perhaps by the second kind of dispensation.

ARTICLE 3. Whether it was lawful to divorce a wife under the Mosaic law?

Objection 1: It would seem that it was lawful to divorce a wife under the Mosaic law. For one way of giving consent is to refrain from prohibiting when one can prohibit. It is also unlawful to consent to what is unlawful. Since then the Mosaic law did not forbid the putting away of a wife and did no wrong by not forbidding it, for "the law . . . is holy" (Rm. 7:12), it would seem that divorce was at one time lawful.

Objection 2: Further, the prophets spoke inspired by the Holy Ghost, according to 2 Pt. 1:21. Now it is written (Malachi 2:16): "When thou shalt hate her, put her away." Since then that which the Holy Ghost inspires is not unlawful, it would seem that it was not always unlawful to divorce a wife.

Objection 3: Further, Chrysostom [Hom. xxxii in Opus Imperfectum] says that even as the apostles permitted second marriages, so Moses allowed the bill of divorce. But second marriages are not sinful. Therefore neither was it sinful under the Mosaic law to divorce a wife.

Objection 4: On the contrary, our Lord said (Mt. 19:8) that Moses granted the Jews the bill of divorce by reason of the hardness of their heart. But their hardness of heart did not excuse them from sin. Neither therefore did the law about the bill of divorce.

Objection 5: Further, Chrysostom says [Hom. xxxii in Opus Imperfectum] that "Moses, by granting the bill of divorce, did not indicate the justice of God, but deprived their sin of its guilt, for while the Jews acted as though they were keeping the law, their sin seemed to be no sin."

I answer that, on this point there are two opinions. For some say that under the Law those who put away their wives, after giving them a bill of divorce, were not excused from sin, although they were excused from the punishment which they should have suffered according to the Law: and that for this reason Moses is stated to have permitted the bill of divorce. Accordingly they reckon four kinds of permission: one by absence of precept, so that when a greater good is not prescribed, a lesser good is said to be permitted: thus the Apostle by not prescribing virginity, permitted marriage (1 Cor. 7). The second is by absence of prohibition: thus venial sins are said to be permitted because they are not forbidden. The third is by absence of prevention, and thus all sins are said to be permitted by God, in so far as He does not prevent them whereas He can. The fourth is by omission of punishment, and in this way the bill of divorce was permitted in the Law, not indeed for the sake of obtaining a greater good, as was the dispensation to have several wives, but for the sake of preventing a greater evil, namely wife-murder to which the Jews were prone on account of the corruption of their irascible appetite. Even so they were allowed to lend money for usury to strangers, on account of corruption in their concupiscible appetite, lest they should exact usury of their brethren; and again on account of the corruption of suspicion in the reason they were allowed the sacrifice of jealousy, lest mere suspicion should corrupt their judgment. But because the Old Law, though it did not confer grace, was given that it might indicate sin, as the saints are agreed in saying, others are of opinion that if it had been a sin for a man to put away his wife, this ought to have been indicated to him, at least by the law or the prophets: "Show My people their wicked doings" (Is. 58:1): else they would seem to have been neglected, if those things which are necessary for salvation and which they knew not were never made known to them: and this cannot be admitted, because the righteousness of the Law observed at the time of the Law would merit eternal life. For this reason they say that although to put away one's wife is wrong in itself, it nevertheless became lawful by God's permitting it, and they confirm this by the authority of Chrysostom, who says [Hom. xxxii in Opus Imperfectum] that "the Lawgiver by permitting divorce removed the guilt from the sin." Although this opinion has some probability the former is more generally held: wherefore we must reply to the arguments on both sides [FS, Question 105, Article 4, ad 8; FS, Question 108, Article 3, ad 2; Contra Gentes iii, cap. 123].

Reply to Objection 1: He who can forbid, sins not by omitting to forbid if he has no hope of correcting, but fears by forbidding to furnish the occasion of a greater evil. Thus it happened to Moses: wherefore acting on Divine authority he did not forbid the bill of divorce.

Reply to Objection 2: The prophets, inspired by the Holy Ghost, said that a wife ought to be put away, not as though this were a command of the Holy Ghost, but as being permitted lest greater evils should be perpetrated.

Reply to Objection 3: This likeness of permission must not be applied to every detail, but only to the cause which was the same in both cases, since both permissions were granted in order to avoid some form of wickedness.

Reply to Objection 4: Although their hardness of heart excused them not from sin, the permission given on account of that hardness excused them. For certain things are forbidden those who are healthy in body, which are not forbidden the sick, and yet the sick sin not by availing themselves of the permission granted to them.

Reply to Objection 5: A good may be omitted in two ways. First, in order to obtain a greater good, and then the omission of that good becomes virtuous by being directed to a greater good; thus Jacob rightly omitted to have only one wife, on account of the good of the offspring. In another way a good is omitted in order to avoid a greater evil, and then if this is done with the authority of one who can grant a dispensation, the omission of that good is not sinful, and yet it does not also become virtuous. In this way the indissolubility of marriage was suspended in the law of Moses in order to avoid a greater evil, namely wife-murder. Hence Chrysostom says that "he removed the guilt from the sin." For though divorce remained inordinate, for which reason it is called a sin, it did not incur the debt of punishment, either temporal or eternal, in so far as it was done by Divine permission: and thus its guilt was taken away from it. And therefore he says again [Hom. xxxii in Opus Imperfectum] that "divorce was permitted, an evil indeed, yet lawful." Those who hold the first opinion understand by this only that divorce incurred the debt of temporal punishment.

ARTICLE 4. Whether it was lawful for a divorced wife to have another husband?

Objection 1: It would seem that it was lawful for a divorced wife to have another husband. For in divorce the husband did a greater wrong by divorcing his wife than the wife by being divorced. But the husband could, without sin, marry another wife. Therefore the wife could without sin, marry another husband.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine, speaking about bigamy, says (De Bono Conjug. xv, xviii) that "when it was the manner it was no sin." Now at the time of the Old Law it was the custom for a wife after divorce to marry another husband: "When she is departed and married another husband," etc. Therefore the wife sinned not by marrying another husband.

Objection 3: Further, our Lord showed that the justice of the New Testament is superabundant in comparison with the justice of the Old Testament (Mt. 5). Now He said that it belongs to the superabundant justice of the New Testament that the divorced wife marry not another husband (Mt. 5:32). Therefore it was lawful in the Old Law.

Objection 4: On the contrary, are the words of Mt. 5:32, "He that shall marry her that is put away committeth adultery." Now adultery was never permitted in the Old Law. Therefore it was not lawful for the divorced wife to have another husband.

Objection 5: Further, it is written (Dt. 24:3) that a divorced woman who marries another husband "is defiled, and is become abominable before the Lord." Therefore she sinned by marrying another husband.

I answer that, According to the first above mentioned opinion (Article 3), she sinned by marrying another husband after being divorced, because her first marriage still held good. For "the woman . . . whilst her husband liveth, is bound to the law of her husband" (Rm. 7:2): and she could not have several husbands at one time. But according to the second opinion, just as it was lawful by virtue of the Divine dispensation for a husband to divorce his wife, so could the wife marry another husband, because the indissolubility of marriage was removed by reason of the divine dispensation: and as long as that indissolubility remains the saying of the Apostle holds.

Accordingly to reply to the arguments on either side:

Reply to Objection 1: It was lawful for a husband to have several wives at one time by virtue of the divine dispensation: wherefore having put one away he could marry another even though the former marriage were not dissolved. But it was never lawful for a wife to have several husbands. Wherefore the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 2: In this saying of Augustine manner [mos] does not signify custom but good manners; in the same sense a person is said to have manners [morigeratus] because he has good manners; and "moral" philosophy takes its name from the same source.

Reply to Objection 3: Our Lord shows the superabundance of the New Law over the Old in respect of the counsels, not only as regards those things which the Old Law permitted, but also as regards those things which were forbidden in the Old Law, and yet were thought by many to be permitted on account of the precepts being incorrectly explained---for instance that of the hatred towards our enemies. and so is it in the matter of divorce.

Reply to Objection 4: The saying of our Lord refers to the time of the New Law, when the aforesaid permission was recalled. In the same way we are to understand the statement of Chrysostom [Hom. xii in Opus Imperfectum], who says that "a man who divorces his wife according to the law is guilty of four crimes: for in God's sight he is a murderer," in so far as he has the purpose of killing his wife unless he divorce her; "and because he divorces her without her having committed fornication," in which case alone the law of the Gospel allows a man to put away his wife; "and again, because he makes her an adulteress, and the man whom she marries an adulterer."

Reply to Objection 5: A gloss observes here: "She is defiled and abominable, namely in the judgment of him who first put her away as being defiled," and consequently it does not follow that she is defiled absolutely speaking; or she is said to be defiled just as a person who had touched a dead or leprous body was said to be unclean with the uncleanness, not of sin, but of a certain legal irregularity. Wherefore a priest could not marry a widow or a divorced woman.

ARTICLE 5. Whether a husband could lawfully take back the wife he had divorced?

Objection 1: It would seem that a husband could lawfully take back the wife he had divorced. For it is lawful to undo what was ill done. But for the husband to divorce his wife was ill done. Therefore it was lawful for him to undo it, by taking back his wife.

Objection 2: Further, it has always been lawful to be indulgent to the sinner, because this is a moral precept, which obtains in every law. Now the husband by taking back the wife he had divorced was indulgent to one who had sinned. Therefore this also was lawful.

Objection 3: Further, the reason given (Dt. 24:4) for its being unlawful to take back a divorced wife was "because she is defiled." But the divorced wife is not defiled except by marrying another husband. Therefore at least it was lawful to take back a divorced wife before she married again.

On the contrary, It is said (Dt. 24:4) that "the former husband cannot take her again," etc.

I answer that, In the law concerning the bill of divorce two things were permitted, namely for the husband to put away the wife, and for the divorced wife to take another husband; and two things were commanded, namely that the bill of divorce should be written, and secondly that the husband who divorced his wife could not take her back. According to those who hold the first opinion (Article 3) this was done in punishment of the woman who married again, and that it was by this sin that she was defiled: but according to the others it was done that a husband might not be too ready to divorce his wife if he could nowise take her back afterwards.

Reply to Objection 1: In order to prevent the evil committed by a man in divorcing his wife, it was ordered that the husband could not take back his divorced wife, as stated above: and for this reason it was ordered by God.

Reply to Objection 2: It was always lawful to be indulgent to the sinner as regards the unkindly feelings of the heart, but not as regards the punishment appointed by God.

Reply to Objection 3: There are two opinions on this point. For some say that it was lawful for a divorced wife to be reconciled to her husband, unless she were joined in marriage to another husband. For then, on account of the adultery to which she had voluntarily yielded, it was assigned to her in punishment that she should not return to her former husband. Since, however, the law makes no distinction in its prohibition, others say that from the moment that she was put away she could not be taken back, even before marrying again, because the defilement must be understood not in reference to sin, but as explained above (Article 4, ad 3).

ARTICLE 6. Whether the reason for divorce was hatred for the wife?

Objection 1: It would seem that the reason for divorce was hatred for the wife. For it is written (Malachi 2:16): "When thou shalt hate her put her away." Therefore, etc.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Dt. 24:1): "If . . . she find not favor in his eyes, for some uncleanness," etc. Therefore the same conclusion follows as before.

Objection 3: On the contrary, Barrenness and fornication are more opposed to marriage than hatred. Therefore they ought to have been reasons for divorce rather than hatred.

Objection 4: Further, hatred may be caused by the virtue of the person hated. Therefore, if hatred is a sufficient reason, a woman could be divorced on account of her virtue, which is absurd.

Objection 5: Further, "If a man marry a wife and afterwards hate her, and seek occasions to put her away" alleging that she was not a virgin when he married her, should he fail to prove this, he shall be beaten, and shall be condemned in a hundred sicles of silver, and he shall be unable to put her away all the days of his life (Dt. 22:13-19). Therefore hatred is not a sufficient reason for divorce.

I answer that, It is the general opinion of holy men that the reason for permission being given to divorce a wife was the avoidance of wife-murder. Now the proximate cause of murder is hatred: wherefore the proximate cause of divorce was hatred. But hatred proceeds, like love, from a cause. Wherefore we must assign to divorce certain remote causes which were a cause of hatred. For Augustine says in his gloss (De Serm. Dom. in Monte i, 14): "In the Law there were many causes for divorcing a wife: Christ admitted none but fornication: and He commands other grievances to be borne for conjugal fidelity and chastity." Such causes are imperfections either of body, as sickness or some notable deformity, or in soul as fornication or the like which amounts to moral depravity. Some, however, restrict these causes within narrower limits, saying with sufficient probability that it was not lawful to divorce a wife except for some cause subsequent to the marriage; and that not even then could it be done for any such cause, but only for such as could hinder the good of the offspring, whether in body as barrenness, or leprosy and the like, or in soul, for instance if she were a woman of wicked habits which her children through continual contact with her would imitate. There is however a gloss on Dt. 24:1, "If . . . she find not favor in his eyes," which would seem to restrict them yet more, namely to sin, by saying that there "uncleanness" denotes sin: but "sin" in the gloss refers not only to the morality of the soul but also to the condition of the body. Accordingly we grant the first two objections.

Reply to Objection 3: Barrenness and other like things are causes of hatred, and so they are remote causes of divorce.

Reply to Objection 4: No one is hateful on account of virtue as such, because goodness is the cause of love. Wherefore the argument does not hold.

Reply to Objection 5: The husband was punished in that case by being unable to put away his wife for ever, just as in the case when he had corrupted a maid (Dt. 22:28-30).

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 7. Whether the causes of divorce had to be written in the bill?

Objection 1: It would seem that the causes of divorce had to be written in the bill: because the husband was absolved from the punishment of the law by the written bill of divorce. But this would seem altogether unjust, unless sufficient causes were alleged for a divorce. Therefore it was necessary for them to be written in the bill.

Objection 2: Further, seemingly this document was of no use except to show the causes for divorce. Therefore, if they were not written down, the bill was delivered for no purpose.

Objection 3: Further, the Master says that it was so in the text (Sent. iv, D, 33).

On the contrary, The causes for divorce were either sufficient or not. If they were sufficient, the wife was debarred from a second marriage, though this was allowed her by the Law. If they were insufficient, the divorce was proved to be unjust, and therefore could not be effected. Therefore the causes for divorce were by no means particularized in the bill.

I answer that, The causes for divorce were not particularized in the bill, but were indicated in a general way, so as to prove the justice of the divorce. According to Josephus (Antiq. iv, 6) this was in order that the woman, having the written bill of divorce, might take another husband, else she would not have been believed. Wherefore according to him it was written in this wise: "I promise never to have thee with me again." But according to Augustine (Contra Faust. xix, 26) the bill was put into writing in order to cause a delay, and that the husband might be dissuaded by the counsel of the notaries to refrain from his purpose of divorce.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

OF ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN

Prologue

We must now consider children of illegitimate birth. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether those born out of true marriage are illegitimate?
- (2) Whether children should suffer any loss through being illegitimate?
- (3) Whether they can be legitimized?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether children born out of true marriage are illegitimate?

Objection 1: It would seem that children born out of true marriage are legitimate. For he that is born according to law is called a legitimate son. Now everyone is born according to law, at least the law of nature, which has more force than any other. Therefore every child is to be called legitimate.

Objection 2: Further, it is the common saying that a legitimate child is one born of a legitimate marriage, or of a marriage that is deemed legitimate in the eyes of the Church. Now it happens sometimes that a marriage is deemed legitimate in the eyes of the Church, whereas there is some impediment affecting its validity; which impediment may be known to the parties who marry in the presence of the Church: or they may marry in secret and be ignorant of the impediment, in which case their marriage would seem legitimate in the eyes of the Church, for the very reason that it is not prevented by the Church. Therefore children born out of true marriage are not illegitimate.

On the contrary, Illegitimate is that which is against the law. Now those who are born out of wedlock are born contrary to the law. Therefore they are illegitimate.

I answer that, Children are of four conditions. Some are natural and legitimate, for instance those who are born of a true and lawful marriage; some are natural and illegitimate, as those who are born of fornication; some are legitimate and not natural, as adopted children; some are neither legitimate nor natural; such are those born of adultery or incest, for these are born not only against the positive law, but against the express natural law. Hence we must grant that some children are illegitimate.

Reply to Objection 1: Although those who are born of an unlawful intercourse are born according to the nature common to man and all animals, they are born contrary to the law of nature which is proper to man: since fornication, adultery, and the like are contrary to the law of nature. Hence the like are not legitimate by any law.

Reply to Objection 2: Ignorance, unless it be affected, excuses unlawful intercourse from sin. Wherefore those who contract together in good faith in the presence of the Church, although there be an impediment, of which however they are ignorant, sin not, nor are their children illegitimate. If, however, they know of the impediment, although the Church upholds their marriage because she knows not of the impediment, they are not excused from sin, nor do their children avoid being illegitimate. Neither are they excused if they know not of the impediment and marry secretly, because such ignorance would appear to be affected.

ARTICLE 2. Whether children should suffer any loss through being illegitimate?

Objection 1: It would seem that children ought not to suffer any loss through being illegitimate. For a child should not be punished on account of his father's sin, according to the Lord's saying (Ezech. 18:20). But it is not his own but his father's fault that he is born of an unlawful union. Therefore he should not incur a loss on this account.

Objection 2: Further, human justice is copied from Divine. Now God confers natural goods equally on legitimate and illegitimate children. Therefore illegitimate should be equalled to legitimate children according to human laws.

On the contrary, It is stated (Gn. 25:5,6) that "Abraham gave all his possessions to Isaac, and that to the children of the concubines he gave gifts": and yet the latter were not born of an unlawful intercourse. Much more, therefore, ought those born of an unlawful intercourse to incur loss by not inheriting their father's property.

I answer that, A person is said to incur a loss for some cause in two ways: First, because he is deprived of his due, and thus an illegitimate child incurs no loss. Secondly, because something is not due to him, which might have been due otherwise, and thus an illegitimate son incurs a twofold loss. First because he is excluded from legitimate acts such as offices and dignities, which require a certain respectability in those who perform them. Secondly, he incurs a loss by not succeeding to his father's inheritance. Nevertheless natural sons can inherit a sixth only, whereas spurious children cannot inherit any portion, although by natural law their parents are bound to provide for their needs. Hence it is part of a bishop's care to compel both parents to provide for them.

Reply to Objection 1: To incur a loss in this second way is not a punishment. Hence we do not say that a person is punished by not succeeding to the throne through not being the king's son. In like manner it is no punishment to an illegitimate child that he has no right to that which belongs to the legitimate children.

Reply to Objection 2: Illegitimate intercourse is contrary to the law, not as an act of the generative power, but as proceeding from a wicked will. Hence an illegitimate son incurs a loss, not in those things which come to him by his natural origin, but in those things which are dependent on the will for being done or possessed.

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether an illegitimate son can be legitimized?

Objection 1: It would seem that an illegitimate son cannot be legitimized. For the legitimate child is as far removed from the illegitimate as the illegitimate from the legitimate. But a legitimate child is never made illegitimate. Neither, therefore, is an illegitimate child ever made legitimate.

Objection 2: Further, illegitimate intercourse begets an illegitimate child. But illegitimate intercourse never becomes legitimate. Neither, therefore, can an illegitimate son become legitimate.

On the contrary, What is done by the law can be undone by the law. Now the illegitimacy of children is an effect of positive law. Therefore an illegitimate child can be legitimized by one who has legal authority.

I answer that, An illegitimate child can be legitimized, not so that he be born of a legitimate intercourse, because this intercourse is a thing of the past and can never be legitimized from the moment that it was once illegitimate. But the child is said to be legitimized, in so far as the losses which an illegitimate child ought to incur are withdrawn by the authority of the law.

There are six ways of becoming legitimate: two according to the canons (Cap. Conquestus; Cap. Tanta), namely when a man marries the woman of whom he has an unlawful child (if it were not a case of adultery), and by special indulgence and dispensation of the lord Pope. The other four ways are according to the laws: (1) If the father offer his natural son to the emperor's court, for by this very fact the son is legitimate on account of the reputation of the court; (2) if the father designate him in his will as his legitimate heir, and the son afterwards offer the will to the emperor; (3) if there be no legitimate son and the son himself offer himself to the emperor; (4) if the father designate him as legitimate in a public document or in a document signed by three witnesses, without calling him natural.

Reply to Objection 1: A favor may be bestowed on a person without injustice, but a person cannot be damnified except for a fault. Hence an illegitimate child can be legitimized rather than "vice versa"; for although a legitimate son is sometimes deprived of his inheritance on account of his fault, he is not said to be illegitimate, because he was legitimately begotten.

Reply to Objection 2: Illegitimate intercourse has an inherent inseparable defect whereby it is opposed to the law: and consequently it cannot be legitimized. Nor is there any comparison with an illegitimate child who has no such defect.

OF MATTERS CONCERNING THE RESURRECTION, AND FIRST OF THE PLACE WHERE SOULS ARE AFTER DEATH

Prologue

In sequence to the foregoing we must treat of matters concerning the state of resurrection: for after speaking of the sacraments whereby man is delivered from the death of sin, we must next speak of the resurrection whereby man is delivered from the death of punishment. The treatise on the resurrection offers a threefold consideration, namely the things that precede, those that accompany, and those that follow the resurrection. Consequently we must speak (1) of those things which partly, though not wholly, precede the resurrection; (2) of the resurrection itself and its circumstances; (3) of the things which follow it.

Among the things which precede the resurrection we must consider (1) the places appointed for the reception of bodies after death; (2) the quality of separated souls, and the punishment inflicted on them by fire; (3) the suffrages whereby the souls of the departed are assisted by the living; (4) the prayers of the saints in heaven; (5) the signs preceding the general judgment; (6) the fire of the world's final conflagration which will precede the appearance of the Judge.

Under the first head there are seven points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether any places are appointed to receive souls after death?
- (2) Whether souls are conveyed thither immediately after death?
- (3) Whether they are able to leave those places?
- (4) Whether the limbo of hell is the same as Abraham's bosom?
- (5) Whether limbo is the same as the hell of the damned?

(6) Whether the limbo of the patriarchs is the same as the limbo of children?

(7) Whether so many places should be distinguished?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether places are appointed to receive souls after death?

Objection 1: It would seem that places are not appointed to receive souls after death. For as Boethius says (De Hebdom.): "Wise men are agreed that incorporeal things are not in a place," and this agrees with the words of Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xii, 32): "We can answer without hesitation that the soul is not conveyed to corporeal places, except with a body, or that it is not conveyed locally." Now the soul separated from the body is without a body, as Augustine also says (Gen. ad lit. xii, 32). Therefore it is absurd to assign any places for the reception of souls.

Objection 2: Further, whatever has a definite place has more in common with that place than with any other. Now separated souls, like certain other spiritual substances, are indifferent to all places; for it cannot be said that they agree with certain bodies, and differ from others, since they are utterly removed from all corporeal conditions. Therefore places should not be assigned for their reception.

Objection 3: Further, nothing is assigned to separated souls after death, except what conduces to their punishment or to their reward. But a corporeal place cannot conduce to their punishment or reward, since they receive nothing from bodies. Therefore definite places should not be assigned to receive them.

On the contrary, The empyrean heaven is a corporeal place, and yet as soon as it was made it was filled with the holy angels, as Bede [Hexaem. i, ad Gn. 1:2] says. Since then angels even as separated souls are incorporeal, it would seem that some place should also be assigned to receive separated souls.

Further, this appears from Gregory's statement (Dial. iv) that souls after death are conveyed to various corporeal places, as in the case of Paschasius whom Germanus, Bishop of Capua, found at the baths, and of the soul of King Theodoric, which he asserts to have been conveyed to hell. Therefore after death souls have certain places for their reception.

I answer that, Although spiritual substances do not depend on a body in respect of their being, nevertheless the corporeal world is governed by God by means of the spiritual world, as asserted by Augustine (De Trin. iii, 4) and Gregory (Dial. iv, 6). Hence it is that there is a certain fittingness by way of congruity of spiritual substances to corporeal substances, in that the more noble bodies are adapted to the more noble substances: wherefore also the philosophers held that the order of separate substances is according to the order of movables. And though after death souls have no bodies assigned to them whereof they be the forms or determinate motors, nevertheless certain corporeal places are appointed to them by way of congruity in reference to their degree of nobility (wherein they are as though in a place, after the manner in which incorporeal things can be in a place), according as they more or less approach to the first substance (to which the highest place is fittingly assigned), namely God, whose throne the Scriptures proclaim heaven to be (Ps. 102:19, Is. 66:1). Wherefore we hold that those souls that have a perfect share of the Godhead are in heaven, and that those souls that are deprived of that share are assigned to a contrary place.

Reply to Objection 1: Incorporeal things are not in place after a manner known and familiar to us, in which way we say that bodies are properly in place; but they are in place after a manner befitting spiritual substances, a manner that cannot be fully manifest to us.

Reply to Objection 2: Things have something in common with or a likeness to one another in two ways. First, by sharing a same quality: thus hot things have something in common, and incorporeal things can have nothing in common with corporeal things in this way. Secondly, by a kind of proportionateness, by reason of which the Scriptures apply the corporeal world to the spiritual metaphorically. Thus the Scriptures speak of God as the sun, because He is the principle of spiritual life, as the sun is of corporeal life. In this way certain souls have more in common with certain places: for instance, souls that are spiritually enlightened, with luminous bodies, and souls that are plunged in darkness by sin, with dark places.

Reply to Objection 3: The separated soul receives nothing directly from corporeal places in the same way as bodies which are maintained by their respective places: yet these same souls, through knowing themselves to be appointed to such places, gather joy or sorrow therefrom; and thus their place conduces to their punishment or reward.

■ Back

■ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether souls are conveyed to heaven or hell immediately after death?

Objection 1: It would seem that no souls are conveyed to heaven or hell immediately after death. For a gloss on Ps. 36:10, "Yet a little while and the wicked shall not be," says that "the saints are delivered at the end of life; yet after this life they will not yet be where the saints will be when it is said to them: Come ye blessed of My Father." Now those saints will be in heaven. Therefore after this life the saints do not go immediately up to heaven.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (Enchiridion cix) that "the time which lies between man's death and the final resurrection holds the souls in secret receptacles according as each one is worthy of rest or of suffering." Now these secret abodes cannot denote heaven and hell, since also after the final resurrection the souls will be there together with their bodies: so that he would have no reason to distinguish between the time before and the time after the resurrection. Therefore they will be neither in hell nor in heaven until the day of judgment.

Objection 3: Further, the glory of the soul is greater than that of bodies. Now the glory of the body is awarded to all at the same time, so that each one may have the greater joy in the common rejoicing of all, as appears from a gloss on Heb. 11:40, "God providing some better thing for us---that the common joy may make each one rejoice the more." Much more, therefore, ought the glory of souls to be deferred until the end, so as to be awarded to all at the same time.

Objection 4: Further, punishment and reward, being pronounced by the sentence of the judge, should not precede the judgment. Now hell fire and the joys of heaven will be awarded to all by the sentence of Christ judging them, namely at the last judgment, according to Mt. 25. Therefore no one will go up to heaven or down to hell before the day of judgment.

On the contrary, It is written (2 Cor. 5:1): "If our earthly house of this habitation be dissolved, that we have . . . a house not made with hands, but reserved in heaven." Therefore, after the body's dissolution, the soul has an abode, which had been reserved for it in heaven.

Further, the Apostle says (Phil. 1:23): "I desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ." From these words Gregory argues as follows (Dial. iv, 25): "If there is no doubt that Christ is in heaven, it cannot be denied that Paul's soul is in heaven likewise." Now it cannot be gainsaid that Christ is in heaven, since this is an article of faith. Therefore neither is it to be denied that the souls of the saints are borne to heaven. That also some souls go down to hell immediately after death is evident from Lk. 16:22, "And the rich man died, and he was buried in hell."

I answer that, Even as in bodies there is gravity or levity whereby they are borne to their own place which is the end of their movement, so in souls there is merit or demerit whereby they reach their reward or punishment, which are the ends of their deeds. Wherefore just as a body is conveyed at once to its place, by its gravity or levity, unless there be an obstacle, so too the soul, the bonds of the flesh being broken, whereby it was detained in the state of the way, receives at once its reward or punishment, unless there be an obstacle. Thus sometimes venial sin, though needing first of all to be cleansed, is an obstacle to the receiving of the reward; the result being that the reward is delayed. And since a place is assigned to souls in keeping with their reward or punishment, as soon as the soul is set free from the body it is either plunged into hell or soars to heaven, unless it be held back by some debt, for which its flight must needs be delayed until the soul is first of all cleansed. This truth is attested by the manifest authority of the canonical Scriptures and the doctrine of the holy Fathers; wherefore the contrary must be judged heretical as stated in Dial. iv, 25, and in De Eccl. Dogm. xlvii.

Reply to Objection 1: The gloss explains itself: for it expounds the words, "They will not yet be where the saints will be," etc., by saying immediately afterwards: "That is to say, they will not have the double stole which the saints will have at the resurrection."

Reply to Objection 2: Among the secret abodes of which Augustine speaks, we must also reckon hell and heaven, where some souls are detained before the resurrection. The reason why a distinction is drawn between the time before and the time after the resurrection is because before the resurrection they are there without the body whereas afterwards they are with the body, and because in certain places there are souls now which will not be there after the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 3: There is a kind of continuity among men as regards the body, because in respect thereof is verified the saying of Acts 17:24,26, "God . . . hath made of one all mankind": whereas He has fashioned souls independently of one another. Consequently it is not so fitting that all men should be glorified together in the soul as that they should be glorified together in the body. Moreover the glory of the body is not so essential as the glory of the soul; wherefore it would be more derogatory to the saints if the glory of the soul were delayed, than that the glory of the body be deferred: nor could this detriment to their glory be compensated on account of the joy of each one being increased by the common joy.

Reply to Objection 4: Gregory proposes and solves this very difficulty (Dial. iv, 25): "If then," he says, "the souls of the just are in heaven now, what will they receive in reward for their justice on the judgment day?" And he answers: "Surely it will be a gain to them at the judgment, that whereas now they enjoy only the happiness of the soul, afterwards they will enjoy also that of the body, so as to rejoice also in the flesh wherein they bore sorrow and torments for the Lord." The same is to be said in reference to the damned.

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the souls who are in heaven or hell are able to go from thence?

Objection 1: It would seem that the souls in heaven or hell are unable to go from thence. For Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. xiii): "If the souls of the dead took any part in the affairs of the living, to say nothing of others, there is myself whom not for a single night would my loving mother fail to visit since she followed me by land and sea in order to abide with me": and from this he concludes that the souls of the departed do not mingle in the affairs of the living. But they would be able to do so if they were to leave their abode. Therefore they do not go forth from their abode.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Ps. 26:4): "That I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life," and (Job 7:9): "He that shall go down to hell shall not come up." Therefore neither the good nor the wicked quit their abode.

Objection 3: Further, as stated above (Article 2), abodes are awarded to souls after death as a reward or punishment. Now after death neither the rewards of the saints nor the punishments of the damned are increased. Therefore they do not quit their abodes.

On the contrary, Jerome writing against Vigilantius addresses him thus: "For thou sayest that the souls of the apostles and martyrs have taken up their abode either in Abraham's bosom or in the place of refreshment, or under the altar of God, and that they are unable to visit their graves when they will. Wouldst thou then lay down the law for God? Wouldst thou put the apostles in chains, imprison them until the day of judgment, and forbid them to be with their lord, them of whom it is written: They follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth? And if the Lamb is everywhere, therefore we must believe that those also who are with Him are everywhere." Therefore it is absurd to say that the souls of the departed do not leave their abode.

Further, Jerome argues as follows: "Since the devil and the demons wander throughout the whole world, and are everywhere present with wondrous speed, why should the martyrs, after shedding their blood be imprisoned and unable to go forth?" Hence we may infer that not only the good sometimes leave their abode, but also the wicked, since their damnation does not exceed that of the demons who wander about everywhere.

Further, the same conclusion may be gathered from Gregory (Dial. iv), where he relates many cases of the dead having appeared to the living.

I answer that, There are two ways of understanding a person to leave hell or heaven. First, that he goes from thence simply, so that heaven or hell be no longer his place: and in this way no one who is finally consigned to hell or heaven can go from thence, as we shall state further on (Question 71, Article 5, ad 5). Secondly, they may be understood to go forth for a time: and here we must distinguish what befits them according to the order of nature, and what according to the order of Divine providence; for as Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. xvi): "Human affairs have their limits other than have the wonders of the Divine power, nature's works differ from those which are done miraculously." Consequently, according to the natural course, the separated souls consigned to their respective abodes are utterly cut off from communication with the living. For according to the course of nature men living in mortal bodies are not immediately united to separate substances, since their entire knowledge arises from the senses: nor would it be fitting for them to leave their abode for any purpose other than to take part in the affairs of the living. Nevertheless, according to the disposition of Divine providence separated souls sometimes come forth from their abode and appear to men, as Augustine, in the book quoted above, relates of the martyr Felix who appeared visibly to the people of Nola when they were besieged by the barbarians. It is also credible that this may occur sometimes to the damned, and that for man's instruction and intimidation they be permitted to appear to the living; or again in order to seek our suffrages, as to those who are detained in purgatory, as evidenced by many instances related in the fourth book of the Dialogues. There is, however, this difference between the saints and the damned, that the saints can appear when they will to the living, but not the damned; for even as the saints while living in the flesh are able by the gifts of gratuitous grace to heal and work wonders, which can only be done miraculously by the Divine power, and cannot be done by those who lack this gift, so it is not unfitting for the souls of the saints to be endowed with a power in virtue of their glory, so that they are able to appear wondrously to the living, when they will: while others are unable to do so unless they be sometimes permitted.

Reply to Objection 1: Augustine, as may be gathered from what he says afterwards, is speaking according to the common course of nature, And yet it does not follow, although the dead be able to appear to the living as they will, that they appear as often as when living in the flesh: because when they are separated from the flesh, they are either wholly conformed to the divine will, so that they may do nothing but what they see to be agreeable with the Divine disposition, or else they are so overwhelmed by their punishments that their grief for their unhappiness surpasses their desire to appear to others.

Reply to Objection 2: The authorities quoted speak in the sense that no one comes forth from heaven or hell simply, and do not imply that one may not come forth for a time.

Reply to Objection 3: As stated above (Article 1, ad 3) the soul's place conduces to its punishment or reward in so far as the soul, through being consigned to that place, is affected either by joy or by grief. Now this joy or grief at being consigned to such a place remains in the soul even when it is outside that place. Thus a bishop who is given the honor of sitting on a throne in the church incurs no dishonor when he leaves the throne, for though he sits not therein actually, the place remains assigned to him.

We must also reply to the arguments in the contrary sense.

Reply to Objection 4: Jerome is speaking of the apostles and martyrs in reference to that which they gain from their power of glory, and not to that which befits them as due to them by nature. And when he says that they are everywhere, he does not mean that they are in several places or everywhere at once, but that they can be wherever they will.

Reply to Objection 5: There is no parity between demons and angels on the one hand and the souls of the saints and of the damned on the other. For the good or bad angels have allotted to them the office of presiding over men, to watch over them or to try them; but this cannot be said of the souls of men. Nevertheless, according to the power of glory, it is competent to the souls of the saints that they can be where they will; and this is what Jerome means to say.

Reply to Objection 6: Although the souls of the saints or of the damned are sometimes actually present where they appear, we are not to believe that this is always so: for sometimes these apparitions occur to persons whether asleep or awake by the activity of good or wicked angels in order to instruct or deceive the living. Thus sometimes even the living appear to others and tell them many things in their sleep; and yet it is clear that they are not present, as Augustine proves from many instances (De Cura pro Mort. xi, xii).

ARTICLE 4. Whether the limbo of hell is the same as Abraham's bosom?

Objection 1: It would seem that the limbo of hell is not the same as Abraham's bosom. For according to Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xxxiii): "I have not yet found Scripture mentioning hell in a favorable sense." Now Abraham's bosom is taken in a favorable sense, as Augustine goes on to say (Gen. ad lit. xxxiii): "Surely no one would be allowed to give an unfavorable signification to Abraham's bosom and the place of rest whither the godly poor man was carried by the angels." Therefore Abraham's bosom is not the same as the limbo of hell.

Objection 2: Further, those who are in hell see not God. Yet God is seen by those who are in Abraham's bosom, as may be gathered from Augustine (Confess. ix, 3) who, speaking of Nebridius, says: "Whatever that be, which is signified by thut bosom, there lives my Nebridius," and further on: "Now lays he not his ear to my mouth, but his spiritual mouth unto Thy fountain, and drinketh as much as he can receive wisdom in proportion to his thirst, endlessly happy." Therefore Abraham's bosom is not the same as the limbo of hell.

Objection 3: Further, the Church prays not that a man be taken to hell: and yet she prays that the angels may carry the departed soul to Abraham's bosom. Therefore it would seem that Abraham's bosom is not the same as limbo.

On the contrary, The place whither the beggar Lazarus was taken is called Abraham's bosom. Now he was taken to hell, for as a gloss [St. Gregory, Moral. xx] on Job 30:23, "Where a house is appointed for every one that liveth," says: "Hell was the house of all the living until the coming of Christ." Therefore Abraham's bosom is the same as limbo.

Further, Jacob said to his sons (Gn. 44:38): "You will bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to hell": wherefore Jacob knew that he would be taken to hell after his death. Therefore Abraham likewise was taken to hell after his death; and consequently Abraham's bosom would seem to be a part of hell.

I answer that, After death men's souls cannot find rest save by the merit of faith, because "he that cometh to God must believe" (Heb.

11:6). Now the first example of faith was given to men in the person of Abraham, who was the first to sever himself from the body of unbelievers, and to receive a special sign of faith: for which reason "the place of rest given to men after death is called Abraham's bosom," as Augustine declares (Gen. ad lit. xii). But the souls of the saints have not at all times had the same rest after death; because, since Christ's coming they have had complete rest through enjoying the vision of God, whereas before Christ's coming they had rest through being exempt from punishment, but their desire was not set at rest by their attaining their end. Consequently the state of the saints before Christ's coming may be considered both as regards the rest it afforded, and thus it is called Abraham's bosom, and as regards its lack of rest, and thus it is called the limbo of hell. Accordingly, before Christ's coming the limbo of hell and Abraham's bosom were one place accidentally and not essentially: and consequently, nothing prevents Abraham's bosom from being after Christ's coming, and from being altogether distinct from limbo, since things that are one accidentally may be parted from one another.

Reply to Objection 1: The state of the holy Fathers as regards what was good in it was called Abraham's bosom, but as regards its deficiencies it was called hell. Accordingly, neither is Abraham's bosom taken in an unfavorable sense nor hell in a favorable sense, although in a way they are one.

Reply to Objection 2: The place of rest of the holy Fathers was called Abraham's bosom before as well as after Christ's coming, but in different ways. For since before Christ's coming the saints' rest had a lack of rest attached to it, it was called both hell and Abraham's bosom, wherefore God was not seen there. But since after the coming of Christ the saints' rest is complete through their seeing God, this rest is called Abraham's bosom, but not hell by any means. It is to this bosom of Abraham that the Church prays for the faithful to be brought.

Hence the Reply to the Third Objection is evident: and the same meaning applies to a gloss on Lk. 16:22, "It came to pass that the beggar died," etc., which says: "Abraham's bosom is the rest of the blessed poor, whose is the kingdom of heaven."

ARTICLE 5. Whether limbo is the same as the hell of the damned?

Objection 1: It would seem that the limbo of hell is the same as the hell of the damned. For Christ is said to have "bitten" [Osee 13:14] hell, but not to have swallowed it, because He took some from thence but not all. Now He would not be said to have "bitten" hell if those whom He set free were not part of the multitude shut up in hell. Therefore since those whom He set free were shut up in hell, the same were shut up in limbo and in hell. Therefore limbo is either the same as hell, or is a part of hell.

Objection 2: Further, in the Creed Christ is said to have descended into hell. But he did not descend save to the limbo of the Fathers. Therefore the limbo of the Fathers is the same as hell.

Objection 3: Further, it is written (Job 17:16): "All that I have shall go down into the deepest hell." Now since Job was a holy and just man, he went down to limbo. Therefore limbo is the same as the deepest hell.

On the contrary, In hell there is no redemption [Office of the Dead, Resp. vii]. But the saints were redeemed from limbo. Therefore limbo is not the same as hell.

Further, Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xii): "I do not see how we can believe that the rest which Lazarus received was in hell." Now the soul of Lazarus went down into limbo. Therefore limbo is not the same as hell.

I answer that, The abodes of souls after death may be distinguished in two ways; either as to their situation, or as to the quality of the places, inasmuch as souls are punished or rewarded in certain places. Accordingly if we consider the limbo of the Fathers and hell in respect of the aforesaid quality of the places, there is no doubt that they are distinct, both because in hell there is sensible punishment, which was not in the limbo of the Fathers, and because in hell there is eternal punishment, whereas the saints were detained but temporally in the limbo of the Fathers. On the other hand, if we consider them as to the situation of the place, it is probable that hell and limbo are the same place, or that they are continuous as it were yet so that some higher part of hell be called the limbo of the Fathers. For those who are in hell receive diverse punishments according to the diversity of their guilt, so that those who are condemned are consigned to darker and deeper parts of hell according as they have been guilty of graver sins, and consequently the holy Fathers in whom there was the least amount of sin were consigned to a higher and less darksome part than all those who were condemned to punishment.

Reply to Objection 1: When Christ, by His descent, delivered the Fathers from limbo, He is said to have "bitten" hell and to have descended into hell, in so far as hell and limbo are the same as to situation.

This suffices for the Reply to the Second Objection.

Reply to Objection 3: Job descended, not to the hell of the damned, but to the limbo of the Fathers. The latter is called the deepest place not in reference to the places of punishment, but in comparison with other places, as including all penal places under one head. Again we may reply with Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xii): who says of Jacob: "When Jacob said to his sons, 'You will bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to hell,' he seems to have feared most, lest he should be troubled with so great a sorrow as to obtain, not the rest of good men, but the hell of sinners." The saying of Job may be expounded in the same way, as being the utterance of one in fear, rather than an assertion.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the limbo of children is the same as the limbo of the Fathers?

Objection 1: It would seem that the limbo of children is the same as the limbo of the Fathers. For punishment should correspond to sin. Now the Fathers were detained in limbo for the same sin as children, namely for original sin. Therefore the place of punishment should be the same for both.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (Enchir. xciii): "The punishment of children who die in none but original sin is most lenient." But no punishment is more lenient than that of the holy Fathers. Therefore the place of punishment is the same for both.

On the contrary, Even as temporal punishment in purgatory and eternal punishment in hell are due to actual sin, so temporal punishment in the limbo of the Fathers and eternal punishment in the limbo of the children were due to original sin. If, therefore, hell and purgatory be not the same it would seem that neither are the limbo of children and the limbo of the Fathers the same.

I answer that, The limbo of the Fathers and the limbo of children, without any doubt, differ as to the quality of punishment or reward. For children have no hope of the blessed life, as the Fathers in limbo had, in whom, moreover, shone forth the light of faith and grace. But as regards their situation, there is reason to believe that the place of both is the same; except that the limbo of the Fathers is placed higher than the limbo of children, just as we have stated in reference to limbo and hell (Article 5).

Reply to Objection 1: The Fathers did not stand in the same relation to original sin as children. For in the Fathers original sin was expiated in so far as it infected the person, while there remained an obstacle on the part of nature, on account of which their satisfaction was not yet complete. On the other hand, in children there is an obstacle both on the part of the person and on the part of nature: and for this reason different abodes are appointed to the Fathers and to children.

Reply to Objection 2: Augustine is speaking of punishments due to some one by reason of his person. Of these the most lenient are due to those who are burdened with none but original sin. But lighter still is the punishment due to those who are debarred from the reception of glory by no personal defect but only by a defect of nature, so that this very delay of glory is called a kind of punishment.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 7. Whether so many abodes should be distinguished?

Objection 1: It would seem that we should not distinguish so many abodes. For after death, just as abodes are due to souls on account of sin, so are they due on account of merit. Now there is only one abode due on account of merit, namely paradise. Therefore neither should there be more than one abode due on account of sin, namely hell.

Objection 2: Further, abodes are appointed to souls after death on account of merits or demerits. Now there is one place where they merit or demerit. Therefore only one abode should be assigned to them after death.

Objection 3: Further, the places of punishment should correspond to the sins. Now there are only three kinds of sin, namely original, venial, and mortal. Therefore there should only be three penal abodes.

Objection 4: On the other hand, it would seem that there should be many more than those assigned. For this darksome air is the prison house of the demons (2 Pt. 2:17), and yet it is not reckoned among the five abodes which are mentioned by certain authors. Therefore there are more than five abodes.

Objection 5: Further, the earthly paradise is distinct from the heavenly paradise. Now some were borne away to the earthly paradise after this state of life, as is related of Enoch and Elias. Since then the earthly paradise is not counted among the five abodes, it would seem that there are more than five.

Objection 6: Further, some penal place should correspond to each state of sinners. Now if we suppose a person to die in original sin who has committed only venial sins, none of the assigned abodes will be befitting to him. For it is clear that he would not be in heaven, since he would be without grace, and for the same reason neither would he be in the limbo of the Fathers; nor again, would he be in the limbo of children, since there is no sensible punishment there, which is due to such a person by reason of venial sin: nor would he be in purgatory, where there is none but temporal punishment, whereas everlasting punishment is due to him: nor would he be in the hell of the damned, since he is not guilty of actual mortal sin. Therefore a sixth abode should be assigned.

Objection 7: Further, rewards and punishments vary in quantity according to the differences of sins and merits. Now the degrees of merit and sin are infinite. Therefore we should distinguish an infinite number of abodes, in which souls are punished or rewarded after death.

Objection 8: Further, souls are sometimes punished in the places where they sinned, as Gregory states (Dial. iv, 55). But they sinned in the place which we inhabit. Therefore this place should be reckoned among the abodes, especially since some are punished for their sins in this world, as the Master said above (Sent. iv, D, 21).

Objection 9: Further, just as some die in a state of grace and have some venial sins for which they deserve punishment, so some die in mortal sin and have some good for which they would deserve a reward. Now to those who die in grace with venial sins an abode is assigned where they are punished ere they receive their reward, which abode is purgatory. Therefore, on the other hand, there should be equally an abode for those who die in mortal sin together with some good works.

Objection 1:: Further, just as the Fathers were delayed from obtaining full glory of the soul before Christ's coming, so are they now detained from receiving the glory of the body. Therefore as we distinguish an abode of the saints before the coming of Christ from the one where they are received now, so ought we to distinguish the one in which they are received now from the one where they will be received after the resurrection.

I answer that, The abodes of souls are distinguished according to the souls' various states. Now the soul united to a mortal body is in the state of meriting, while the soul separated from the body is in the state of receiving good or evil for its merits; so that after death it is either in the state of receiving its final reward, or in the state of being hindered from receiving it. If it is in the state of receiving its final retribution, this happens in two ways: either in the respect of good, and then it is paradise; or in respect of evil, and thus as regards actual sin it is hell, and as regards original sin it is the limbo of children. On the other hand, if it be in the state where it is hindered from receiving its final reward, this is either on account of a defect of the person, and thus we have purgatory where souls are detained from receiving their reward at once on account of the sins they have committed, or else it is on account of a defect of nature, and thus we have the limbo of the Fathers, where the Fathers were detained from obtaining glory on account of the guilt of human nature which could not yet be expiated.

Reply to Objection 1: Good happens in one way, but evil in many ways, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv) and the Philosopher (Ethic. ii, 6): wherefore it is not unfitting if there be one place of blissful reward and several places of punishment.

Reply to Objection 2: The state of meriting and demeriting is one state, since the same person is able to merit and demerit: wherefore it is fitting that one place should be assigned to all: whereas of those who receive according to their merits there are various states, and consequently the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 3: One may be punished in two ways for original sin, as stated above, either in reference to the person, or in reference to nature only. Consequently there is a twofold limbo corresponding to that sin.

Reply to Objection 4: This darksome air is assigned to the demons, not as the place where they receive retribution for their merits, but as a place befitting their office, in so far as they are appointed to try us. Hence it is not reckoned among the abodes of which we are treating now: since hell fire is assigned to them in the first place (Mt. 25).

Reply to Objection 5: The earthly paradise belongs to the state of the wayfarer rather than to the state of those who receive for their merits; and consequently it is not reckoned among the abodes whereof we are treating now.

Reply to Objection 6: This supposition is impossible [FS, Question 89, Article 6]. If, however, it were possible, such a one would be punished in hell eternally: for it is accidental to venial sin that it be punished temporally in purgatory, through its having grace annexed to it: wherefore if it be annexed to a mortal sin, which is without grace, it will be punished eternally in hell. And since this one who dies in original sin has a venial sin without grace, it is not unfitting to suppose that he be punished eternally.

Reply to Objection 7: Diversity of degrees in punishments or rewards does not diversify the state, and it is according to the diversity of state that we distinguish various abodes. Hence the argument does not prove.

Reply to Objection 8: Although separated souls are sometimes punished in the place where we dwell, it does not follow that this is their proper place of punishment: but this is done for our instruction, that seeing their punishment we may be deterred from sin. That souls while yet in the flesh are punished here for their sins has nothing to do with the question, because a punishment of this kind does not place a man outside the state of meriting or demeriting: whereas we are treating now of the abodes to which souls are assigned after the state of merit or demerit.

Reply to Objection 9: It is impossible for evil to be pure and without the admixture of good, just as the supreme good is without any admixture of evil. Consequently those who are to be conveyed to beatitude which is a supreme good must be cleansed of all evil. wherefore there must needs be a place where such persons are cleansed if they go hence without being perfectly clean. But those who will be thrust into hell will not be free from all good: and consequently the comparison fails, since those who are in hell can receive the reward of their goods, in so far as their past goods avail for the mitigation of their punishment.

Reply to Objection 1:: The essential reward consists in the glory of the soul, but the body's glory, since it overflows from the soul, is entirely founded as it were on the soul: and consequently lack of the soul's glory causes a difference of state, whereas lack of the body's glory does not. For this reason, too, the same place, namely the empyrean, is assigned to the holy souls separated from their bodies and united to glorious bodies: whereas the same place was not assigned to the souls of the Fathers both before and after the glorification of souls.

OF THE QUALITY OF THE SOUL AFTER LEAVING THE BODY, AND OF THE PUNISHMENT INFLICTED ON IT BY MATERIAL FIRE

Prologue

We must next consider the general quality of the soul after leaving the body, and the punishment inflicted on it by material fire. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the sensitive powers remain in the separated soul?
- (2) Whether the acts of the aforesaid powers remain in the soul?
- (3) Whether the separated soul can suffer from a material fire?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the sensitive powers remain in the separated soul?

Objection 1: It would seem that the sensitive powers remain in the sensitive soul. For Augustine says (De Spir. et Anim. xv): "The soul withdraws from the body taking all with itself, sense and imagination, reason, understanding and intelligence, the concupiscible and irascible powers." Now sense, imagination, concupiscible and irascible are sensitive powers. Therefore the sensitive powers remain in the separated soul.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (De Eccl. Dogm. xvi): "We believe that man alone has a substantial soul, which lives though separated from the body, and clings keenly to its senses and wits." Therefore the soul retains its senses after being separated from the body.

Objection 3: Further, the soul's powers are either its essential parts as some maintain, or at least are its natural properties. Now that which is in a thing essentially cannot be separated from it, nor is a subject severed from its natural properties. Therefore it is impossible for the soul to lose any of its powers after being separated from the body.

Objection 4: Further, a whole is not entire if one of its parts be lacking. Now the soul's powers are called its parts. Therefore, if the soul lose any of its powers after death, it will not be entire after death: and this is unfitting.

Objection 5: Further, the soul's powers co-operate in merit more even than the body, since the body is a mere instrument of action, while the powers are principles of action. Now the body must of necessity be rewarded together with the soul, since it co-operated in merit. Much more, therefore, is it necessary that the powers of the soul be rewarded together with it. Therefore the separated soul does not lose them.

Objection 6: Further, if the soul after separation from the body loses its sensitive power, that must needs come to naught. For it cannot be said that it is dissolved into some matter, since it has no matter as a part of itself. Now that which entirely comes to naught is not restored in identity; wherefore at the resurrection the soul will not have the same identical sensitive powers. Now according to the Philosopher (De Anima ii, 1), as the soul is to the body so are the soul's powers to the parts of the body, for instance the sight to the eye. But if it were not identically the same soul that returns to the body, it would not be identically the same man. Therefore for the same reason it would not be identically the same eye, if the visual power were not identically the same; and in like manner no other part would rise again in identity, and consequently neither would the whole man be identically the same. Therefore it is impossible for the separated soul to lose its sensitive powers.

Objection 7: Further, if the sensitive powers were to be corrupted when the body is corrupted, it would follow that they are weakened when the body is weakened. Yet this is not the case, for according to De Anima i, "if an old man were given the eye of a young man, he would, without doubt, see as well as a young man." Therefore neither are the sensitive powers corrupted when the body is corrupted.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Eccl. Dogm. xix): "Of two substances alone does man consist, soul and body: the soul with its reason, and the body with its senses." Therefore the sensitive powers belong to the body: and consequently when the body is corrupted the sensitive powers remain not in the soul.

Further, the Philosopher, speaking of the separation of the soul, expresses himself thus (Metaph. xi, 3): "If, however, anything remain at last, we must ask what this is: because in certain subjects it is not impossible, for instance if the soul be of such a disposition, not the whole soul but the intellect; for as regards the whole soul this is probably impossible." Hence it seems that the whole soul is not separated from the body, but only the intellective powers of the soul, and consequently not the sensitive or vegetative powers.

Further, the Philosopher, speaking of the intellect, says (De Anima ii, 2): "This alone is ever separated, as the everlasting from the corruptible: for it is hereby clear that the remaining parts are not separable as some maintain." Therefore the sensitive powers do not remain in the separated soul.

I answer that, There are many opinions on this question. For some, holding the view that all the powers are in the soul in the same way as color is in a body, hold that the soul separated from the body takes all its powers away with it: because, if it lacked any one of them, it would follow that the soul is changed in its natural properties, since these cannot change so long as their subject remains. But the aforesaid view is false, for since a power is so called because it enables us to do or suffer something, and since to do and to be able belong to the same subject, it follows that the subject of a power is the same as that which is agent or patient. Hence the Philosopher says (De Somn. et Vigil.) that "where we find power there we find action." Now it is evident that certain operations, whereof the soul's powers are the principles, do not belong to the soul properly speaking but to the soul as united to the body, because they are not performed except through the medium of the body---such as to see, to hear, and so forth. Hence it follows that such like powers belong to the united soul and body as their subject, but to the soul as their quickening principle, just as the form is the principle of the properties of a composite being. Some operations, however, are performed by the soul without a bodily organ---for instance to understand, to consider, to will: wherefore, since these actions are proper to the soul, the powers that are the principles thereof belong to the soul not only as their principle but also as their subject. Therefore, since so long as the proper subject remains its proper passions must also remain, and when it is corrupted they also must be corrupted, it follows that these powers which use no bodily organ for their actions must needs remain in the separated body, while those which use a bodily organ must needs be corrupted when the body is corrupted: and such are all the powers belonging to the sensitive and the vegetative soul. On this account some draw a distinction in the sensitive powers of the soul: for they say that they are of two kinds---some being acts of organs and emanating from the soul into the body are corrupted with the body; others, whence the former originate, are in the soul, because by them the soul sensitizes the body for seeing, hearing, and so on; and these primary powers remain in the separated soul. But this statement seems unreasonable: because the soul, by its essence and not through the medium of certain other powers, is the origin of those powers which are the acts of organs, even as any form, from the very fact that by its essence it informs its matter, is the origin of the properties which result naturally in the composite. For were it necessary to suppose other powers in the soul, by means of which the powers that perfect the organs may flow from the essence of the soul, for the same reason it would be necessary to suppose other powers by means of which these mean powers flow from the essence of the soul, and so on to infinity, and if we have to stop it is better to do so at the first step.

Hence others say that the sensitive and other like powers do not remain in the separated soul except in a restricted sense, namely radically, in the same way as a result is in its principle: because there remains in the separated soul the ability to produce these powers if it should be reunited to the body; nor is it necessary for this ability to be anything in addition to the essence of the soul, as stated above. This opinion appears to be the more reasonable.

Reply to Objection 1: This saying of Augustine is to be understood as meaning that the soul takes away with it some of those powers actually, namely understanding and intelligence, and some radically, as stated above [FP, Question 77, Article 8, ad 1 and infra Article 2, ad 1].

Reply to Objection 2: The senses which the soul takes away with it are not these external senses, but the internal, those, namely, which pertain to the intellective part, for the intellect is sometimes called sense, as Basil states in his commentary on the Proverbs, and again the Philosopher (Ethic. vi, 11). If, however, he means the external senses we must reply as above to the first objection.

Reply to Objection 3: As stated above, the sensitive powers are related to the soul, not as natural passions to their subject, but as compared to their origin: wherefore the conclusion does not follow.

Reply to Objection 4: The powers of the soul are not called its integral but its potential parts. Now the nature of such like wholes is that the entire energy of the whole is found perfectly in one of the parts, but partially in the others; thus in the soul the soul's energy is found perfectly in the intellective part, but partially in the others. Wherefore, as the powers of the intellective part remain in the separated soul, the latter will remain entire and undiminished, although the sensitive powers do not remain actually: as neither is the king's power decreased by the death of a mayor who shared his authority.

Reply to Objection 5: The body co-operates in merit, as an essential part of the man who merits. The sensitive powers, however, do not co-operate thus, since they are of the genus of accidents. Hence the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 6: The powers of the sensitive soul are said to be acts of the organs, not as though they were the essential forms of those organs, except in reference to the soul whose powers they are. But they are the acts of the organs, by perfecting them for their proper operations, as heat is the act of fire by perfecting it for the purpose of heating. Wherefore, just as a fire would remain identically the same, although another individual heat were in it (even so the cold of water that has been heated returns not identically the same, although the water remains the same in identity), so the organs will be the same identically, although the powers be not identically the same.

Reply to Objection 7: The Philosopher is speaking there of these powers as being rooted in the soul. This is clear from his saying that "old age is an affection not of the soul, but of that in which the soul is," namely the body. For in this way the powers of the soul are neither weakened nor corrupted on account of the body.

Objection 1: It would seem that the acts of the sensitive powers remain in the separated soul. For Augustine says (De Spiritu et Anima xv): "When the soul leaves the body it derives pleasure or sorrow through being affected with these" (namely the imagination, and the concupiscible and irascible faculties) "according to its merits." But the imagination, the concupiscible, and the irascible are sensitive powers. Therefore the separated soul will be affected as regards the sensitive powers, and consequently will be in some act by reason of them.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xii) that "the body feels not, but the soul through the body," and further on: "The soul feels certain things, not through the body but without the body." Now that which befits the soul without the body can be in the soul separated from the body. Therefore the soul will then be able to feel actually.

Objection 3: Further, to see images of bodies, as occurs in sleep, belongs to imaginary vision which is in the sensitive part. Now it happens that the separated soul sees images of bodies in the same way as when we sleep. Thus Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xii): "For I see not why the soul has an image of its own body when, the body lying senseless, yet not quite dead, it sees some things which many have related after returning to life from this suspended animation and yet has it not when it has left the body through death having taken place." For it is unintelligible that the soul should have an image of its body, except in so far as it sees that image: wherefore he said before of those who lie senseless that "they have a certain image of their own body, by which they are able to be borne to corporeal places and by means of sensible images to take cognizance of such things as they see." Therefore the separated soul can exercise the acts of the sensitive powers.

Objection 4: Further, the memory is a power of the sensitive part, as proved in De Memor. et Remin. i. Now separated souls will actually remember the things they did in this world: wherefore it is said to the rich glutton (Lk. 16:25): "Remember that thou didst receive good things in thy lifetime." Therefore the separated soul will exercise the act of a sensitive power.

Objection 5: Further, according to the Philosopher (De Anima iii, 9) the irascible and concupiscible are in the sensitive part. But joy and sorrow, love and hatred, fear and hope, and similar emotions which according to our faith we hold to be in separated souls, are in the irascible and concupiscible. Therefore separated souls will not be deprived of the acts of the sensitive powers.

On the contrary, That which is common to soul and body cannot remain in the separated soul. Now all the operations of the sensitive powers are common to the soul and body: and this is evident from the fact that no sensitive power exercises an act except through a bodily organ. Therefore the separated soul will be deprived of the acts of the sensitive powers.

Further, the Philosopher says (De Anima i, 4), that "when the body is corrupted, the soul neither remembers nor loves," and the same applies to all the acts of the sensitive powers. Therefore the separated soul does not exercise the act of any sensitive power.

I answer that, Some distinguish two kinds of acts in the sensitive powers: external acts which the soul exercises through the body. and these do not remain in the separated soul; and internal acts which the soul performs by itself; and these will be in the separated soul. This statement would seem to have originated from the opinion of Plato, who held that the soul is united to the body, as a perfect substance nowise dependant on the body, and merely as a mover is united to the thing moved. This is an evident consequence of transmigration which he held. And since according to him nothing is in motion except what is moved, and lest he should go on indefinitely, he said that the first mover moves itself, and he maintained that the soul is the cause of its own movement. Accordingly there would be a twofold movement of the soul, one by which it moves itself, and another whereby the body is moved by the soul: so that this act "to see" is first of all in the soul itself as moving itself, and secondly in the bodily organ in so far as the soul moves the body. This opinion is refuted by the Philosopher (De Anima i, 3) who proves that the soul does not move itself, and that it is nowise moved in respect of such operations as seeing, feeling, and the like, but that such operations are movements of the composite only. We must therefore conclude that the acts of the sensitive powers nowise remain in the separated soul, except perhaps as in their remote origin.

Reply to Objection 1: Some deny that this book is Augustine's: for it is ascribed to a Cistercian who compiled it from Augustine's works and added things of his own. Hence we are not to take what is written there, as having authority. If, however, its authority should be maintained, it must be said that the meaning is that the separated soul is affected with imagination and other like powers, not as though such affection were the act of the aforesaid powers, but in the sense that the soul will be affected in the future life for good or ill, according to the things which it committed in the body through the imagination and other like powers: so that the imagination and such like powers are not supposed to elicit that affection, but to have elicited in the body the merit of that affection.

Reply to Objection 2: The soul is said to feel through the body, not as though the act of feeling belonged to the soul by itself, but as belonging to the whole composite by reason of the soul, just as we say that heat heats. That which is added, namely that the soul feels some things without the body, such as fear and so forth, means that it feels such things without the outward movement of the body that takes place in the acts of the proper senses: since fear and like passions do not occur without any bodily movement.

It may also be replied that Augustine is speaking according to the opinion of the Platonists who maintained this as stated above.

Reply to Objection 3: Augustine speaks there as nearly throughout that book, as one inquiring and not deciding. For it is clear that there is no comparison between the soul of a sleeper and the separated soul: since the soul of the sleeper uses the organ of imagination wherein corporeal images are impressed; which cannot be said of the separated soul. Or we may reply that images of things are in the soul, both as to the sensitive and imaginative power and as to the intellective power, with greater or lesser abstraction from matter and material conditions. Wherefore Augustine's comparison holds in this respect that just as the images of corporeal things are in the soul of the dreamer or of one who is carried out of his mind, imaginatively, so are they in the separated soul intellectually: but not that they are in the separated soul imaginatively.

Reply to Objection 4: As stated in the first book (Sent. i, D, 3, qu. 4), memory has a twofold signification. Sometimes it means a power of the sensitive part, in so far as its gaze extends over past time; and in this way the act of the memory will not be in the separated soul. Wherefore the Philosopher says (De Anima i, 4) that "when this," the body to wit, "is corrupted, the soul remembers not." In another way memory is used to designate that part of the imagination which pertains to the intellective faculty, in so far namely as it abstracts from all differences of time, since it regards not only the past but also the present, and the future as Augustine says (De Trin. xiv, 11). Taking memory in this sense the separated soul will remember [FP, Question 77, Article 8; FP, Question 89, Article 6].

Reply to Objection 5: Love, joy, sorrow, and the like, have a twofold signification. Sometimes they denote passions of the sensitive appetite, and thus they will not be in the separated soul, because in this way they are not exercised without a definite movement of the heart. In another way they denote acts of the will which is in the intellective part: and in this way they will be in the separated soul, even as delight will be there without bodily movement, even as it is in God, namely in so far as it is a simple movement of the will. In this sense the Philosopher says (Ethic. vii, 14) that "God's joy is one simple delight."

ARTICLE 3. Whether the separated soul can suffer from a bodily fire?

Objection 1: It would seem that the separated soul cannot suffer from a bodily fire. For Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xii): "The things that affect the soul well or ill after its separation from the body, are not corporeal but resemble corporeal things." Therefore the separated soul is not punished with a bodily fire.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xii) says that "the agent is always more excellent than the patient." But it is impossible for any body to be more excellent than the separated soul. Therefore it cannot suffer from a body.

Objection 3: Further, according to the Philosopher (De Gener. i) and Boethius (De Duab. Natur.) only those things that agree in matter are active and passive in relation to one another. But the soul and corporeal fire do not agree in matter, since there is no matter common to spiritual and corporeal things: wherefore they cannot be changed into one another, as Boethius says (De Duab. Natur.). Therefore the separated soul does not suffer from a bodily fire.

Objection 4: Further, whatsoever is patient receives something from the agent. Therefore if the soul suffer from the bodily fire, it will receive something therefrom. Now whatsoever is received in a thing is received according to the mode of the recipient. Therefore that which is received in the soul from the fire, is in it not materially but spiritually. Now the forms of things existing spiritually in the soul are its perfections. Therefore though it be granted that the soul suffer from the bodily fire, this will not conduce to its punishment, but rather to its perfection.

Objection 5: Further, if it be said that the soul is punished merely by seeing the fire, as Gregory would seem to say (Dial. iv, 29). On the contrary, if the soul sees the fire of hell, it cannot see it save by intellectual vision, since it has not the organs by which sensitive or imaginative vision is effected. But it would seem impossible for intellectual vision to be the cause of sorrow, since "there is no sorrow contrary to the pleasure of considering," according to the Philosopher (Topic. i, 13). Therefore the soul is not punished by that vision.

Objection 6: Further, if it be said that the soul suffers from the corporeal fire, through being held thereby, even as now it is held by the body while living in the body; on the contrary, the soul while living in the body is held by the body in so far as there results one thing from the soul and the body, as from form and matter. But the soul will not be the form of that corporeal fire. Therefore it cannot be held by the fire in the manner aforesaid.

Objection 7: Further, every bodily agent acts by contact. But a corporeal fire cannot be in contact with the soul, since contact is only between corporeal things whose bounds come together. Therefore the soul suffers not from that fire.

Objection 8: Further, an organic agent does not act on a remote object, except through acting on the intermediate objects; wherefore it is able to act at a fixed distance in proportion to its power. But souls, or at least the demons to whom this equally applies, are sometimes outside the place of hell, since sometimes they appear to men even in this world: and yet they are not then free from punishment, for just as the glory of the saints is never interrupted, so neither is the punishment of the damned. And yet we do not find that all the intermediate things suffer from the fire of hell: nor again is it credible that any corporeal thing of an elemental nature has such a power that its action can reach to such a distance. Therefore it does not seem that the pains suffered by the souls of the damned are inflicted by a corporeal fire.

On the contrary, The possibility of suffering from a corporeal fire is equally consistent with separated souls and with demons. Now demons suffer therefrom since they are punished by that fire into which the bodies of the damned will be cast after the resurrection, and which must needs be as corporeal fire. This is evident from the words of our Lord (Mt. 25:41), "Depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire, which was prepared for the devil," etc. Therefore separated souls also can suffer from that fire.

Further, punishment should correspond to sin. Now in sinning the soul subjected itself to the body by sinful concupiscence. Therefore it is just that it should be punished by being made subject to a bodily thing by suffering therefrom.

Further, there is greater union between form and matter than between agent and patient. Now the diversity of spiritual and corporeal nature does not hinder the soul from being the form of the body. Therefore neither is it an obstacle to its suffering from a body.

I answer that, Given that the fire of hell is not so called metaphorically, nor an imaginary fire, but a real corporeal fire, we must needs say that the soul will suffer punishment from a corporeal fire, since our Lord said (Mt. 25:41) that this fire was prepared for the devil and his angels, who are incorporeal even as the soul. But how it is that they can thus suffer is explained in many ways.

For some have said that the mere fact that the soul sees the fire makes the soul suffer from the fire: wherefore Gregory (Dial. iv, 29) says: "The soul suffers from the fire by merely seeing it." But this does not seem sufficient, because whatever is seen, from the fact that it is seen, is a perfection of the seer. wherefore it cannot conduce to his punishment, as seen. Sometimes, however, it is of a penal or unpleasant nature accidentally, in so far, to wit, as it is apprehended as something hurtful, and consequently, besides the fact that the soul sees the fire, there must needs be some relation of the soul to the fire, according to which the fire is hurtful to the soul.

Hence others have said that although a corporeal fire cannot burn the soul, the soul nevertheless apprehends it as hurtful to itself, and in consequence of this apprehension is seized with fear and sorrow, in fulfillment of Ps. 13:5, "They have trembled for fear, where there was no fear." Hence Gregory says (Dial. iv, 29) that "the soul burns through seeing itself aflame." But this, again, seems insufficient, because in this case the soul would suffer from the fire, not in reality but only in apprehension: for although a real passion of sorrow or pain may result from a false imagination, as Augustine observes (Gen. ad lit. xii), it cannot be said in relation to that passion that one really suffers from the thing, but from the image of the thing that is present to one's fancy. Moreover, this kind of suffering would be more unlike real suffering than that which results from imaginary vision, since the latter is stated to result from real images of things, which images the soul carries about with it, whereas the former results from false fancies which the erring soul imagines: and furthermore, it is not probable that separated souls or demons, who are endowed with keen intelligence, would think it possible for a corporeal fire to hurt them, if they were nowise distressed thereby.

Hence others say that it is necessary to admit that the soul suffers even really from the corporeal fire: wherefore Gregory says (Dial. iv, 29): "We can gather from the words of the Gospel, that the soul suffers from the fire not only by seeing it, but also by feeling it." They explain the possibility of this as follows. They say that this corporeal fire can be considered in two ways. First, as a corporeal thing, and thus it has not the power to act on the soul. Secondly, as the instrument of the vengeance of Divine justice. For the order of Divine justice demands that the soul which by sinning subjected itself to corporeal things should be subjected to them also in punishment. Now an instrument acts not only in virtue of its own nature, but also in virtue of the principal agent: wherefore it is not unreasonable if that fire, seeing that it acts in virtue of a spiritual agent, should act on the spirit of a man or demon, in the same way as we have explained the sanctification of the soul by the sacraments (TP, Question 62, Articles 1,4).

But, again, this does not seem to suffice, since every instrument, in acting on that on which it is used instrumentally, has its own connatural action besides the action whereby it acts in virtue of the principal agent: in fact it is by fulfilling the former that it effects the latter action, even as, in Baptism, it is by laving the body that water sanctifies the soul, and the saw by cutting wood produces the shape of a house.

Hence we must allow the fire to exercise on the soul an action connatural to the fire, in order that it may be the instrument of Divine justice in the punishment of sin: and for this reason we must say that a body cannot naturally act on a spirit, nor in any way be hurtful or distressful to it, except in so far as the latter is in some way united to a body: for thus we observe that "the corruptible body is a load upon the soul" (Wis. 9:15). Now a spirit is united to a body in two ways. In one way as form to matter, so that from their union there results one thing simply: and the spirit that is thus united to a body both quickens the body and is somewhat burdened by the body: but it is not thus that the spirit of man or demon is united to the corporeal fire. In another way as the mover is united to the things moved, or as a thing placed is united to place, even as incorporeal things are in a place. In this way created incorporeal spirits are confined to a place, being in one place in such a way as not to be in another. Now although of its nature a corporeal thing is able to confine an incorporeal spirit to a place, it is not able of its nature to detain an incorporeal spirit in the place to which it is confined, and so to tie it to that place that it be unable to seek another, since a spirit is not by nature in a place so as to be subject to place. But the corporeal fire is enabled as the instrument of the vengeance of Divine justice thus to detain a spirit; and thus it has a penal effect on it, by hindering it from fulfilling its own will, that is by hindering it from acting where it will and as it will.

This way is asserted by Gregory (Dial. iv, 29). For in explaining how the soul can suffer from that fire by feeling it, he expresses himself as follows: "Since Truth declares the rich sinner to be condemned to fire, will any wise man deny that the souls of the wicked are imprisoned in flames?" Julian [Bishop of Toledo, Prognostic ii, 17] says the same as quoted by the Master (Sent. iv, D, 44): "If the incorporeal spirit of a living man is held by the body, why shall it not be held after death by a corporeal fire?" and Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxi, 10) that "just as, although the soul is spiritual and the body corporeal, man is so fashioned that the soul is united to the body as giving it life, and on account of this union conceives a great love for its body, so it is chained to the fire, as receiving punishment therefrom, and from this union conceives a loathing."

Accordingly we must unite all the aforesaid modes together, in order to understand perfectly how the soul suffers from a corporeal fire: so as to say that the fire of its nature is able to have an incorporeal spirit united to it as a thing placed is united to a place; that as the instrument of Divine justice it is enabled to detain it enchained as it were, and in this respect this fire is really hurtful to the spirit, and thus the soul seeing the fire as something hurtful to it is tormented by the fire. Hence Gregory (Dial. iv, 29) mentions all these in order, as may be seen from the above quotations.

Reply to Objection 1: Augustine speaks there as one inquiring: wherefore he expresses himself otherwise when deciding the point, as quoted above (De Civ. Dei xxi). Or we may reply that Augustine means to say that the things which are the proximate occasion of the soul's pain or sorrow are spiritual, since it would not be distressed unless it apprehended the fire as hurtful to it: wherefore the fire as apprehended is the proximate cause of its distress, whereas the corporeal fire which exists outside the soul is the remote cause of its distress.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the soul is simply more excellent than the fire, the fire is relatively more excellent than the soul, in so far, to wit, as it is the instrument of Divine justice.

Reply to Objection 3: The Philosopher and Boethius are speaking of the action whereby the patient is changed into the nature of the agent. Such is not the action of the fire on the soul: and consequently the argument is not conclusive.

Reply to Objection 4: By acting on the soul the fire bestows nothing on it but detains it, as stated above. Hence the argument is not to the point.

Reply to Objection 5: In intellectual vision sorrow is not caused by the fact that something is seen, since the thing seen as such can nowise be contrary to the intellect. But in the sensible vision the thing seen, by its very action on the sight so as to be seen, there may be accidentally something corruptive of the sight, in so far as it destroys the harmony of the organ Nevertheless, intellectual vision may cause sorrow, in so far as the thing seen is apprehended as hurtful, not that it hurts through being seen, but in some other way no matter which. It is thus that the soul in seeing the fire is distressed.

Reply to Objection 6: The comparison does not hold in every respect, but it does in some, as explained above.

Reply to Objection 7: Although there is no bodily contact between the soul and body, there is a certain spiritual contact between them (even as the mover of the heaven, being spiritual, touches the heaven, when it moves it, with a spiritual contact) in the same way as a "painful object is said to touch," as stated in De Gener. i. This mode of contact is sufficient for action.

Reply to Objection 8: The souls of the damned are never outside hell, except by Divine permission, either for the instruction or for the trial of the elect. And wherever they are outside hell they nevertheless always see the fire thereof as prepared for their punishment. Wherefore, since this vision is the immediate cause of their distress, as stated above, wherever they are, they suffer from hell-fire. Even so prisoners, though outside the prison, suffer somewhat from the prison, seeing themselves condemned thereto. Hence just as the glory of the elect is not diminished, neither as to the essential, nor as to the accidental reward, if they happen to be outside the empyrean, in fact this somewhat conduces to their glory, so the punishment of the damned is nowise diminished, if by God's permission they happen to be outside hell for a time. A gloss on James 3:6, "inflameth the wheel of our nativity," etc., is in agreement with this, for it is worded thus: "The devil, wherever he is, whether in the air or under the earth, drags with him the torments of his flames." But the objection argues as though the corporeal fire tortured the spirit immediately in the same way as it torments bodies.

OF THE SUFFRAGES FOR THE DEAD

Prologue

We must now consider the suffrages for the dead. Under this head there are fourteen points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether suffrages performed by one person can profit others?
- (2) Whether the dead can be assisted by the works of the living?
- (3) Whether the suffrages of sinners profit the dead?
- (4) Whether suffrages for the dead profit those who perform them?
- (5) Whether suffrages profit those who are in hell?
- (6) Whether they profit those who are in purgatory?
- (7) Whether they avail the children in limbo?
- (8) Whether in any way they profit those who are heaven?
- (9) Whether the prayer of the Church, the Sacrament of the altar, and almsgiving profit the departed?
- (10) Whether indulgences granted by the Church profit them?
- (11) Whether the burial service profits the departed?
- (12) Whether suffrages for one dead person profit that person more than others?
- (13) Whether suffrages for many avail each one as much as if they were offered for each individual?

(14) Whether general suffrages avail those for whom special suffrages are not offered, as much as special and general suffrages together avail those for whom they are offered?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the suffrages of one person can profit others?

Objection 1: It would seem that the suffrages of one person cannot profit others. For it is written (Gal. 6:8): "What things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap." Now if one person reaped fruit from the suffrages of another, he would reap from another's sowing. Therefore a person receives no fruit from the suffrages of others.

Objection 2: Further, it belongs to God's justice, that each one should receive according to his merits, wherefore the psalm (Ps. 61:13) says: "Thou wilt render to every man according to his works." Now it is impossible for God's justice to fail. Therefore it is impossible for one man to be assisted by the works of another.

Objection 3: Further, a work is meritorious on the same count as it is praiseworthy, namely inasmuch as it is voluntary. Now one man is not praised for the work of another. Therefore neither can the work of one man be meritorious and fruitful for another.

Objection 4: Further, it belongs to Divine justice to repay good for good in the same way as evil for evil. But no man is punished for the evildoings of another; indeed, according to Ezech. 18:4, "the soul that sinneth, the same shall die." Therefore neither does one person profit by another's good.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 118:63): "I am a partaker with all them that fear Thee," etc.

Further, all the faithful united together by charity are members of the one body of the Church. Now one member is assisted by another. Therefore one man can be assisted by the merits of another.

I answer that, our actions can avail for two purposes. First, for acquiring a certain state; thus by a meritorious work a man obtains the state of bliss. Secondly, for something consequent upon a state; thus by some work a man merits an accidental reward, or a rebate of punishment. And for both these purposes our actions may avail in two ways: first, by way of merit; secondly, by way of prayer: the difference being that merit relies on justice, and prayer on mercy; since he who prays obtains his petition from the mere liberality of the one he prays. Accordingly we must say that the work of one person nowise can avail another for acquiring a state by way of merit, so that, to wit, a man be able to merit eternal life by the works which I do, because the share of glory is awarded according to the measure of the recipient, and each one is disposed by his own and not by another's actions---disposed, that is to say, by being worthy of reward. By way of prayer, however, the work of one may profit another while he is a wayfarer, even for acquiring a state; for instance, one man may obtain the first grace for another [FS, Question 114, Article 6]: and since the impetration of prayer depends on the liberality of God Whom we pray, it may extend to whatever is ordinately subject to the Divine power. On the other hand, as regards that which is consequent upon or accessory to a state, the work of one may avail another, not only by way of prayer but even by way of merit: and this happens in two ways. First, on account of their communion in the root of the work, which root is charity in meritorious works. Wherefore all who are united together by charity acquire some benefit from one another's works, albeit according to the measure of each one's state, since even in heaven each one will rejoice in the goods of others. Hence it is that the communion of saints is laid down as an article of faith. Secondly, through the intention of the doer who does certain works specially for the purpose that they may profit such persons: so that those works become somewhat the works of those for whom they are done, as though they were bestowed on them by the doer. Wherefore they can avail them either for the fulfillment of satisfaction or for some similar purpose that does not change their state.

Reply to Objection 1: This reaping is the receiving of eternal life, as stated in Jn. 4:36, "And he that reapeth . . . gathereth fruit unto life everlasting." Now a share of eternal life is not given to a man save for his own works, for although we may impetrate for another that he obtain life, this never happens except by means of his own works, when namely, at the prayers of one, another is given the grace whereby he merits eternal life.

Reply to Objection 2: The work that is done for another becomes his for whom it is done: and in like manner the work done by a man who is one with me is somewhat mine. Hence it is not contrary to Divine justice if a man receives the fruit of the works done by a man who is one with him in charity, or of works done for him. This also happens according to human justice, so that the satisfaction offered by one is accepted in lieu of another's.

Reply to Objection 3: Praise is not given to a person save according to his relation to an act, wherefore praise is "in relation to something" (Ethic. i, 12). And since no man is made or shown to be well- or ill-disposed to something by another's deed, it follows that no man is praised for another's deeds save accidentally in so far as he is somewhat the cause of those deeds, by giving counsel, assistance, inducement, or by any other means. on the other hand, a work is meritorious to a person, not only by reason of his disposition, but also in view of something consequent upon his disposition or state, as evidenced by what has been said.

Reply to Objection 4: It is directly contrary to justice to take away from a person that which is his due: but to give a person what is not his due is not contrary to justice, but surpasses the bounds of justice, for it is liberality. Now a person cannot be hurt by the ills of another, unless he be deprived of something of his own. Consequently it is not becoming that one should be punished for another's sins, as it is that one should acquire some advantage from deeds of another.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether the dead can be assisted by the works of the living?

Objection 1: It would seem that the dead cannot be assisted by the works of the living. First, because the Apostle says (2 Cor. 5:10): "We must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he hath done." Therefore nothing can accrue to a man from the works of others, which are done after his death and when he is no longer in the body.

Objection 2: Further, this also seems to follow from the words of Apoc. 14:13, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord . . . for their works follow them."

Objection 3: Further, it belongs only to one who is on the way to advance on account of some deed. Now after death men are no longer wayfarers, because to them the words of Job 19:8, refer: "He hath hedged in my path round about, and I cannot pass." Therefore the dead cannot be assisted by a person's suffrages.

Objection 4: Further, no one is assisted by the deed of another, unless there be some community of life between them. Now there is no community between the dead and the living, as the Philosopher says (Ethic. i, 11). Therefore the suffrages of the living do not profit the dead.

On the contrary are the words of 2 Macc. 12:46: "It is . . . a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead that they may be loosed from sins." But this would not be profitable unless it were a help to them. Therefore the suffrages of the living profit the dead.

Further, Augustine says (De Cure pro Mort. i): "Of no small weight is the authority of the Church whereby she clearly approves of the custom whereby a commendation of the dead has a place in the prayers which the priests pour forth to the Lord God at His altar." This custom was established by the apostles themselves according to the Damascene in a sermon on suffrages for the dead [De his qui in fide dormierunt, 3], where he expresses himself thus: "Realizing the nature of the Mysteries the disciples of the Saviour and His holy apostles sanctioned a commemoration of those who had died in the faith, being made in the awe-inspiring and life-giving Mysteries." This is also confirmed by the authority of Dionysius (Hier. Eccl.), where he mentions the rite of the Early Church in praying for the dead, and, moreover, asserts that the suffrages of the living profit the dead. Therefore we must believe this without any doubt.

I answer that, Charity, which is the bond uniting the members of the Church, extends not only to the living, but also to the dead who die in charity. For charity which is the life of the soul, even as the soul is the life of the body, has no end: "Charity never falleth away" (1 Cor. 13:8). Moreover, the dead live in the memory of the living: wherefore the intention of the living can be directed to them. Hence the suffrages of the living profit the dead in two ways even as they profit the living, both on account of the bond of charity and on account of the intention being directed to them. Nevertheless, we must not believe that the suffrages of the living profit them so as to change their state from unhappiness to happiness or "vice versa"; but they avail for the diminution of punishment or something of the kind that involves no change in the state of the dead.

Reply to Objection 1: Man while living in the body merited that such things should avail him after death. Wherefore if he is assisted thereby after this life, this is, nevertheless, the result of the things he has done in the body.

Or we may reply, according to John Damascene, in the sermon quoted above, that these words refer to the retribution which will be made at the final judgment, of eternal glory or eternal unhappiness: for then each one will receive only according as he himself has done in the body. Meanwhile, however, he can be assisted by the suffrages of the living.

Reply to Objection 2: The words quoted refer expressly to the sequel of eternal retribution as is clear from the opening words: "Blessed are the dead," etc. Or we may reply that deeds done on their behalf are somewhat their own, as stated above.

Reply to Objection 3: Although, strictly speaking, after death souls are not in the state of the way, yet in a certain respect they are still on the way, in so far as they are delayed awhile in their advance towards their final award. Wherefore, strictly speaking, their way is hedged in round about, so that they can no more be changed by any works in respect of the state of happiness or unhappiness. Yet their way is not so hedged around that they cannot be helped by others in the matter of their being delayed from receiving their final award, because in this respect they are still wayfarers.

Reply to Objection 4: Although the communion of civic deeds whereof the Philosopher speaks, is impossible between the dead and the living, because the dead are outside civic life, the communication of the spiritual life is possible between them, for that life is founded on charity towards God, to Whom the spirits of the dead live.

ARTICLE 3. Whether suffrages performed by sinners profit the dead?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages performed by sinners do not profit the dead. For, according to Jn. 9:31, "God doth not hear sinners." Now if their prayers were to profit those for whom they pray, they would be heard by God. Therefore the suffrages performed by them do not profit the dead.

Objection 2: Further, Gregory says (Pastoral i, 11) that "when an offensive person is sent to intercede, the wrath of the angered party is provoked to harsher measures." Now every sinner is offensive to God. Therefore God is not inclined to mercy by the suffrages of sinners, and consequently their suffrages are of no avail.

Objection 3: Further, a person's deed would seem to be more fruitful to the doer than to another. But a sinner merits naught for himself by his deeds. Much less, therefore, can he merit for another.

Objection 4: Further, every meritorious work must be a living work, that is to say, informed by charity. Now works done by sinners are dead. Therefore the dead for whom they are done cannot be assisted thereby.

Objection 5: On the contrary, No man can know for certain about another man whether the latter be in a state of sin or of grace. If, therefore, only those suffrages were profitable that are done by those who are in a state of grace, a man could not know of whom to ask suffrages for his dead, and consequently many would be deterred from obtaining suffrages.

Objection 6: Further, according to Augustine (Enchiridion cix), as quoted in the text (Sent. iv, D, 45), the dead are assisted by suffrages according as while living they merited to be assisted after death. Therefore the worth of suffrages is measured according to the disposition of the person for whom they are performed. Therefore it would appear that it differs not whether they be performed by good or by wicked persons.

I answer that, Two things may be considered in the suffrages performed by the wicked. First, the deed done, for instance the sacrifice of the altar. And since our sacraments have their efficacy from themselves independently of the deed of the doer, and are equally efficacious by whomsoever they are performed, in this respect the suffrages of the wicked profit the departed. Secondly, we may consider the deed of the doer, and then we must draw a distinction; because the deed of a sinner who offers suffrage may be considered---in one way in so far as it is his own deed, and thus it can nowise be meritorious either to himself or to another; in another way in so far as it is another's deed, and this happens in two ways. First, when the sinner, offering suffrages, represents the whole Church; for instance a priest when he performs the burial service in church. And since one in whose name or in whose stead a thing is done is understood to do it himself as Dionysius asserts (Coel. Hier. xiii), it follows that the suffrages of that priest, albeit a sinner, profit the departed. Secondly, when he acts as the instrument of another: for the work of the instrument belongs more to the principal agent. Wherefore, although he who acts as the instrument of another be not in a state of merit, his act may be meritorious on account of the principal agent: for instance if a servant being in sin do any work of mercy at the command of his master who has charity. Hence, if a person dying in charity command suffrages to be offered for him, or if some other person having charity prescribe them, those suffrages avail for the departed, even though the persons by whom they are performed be in sin. Nevertheless they would avail more if those persons were in charity, because then those works would be meritorious on two counts.

Reply to Objection 1: The prayer offered by a sinner is sometimes not his but another's, and consequently in this respect is worthy to be heard by God. Nevertheless, God sometimes hears sinners, when, to wit, they ask for something acceptable to God. For God dispenses His goods not only to the righteous but also to sinners (Mt. 5:45), not indeed on account of their merits, but of His loving kindness. Hence a gloss on Jn. 9:31, "God doth not hear sinners," says that "he speaks as one unanointed and as not seeing clearly."

Reply to Objection 2: Although the sinner's prayer is not acceptable in so far as he is offensive, it may be acceptable to God on account of another in whose stead or at whose command he offers the prayer.

Reply to Objection 3: The reason why the sinner who performs these suffrages gains nothing thereby is because he is not capable of profiting by reason of his own indisposition. Nevertheless, as stated above, it may in some way profit another, who is disposed.

Reply to Objection 4: Although the sinner's deed is not living in so far as it is his own, it may be living in so far as it is another's, as stated above.

Since, however, the arguments in the contrary sense would seem to show that it matters not whether one obtain suffrages from good or from evil persons, we must reply to them also.

Reply to Objection 5: Although one cannot know for certain about another whether he be in the state of salvation, one may infer it with probability from what one sees outwardly of a man: for a tree is known by its fruit (Mt. 7:16).

Reply to Objection 6: In order that suffrage avail another, it is requisite that the one for whom it is performed be capable of availing by it: and a man has become capable of this by his own works which he did in his life-time. This is what Augustine means to say. Nevertheless, those works must be such that they can profit him, and this depends not on the person for whom the suffrage is performed, but rather on the one who offers the suffrages whether by performing them or by commanding them.

ARTICLE 4. Whether suffrages offered by the living for the dead profit those who offer them?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages offered by the living for the dead do not profit those who offer them. For according to human justice a man is not absolved from his own debt if he pay a debt for another man. Therefore a man is not absolved from his own debt for the reason that by offering suffrages he has paid the debt of the one for whom he offered them.

Objection 2: Further, whatever a man does, he should do it as best he can. Now it is better to assist two than one. Therefore if one who by suffrages has paid the debt of a dead person is freed from his own debt, it would seem that one ought never to satisfy for oneself, but always for another.

Objection 3: Further, if the satisfaction of one who satisfies for another profits him equally with the one for whom he satisfies, it will likewise equally profit a third person if he satisfy for him at the same time, and likewise a fourth and so on. Therefore he might satisfy for all by one work of satisfaction; which is absurd.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 34:13): "My prayer shall be turned into my bosom." Therefore, in like manner, suffrages that are offered for others profit those who satisfy.

Further, the Damascene says in the sermon "On those who fell asleep in the faith: Just as when about to anoint a sick man with the ointment or other holy oil, first of all he, " namely the anointer, "shares in the anointing and thus proceeds to anoint the patient, so whoever strives for his neighbor's salvation first of all profits himself and afterwards his neighbor." And thus the question at issue is answered.

I answer that, The work of suffrage that is done for another may be considered in two ways. First, as expiating punishment by way of compensation which is a condition of satisfaction: and in this way the work of suffrage that is counted as belonging to the person for whom it is done, while absolving him from the debt of punishment, does not absolve the performer from his own debt of punishment, because in this compensation we have to consider the equality of justice: and this work of satisfaction can be equal to the one debt without being equal to the other, for the debts of two sinners require a greater satisfaction than the debt of one. Secondly, it may be considered as meriting eternal life, and this it has as proceeding from its root, which is charity: and in this way it profits not only the person for whom it is done, but also and still more the doer.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections: for the first considered the work of suffrage as a work of satisfaction, while the others consider it as meritorious.

ARTICLE 5. Whether suffrages profit those who are in hell?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages profit those who are in hell. For it is written (2 Macc. 12:40): "They found under the coats of the slain some of the donaries of the idols . . . which the law forbiddeth to the Jews," and yet we read further on (2 Macc. 12:43) that Judas "sent twelve thousand drachms of silver to Jerusalem . . . to be offered for the sins of the dead." Now it is clear that they sinned mortally through acting against the Law, and consequently that they died in mortal sin, and were taken to hell. Therefore suffrages profit those who are in hell.

Objection 2: Further, the text (Sent. iv, D, 45) quotes the saying of Augustine (Enchiridion cx) that "those whom suffrages profit gain either entire forgiveness, or at least an abatement of their damnation." Now only those who are in hell are said to be damned. Therefore suffrages profit even those who are in hell.

Objection 3: Further, Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier.): "If here the prayers of the righteous avail those who are alive, how much more do they, after death, profit those alone who are worthy of their holy prayers?" Hence we may gather that suffrages are more profitable to the dead than to the living. Now they profit the living even though they be in mortal sin, for the Church prays daily for sinners that they be converted to God. Therefore suffrages avail also for the dead who are in mortal sin.

Objection 4: Further, in the Lives of the Fathers (iii, 172; vi, 3) we read, and the Damascene relates in his sermon [De his qui in fide dormierunt] that Macarius discovered the skull of a dead man on the road, and that after praying he asked whose head it was, and the head replied that it had belonged to a pagan priest who was condemned to hell; and yet he confessed that he and others were assisted by the prayers of Macarius. Therefore the suffrages of the Church profit even those who are in hell.

Objection 5: Further, the Damascene in the same sermon relates that Gregory, while praying for Trajan, heard a voice from heaven saying to him: "I have heard thy voice, and I pardon Trajan": and of this fact the Damascene adds in the same sermon, "the whole East and West are witnesses." Yet it is clear that Trajan was in hell, since "he put many martyrs to a cruel death" [De his qui fide dormierunt]. Therefore the suffrages of the Church avail even for those who are in hell.

On the contrary, Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. vii): "The high priest prays not for the unclean, because by so doing he would act counter to the Divine order," and consequently he says (Eccl. Hier. vii) that "he prays not that sinners be forgiven, because his prayer for them would not be heard." Therefore suffrages avail not those who are in hell.

Further, Gregory says (Moral. xxxiv, 19): "There is the same reason for not praying then" (namely after the judgment day) "for men condemned to the everlasting fire, as there is now for not praying for the devil and his angels who are sentenced to eternal punishment, and for this reason the saints pray not for dead unbelieving and wicked men, because, forsooth, knowing them to be already condemned to eternal punishment, they shrink from pleading for them by the merit of their prayers before they are summoned to the presence of the just Judge."

Further, the text (Sent. iv, D, 45) quotes the words of Augustine (De Verb. A post. Serm. xxxii): "If a man depart this life without the faith that worketh by charity and its sacraments, in vain do his friends have recourse to such like acts of kindness." Now all the damned come under that head. Therefore suffrages profit them not.

I answer that, There have been three opinions about the damned. For some have said that a twofold distinction must be made in this matter. First, as to time; for they said that after the judgment day no one in hell will be assisted by any suffrage, but that before the judgment day some are assisted by the suffrages of the Church. Secondly, they made a distinction among those who are detained in hell. Some of these, they said, are very bad, those namely who have died without faith and the sacraments, and these, since they were not of the Church, neither "by grace nor, by name" [Oratio ad Vesperas, Fer. ii, post Dom. Pass.] can the suffrages of the Church avail; while others are not very bad, those namely who belonged to the Church as actual members, who had the faith, frequented the sacraments and performed works generically good, and for these the suffrages of the Church ought to avail. Yet they were confronted with a difficulty which troubled them, for it would seem to follow from this (since the punishment of hell is finite in intensity although infinite in duration) that a multiplicity of suffrages would take away that punishment altogether, which is the error of Origen (Peri Archon. i; cf. Gregory, Moral. xxxiv): and consequently endeavored in various ways to avoid this difficulty.

Praepositivus [Gilbert Prevostin, Chancellor of the See of Paris] said that suffrages for the damned can be so multiplied that they are entirely freed from punishment, not absolutely as Origen maintained, but for a time, namely till the judgment day: for their souls will be reunited to their bodies, and will be cast back into the punishments of hell without hope of pardon. But this opinion seems incompatible with Divine providence, which leaves nothing inordinate in the world. For guilt cannot be restored to order save by punishment: wherefore it is impossible for punishment to cease, unless first of all guilt be expiated: so that, as guilt remains for ever in the damned, their punishment will nowise be interrupted.

For this reason the followers of Gilbert de la Porree devised another explanation. These said that the process in the diminution of punishments by suffrages is as the process in dividing a line, which though finite, is indefinitely divisible, and is never destroyed by division, if it be diminished not by equal but by proportionate quantities, for instance if we begin by taking away a quarter of the whole, and secondly, a quarter of that quarter, and then a quarter of this second quarter, and so on indefinitely. In like manner, they say by the first suffrage a certain proportion of the punishment is taken away, and by the second an equally proportionate part of the remainder. But this explanation is in many ways defective. First, because it seems that indefinite division which is applicable to continuous quantity cannot be transferred to spiritual quantity: secondly, because there is no reason why the second suffrage, if it be of equal worth, should diminish the punishment less than the first: thirdly, because punishment cannot be diminished unless guilt be diminished, even as it cannot be done away unless the guilt be done away: fourthly, because in the division of a line we come at length to something which is not sensible, for a sensible body is not indefinitely divisible: and thus it would follow that after many suffrages the remaining punishment would be so little as not to be felt, and thus would no longer be a punishment.

Hence others found another explanation. For Antissiodorensis [William of Auxerre, Archdeacon of Beauvais] (Sent. iv, Tract. 14) said that suffrages profit the damned not by diminishing or interrupting their punishment, but by fortifying the person punished: even as a man who is carrying a heavy load might bathe his face in water, for thus he would be enabled to carry it better, and yet his load would be none the lighter. But this again is impossible, because according to Gregory (Moral. ix) a man suffers more or less from the eternal fire according as his guilt deserves; and consequently some suffer more, some less, from the same fire. wherefore since the guilt of the damned remains unchanged, it cannot be that he suffers less punishment. Moreover, the aforesaid opinion is presumptuous, as being in opposition to the statements of holy men, and groundless as being based on no authority. It is also unreasonable. First, because the damned in hell are cut off from the bond of charity in virtue of which the departed are in touch with the works of the living. Secondly, because they have entirely come to the end of life, and have received the final award for their merits, even as the saints who are in heaven. For the remaining punishment or glory of the body does not make them to be wayfarers, since glory essentially and radically resides in the soul. It is the same with the unhappiness of the damned, wherefore their punishment cannot be diminished as neither can the glory of the saints be increased as to the essential reward.

However, we may admit, in a certain measure, the manner in which, according to some, suffrages profit the damned, if it be said that they profit neither by diminishing nor interrupting their punishment, nor again by diminishing their sense of punishment, but by withdrawing from the damned some matter of grief, which matter they might have if they knew themselves to be so outcast as to be a care to no one; and this matter of grief is withdrawn from them when suffrages are offered for them. Yet even this is impossible according to the general law, because as Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. xiii)---and this applies especially to the damned---"the spirits of the departed are where they see nothing of what men do or of what happens to them in this life," and consequently they know not when suffrages are offered for them, unless this relief be granted from above to some of the damned in spite of the general law. This, however, is a matter of great uncertainty; wherefore it is safer to say simply that suffrages profit not the damned, nor does the Church intend to pray for them, as appears from the authors quoted above.

Reply to Objection 1: The donaries to the idols were not found on those dead so that they might be taken as a sign that they were carried off in reverence to the idols: but they took them as conquerors because they were due to them by right of war. They sinned, however, venially by covetousness: and consequently they were not damned in hell, and thus suffrages could profit them. or we may say, according to some, that in the midst of fighting, seeing they were in danger, they repented of their sin, according to Ps. 77:34, "When He slew them, then they sought Him": and this is a probable opinion. Wherefore the offering was made for them.

Reply to Objection 2: In these words damnation is taken in a broad sense for any kind of punishment, so as to include also the punishment of purgatory which is sometimes entirely expiated by suffrages, and sometimes not entirely, but diminished.

Reply to Objection 3: Suffrage for a dead person is more acceptable than for a living person, as regards his being in greater want, since he cannot help himself as a living person can. But a living person is better off in that he can be taken from the state of mortal sin to the state of grace, which cannot be said of the dead. Hence there is not the same reason for praying for the dead as for the living.

Reply to Objection 4: This assistance did not consist in a diminishment of their punishment, but in this alone (as stated in the same place) that when he prayed they were permitted to see one another, and in this they had a certain joy, not real but imaginary, in the fulfillment of their desire. Even so the demons are said to rejoice when they draw men into sin, although this nowise diminishes their punishment, as neither is the joy of the angels diminished by the fact that they take pity on our ills.

Reply to Objection 5: Concerning the incident of Trajan it may be supposed with probability that he was recalled to life at the prayers of blessed Gregory, and thus obtained the grace whereby he received the pardon of his sins and in consequence was freed from punishment. The same applies to all those who were miraculously raised from the dead, many of whom were evidently idolaters and damned. For we must needs say likewise of all such persons that they were consigned to hell, not finally, but as was actually due to their own merits according to justice: and that according to higher causes, in view of which it was foreseen that they would be recalled to life, they were to be disposed of otherwise.

Or we may say with some that Trajan's soul was not simply freed from the debt of eternal punishment, but that his punishment was suspended for a time, that is, until the judgment day. Nor does it follow that this is the general result of suffrages, because things happen differently in accordance with the general law from that which is permitted in particular cases and by privilege. Even so the bounds of human affairs differ from those of the miracles of the Divine power as Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. xvi).

ARTICLE 6. Whether suffrages profit those who are in purgatory?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages do not profit even those who are in purgatory. For purgatory is a part of hell. Now "there is no redemption in hell" [Office of the Dead, Resp. vii], and it is written (Ps. 6:6), "Who shall confess to Thee in hell?" Therefore suffrages do not profit those who are in purgatory.

Objection 2: Further, the punishment of purgatory is finite. Therefore if some of the punishment is abated by suffrages, it would be possible to have such a great number of suffrages, that the punishment would be entirely remitted, and consequently the sin entirely unpunished: and this would seem incompatible with Divine justice.

Objection 3: Further, souls are in purgatory in order that they may be purified there, and being pure may come to the kingdom. Now nothing can be purified, unless something be done to it. Therefore suffrages offered by the living do not diminish the punishment of purgatory.

Objection 4: Further, if suffrages availed those who are in purgatory, those especially would seem to avail them which are offered at their behest. Yet these do not always avail: for instance, if a person before dying were to provide for so many suffrages to be offered for him that if they were offered they would suffice for the remission of his entire punishment. Now supposing these suffrages to be delayed until he is released from punishment, they will profit him nothing. For it cannot be said that they profit him before they are discharged; and after they are fulfilled, he no longer needs them, since he is already released. Therefore suffrages do not avail those who are in purgatory.

On the contrary, As quoted in the text (Sent. iv, D, 45), Augustine says (Enchiridion cx): "Suffrages profit those who are not very good or not very bad." Now such are those who are detained in purgatory. Therefore, etc.

Further, Dionysius says (Eccl. Hier. vii) that the "godlike priest in praying for the departed prays for those who lived a holy life, and yet contracted certain stains through human frailty." Now such persons are detained in purgatory. Therefore, etc.

I answer that, The punishment of purgatory is intended to supplement the satisfaction which was not fully completed in the body. Consequently, since, as stated above (Articles 1,2; Question 13, Article 2), the works of one person can avail for another's satisfaction, whether the latter be living or dead, the suffrages of the living, without any doubt, profit those who are in purgatory.

Reply to Objection 1: The words quoted refer to those who are in the hell of the damned, where there is no redemption for those who are finally consigned to that punishment. We may also reply with Damascene (Serm.: De his qui in fide dormierunt) that such statements are to be explained with reference to the lower causes, that is according to the demands of the merits of those who are consigned to those punishments. But according to the Divine mercy which transcends human merits, it happens otherwise through the prayers of the righteous, than is implied by the expressions quoted in the aforesaid authorities. Now "God changes His sentence but not his counsel," as Gregory says (Moral. xx): wherefore the Damascene (Serm.: De his qui in fide dormierunt) quotes as instances of this the Ninevites, Achab and Ezechias, in whom it is apparent that the sentence pronounced against them by God was commuted by the Divine mercy [FP, Question 19, Article 7, ad 2].

Reply to Objection 2: It is not unreasonable that the punishment of those who are in purgatory be entirely done away by the multiplicity of suffrages. But it does not follow that the sins remain unpunished, because the punishment of one undertaken in lieu of another is credited to that other.

Reply to Objection 3: The purifying of the soul by the punishment of purgatory is nothing else than the expiation of the guilt that hinders it from obtaining glory. And since, as stated above (Question 13, Article 2), the guilt of one person can be expiated by the punishment which another undergoes in his stead, it is not unreasonable that one person be purified by another satisfying for him.

Reply to Objection 4: Suffrages avail on two counts, namely the action of the agent ["Ex opere operante" and "ex opere operato"] and the action done. By action done I mean not only the sacrament of the Church, but the effect incidental to that action---thus from the giving of alms there follow the relief of the poor and their prayer to God for the deceased. In like manner the action of the agent may be considered in relation either to the principal agent or to the executor. I say, then, that the dying person, as soon as he provides for certain suffrages to be offered for him, receives the full meed of those suffrages, even before they are discharged, as regards the efficacy of the suffrages that results from the action as proceeding from the principal agent. But as regards the efficacy of the suffrages arising from the action done or from the action as proceeding from the executor, he does not receive the fruit before the suffrages are discharged. And if, before this, he happens to be released from his punishment, he will in this respect be deprived of the fruit of the suffrages, and this will fall back upon those by whose fault he was then defrauded. For it is not unreasonable that a person be defrauded in temporal matters by another's fault---and the punishment of purgatory is temporal---although as regards the eternal retribution none can be defrauded save by his own fault.

ARTICLE 7. Whether suffrages avail the children who are in limbo?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages avail the children who are in limbo. For they are not detained there except for another's sin. Therefore it is most becoming that they should be assisted by the suffrages of others.

Objection 2: Further, in the text (Sent. iv, D, 45) the words of Augustine (Enchiridion cx) are quoted: "The suffrages of the Church obtain forgiveness for those who are not very bad." Now children are not reckoned among those who are very bad, since their punishment is very light. Therefore the suffrages of the Church avail them.

On the contrary, The text (Sent. iv, D, 45) quotes Augustine as saying (Serm. xxxii, De Verb Ap.) that "suffrages avail not those who have departed hence without the faith that works by love." Now the children departed thus. Therefore suffrages avail them not.

I answer that, Unbaptized children are not detained in limbo save because they lack the state of grace. Hence, since the state of the dead cannot be changed by the works of the living, especially as regards the merit of the essential reward or punishment, the suffrages of the living cannot profit the children in limbo.

Reply to Objection 1: Although original sin is such that one person can be assisted by another on its account, nevertheless the souls of the children in limbo are in such a state that they cannot be assisted, because after this life there is no time for obtaining grace.

Reply to Objection 2: Augustine is speaking of those who are not very bad, but have been baptized. This is clear from what precedes: "Since these sacrifices, whether of the altar or of any alms whatsoever are offered for those who have been baptized," etc.

ARTICLE 8. Whether suffrages profit the saints in heaven?

Objection 1: It would seem that in some way suffrages profit the saints in heaven; on account of the words of the Collect in the Mass [Postcommunion, Feast of St. Andrew, Apostle]: "Even as they" (i.e. the sacraments) "avail thy saints unto glory, so may they profit us unto healing." Now foremost among all suffrages is the sacrifice of the altar. Therefore suffrages profit the saints in heaven.

Objection 2: Further, the sacraments cause what they signify. Now the third part of the host, that namely which is dropped into the chalice, signifies those who lead a happy life in heaven. Therefore the suffrages of the Church profit those who are in heaven.

Objection 3: Further, the saints rejoice in heaven not only in their own goods, but also in the goods of others: hence it is written (Lk. 15:10): "There is joy before the angels of God upon one sinner doing penance." Therefore the joy of the saints in heaven increases on account of the good works of the living: and consequently our suffrages also profit them.

Objection 4: Further, the Damascene says (Serm.: De his qui in fide dormierunt) quoting the words of Chrysostom: "For if the heathens," he says, "burn the dead together with what has belonged to them, how much more shouldst thou, a believer, send forth a believer together with what has belonged to him, not that they also may be brought to ashes like him, but that thou mayest surround him with greater glory by so doing; and if he be a sinner who has died, that thou mayest loose him from his sins, and if he be righteous, that thou mayest add to his meed and reward!" And thus the same conclusion follows.

On the contrary, As quoted in the text (Sent. iv, D, 15), Augustine says (De Verb Ap., Serm. xvii): "It is insulting to pray for a martyr in church, since we ought to commend ourselves to his prayers."

Further, to be assisted belongs to one who is in need. But the saints in heaven are without any need whatever. Therefore they are not assisted by the suffrages of the Church.

I answer that, Suffrage by its very nature implies the giving of some assistance, which does not apply to one who suffers no default: since no one is competent to be assisted except he who is in need. Hence, as the saints in heaven are free from all need, being inebriated with the plenty of God's house (Ps. 35:10), they are not competent to be assisted by suffrages.

Reply to Objection 1: Such like expressions do not mean that the saints receive an increase of glory in themselves through our observing their feasts, but that we profit thereby in celebrating their glory with greater solemnity. Thus, through our knowing or praising God, and through His glory thus increasing some what in us, there accrues something, not to God, but to us.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the sacraments cause what they signify, they do not produce this effect in respect of everything that they signify: else, since they signify Christ, they would produce something in Christ (which is absurd). But they produce their effect on the recipient of the sacrament in virtue of that which is signified by the sacrament. Thus it does not follow that the sacrifices offered for the faithful departed profit the saints, but that by the merits of the saints which we commemorate, or which are signified in the sacrament, they profit others for whom they are offered.

Reply to Objection 3: Although the saints in heaven rejoice in all our goods, it does not follow, that if our joys be increased their joy is also increased formally, but only materially, because every passion is increased formally in respect of the formal aspect of its object. Now the formal aspect of the saints' joy, no matter what they rejoice in, is God Himself, in Whom they cannot rejoice more and less, for otherwise their essential reward, consisting of their joy in God, would vary. Hence from the fact that the goods are multiplied, wherein they rejoice with God as the formal aspect of their joy, it does not follow that their joy is intensified, but that they rejoice in more things. Consequently it does not follow that they are assisted by our works.

Reply to Objection 4: The sense is not that an increase of meed or reward accrues to the saint from the suffrages offered by a person, but that this accrues to the offerer. Or we may reply that the blessed departed may derive a reward from suffrages through having, while living, provided for suffrage to be offered for himself, and this was meritorious for him.

ARTICLE 9. Whether the prayers of the Church, the sacrifice of the altar and alms profit the departed?

Objection 1: It would seem that the souls of the departed are not assisted only by the prayers of the Church, the sacrifice of the altar and alms, or that they are not assisted by them chiefly. For punishment should compensate for punishment. Now fasting is more penal than almsgiving or prayer. Therefore fasting profits more as suffrage than any of the above.

Objection 2: Further, Gregory reckons fasting together with these three, as stated in the Decretals (xiii, Q. ii, Cap. 22): "The souls of the departed are released in four ways, either by the offerings of priests, or the alms of their friends, or the prayers of the saints, or the fasting of their kinsfolk." Therefore the three mentioned above are insufficiently reckoned by Augustine (De Cura pro Mort. xviii).

Objection 3: Further, Baptism is the greatest of the sacraments, especially as regards its effect. Therefore Baptism and other sacraments ought to be offered for the departed equally with or more than the Sacrament of the altar.

Objection 4: Further, this would seem to follow from the words of 1 Cor. 15:29, "If the dead rise not again at all, why are they then baptized for them?" Therefore Baptism avails as suffrage for the dead.

Objection 5: Further, in different Masses there is the same Sacrifice of the altar. If, therefore, sacrifice, and not the Mass, be reckoned among the suffrages, it would seem that the effect would be the same whatever Mass be said for a deceased person, whether in honor of the Blessed Virgin or of the Holy Ghost, or any other. Yet this seems contrary to the ordinance of the Church which has appointed a special Mass for the dead.

Objection 6: Further, the Damascene (Serm.: De his qui in fide dormierunt) teaches that candles and oil should be offered for the dead. Therefore not only the offering of the sacrifice of the altar, but also other offerings should be reckoned among suffrages for the dead.

I answer that, The suffrages of the living profit the dead in so far as the latter are united to the living in charity, and in so far as the intention of the living is directed to the dead. Consequently those whose works are by nature best adapted to assist the dead, which pertain chiefly to the communication of charity, or to the directing of one's intention to another person. Now the sacrament of the Eucharist belongs chiefly to charity, since it is the sacrament of ecclesiastical unity, inasmuch as it contains Him in Whom the whole Church is united and incorporated, namely Christ: wherefore the Eucharist is as it were the origin and bond of charity. Again, chief among the effects of charity is the work of almsgiving: wherefore on the part of charity these two, namely the sacrifice of the Church and almsgiving are the chief suffrages for the dead. But on the part of the intention directed to the dead the chief suffrage is prayer, because prayer by its very nature implies relation not only to the person who prays, even as other works do, but more directly still to that which we pray for. Hence these three are reckoned the principal means of succoring the dead, although we must allow that any other goods whatsoever that are done out of charity for the dead are profitable to them.

Reply to Objection 1: When one person satisfies for another, the point to consider, in order that the effect of his satisfaction reach the other, is the thing whereby the satisfaction of one passes to another, rather than even the punishment undergone by way of satisfaction; although the punishment expiates more the guilt of the one who satisfies, in so far as it is a kind of medicine. And consequently the three aforesaid are more profitable to the departed than fasting.

Reply to Objection 2: It is true that fasting can profit the departed by reason of charity, and on account of the intention being directed to the departed. Nevertheless, fasting does not by its nature contain anything pertaining to charity or to the directing of the intention, and these things are extrinsic thereto as it were, and for this reason Augustine did not reckon, while Gregory did reckon, fasting among the suffrages for the dead.

Reply to Objection 3: Baptism is a spiritual regeneration, wherefore just as by generation being does not accrue save to the object generated, so Baptism produces its effect only in the person baptized, as regards the deed done: and yet as regards the deed of the doer whether of the baptizer or of the baptized, it may profit others even as other meritorious works. On the other hand, the Eucharist is the sign of ecclesiastical unity, wherefore by reason of the deed done its effect can pass to another, which is not the case with the other sacraments.

Reply to Objection 4: According to a gloss this passage may be expounded in two ways. First, thus: "If the dead rise not again, nor did Christ rise again, why are they baptized for them? i.e. for sins, since they are not pardoned if Christ rose not again, because in Baptism not only Christ's passion but also His resurrection operates, for the latter is in a sense the cause of our spiritual resurrection." Secondly, thus: There have been some misguided persons who were baptized for those who had departed this life without baptism, thinking that this would profit them: and according to this explanation the Apostle is speaking, in the above words, merely according to the opinion of certain persons.

Reply to Objection 5: In the office of the Mass there is not only a sacrifice but also prayers. Hence the suffrage of the Mass contains two of the things mentioned by Augustine (De Cura pro Mort. xviii), namely "prayer" and "sacrifice." As regards the sacrifice offered the Mass profits equally the departed, no matter in whose honor it be said: and this is the principal thing done in the Mass. But as regards the prayers, that Mass is most profitable in which the prayers are appointed for this purpose. Nevertheless, this defect may be supplied by the greater devotion, either of the one who says Mass, or of the one who orders the Mass to be said, or again, by the intercession of the saint whose suffrage is besought in the Mass.

Reply to Objection 6: This offering of candles or oil may profit the departed in so far as they are a kind of alms: for they are given for the worship of the Church or for the use of the faithful.

ARTICLE 10. Whether the indulgences of the Church profit the dead?

Objection 1: It would seem that the indulgences granted by the Church profit even the dead. First, on account of the custom of the Church, who orders the preaching of a crusade in order that some one may gain an indulgence for himself and for two or three and sometimes even ten souls, both of the living and of the dead. But this would amount to a deception unless they profited the dead. Therefore indulgences profit the dead.

Objection 2: Further, the merit of the whole Church is more efficacious than that of one person. Now personal merit serves as a suffrage for the departed, for instance in the case of almsgiving. Much more therefore does the merit of the Church whereon indulgences are founded.

Objection 3: Further, the indulgences of the Church profit those who are members of the Church. Now those who are in purgatory are members of the Church, else the suffrages of the Church would not profit them. Therefore it would seem that indulgences profit the departed.

On the contrary, In order that indulgences may avail a person, there must be a fitting cause for granting the indulgence [Question 25, Article 2]. Now there can be no such cause on the part of the dead, since they can do nothing that is of profit to the Church, and it is for such a cause that indulgences are chiefly granted. Therefore, seemingly, indulgences profit not the dead.

Further, indulgences are regulated according to the decision of the party who grants them. If, therefore, indulgences could avail the dead, it would be in the power of the party granting them to release a deceased person entirely from punishment: which is apparently absurd.

I answer that, An indulgence may profit a person in two ways: in one way, principally; in another, secondarily. It profits principally the person who avails himself of an indulgence, who, namely, does that for which the indulgence is granted, for instance one who visits the shrine of some saint. Hence since the dead can do none of those things for which indulgences are granted, indulgences cannot avail them directly. However, they profit secondarily and indirectly the person for whom one does that which is the cause of the indulgence. This is sometimes feasible and sometimes not, according to the different forms of indulgence. For if the form of indulgence be such as this: "Whosoever does this or that shall gain so much indulgence," he who does this cannot transfer the fruit of the indulgence to another, because it is not in his power to apply to a particular person the intention of the Church who dispenses the common suffrages whence indulgences derive their value, as stated above (Question 27, Article 3, ad 2). If, however, the indulgence be granted in this form: "Whosoever does this or that, he, his father, or any other person connected with him and detained in purgatory, will gain so much indulgence," an indulgence of this kind will avail not only a living but also a deceased person. For there is no reason why the Church is able to transfer the common merits, whereon indulgences are based, to the living and not to the dead. Nor does it follow that a prelate of the Church can release souls from purgatory just as he lists, since for indulgences to avail there must be a fitting cause for granting them, as stated above (Question 26, Article 3).

ARTICLE 11. Whether the burial service profits the dead?

Objection 1: It would seem that the burial service profits the dead. For Damascene (Serm.: De his qui in fide dormierunt) quotes Athanasius as saying: "Even though he who has departed in godliness be taken up to heaven, do not hesitate to call upon God and to burn oil and wax at his tomb; for such things are pleasing to God and receive a great reward from Him." Now the like pertain to the burial service. Therefore the burial service profits the dead.

Objection 2: Further, according to Augustine (De Cura pro mort. iii), "In olden times the funerals of just men were cared for with dutiful piety, their obsequies celebrated, their graves provided, and themselves while living charged their children touching the burial or even the translation of their bodies." But they would not have done this unless the tomb and things of this kind conferred something on the dead. Therefore the like profit the dead somewhat.

Objection 3: Further, no one does a work of mercy on some one's behalf unless it profit him. Now burying the dead is reckoned among the works of mercy, therefore Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. iii): "Tobias, as attested by the angel, is declared to have found favor with God by burying the dead." Therefore such like burial observances profit the dead.

Objection 4: Further, it is unbecoming to assert that the devotion of the faithful is fruitless. Now some, out of devotion, arrange for their burial in some religious locality. Therefore the burial service profits the dead.

Objection 5: Further, God is more inclined to pity than to condemn. Now burial in a sacred place is hurtful to some if they be unworthy: wherefore Gregory says (Dial. iv): "If those who are burdened with grievous sins are buried in the church this will lead to their more severe condemnation rather than to their release." Much more, therefore, should we say that the burial service profits the good.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. iii): "Whatever service is done the body is no aid to salvation, but an office of humanity."

Further, Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. iii; De Civ. Dei i): "The funereal equipment, the disposition of the grace, the solemnity of the obsequies are a comfort to the living rather than a help to the dead."

Further, Our Lord said (Lk. 12:4): "Be not afraid of them who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do." Now after death the bodies of the saints can be hindered from being buried, as we read of having been done to certain martyrs at Lyons in Gaul (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. v, 1). Therefore the dead take no harm if their bodies remain unburied: and consequently the burial service does not profit them.

I answer that, We have recourse to burial for the sake of both the living and the dead. For the sake of the living, lest their eyes be revolted by the disfigurement of the corpse, and their bodies be infected by the stench, and this as regards the body. But it profits the living also spiritually inasmuch as our belief in the resurrection is confirmed thereby. It profits the dead in so far as one bears the dead in mind and prays for them through looking on their burial place, wherefore a "monument" takes its name from remembrance, for a monument is something that recalls the mind [monens mentem], as Augustine observes (De Civ. Dei i; De Cura pro Mort. iv). It was, however, a pagan error that burial was profitable to the dead by procuring rest for his soul: for they believed that the soul could not be at rest until the body was buried, which is altogether ridiculous and absurd.

That, moreover, burial in a sacred place profits the dead, does not result from the action done, but rather from the action itself of the doer: when, to wit, the dead person himself, or another, arranges for his body to be buried in a sacred place, and commends him to the patronage of some saint, by whose prayers we must believe that he is assisted, as well as to the suffrages of those who serve the holy place, and pray more frequently and more specially for those who are buried in their midst. But such things as are done for the display of the obsequies are profitable to the living, as being a consolation to them; and yet they can also profit the dead, not directly but indirectly, in so far as men are aroused to pity thereby and consequently to pray, or in so far as the outlay on the burial brings either assistance to the poor or adornment to the church: for it is in this sense that the burial of the dead is reckoned among the works of mercy.

Reply to Objection 1: By bringing oil and candles to the tombs of the dead we profit them indirectly, either as offering them to the Church and as giving them to the poor, or as doing this in reverence of God. Hence, after the words quoted we read: "For oil and candles are a holocaust."

Reply to Objection 2: The fathers of old arranged for the burial of their bodies, so as to show that "the bodies of the dead" are the object of Divine providence, not that there is any feeling in a dead body, but in order to confirm the belief in the resurrection, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei i, 13). Hence, also, they wished to be buried in the land of promise, where they believed Christ's birth and death would take place, Whose resurrection is the cause of our rising again.

Reply to Objection 3: Since flesh is a part of man's nature, man has a natural affection for his flesh, according to Eph. 5:29, "No man ever hated his own flesh." Hence in accordance with this natural affection a man has during life a certain solicitude for what will become of his body after death: and he would grieve if he had a presentiment that something untoward would happen to his body. Consequently those who love a man, through being conformed to the one they love in his affection for himself, treat his body with loving care. For as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei i, 13): "If a father's garment and ring, and whatever such like is the more dear to those whom they leave behind the greater their affection is towards their parents, in no wise are the bodies themselves to be spurned which truly we wear in more familiar and close conjunction than anything else we put on."

Reply to Objection 4: As Augustine says (De Cura pro Mort. iv), the devotion of the faithful is not fruitless when they arrange for their friends to be buried in holy places, since by so doing they commend their dead to the suffrages of the saints, as stated above.

Reply to Objection 5: The wicked man dead takes no harm by being buried in a holy place, except in so far as he rendered such a burial place unfitting for him by reason of human glory.

ARTICLE 12. Whether suffrages offered for one deceased person profit the person for whom they are offered more than others?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages offered for one deceased person are not more profitable to the one for whom they are offered, than to others. For spiritual light is more communicable than a material light. Now a material light, for instance of a candle, though kindled for one person only, avails equally all those who are gathered together, though the candle be not lit for them. Therefore, since suffrages are a kind of spiritual light, though they be offered for one person in particular, do not avail him any more than the others who are in purgatory.

Objection 2: Further, as stated in the text (Sent. iv, D, 45), suffrages avail the dead "in so far as during this life they merited that they might avail them afterwards" [St. Augustine, Enchiridion cx]. Now some merited that suffrages might avail them more than those for whom they are offered. Therefore they profit more by those suffrages, else their merits would be rendered unavailing.

Objection 3: Further, the poor have not so many suffrages given them as the rich. Therefore if the suffrages offered for certain people profit them alone, or profit them more than others, the poor would be worse off: yet this is contrary to our Lord's saying (Lk. 6:20): "Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God."

On the contrary, Human justice is copied from Divine justice. But if a person pay another's debt human justice releases the latter alone. Therefore since he who offers suffrages for another pays the debt, in a sense, of the person for whom he offers them, they profit this person alone.

Further, just as a man by offering suffrages satisfies somewhat for a deceased person, so, too, sometimes a person can satisfy for a living person. Now where one satisfies for a living person the satisfaction counts only for the person for whom it is offered. Therefore one also who offers suffrages profits him alone for whom he offers them.

I answer that, There have been two opinions on this question. Some, like Praepositivus, have said that suffrages offered for one particular person do avail chiefly, not the person for whom they are offered, but those who are most worthy. And they instanced a candle which is lit for a rich man and profits those who are with him no less than the rich man himself, and perhaps even more, if they have keener sight. They also gave the instance of a lesson which profits the person to whom it is given no more than others who listen with him, but perhaps profits these others more, if they be more intelligent. And if it were pointed out to them that in this case the Church's ordinance in appointing certain special prayers for certain persons is futile, they said that the Church did this to excite the devotion of the faithful, who are more inclined to offer special than common suffrages, and pray more fervently for their kinsfolk than for strangers.

Others, on the contrary, said that suffrages avail more those for whom they are offered. Now both opinions have a certain amount of truth: for the value of suffrages may be gauged from two sources. For their value is derived in the first place from the virtue of charity, which makes all goods common, and in this respect they avail more the person who is more full of charity, although they are not offered specially for him. In this way the value of suffrages regards more a certain inward consolation by reason of which one who is in charity rejoices in the goods of another after death in respect of the diminution of punishment; for after death there is no possibility of obtaining or increasing grace, whereas during life the works of others avail for this purpose by the virtue of charity. In the second place suffrages derive their value from being applied to another person by one's intention. In this way the satisfaction of one person counts for another, and there can be no doubt that thus they avail more the person for whom they are offered: in fact, they avail him alone in this way, because satisfaction, properly speaking, is directed to the remission of punishment. Consequently, as regards the remission of punishment, suffrages avail chiefly the person for whom they are offered, and accordingly there is more truth in the second opinion than in the first.

Reply to Objection 1: Suffrages avail, after the manner of a light, in so far as they reach the dead, who thereby receive a certain amount of consolation: and this is all the greater according as they are endowed with a greater charity. But in so far as suffrages are a satisfaction applied to another by the intention of the offerer, they do not resemble a light, but rather the payment of a debt: and it does not follow, if one person's debt be paid, that the debt of others is paid likewise.

Reply to Objection 2: Such a merit is conditional, for in this way they merited that suffrages would profit them if offered for them, and this was merely to render themselves fit recipients of those suffrages. It is therefore clear that they did not directly merit the assistance of those suffrages, but made themselves fit by their preceding merits to receive the fruit of suffrages. Hence it does not follow that their merit is rendered unavailing.

Reply to Objection 3: Nothing hinders the rich from being in some respects better off than the poor, for instance as regards the expiation of their punishment. But this is as nothing in comparison with the kingdom of heaven, where the poor are shown to be better off by the authority quoted.

ARTICLE 13. Whether suffrages offered for several are of as much value to each one as if they had been offered for each in particular?

Objection 1: It would seem that suffrages offered for several are of as much value to each one as if they had been offered for each in particular. For it is clear that if one person receives a lesson he loses nothing if others receive the lesson with him. Therefore in like manner a person for whom a suffrage is offered loses nothing if some one else is reckoned together with him: and consequently if it be offered for several, it is of as much value to each one as if it were offered for each in particular.

Objection 2: Further, it is to be observed that according to the common practice of the Church, when Mass is said for one deceased person, other prayers are added for other deceased persons. Now this would not be done, if the dead person for whom the Mass is said were to lose something thereby. Therefore the same conclusion follows as above.

Objection 3: Further, suffrages, especially of prayers, rely on the Divine power. But with God, just as it makes no difference whether He helps by means of many or by means of a few, so it differs not whether He assists many or a few. Therefore if the one same prayer be said for many, each one of them will receive as much assistance as one person would if that same prayer were said for him alone.

On the contrary, It is better to assist many than one. If therefore a suffrage offered for several is of as much value to each one as if it were offered for one alone, it would seem that the Church ought not to have appointed a Mass and prayer to be said for one person in particular, but that Mass ought always to be said for all the faithful departed: and this is evidently false.

Further, a suffrage has a finite efficiency. Therefore if it be divided among many it avails less for each one than if it were offered for one only.

I answer that, If the value of suffrages be considered according as it is derived from the virtue of charity uniting the members of the Church together, suffrages offered for several persons avail each one as much as if they were offered for one alone, because charity is not diminished if its effect be divided among many, in fact rather is it increased; and in like manner joy increases through being shared by many, as Augustine says (Confess. viii). Consequently many in purgatory rejoice in one good deed no less than one does. On the other hand, if we consider the value of suffrages, inasmuch as they are a kind of satisfaction applied to the dead by the intention of the person offering them, then the suffrage for some person in particular avails him more than that which is offered for him in common with many others; for in this case the effect of the suffrages is divided in virtue of Divine justice among those for whom the suffrages are offered. Hence it is evident that this question depends on the first; and, moreover, it is made clear why special suffrages are appointed to be offered in the Church.

Reply to Objection 1: Suffrages considered as works of satisfaction do not profit after the manner of an action as teaching does; for teaching, like any other action, produces its effect according to the disposition of the recipient. But they profit after the manner of the payment of a debt, as stated above (Article 12, ad 1); and so the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 2: Since suffrages offered for one person avail others in a certain way, as stated (Article 1), it follows that when Mass is said for one person, it is not unfitting for prayers to be said for others also. For these prayers are said, not that the satisfaction offered by one suffrage be applied to those others chiefly, but that the prayer offered for them in particular may profit them also.

Reply to Objection 3: Prayer may be considered both on the part of the one who prays, and on the part of the person prayed: and its effect depends on both. Consequently though it is no more difficult to the Divine power to absolve many than to absolve one, nevertheless the prayer of one who prays thus is not as satisfactory for many as for one.

ARTICLE 14. Whether general suffrages avail those for whom special suffrages are not offered, as much as special suffrages avail those for whom they are offered in addition to general suffrages?

Objection 1: It would seem that general suffrages avail those for whom special suffrages are not offered, as much as special suffrages avail those for whom they are offered in addition to general suffrages. For in the life to come each one will be rewarded according to his merits. Now a person for whom no suffrages are offered merited to be assisted after death as much as one for whom special suffrages are offered. Therefore the former will be assisted by general suffrages as much as the latter by special and general suffrages.

Objection 3: Further, the Eucharist is the chief of the suffrages of the Church. Now the Eucharist, since it contains Christ whole, has infinite efficacy so to speak. Therefore one offering of the Eucharist for all in general is of sufficient value to release all who are in purgatory: and consequently general suffrages alone afford as much assistance as special and general suffrages together.

On the contrary, Two goods are more eligible than one. Therefore special suffrages, together with general suffrages, are more profitable to the person for whom they are offered than general suffrages alone.

I answer that, The reply to this question depends on that which is given to the twelfth inquiry (Article 12): for if the suffrages offered for one person in particular avail indifferently for all, then all suffrages are common; and consequently one for whom the special suffrages are not offered will be assisted as much as the one for whom they are offered, if he be equally worthy. On the other hand, if the suffrages offered for a person do not profit all indifferently, but those chiefly for whom they are offered, then there is no doubt that general and special suffrages together avail a person more than general suffrages alone. Hence the Master, in the text (Sent. iv, D, 45), mentions two opinions: one, when he says that a rich man derives from general, together with special suffrages, an equal profit to that which a poor man derives from special suffrages alone; for although the one receives assistance from more sources than the other, he does not receive a greater assistance: the other opinion he mentions when he says that a person for whom special suffrages are offered obtains a more speedy but not a more complete release, because each will be finally released from all punishment.

Reply to Objection 1: As stated above (Article 12, ad 2) the assistance derived from suffrages is not directly and simply an object of merit, but conditionally as it were: hence the argument does not prove.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the power of Christ Who is contained in the Sacrament of the Eucharist is infinite, yet there is a definite effect to which that sacrament is directed. Hence it does not follow that the whole punishment of those who are in purgatory is expiated by one sacrifice of the altar: even so, by the one sacrifice which a man offers, he is not released from the whole satisfaction due for his sins, wherefore sometimes several Masses are enjoined in satisfaction for one sin. Nevertheless, if any thing from special suffrages be left over for those for whom they are offered (for instance if they need them not) we may well believe that by God's mercy this is granted to others for whom those suffrages are not offered, if they need them: as affirmed by Damascene (Serm.: De his qui in fide dormierunt) who says: "Truly God, forasmuch as He is just will adapt ability to the disabled, and will arrange for an exchange of deficiencies": and this exchange is effected when what is lacking to one is supplied by another.

OF PRAYERS WITH REGARD TO THE SAINTS IN HEAVEN

Prologue

We must now consider prayer with regard to the saints in heaven.
Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the saints have knowledge of our prayers?
- (2) Whether we should beseech them to pray for us?
- (3) Whether the prayers they pour forth for us are always granted?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the saints have knowledge of our prayers?

Objection 1: It would seem that the saints have no knowledge of our prayers. For a gloss on Is. 62:16, "Thou art our father and Abraham hath not known us, and Israel hath been ignorant of us," says that "the dead saints know not what the living, even their own children, are doing." This is taken from Augustine (De Cura pro Mort. xiii), where he quotes the aforesaid authority, and the following are his words: "If such great men as the patriarchs knew not what was happening to the people begotten of them, how can the dead occupy themselves in watching and helping the affairs and actions of the living?" Therefore the saints cannot be cognizant of our prayers.

Objection 2: Further, the following words are addressed to King Joas (4 Kgs. 22:20): "Therefore" (i.e. because thou hast wept before Me), "I will gather thee to thy fathers . . . that thy eyes may not see all the evils which I will bring upon this place." But Joas would have gained no such advantage from his death if he were to know after death what was happening to his people. Therefore the saints after death know not our actions, and thus they are not cognizant of our prayers.

Objection 3: Further, the more perfect a man is in charity, the more he succors his neighbor when the latter is in danger. Now the saints, in this life, watch over their neighbor, especially their kinsfolk, when these are in danger, and manifestly assist them. Since then, after death, their charity is much greater, if they were cognizant of our deeds, much more would they watch over their friends and kindred and assist them in their needs: and yet, seemingly, they do not. Therefore it would seem that our deeds and prayers are not known to them.

Objection 4: Further, even as the saints after death see the Word, so do the angels of whom it is stated (Mt. 18:10) that "their angels in heaven always see the face of My Father." Yet the angels through seeing the Word do not therefore know all things, since the lower angels are cleansed from their lack of knowledge by the higher angels [FP, Question 106, Article 1], as Dionysius declares (Coel. Hier. vii). Therefore although the saints see the Word, they do not see therein our prayers and other things that happen in our regard.

Objection 5: Further, God alone is the searcher of hearts. Now prayer is seated chiefly in the heart. Therefore it belongs to God alone to know our prayers. Therefore our prayers are unknown to the saints.

On the contrary, Gregory, commenting on Job 14:21, "Whether his children come to honor or dishonor, he shall not understand," says (Moral. xii): "This does not apply to the souls of the saints, for since they have an insight of Almighty God's glory we must nowise believe that anything outside that glory is unknown to them." Therefore they are cognizant of our prayers. Further, Gregory says (Dial. ii): "All creatures are little to the soul that sees God: because however little it sees of the Creator's light, every created thing appears foreshortened to it." Now apparently the chief obstacle to the souls of the saints being cognizant of our prayers and other happenings in our regard is that they are far removed from us. Since then distance does not prevent these things, as appears from the authority quoted, it would seem that the souls of the saints are cognizant of our prayers and of what happens here below.

Further, unless they were aware of what happens in our regard they would not pray for us, since they would be ignorant of our needs. But this is the error of Vigilantius, as Jerome asserts in his letter against him. Therefore the saints are cognizant of what happens in our regard.

I answer that, The Divine essence is a sufficient medium for knowing all things, and this is evident from the fact that God, by seeing His essence, sees all things. But it does not follow that whoever sees God's essence knows all things, but only those who comprehend the essence of God [FP, Question 12, Articles 7,8]: even as the knowledge of a principle does not involve the knowledge of all that follows from that principle unless the whole virtue of the principle be comprehended. Wherefore, since the souls of the saints do not comprehend the Divine essence, it does not follow that they know all that can be known by the Divine essence---for which reason the lower angels are taught concerning certain matters by the higher angels, though they all see the essence of God; but each of the blessed must needs see in the Divine essence as many other things as the perfection of his happiness requires. For the perfection of a man's happiness requires him to have whatever he will, and to will nothing amiss: and each one wills with a right will, to know what concerns himself. Hence since no rectitude is lacking to the saints, they wish to know what concerns themselves, and consequently it follows that they know it in the Word. Now it pertains to their glory that they assist the needy for their salvation: for thus they become God's co-operators, "than which nothing is more Godlike," as Dionysius declares (Coel. Hier. iii). Wherefore it is evident that the saints are cognizant of such things as are required for this purpose; and so it is manifest that they know in the Word the vows, devotions, and prayers of those who have recourse to their assistance.

Reply to Objection 1: The saying of Augustine is to be understood as referring to the natural knowledge of separated souls, which knowledge is devoid of obscurity in holy men. But he is not speaking of their knowledge in the Word, for it is clear that when Isaias said this, Abraham had no such knowledge, since no one had come to the vision of God before Christ's passion.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the saints, after this life, know what happens here below, we must not believe that they grieve through knowing the woes of those whom they loved in this world: for they are so filled with heavenly joy, that sorrow finds no place in them. Wherefore if after death they know the woes of their friends, their grief is forestalled by their removal from this world before their woes occur. Perhaps, however, the non-glorified souls would grieve somewhat, if they were aware of the distress of their dear ones: and since the soul of Josias was not glorified as soon as it went out from his body, it is in this respect that Augustine uses this argument to show that the souls of the dead have no knowledge of the deeds of the living.

Reply to Objection 3: The souls of the saints have their will fully conformed to the Divine will even as regards the things willed. and consequently, although they retain the love of charity towards their neighbor, they do not succor him otherwise than they see to be in conformity with the disposition of Divine justice. Nevertheless, it is to be believed that they help their neighbor very much by interceding for him to God.

Reply to Objection 4: Although it does not follow that those who see the Word see all things in the Word, they see those things that pertain to the perfection of their happiness, as stated above.

Reply to Objection 5: God alone of Himself knows the thoughts of the heart: yet others know them, in so far as these are revealed to them, either by their vision of the Word or by any other means.

ARTICLE 2. Whether we ought to call upon the saints to pray for us?

Objection 1: It would seem that we ought not to call upon the saints to pray for us. For no man asks anyone's friends to pray for him, except in so far as he believes he will more easily find favor with them. But God is infinitely more merciful than any saint, and consequently His will is more easily inclined to give us a gracious hearing, than the will of a saint. Therefore it would seem unnecessary to make the saints mediators between us and God, that they may intercede for us.

Objection 2: Further, if we ought to beseech them to pray for us, this is only because we know their prayer to be acceptable to God. Now among the saints the holier a man is, the more is his prayer acceptable to God. Therefore we ought always to bespeak the greater saints to intercede for us with God, and never the lesser ones.

Objection 3: Further, Christ, even as man, is called the "Holy of Holies," and, as man, it is competent to Him to pray. Yet we never call upon Christ to pray for us. Therefore neither should we ask the other saints to do so.

Objection 4: Further, whenever one person intercedes for another at the latter's request, he presents his petition to the one with whom he intercedes for him. Now it is unnecessary to present anything to one to whom all things are present. Therefore it is unnecessary to make the saints our intercessors with God.

Objection 5: Further, it is unnecessary to do a thing if, without doing it, the purpose for which it is done would be achieved in the same way, or else not achieved at all. Now the saints would pray for us just the same, or would not pray for us at all, whether we pray to them or not: for if we be worthy of their prayers, they would pray for us even though we prayed not to them, while if we be unworthy they pray not for us even though we ask them to. Therefore it seems altogether unnecessary to call on them to pray for us.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 5:1): "Call . . . if there be any that will answer thee, and turn to some of the saints." Now, as Gregory says (Moral. v, 30) on this passage, "we call upon God when we beseech Him in humble prayer." Therefore when we wish to pray God, we should turn to the saints, that they may pray God for us.

Further, the saints who are in heaven are more acceptable to God than those who are on the way. Now we should make the saints, who are on the way, our intercessors with God, after the example of the Apostle, who said (Rm. 15:30): "I beseech you . . . brethren, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the charity of the Holy Ghost, that you help me in your prayers for me to God." Much more, therefore, should we ask the saints who are in heaven to help us by their prayers to God.

Further, an additional argument is provided by the common custom of the Church which asks for the prayers of the saints in the Litany.

I answer that, According to Dionysius (Eccl. Hier. v) the order established by God among things is that "the last should be led to God by those that are midway between." Wherefore, since the saints who are in heaven are nearest to God, the order of the Divine law requires that we, who while we remain in the body are pilgrims from the Lord, should be brought back to God by the saints who are between us and Him: and this happens when the Divine goodness pours forth its effect into us through them. And since our return to God should correspond to the outflow of His boons upon us, just as the Divine favors reach us by means of the saints intercession, so should we, by their means, be brought back to God, that we may receive His favors again. Hence it is that we make them our intercessors with God, and our mediators as it were, when we ask them to pray for us.

Reply to Objection 1: It is not on account of any defect in God's power that He works by means of second causes, but it is for the perfection of the order of the universe, and the more manifold outpouring of His goodness on things, through His bestowing on them not only the goodness which is proper to them, but also the faculty of causing goodness in others. Even so it is not through any defect in His mercy, that we need to bespeak His clemency through the prayers of the saints, but to the end that the aforesaid order in things be observed.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the greater saints are more acceptable to God than the lesser, it is sometimes profitable to pray to the lesser; and this for five reasons. First, because sometimes one has greater devotion for a lesser saint than for a greater, and the effect of prayer depends very much on one's devotion. Secondly, in order to avoid tediousness, for continual attention to one thing makes a person weary; whereas by praying to different saints, the fervor of our devotion is aroused anew as it were. Thirdly, because it is granted to some saints to exercise their patronage in certain special cases, for instance to Saint Anthony against the fire of hell. Fourthly, that due honor be given by us to all. Fifthly, because the prayers of several sometimes obtain that which would not have been obtained by the prayers of one.

Reply to Objection 3: Prayer is an act, and acts belong to particular persons [supposita]. Hence, were we to say: "Christ, pray for us," except we added something, this would seem to refer to Christ's person, and consequently to agree with the error either of Nestorius, who distinguished in Christ the person of the son of man from the person of the Son of God, or of Arius, who asserted that the person of the Son is less than the Father. Wherefore to avoid these errors the Church says not: "Christ, pray for us," but "Christ, hear us," or "have mercy on us."

Reply to Objection 4: As we shall state further on (Article 3) the saints are said to present our prayers to God, not as though they notified things unknown to Him, but because they ask God to grant those prayers a gracious hearing, or because they seek the Divine truth about them, namely what ought to be done according to His providence.

Reply to Objection 5: A person is rendered worthy of a saint's prayers for him by the very fact that in his need he has recourse to him with pure devotion. Hence it is not unnecessary to pray to the saints.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the prayers which the saints pour forth to God for us are always granted?

Objection 1: It would seem that the prayers which the saints pour forth to God for us are not always granted. For if they were always granted, the saints would be heard especially in regard to matters concerning themselves. But they are not heard in reference to these things; wherefore it is stated in the Apocalypse (6:11) that on the martyrs beseeching vengeance on them that dwell on earth, "it was said to them that they should rest for a little while till the number of their brethren should be filled up." Much less therefore, are they heard in reference to matters concerning others.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Jer. 15:1): "If Moses and Samuel shall stand before Me, My soul is not towards this people." Therefore, the saints are not always heard when they pray God for us.

Objection 3: Further, the saints in heaven are stated to be equal to the angels of God (Mt. 22:30). But the angels are not always heard in the prayers which they offer up to God. This is evident from Dan. 10:12,13, where it is written: "I am come for thy words: but the prince of the kingdom of the Persians resisted me one-and-twenty days." But the angel who spoke had not come to Daniel's aid except by asking of God to be set free; and yet the fulfillment of his prayer was hindered. Therefore neither are other saints always heard by God when they pray for us.

Objection 4: Further, whosoever obtains something by prayer merits it in a sense. But the saints in heaven are not in the state of meriting. Therefore they cannot obtain anything for us from God by their prayers.

Objection 5: Further, the saints, in all things, conform their will to the will of God. Therefore they will nothing but what they know God to will. But no one prays save for what he wills. Therefore they pray not save for what they know God to will. Now that which God wills would be done even without their praying for it. Therefore their prayers are not efficacious for obtaining anything.

Objection 6: Further, the prayers of the whole heavenly court, if they could obtain anything, would be more efficacious than all the petitions of the Church here below. Now if the suffrages of the Church here below for some one in purgatory were to be multiplied, he would be wholly delivered from punishment. Since then the saints in heaven pray for those who are in purgatory on the same account as for us, if they obtain anything for us, their prayers would deliver entirely from punishment those who are in purgatory. But this is not true because, then the Church's suffrages for the dead would be unnecessary.

On the contrary, It is written (2 Macc. 15:14): "This is he that prayeth much for the people, and for all the holy city, Jeremias the prophet of God": and that his prayer was granted is clear from what follows (2 Macc. 15:15): "Jeremias stretched forth his right hand, and gave to Judas a sword of gold, saying: Take this holy sword, a gift from God," etc.

Further, Jerome says (Ep. contra Vigilant.): "Thou sayest in thy pamphlets, that while we live, we can pray for one another, but that when we are dead no one's prayer for another will be heard": and afterwards he refutes this in the following words: "If the apostles and martyrs while yet in the body can pray for others, while they are still solicitous for themselves, how much more can they do so when the crown, the victory, the triumph is already theirs!"

Further, this is confirmed by the custom of the Church, which often asks to be assisted by the prayers of the saints.

I answer that, The saints are said to pray for us in two ways. First, by "express" prayer, when by their prayers they seek a hearing of the Divine clemency on our behalf: secondly, by "interpretive" prayer, namely by their merits which, being known to God, avail not only them unto glory, but also us as suffrages and prayers, even as the shedding of Christ's blood is said to ask pardon for us. In both ways the saints' prayers considered in themselves avail to obtain what they ask, yet on our part they may fail so that we obtain not the fruit of their prayers, in so far as they are said to pray for us by reason of their merits availing on our behalf. But in so far as they pray for us by asking something for us in their prayers, their prayers are always granted, since they will only what God wills, nor do they ask save for what they will to be done; and what God wills is always fulfilled---unless we speak of His "antecedent" will, whereby "He wishes all men to be saved" [FP, Question 19, Article 6, ad 1]. For this will is not always fulfilled; wherefore no wonder if that also which the saints will according to this kind of will be not fulfilled sometimes.

Reply to Objection 1: This prayer of the martyrs is merely their desire to obtain the robe of the body and the fellowship of those who will be saved, and their consent to God's justice in punishing the wicked. Hence a gloss on Apoc. 6:11, "How long, O Lord," says: "They desire an increase of joy and the fellowship of the saints, and they consent to God's justice."

Reply to Objection 2: The Lord speaks there of Moses and Samuel according to their state in this life. For we read that they withstood God's anger by praying for the people. And yet even if they had been living at the time in question, they would have been unable to placate God towards the people by their prayers, on account of the wickedness of this same people: and it is thus that we are to understand this passage.

Reply to Objection 3: This dispute among the good angels does not mean that they offered contradictory prayers to God, but that they submitted contrary merits on various sides to the Divine inquiry, with a view of God's pronouncing sentence thereon. This, in fact, is what Gregory says (Moral. xvii) in explanation of the aforesaid words of Daniel: "The lofty spirits that are set over the nations never fight in behalf of those that act unjustly, but they justly judge and try their deeds. And when the guilt or innocence of any particular nation is brought into the debate of the court above, the ruling spirit of that nation is said to have won or lost in the conflict. Yet the supreme will of their Maker is victorious over all, for since they have it ever before their eyes, they will not what they are unable to obtain," wherefore neither do they seek for it. And consequently it is clear that their prayers are always heard.

Reply to Objection 4: Although the saints are not in a state to merit for themselves, when once they are in heaven, they are in a state to merit for others, or rather to assist others by reason of their previous merit: for while living they merited that their prayers should be heard after their death.

Or we may reply that prayer is meritorious on one count, and impetratory on another. For merit consists in a certain equation of the act to the end for which it is intended, and which is given to it as its reward; while the impetration of a prayer depends on the liberality of the person supplicated. Hence prayer sometimes, through the liberality of the person supplicated, obtains that which was not merited either by the suppliant, or by the person supplicated for: and so, although the saints are not in the state of meriting, it does not follow that they are not in the state of impetrating.

Reply to Objection 5: As appears from the authority of Gregory quoted above (ad 3), the saints and angels will nothing but what they see to be in the Divine will: and so neither do they pray for aught else. Nor is their prayer fruitless, since as Augustine says (De Praed. Sanct. [De Dono Persever. xxii]): "The prayers of the saints profit the predestinate, because it is perhaps pre-ordained that they shall be saved through the prayers of those who intercede for them": and consequently God also wills that what the saints see Him to will shall be fulfilled through their prayers.

Reply to Objection 6: The suffrages of the Church for the dead are as so many satisfactions of the living in lieu of the dead: and accordingly they free the dead from the punishment which the latter have not paid. But the saints in heaven are not in the state of making satisfaction; and consequently the parallel fails between their prayers and the suffrages of the Church.

OF THE SIGNS THAT WILL PRECEDE THE JUDGMENT

Prologue

We must next consider the signs that will precede the judgment: and under this head there are three points of inquiry:

(1) Whether any signs will precede the Lord's coming to judgment?

(2) Whether in very truth the sun and moon will be darkened?

(3) Whether the powers of the heavens will be moved when the Lord shall come?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether any signs will precede the Lord's coming to judgment?

Objection 1: It would seem that the Lord's coming to judgment will not be preceded by any signs. Because it is written (1 Thess. 5:3): "When they shall say: Peace and security; then shall sudden destruction come upon them." Now there would be no peace and security if men were terrified by previous signs. Therefore signs will not precede that coming Objection 2: Further, signs are ordained for the manifestation of something. But His coming is to be hidden; wherefore it is written (1 Thess. 5:2): "The day of the Lord shall come as a thief in the night." Therefore signs ought not to precede it.

Objection 3: Further, the time of His first coming was foreknown by the prophets, which does not apply to His second coming. Now no such signs preceded the first coming of Christ. Therefore neither will they precede the second.

On the contrary, It is written (Lk. 21:25): "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars," etc.

Further, Jerome [St. Peter Damian, Opuscul. xlix] mentions fifteen signs preceding the judgment. He says that on the "first" day all the seas will rise fifteen cubits above the mountains; in the "second" day all the waters will be plunged into the depths, so that scarcely will they be visible; on the "third" day they will be restored to their previous condition; on the "fourth" day all the great fishes and other things that move in the waters will gather together and, raising their heads above the sea, roar at one another contentiously; on the "fifth" day, all the birds of the air will gather together in the fields, wailing to one another, with neither bite nor sup; on the "sixth" day rivers of fire will arise towards the firmament rushing together from the west to the east; on the "seventh" day all the stars, both planets and fixed stars, will throw out fiery tails like comets; on the "eighth" day there will be a great earthquake, and all animals will be laid low; on the "ninth" day all the plants will be bedewed as it were with blood; on the "tenth" day all stones, little and great, will be divided into four parts dashing against one another; on the "eleventh" day all hills and mountains and buildings will be reduced to dust; on the "twelfth" day all animals will come from forest and mountain to the fields, roaring and tasting of nothing; on the "thirteenth" day all graves from east to west will open to allow the bodies to rise again; on the "fourteenth" day all men will leave their abode, neither understanding nor speaking, but rushing hither and thither like madmen; on the "fifteenth" day all will die and will rise again with those who died long before.

I answer that, When Christ shall come to judge He will appear in the form of glory, on account of the authority becoming a judge. Now it pertains to the dignity of judicial power to have certain signs that induce people to reverence and subjection: and consequently many signs will precede the advent of Christ when He shall come to judgment, in order that the hearts of men be brought to subjection to the coming judge, and be prepared for the judgment, being forewarned by those signs. But it is not easy to know what these signs may be: for the signs of which we read in the gospels, as Augustine says, writing to Hesychius about the end of the world (Ep. lxxx), refer not only to Christ's coming to judgment, but also to the time of the sack of Jerusalem, and to the coming of Christ in ceaselessly visiting His Church. So that, perhaps, if we consider them carefully, we shall find that none of them refers to the coming advent, as he remarks: because these signs that are mentioned in the gospels, such as wars, fears, and so forth, have been from the beginning of the human race: unless perhaps we say that at that time they will be more prevalent: although it is uncertain in what degree this increase will foretell the imminence of the advent. The signs mentioned by Jerome are not asserted by him; he merely says that he found them written in the annals of the Hebrews: and, indeed, they contain very little likelihood.

Reply to Objection 1: According to Augustine (Ad Hesych., Ep. lxxx) towards the end of the world there will be a general persecution of the good by the wicked: so that at the same time some will fear, namely the good, and some will be secure, namely the wicked. The words: "When they shall say: Peace and security," refer to the wicked, who will pay little heed to the signs of the coming judgment: while the words of Lk. 21:26, "men withering away," etc., should be referred to the good.

We may also reply that all these signs that will happen about the time of the judgment are reckoned to occur within the time occupied by the judgment, so that the judgment day contains them all.

Wherefore although men be terrified by the signs appearing about the judgment day, yet before those signs begin to appear the wicked will think themselves to be in peace and security, after the death of Antichrist and before the coming of Christ, seeing that the world is not at once destroyed, as they thought hitherto.

Reply to Objection 2: The day of the Lord is said to come as a thief, because the exact time is not known, since it will not be possible to know it from those signs: although, as we have already said, all these most manifest sings which will precede the judgment immediately may be comprised under the judgment day.

Reply to Objection 3: At His first advent Christ came secretly, although the appointed time was known beforehand by the prophets. Hence there was no need for such signs to appear at His first coming, as will appear at His second advent, when He will come openly, although the appointed time is hidden.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether towards the time of the judgment the sun and moon will be darkened in very truth?

Objection 1: It would seem that towards the time of the judgment the sun and moon will be darkened in very truth. For, as Rabanus says, commenting on Mt. 24:29 "nothing hinders us from gathering that the sun moon, and stars will then be deprived of their light, as we know happened to the sun at the time of our Lord's passion."

Objection 2: Further, the light of the heavenly bodies is directed to the generation of inferior bodies, because by its means and not only by their movement they act upon this lower world as Averroes says (De Subst. Orbis.). But generation will cease then. Therefore neither will light remain in the heavenly bodies.

Objection 3: Further, according to some the inferior bodies will be cleansed of the qualities by which they act. Now heavenly bodies act not only by movement, but also by light, as stated above (Objection 2). Therefore as the movement of heaven will cease, so will the light of the heavenly bodies.

On the contrary, According to astronomers the sun and moon cannot be eclipsed at the same time. But this darkening of the sun and moon is stated to be simultaneous, when the Lord shall come to judgment. Therefore the darkening will not be in very truth due to a natural eclipse.

Further, it is not seemly for the same to be the cause of a thing's failing and increasing. Now when our Lord shall come the light of the luminaries will increase according to Is. 30:26, "The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold." Therefore it is unfitting for the light of these bodies to cease when our Lord comes.

I answer that, If we speak of the sun and moon in respect of the very moment of Christ's coming, it is not credible that they will be darkened through being bereft of their light, since when Christ comes and the saints rise again the whole world will be renewed, as we shall state further on (Question 74). If, however, we speak of them in respect of the time immediately preceding the judgment, it is possible that by the Divine power the sun, moon, and other luminaries of the heavens will be darkened, either at various times or all together, in order to inspire men with fear.

Reply to Objection 1: Rabanus is speaking of the time preceding the judgment: wherefore he adds that when the judgment day is over the words of Isaias shall be fulfilled.

Reply to Objection 2: Light is in the heavenly bodies not only for the purpose of causing generation in these lower bodies, but also for their own perfection and beauty. Hence it does not follow that where generation ceases, the light of the heavenly bodies will cease, but rather that it will increase.

Reply to Objection 3: It does not seem probable that the elemental qualities will be removed from the elements, although some have asserted this. If, however, they be removed, there would still be no parallel between them and light, since the elemental qualities are in opposition to one another, so that their action is corruptive: whereas light is a principle of action not by way of opposition, but by way of a principle regulating things in opposition to one another and bringing them back to harmony. Nor is there a parallel with the movement of heavenly bodies, for movement is the act of that which is imperfect, wherefore it must needs cease when the imperfection ceases: whereas this cannot be said of light.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the virtues of heaven will be moved when our Lord shall come?

Objection 1: It would seem that the virtues of heaven will not be moved when our Lord shall come. For the virtues of heaven can denote only the blessed angels. Now immobility is essential to blessedness. Therefore it will be impossible for them to be moved.

Objection 2: Further, ignorance is the cause of wonder (Metaph. i, 2). Now ignorance, like fear, is far from the angels, for as Gregory says (Dial. iv, 33; Moral. ii, 3), "what do they not see, who see Him Who sees all." Therefore it will be impossible for them to be moved with wonder, as stated in the text (Sent. iv, D, 48).

Objection 3: Further, all the angels will be present at the Divine judgment; wherefore it is stated (Apoc. 7:11): "All the angels stood round about the throne." Now the virtues denote one particular order of angels. Therefore it should not be said of them rather than of others, that they are moved.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 26:11): "The pillars of heaven tremble, and dread at His beck." Now the pillars of heaven can denote only the virtues of heaven. Therefore the virtues of heaven will be moved.

Further, it is written (Mt. 24:29): "The stars shall fall from heaven, and the virtues of heaven shall be moved."

I answer that, Virtue is twofold as applied to the angels, [FP, Question 108, Article 5, ad 1] as Dionysius states (Coel. Hier. xi). For sometimes the name of "virtues" is appropriated to one order, which according to him, is the middle order of the middle hierarchy, but according to Gregory (Hom. in Evang. xxxiv) is the highest order of the lowest hierarchy. In another sense it is employed to denote all the angels: and then they are said to the question at issue it may be taken either way. For in the text (Sent. iv, D, 48) it is explained according to the second acceptation, so as to denote all the angels: and then they are said to be moved through wonder at the renewing of the world, as stated in the text. It can also be explained in reference to virtue as the name of a particular order; and then that order is said to be moved more than the others by reason of the effect, since according to Gregory (Hom. in Evang. xxxiv) we ascribe to that order the working of miracles which especially will be worked about that time: or again, because that order---since, according to Dionysius (Coel. Hier. xi), it belongs to the middle hierarchy---is not limited in its power, wherefore its ministry must needs regard universal causes. Consequently the proper office of the virtues is seemingly to move the heavenly bodies which are the cause of what happens in nature here below. And again the very name denotes this, since they are called the "virtues of heaven." Accordingly they will be moved then, because they will no more produce their effect, by ceasing to move the heavenly bodies: even as the angels who are appointed to watch over men will no longer fulfill the office of guardians.

Reply to Objection 1: This movement changes nothing pertaining to their state; but refers either to their effects which may vary without any change on their part, or to some new consideration of things which hitherto they were unable to see by means of their concreated species, which change of thought is not taken from them by their state of blessedness. Hence Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. viii, 20) that "God moves the spiritual creature through time."

Reply to Objection 2: Wonder is wont to be about things surpassing our knowledge or ability: and accordingly the virtues of heaven will wonder at the Divine power doing such things, in so far as they fail to do or comprehend them. In this sense the blessed Agnes said that the "sun and moon wonder at His beauty": and this does not imply ignorance in the angels, but removes the comprehension of God from them.

The Reply to the Third Objection is clear from what has been said.

OF THE FIRE OF THE FINAL CONFLAGRATION

Prologue

We must now consider the fire of the final conflagration: and under this head there are nine points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether any cleansing of the world is to take place?
- (2) Whether it will be effected by fire?
- (3) Whether that fire is of the same species as elemental fire?
- (4) Whether that fire will cleanse also the higher heavens?
- (5) Whether that fire will consume the other elements?
- (6) Whether it will cleanse all the elements?
- (7) Whether that fire precedes or follows the judgment?
- (8) Whether men are to be consumed by that fire?
- (9) Whether the wicked will be involved therein?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the world is to be cleansed?

Objection 1: It would seem that there is not to be any cleansing of the world. For only that which is unclean needs cleansing. Now God's creatures are not unclean, wherefore it is written (Acts 10:15): "That which God hath cleansed, do not thou call common," i.e. unclean. Therefore the creatures of the world shall not be cleansed.

Objection 2: Further, according to Divine justice cleansing is directed to the removal of the uncleanness of sin, as instanced in the cleansing after death. But there can be no stain of sin in the elements of this world. Therefore, seemingly, they need not to be cleansed.

Objection 3: Further, a thing is said to be cleansed when any foreign matter that depreciates it is removed therefrom: for the removal of that which ennobles a thing is not called a cleansing, but rather a diminishing. Now it pertains to the perfection and nobility of the elements that something of a foreign nature is mingled with them, since the form of a mixed body is more noble than the form of a simple body. Therefore it would seem nowise fitting that the elements of this world can possibly be cleansed.

On the contrary, All renewal is effected by some kind of cleansing. But the elements will be renewed; hence it is written (Apoc. 21:1): "I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth was gone." Therefore the elements shall be cleansed.

Further, a gloss [St. Augustine, De Civ. Dei xx, 16] on 1 Cor. 7:31, "The fashion of this earth passeth away," says: "The beauty of this world will perish in the burning of worldly flames." Therefore the same conclusion follows.

I answer that, Since the world was, in a way, made for man's sake, it follows that, when man shall be glorified in the body, the other bodies of the world shall also be changed to a better state, so that it is rendered a more fitting place for him and more pleasant to look upon. Now in order that man obtain the glory of the body, it behooves first of all those things to be removed which are opposed to glory. There are two, namely the corruption and stain of sin--- because according to 1 Cor. 15:50, "neither shall corruption possess incorruption," and all the unclean shall be without the city of glory (Apoc. 22:15)---and again, the elements require to be cleansed from the contrary dispositions, ere they be brought to the newness of glory, proportionately to what we have said with regard to man. Now although, properly speaking, a corporeal thing cannot be the subject of the stain of sin, nevertheless, on account of sin corporeal things contract a certain unfitness for being appointed to spiritual purposes; and for this reason we find that places where crimes have been committed are reckoned unfit for the performance of sacred actions therein, unless they be cleansed beforehand. Accordingly that part of the world which is given to our use contracts from men's sins a certain unfitness for being glorified, wherefore in this respect it needs to be cleansed. In like manner with regard to the intervening space, on account of the contact of the elements, there are many corruptions, generations and alterations of the elements, which diminish their purity: wherefore the elements need to be cleansed from these also, so that they be fit to receive the newness of glory.

Reply to Objection 1: When it is asserted that every creature of God is clean we are to understand this as meaning that its substance contains no alloy of evil, as the Manichees maintained, saying that evil and good are two substances in some places severed from one another, in others mingled together. But it does not exclude a creature from having an admixture of a foreign nature, which in itself is also good, but is inconsistent with the perfection of that creature. Nor does this prevent evil from being accidental to a creature, although not mingled with it as part of its substance.

Reply to Objection 2: Although corporeal elements cannot be the subject of sin, nevertheless, from the sin that is committed in them they contract a certain unfitness for receiving the perfection of glory.

Reply to Objection 3: The form of a mixed body and the form of an element may be considered in two ways: either as regards the perfection of the species, and thus a mixed body is more perfect---or as regards their continual endurance; and thus the simple body is more noble, because it has not in itself the cause of corruption, unless it be corrupted by something extrinsic: whereas a mixed body has in itself the cause of its corruption, namely the composition of contraries. Wherefore a simple body, although it be corruptible in part is incorruptible as a whole, which cannot be said of a mixed body. And since incorruption belongs to the perfection of glory, it follows that the perfection of a simple is more in keeping with the perfection of glory, than the perfection of a mixed body, unless the mixed body has also in itself some principle of incorruption, as the human body has, the form of which is incorruptible. Nevertheless, although a mixed body is somewhat more noble than a simple body, a simple body that exists by itself has a more noble being than if it exist in a mixed body, because in a mixed body simple bodies are somewhat in potentiality, whereas, existing by themselves, they are in their ultimate perfection.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the cleansing of the world will be effected by fire?

Objection 1: It would seem that this cleansing will not be effected by fire. For since fire is a part of the world, it needs to be cleansed like the other parts. Now, the same thing should not be both cleanser and cleansed. Therefore it would seem that the cleansing will not be by fire.

Objection 2: Further, just as fire has a cleansing virtue so has water. Since then all things are not capable of being cleansed by fire, and some need to be cleansed by water---which distinction is moreover observed by the Old Law---it would seem that fire will not at any rate cleanse all things.

Objection 3: Further, this cleansing would seem to consist in purifying the parts of the world by separating them from one another. Now the separation of the parts of the world from one another at the world's beginning was effected by God's power alone, for the work of distinction was carried out by that power: wherefore Anaxagoras asserted that the separation was effected by the act of the intellect which moves all things (cf. Aristotle, Phys. viii, 9). Therefore it would seem that at the end of the world the cleansing will be done immediately by God and not by fire.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 49:3): "A fire shall burn before Him, and a mighty tempest shall be around Him"; and afterwards in reference to the judgment (Ps. 49:4): "He shall call heaven from above, and the earth to judge His people." Therefore it would seem that the final cleansing of the world will be by means of fire.

Further, it is written (2 Pt. 3:12): "The heavens being on fire will be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with the burning heat." Therefore this cleansing will be effected by fire.

I answer that, As stated above (Article 1) this cleansing of the world will remove from it the stain contracted from sin, and the impurity resulting from mixture, and will be a disposition to the perfection of glory; and consequently in this threefold respect it will be most fitting for it to be effected by fire. First, because since fire is the most noble of the elements, its natural properties are more like the properties of glory, and this is especially clear in regard to light. Secondly, because fire, on account of the efficacy of its active virtue, is not as susceptible as the other elements to the admixture of a foreign matter. Thirdly, because the sphere of fire is far removed from our abode; nor are we so familiar with the use of fire as with that of earth, water, and air, so that it is not so liable to depreciation. Moreover, it is most efficacious in cleansing and in separating by a process of rarefaction.

Reply to Objection 1: Fire is not employed by us in its proper matter (since thus it is far removed from us), but only in a foreign matter: and in this respect it will be possible for the world to be cleansed by fire as existing in its pure state. But in so far as it has an admixture of some foreign matter it will be possible for it to be cleansed; and thus it will be cleanser and cleansed under different aspects. and this is not unreasonable.

Reply to Objection 2: The first cleansing of the world by the deluge regarded only the stain of sin. Now the sin which was most prevalent then was the sin of concupiscence, and consequently it was fitting that the cleansing should be by means of its contrary, namely water. But the second cleansing regards both the stain of sin and the impurity of mixture, and in respect of both it is more fitting for it to be effected by fire than by water. For the power of water tends to unite rather than to separate; wherefore the natural impurity of the elements could not be removed by water as by fire. Moreover, at the end of the world the prevalent sin will be that of tepidity, as though the world were already growing old, because then, according to Mt. 24:12, "the charity of many shall grow cold," and consequently the cleansing will then be fittingly effected by fire. Nor is there any thing that cannot in some way be cleansed by fire: some things, however, cannot be cleansed by fire without being destroyed themselves, such as cloths and wooden vessels, and these the Law ordered to be cleansed with water; yet all these things will be finally destroyed by fire.

Reply to Objection 3: By the work of distinction things received different forms whereby they are distinct from one another: and consequently this could only be done by Him Who is the author of nature. But by the final cleansing things will be restored to the purity wherein they were created, wherefore created nature will be able to minister to its Creator to this effect; and for this reason is a creature employed as a minister, that it is ennobled thereby.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the fire whereby the world will be cleansed will be of the same species with elemental fire?

Objection 1: It would seem that the fire in question is not of the same species as elemental fire. For nothing consumes itself. But that fire will consume the four elements according to a gloss on 2 Pt. 3:12. Therefore that fire will not be of the same species as elemental fire.

Objection 2: Further, as power is made known by operation, so is nature made known by power. Now that fire will have a different power from the fire which is an element: because it will cleanse the universe, whereas this fire cannot do that. Therefore it will not be of the same species as this.

Objection 3: Further, in natural bodies those that are of the same species have the same movement. But that fire will have a different movement from the fire that is an element, because it will move in all directions so as to cleanse the whole. Therefore it is not of the same species.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 16), and his words are contained in a gloss on 1 Cor. 7:31, that "the fashion of this world will perish in the burning of worldly flames." Therefore that fire will be of the same nature as the fire which is now in the world.

Further, just as the future cleansing is to be by fire, so was the past cleansing by water: and they are both compared to one another, 2 Pt. 3:5. Now in the first cleansing the water was of the same species with elemental water. Therefore in like manner the fire of the second cleansing will be of the same species with elemental fire.

I answer that, We meet with three opinions on this question. For some say that the element of fire which is in its own sphere will come down to cleanse the world: and they explain this descent by way of multiplication, because the fire will spread through finding combustible matter on all sides. And this will result all the more then since the virtue of the fire will be raised over all the elements.

Against this, however, would seem to be not only the fact that this fire will come down, but also the statement of the saints that it will rise up; thus (2 Pt. 3:10) it is declared that the fire of the judgment will rise as high as the waters of the deluge; whence it would seem to follow that this fire is situated towards the middle of the place of generation. Hence others say that this fire will be generated towards the intervening space through the focusing together of the rays of the heavenly bodies, just as we see them focused together in a burning-glass; for at that time in lieu of glasses there will be concave clouds, on which the rays will strike. But this again does not seem probable: for since the effects of heavenly bodies depend on certain fixed positions and aspects, if this fire resulted from the virtue of the heavenly bodies, the time of this cleansing would be known to those who observe the movements of the stars and this is contrary to the authority of Scripture. Consequently others, following Augustine, say that "just as the deluge resulted from an outpouring of the waters of the world, so the fashion of this world will perish by a burning of worldly flames" (De Civ. Dei. xx, 16). This burning is nothing else but the assembly of all those lower and higher causes that by their nature have a kindling virtue: and this assembly will take place not in the ordinary course of things, but by the Divine power: and from all these causes thus assembled the fire that will burn the surface of this world will result. If we consider aright these opinions, we shall find that they differ as to the cause producing this fire and not as to its species. For fire, whether produced by the sun or by some lower heating cause, is of the same species as fire in its own sphere, except in so far as the former has some admixture of foreign matter. And this will of necessity be the case then, since fire cannot cleanse a thing, unless this become its matter in some way. Hence we must grant that the fire in question is simply of the same species as ours.

Reply to Objection 1: The fire in question, although of the same species as ours, is not identically the same. Now we see that of two fires of the same species one destroys the other, namely the greater destroys the lesser, by consuming its matter. In like manner that fire will be able to destroy our fire.

Reply to Objection 2: Just as an operation that proceeds from the virtue of a thing is an indication of that virtue, so is its virtue an indication of its essence or nature, if it proceed from the essential principles of the thing. But an operation that does not proceed from the virtue of the operator does not indicate its virtue. This appears in instruments: for the action of an instrument shows forth the virtue of the mover rather than that of the instrument, since it shows forth the virtue of the agent in so far as the latter is the first principle of the action, whereas it does not show forth the virtue of the instrument, except in so far as it is susceptible of the influence of the principal agent as moving that instrument. In like manner a virtue that does not proceed from the essential principles of a thing does not indicate the nature of that thing except in the point of susceptibility. Thus the virtue whereby hot water can heat is no indication of the nature of water except in the point of its being receptive of heat. Consequently nothing prevents water that has this virtue from being of the same species as water that has it not. In like manner it is not unreasonable that this fire, which will have the power to cleanse the surface of the world, will be of the same species as the fire to which we are used, since the heating power therein arises, not from its essential principles but from the divine power or operation: whether we say that this power is an absolute quality, such as heat in hot water, or a kind of intention as we have ascribed to instrumental virtue (Sent. iv, D, 1, qu. 1, Article 4) [TP, Question 62, Article 4, ad 1]. The latter is more probable since that fire will not act save as the instrument of the Divine power.

Reply to Objection 3: Of its own nature fire tends only upwards; but in so far as it pursues its matter, which it requires when it is outside its own sphere, it follows the site of combustible matter. Accordingly it is not unreasonable for it to take a circular or a downward course, especially in so far as it acts as the instrument of the Divine power.

ARTICLE 4. Whether that fire will cleanse also the higher heavens?

Objection 1: It would seem that that fire will cleanse also the higher heavens. For it is written (Ps. 101:26,27): "The heavens are the works of Thy hands: they shall perish but Thou remainest." Now the higher heavens also are the work of God's hands. Therefore they also shall perish in the final burning of the world.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (2 Pt. 3:12): "The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with the burning heat of fire." Now the heavens that are distinct from the elements are the higher heavens, wherein the stars are fixed. Therefore it would seem that they also will be cleansed by that fire.

Objection 3: Further, the purpose of that fire will be to remove from bodies their indisposition to the perfection of glory. Now in the higher heaven we find this indisposition both as regards guilt, since the devil sinned there, and as regards natural deficiency, since a gloss on Rm. 8:22, "We know that every creature groaneth and is in labor even until now," says: "All the elements fulfill their duty with labor: even as it is not without labor that the sun and moon travel their appointed course." Therefore the higher heavens also will be cleansed by that fire.

On the contrary, "The heavenly bodies are not receptive of impressions from without" [Sent. Philosop. ex Arist. collect. lit. c.--- Among the works of Bede].

Further, a gloss on 2 Thess. 1:8, "In a flame of fire giving vengeance," says: "There will be in the world a fire that shall precede Him, and shall rise in the air to the same height as did the waters of the deluge." But the waters of the deluge did not rise to the height of the higher heavens but only 15 cubits higher than the mountain summits (Gn. 7:20). Therefore the higher heavens will not be cleansed by that fire.

I answer that, The cleansing of the world will be for the purpose of removing from bodies the disposition contrary to the perfection of glory, and this perfection is the final consummation of the universe: and this disposition is to be found in all bodies, but differently in different bodies. For in some this indisposition regards something inherent to their substance: as in these lower bodies which by being mixed together fall away from their own purity. In others this indisposition does not regard something inherent to their substance; as in the heavenly bodies, wherein nothing is to be found contrary to the final perfection of the universe, except movement which is the way to perfection, and this not any kind of movement, but only local movement, which changes nothing intrinsic to a thing, such as its substance, quantity, or quality, but only its place which is extrinsic to it. Consequently there is no need to take anything away from the substance of the higher heavens, but only to set its movement at rest. Now local movement is brought to rest not by the action of a counter agent, but by the mover ceasing to move; and therefore the heavenly bodies will not be cleansed, neither by fire nor by the action of any creature, but in lieu of being cleansed they will be set at rest by God's will alone.

Reply to Objection 1: As Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 18,24): "Those words of the psalm refer to the aerial heavens which will be cleansed by the fire of the final conflagration." Or we may reply that if they refer also to the higher heavens, these are said to perish as regards their movement whereby now they are moved without cessation.

Reply to Objection 2: Peter explains himself to which heavens he refers. For before the words quoted, he had said (2 Pt. 3:5-7): "The heavens . . . first, and the earth . . . through water . . . perished . . . which . . . now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire unto the day of judgment." Therefore the heavens to be cleansed are those which before were cleansed by the waters of the deluge, namely the aerial heavens.

Reply to Objection 3: This labor and service of the creature, that Ambrose ascribes to the heavenly bodies, is nothing else than the successive movements whereby they are subject to time, and the lack of that final consummation which they will attain in the end. Nor did the empyrean heaven contract any stain from the sin of the demons, because they were expelled from that heaven as soon as they sinned.

ARTICLE 5. Whether that fire will consume the other elements?

Objection 1: It would seem that the fire in question will consume the other elements. For a gloss of Bede on 2 Pt. 3:12 says: "This exceeding great fire will engulf the four elements whereof the world consists: yet it will not so engulf all things that they will cease to be, but it will consume two of them entirely, and will restore two of them to a better fashion." Therefore it would seem that at least two of the elements are to be entirely destroyed by that fire.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Apoc. 21:1): "The first heaven and the first earth have passed away and the sea is no more." Now the heaven here denotes the air, as Augustine states (De Civ. Dei xx, 18); and the sea denotes the gathering together of the waters. Therefore it would seem that these three elements will be wholly destroyed.

Objection 3: Further, fire does not cleanse except in so far as other things are made to be its matter. If, then, fire cleanses the other elements, they must needs become its matter. Therefore they must pass into its nature, and consequently be voided of their own nature.

Objection 4: Further, the form of fire is the most noble of the forms to which elemental matter can attain. Now all things will be brought to the most noble state by this cleansing. Therefore the other elements will be wholly transformed into fire.

On the contrary, A gloss on 1 Cor. 7:31, "The fashion of this world passeth away," says: "The beauty, not the substance, passeth." But the very substance of the elements belongs to the perfection of the world. Therefore the elements will not be consumed as to their substance.

Further, this final cleansing that will be effected by fire will correspond to the first cleansing which was effected by water. Now the latter did not corrupt the substance of the elements. Therefore neither will the former which will be the work of fire.

I answer that, There are many opinions on this question. For some say that all the elements will remain as to their matter, while all will be changed as regards their imperfection; but that two of them will retain their respective substantial form, namely air and earth, while two of them, namely fire and water, will not retain their substantial form but will be changed to the form of heaven. In this way three elements, namely air, fire, and water, will be called "heaven"; although air will retain the same substantial form as it has now, since even now it is called "heaven." Wherefore (Apoc. 21:1) only heaven and earth are mentioned: "I saw," says he, "a new heaven and a new earth." But this opinion is altogether absurd: for it is opposed both to philosophy---which holds it impossible for the lower bodies to be in potentiality to the form of heaven, since they have neither a common matter, nor mutual contrariety---and to theology, since according to this opinion the perfection of the universe with the integrity of its parts will not be assured on account of two of the elements being destroyed.

Consequently "heaven" is taken to denote the fifth body, while all the elements are designated by "earth," as expressed in Ps. 148:7,8, "Praise the Lord from the earth" and afterwards, "fire, hail, snow, ice," etc.

Hence others say that all the elements will remain as to their substance, but that their active and passive qualities will be taken from them: even as they say too, that in a mixed body the elements retain their substantial form without having their proper qualities, since these are reduced to a mean, and a mean is neither of the extremes. And seemingly the following words of Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx, 16) would seem in agreement with this: "In this conflagration of the world the qualities of the corruptible elements that were befitting our corruptible bodies will entirely perish by fire: and the substance itself will have those qualities that become an immortal body."

However, this does not seem probable, for since the proper qualities of the elements are the effects of their substantial form, it seems impossible, as long as the substantial forms remain, for the aforesaid qualities to be changed, except for a time by some violent action: thus in hot water we see that by virtue of its species it returns to the cold temperature which it had lost by the action of fire, provided the species of water remain. Moreover, these same elemental qualities belong to the second perfection of the elements, as being their proper passions: nor is it probable that in this final consummation the elements will lose anything of their natural perfection. Wherefore it would seem that the reply to this question should be that the elements will remain as to their substance and proper qualities, but that they will be cleansed both from the stain which they contracted from the sins of men, and from the impurity resulting in them through their mutual action and passion: because when once the movement of the first movable body ceases, mutual action and passion will be impossible in the lower elements: and this is what Augustine calls the "qualities of corruptible elements," namely their unnatural dispositions by reason of which they come near to corruption.

Reply to Objection 1: That fire is said to engulf the four elements in so far as in some way it will cleanse them. But when it is said further that "it will consume two entirely," this does not mean that two of the elements are to be destroyed as to their substance, but that two will be more changed from the property which they have now. Some say that these two are fire and water which excel the others in their active qualities, namely heat and cold, which are the chief principles of corruption in other bodies; and since then there will be no action of fire and water which surpass the others in activity, they would seem especially to be changed from the virtue which they have now. Others, however, say that these two are air and water, on account of the various movements of these two elements, which movements they derive from the movement of the heavenly bodies. And since these movements will cease (such as the ebb and flow of the sea, and the disturbances of winds and so forth), therefore these elements especially will be changed from the property which they have now.

Reply to Objection 2: As Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 16), when it is stated: "And the sea is no more," by the sea we may understand the present world of which he had said previously (De Civ. Dei xx, 13): "The sea gave up the dead that were in it." If, however, the sea be taken literally we must reply that by the sea two things are to be understood, namely the substance of the waters, and their disposition, as containing salt and as to the movement of the waves. The sea will remain, not as to this second, but as to the first.

Reply to Objection 3: This fire will not act save as the instrument of God's providence and power; wherefore it will not act on the other elements so as to consume them but only so as to cleanse them. Nor is it necessary for that which becomes the matter of fire, to be voided of its proper species entirely, as instanced by incandescent iron, which by virtue of its species that remains returns to its proper and former state as soon as it is taken from the furnace. It will be the same with the elements after they are cleansed by fire.

Reply to Objection 4: In the elemental parts we must consider not only what is befitting a part considered in itself, but also what is befitting it in its relation to the whole. I say, then, that although water would be more noble if it had the form of fire, as likewise would earth and air, yet the universe would be more imperfect, if all elemental matter were to assume the form of fire.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 6. Whether all the elements will be cleansed by that fire?

Objection 1: It would seem that neither will all the elements be cleansed by that fire. Because that fire, as stated already (Article 3), will not rise higher than the waters of the deluge. But the waters of the deluge did not reach to the sphere of fire. Therefore neither will the element of fire be cleansed by the final cleansing.

Objection 2: Further, a gloss on Apoc. 21:1, "I saw a new heaven," etc., says: "There can be no doubt that the transformation of the air and earth will be caused by fire; but it is doubtful about water, since it is believed to have the power of cleansing itself." Therefore at least it is uncertain that all the elements will be cleansed.

Objection 3: Further, a place where there is an everlasting stain is never cleansed. Now there will always be a stain in hell. Since, then, hell is situated among the elements, it would seem that the elements will not be wholly cleansed.

Objection 4: Further, the earthly paradise is situated on the earth. Yet it will not be cleansed by fire, since not even the waters of the deluge reached it, as Bede says (Hexaem. i, ad Gen. 2:8), as is stated in Sentent. ii, D, 7. Therefore it would seem that the elements will not all be wholly cleansed.

On the contrary, The gloss quoted above (Article 5, Objection 1) on 2 Pt. 3:12 declares that "this fire will engulf the four elements."

I answer that, Some [St. Bonaventure, Sentent. iv, D, 47, Article 2, Question 3] say that the fire in question will rise to the summit of the space containing the four elements: so that the elements would be entirely cleansed both from the stain of sin by which also the higher parts of the elements were infected (as instanced by the smoke of idolatry which stained the higher regions), and again from corruption, since the elements are corruptible in all their parts. But this opinion is opposed to the authority of Scripture, because it is written (2 Pt. 3:7) that those heavens are "kept in store unto fire," which were cleansed by water; and Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 18) that "the same world which perished in the deluge is reserved unto fire." Now it is clear that the waters of the deluge did not rise to the summit of the space occupied by the elements, but only 15 cubits above the mountain tops; and moreover it is known that vapors or any smoke whatever rising from the earth cannot pierce the entire sphere of fire so as to reach its summit; and so the stain of sin did not reach the aforesaid space. Nor can the elements be cleansed from corruptibility by the removal of something that might be consumed by fire: whereas it will be possible for the impurities of the elements arising from their mingling together to be consumed by fire. And these impurities are chiefly round about the earth as far as the middle of the air: wherefore the fire of the final conflagration will cleanse up to that point, since the waters of the deluge rose to a height which can be approximately calculated from the height of the mountains which they surpassed in a fixed measure.

Reply to Objection 2: The reason for doubt is expressed in the gloss, because, to wit, water is believed to have in itself the power of cleansing, yet not such a power as will be competent to the future state, as stated above (Article 5; Article 2, ad 2).

Reply to Objection 3: The purpose of this cleansing will be chiefly to remove all imperfection from the abode of the saints; and consequently in this cleansing all that is foul will be brought together to the place of the damned: so hell will not be cleansed, and the dregs of the whole earth will be brought thither, according to Ps. 74:9, "The dregs thereof are not emptied, all the sinners of the earth shall drink."

Reply to Objection 4: Although the sin of the first man was committed in the earthly paradise, this is not the place of sinners, as neither is the empyrean heaven: since from both places man and devil were expelled forthwith after their sin. Consequently that place needs no cleansing.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the fire of the final conflagration is to follow the judgment?

Objection 1: It would seem that the fire of the final conflagration is to follow the judgment. For Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx, 30) gives the following order of the things to take place at the judgment, saying: "At this judgment we have learned that the following things will occur. Elias the Thesbite will appear, the Jews will believe, Antichrist will persecute, Christ will judge, the dead shall rise again, the good shall be separated from the wicked, the world shall be set on fire and shall be renewed." Therefore the burning will follow the judgment.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 16): "After the wicked have been judged, and cast into everlasting fire, the figure of this world will perish in the furnace of worldly flames." Therefore the same conclusion follows.

Objection 3: Further, when the Lord comes to judgment He will find some men living, as appears from the words of 1 Thess. 4:16, where the Apostle speaking in their person says: "Then we who are alive, who remain unto the coming of the Lord." But it would not be so, if the burning of the world were to come first, since they would be destroyed by the fire. Therefore this fire will follow the judgment.

Objection 4: Further, it is said that our Lord will come to judge the earth by fire, and consequently the final conflagration would seem to be the execution of the sentence of Divine judgment. Now execution follows judgment. Therefore that fire will follow the judgment.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 96:3): "A fire shall go before Him."

Further, the resurrection will precede the judgment, else every eye would not see Christ judging. Now the burning of the world will precede the resurrection, for the saints who will rise again will have spiritual and impassible bodies, so that it will be impossible for the fire to cleanse them, and yet the text (Sent. iv, D, 47) quotes Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx, 18) as saying that "whatever needs cleansing in any way shall be cleansed by that fire." Therefore that fire will precede the judgment.

I answer that, The fire in question will in reality, as regards its beginning, precede the judgment. This can clearly be gathered from the fact that the resurrection of the dead will precede the judgment, since according to 1 Thess. 4:13-16, those who have slept "shall be taken up . . . in the clouds . . . into the air . . . to meet Christ coming to judgment." Now the general resurrection and the glorification of the bodies of the saints will happen at the same time; for the saints in rising again will assume a glorified body, as evidenced by 1 Cor. 15:43, "It is sown in dishonor, it shall rise in glory": and at the same time as the saints' bodies shall be glorified, all creatures shall be renewed, each in its own way, as appears from the statement (Rm. 8:21) that "the creature . . . itself shall be delivered from the servitude of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God." Since then the burning of the world is a disposition to the aforesaid renewal, as stated above (Articles 1,4); it can clearly be gathered that this burning, so far as it shall cleanse the world, will precede the judgment, but as regards a certain action thereof, whereby it will engulf the wicked, it will follow the judgment.

Reply to Objection 1: Augustine is speaking not as one who decides the point, but as expressing an opinion. This is clear from his continuing thus: "That all these things are to happen is a matter of faith, but how and in what order we shall learn more then by experience of the things themselves than now by seeking a definite conclusion by arguing about them. Methinks, however, they will occur in the order I have given." Hence it is clear that he is speaking as offering his opinion. The same answer applies to the Second Objection.

Reply to Objection 3: All men shall die and rise again: yet those are said to be found alive who will live in the body until the time of the conflagration.

Reply to Objection 4: That fire will not carry out the sentence of the judge except as regards the engulfing of the wicked: in this respect it will follow the judgment.

ARTICLE 8. Whether that fire will have such an effect on men as is described?

Objection 1: It would seem that this fire will not have such an effect on men as is described in the text (Sent. iv, D, 47). For a thing is said to be consumed when it is reduced to naught. Now the bodies of the wicked will not be reduced to naught, but will be kept for eternity, that they may bear an eternal punishment. Therefore this fire will not consume the wicked, as stated in the text.

Objection 2: Further, if it be said that it will consume the bodies of the wicked by reducing them to ashes; on the contrary, as the bodies of the wicked, so will those of the good be brought to ashes: for it is the privilege of Christ alone that His flesh see not corruption. Therefore it will consume also the good who will then be found.

Objection 3: Further, the stain of sin is more abundant in the elements, as combining together to the formation of the human body wherein is the corruption of the fomes [FS, Question 83, Article 3; FS, Question 91, Article 6] even in the good, than in the elements existing outside the human body. Now the elements existing outside the human body will be cleansed on account of the stain of sin. Much therefore will the elements in the human body whether of the good or of the wicked need to be cleansed, and consequently the bodies of both will need to be destroyed.

Objection 4: Further, as long as the state of the way lasts the elements act in like manner on the good and the wicked. Now the state of the way will still endure in that conflagration, since after this state of the way death will not be natural, and yet it will be caused by that fire. Therefore that fire will act equally on good and wicked; and consequently it does not seem that any distinction is made between them as to their being affected by that fire, as stated in the text.

Objection 5: Further, this fire will have done its work in a moment as it were. Yet there will be many among the living in whom there will be many things to be cleansed. Therefore that fire will not suffice for their cleansing.

I answer that, This fire of the final conflagration, in so far as it will precede the judgment, will act as the instrument of Divine justice as well as by the natural virtue of fire. Accordingly, as regards its natural virtue, it will act in like manner on the wicked and good who will be alive, by reducing the bodies of both to ashes. But in so far as it acts as the instrument of Divine justice, it will act differently on different people as regards the sense of pain. For the wicked will be tortured by the action of the fire; whereas the good in whom there will be nothing to cleanse will feel no pain at all from the fire, as neither did the children in the fiery furnace (Dan. 3); although their bodies will not be kept whole, as were the bodies of the children: and it will be possible by God's power for their bodies to be destroyed without their suffering pain. But the good, in whom matter for cleansing will be found, will suffer pain from that fire, more or less according to their different merits.

On the other hand, as regards the action which this fire will have after the judgment, it will act on the damned alone, since the good will all have impassible bodies.

Reply to Objection 1: Consumption there signifies being brought, not to nothing, but to ashes.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the bodies of the good will be reduced to ashes by the fire, they will not suffer pain thereby, as neither did the children in the Babylonian furnace. In this respect a distinction is drawn between the good and the wicked.

Reply to Objection 3: The elements that are in human bodies, even in the bodies of the elect, will be cleansed by fire. But this will be done, by God's power, without their suffering pain.

Reply to Objection 4: This fire will act not only according to the natural power of the element, but also as the instrument of Divine justice.

Reply to Objection 5: There are three reasons why those who will be found living will be able to be cleansed suddenly. One is because there will be few things in them to be cleansed, since they will be already cleansed by the previous fears and persecutions. The second is because they will suffer pain both while living and of their own will: and pain suffered in this life voluntarily cleanses much more than pain inflicted after death, as in the case of the martyrs, because "if anything needing to be cleansed be found in them, it is cut off by the sickle of suffering," as Augustine says (De Unic. Bap. xiii), although the pain of martyrdom is of short duration in comparison with the pain endured in purgatory. The third is because the heat will gain in intensity what it loses in shortness of time.

ARTICLE 9. Whether that fire will engulf the wicked?

Objection 1: It would seem that that fire will not engulf the wicked. For a gloss on Malachi 3:3, "He shall purify the sons of Levi," says that "it is a fire consuming the wicked and refining the good"; and a gloss on 1 Cor. 3:13, "Fire shall try every man's work," says: "We read that there will be a twofold fire, one that will cleanse the elect and will precede the judgment, another that will torture the wicked." Now the latter is the fire of hell that shall engulf the wicked, while the former is the fire of the final conflagration. Therefore the fire of the final conflagration will not be that which will engulf the wicked.

Objection 2: Further, that fire will obey God in the cleansing of the world: therefore it should receive its reward like the other elements, especially since fire is the most noble of the elements. Therefore it would seem that it ought not to be cast into hell for the punishment of the damned.

Objection 3: Further, the fire that will engulf the wicked will be the fire of hell: and this fire was prepared from the beginning of the world for the damned; hence it is written (Mt. 25:41): "Depart . . . you cursed . . . into everlasting fire which was prepared for the devil," etc., and (Is. 30:33): "Tophet is prepared from yesterday, prepared by the king," etc., where a gloss observes: "From yesterday, i.e. from the beginning---Tophet, i.e. the valley of hell." But this fire of the final conflagration was not prepared from the beginning, but will result from the meeting together of the fires of the world. Therefore that fire is not the fire of hell which will engulf the wicked.

On the contrary, are the words of Ps. 96:3, where it is said of this fire that it "shall burn His enemies round about."

Further, it is written (Dan. 7:10): "A swift stream of fire issued forth from before Him"; and a gloss adds, "to drag sinners into hell." Now the passage quoted refers to that fire of which we are now speaking, as appears from a gloss which observes on the same words: "In order to punish the wicked and cleanse the good." Therefore the fire of the final conflagration will be plunged into hell together with the wicked

I answer that, The entire cleansing of the world and the renewal for the purpose of cleansing will be directed to the renewal of man: and consequently the cleansing and renewal of the world must needs correspond with the cleansing and renewal of mankind. Now mankind will be cleansed in one way by the separation of the wicked from the good: wherefore it is said (Lk. 3:17): "Whose fan is in His hand, and He will purge His poor, and will gather the wheat," i.e. the elect, "into His barn, but the chaff," i.e. the wicked, "He will burn with unquenchable fire." Hence it will be thus with the cleansing of the world, so that all that is ugly and vile will be cast with the wicked into hell, and all that is beautiful and noble will be taken up above for the glory of the elect: and so too will it be with the fire of that conflagration, as Basil says in Ps. 28:7, "The voice of the Lord divideth the flame of fire," because whatever fire contains of burning heat and gross matter will go down into hell for the punishment of the wicked, and whatever is subtle and lightsome will remain above for the glory of the elect.

Reply to Objection 1: The fire that will cleanse the elect before the judgment will be the same as the fire that will burn the world, although some say the contrary. For it is fitting that man, being a part of the world, be cleansed with the same fire as the world. They are, however, described as two fires, that will cleanse the good, and torture the wicked, both in reference to their respective offices, and somewhat in reference to their substance: since the substance of the cleansing fire will not all be cast into hell, as stated above.

Reply to Objection 2: This fire will be rewarded because whatever it contains of gross matter will be separated from it, and cast into hell.

Reply to Objection 3: The punishment of the wicked, even as the glory of the elect, will be greater after the judgment than before. Wherefore, just as charity will be added to the higher creature in order to increase the glory of the elect, so too whatever is vile in creatures will be thrust down into hell in order to add to the misery of the damned. Consequently it is not unbecoming that another fire be added to the fire of the damned that was prepared from the beginning of the world.

OF THE RESURRECTION

Prologue

In the next place we must consider things connected with and accompanying the resurrection. Of these the first to be considered will be the resurrection itself; the second will be the cause of the resurrection; the third its time and manner. the fourth its term "wherefrom"; the fifth the condition of those who rise again.

Under the first head there will be three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether there is to be a resurrection of the body?
- (2) Whether it is universally of all bodies?
- (3) Whether it is natural or miraculous?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether there is to be a resurrection of the body?

Objection 1: It would seem that there is not to be a resurrection of the body: for it is written (Job 14:12): "Man, when he is fallen asleep, shall not rise again till the heavens be broken." But the heavens shall never be broken, since the earth, to which seemingly this is still less applicable, "standeth for ever" (Eccles. 1:4). Therefore the man that is dead shall never rise again.

Objection 2: Further, Our Lord proves the resurrection by quoting the words: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. He is not the God of the dead but of the living" (Mt. 22:32; Ex. 3:6). But it is clear that when those words were uttered, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob lived not in body, but only in the soul. Therefore there will be no resurrection of bodies but only of souls.

Objection 3: Further, the Apostle (1 Cor. 15) seemingly proves the resurrection from the reward for labors endured by the saints in this life. For if they trusted in this life alone, they would be the most unhappy of all men. Now there can be sufficient reward for labor in the soul alone: since it is not necessary for the instrument to be repaid together with the worker, and the body is the soul's instrument. Wherefore even in purgatory, where souls will be punished for what they did in the body, the soul is punished without the body. Therefore there is no need to hold a resurrection of the body, but it is enough to hold a resurrection of souls, which consists in their being taken from the death of sin and unhappiness to the life of grace and glory.

Objection 4: Further, the last state of a thing is the most perfect, since thereby it attains its end. Now the most perfect state of the soul is to be separated from the body, since in that state it is more conformed to God and the angels, and is more pure, as being separated from any extraneous nature. Therefore separation from the body is its final state, and consequently it returns not from this state to the body, as neither does a man end in becoming a boy.

Objection 5: Further, bodily death is the punishment inflicted on man for his own transgression, as appears from Gn. 2, even as spiritual death, which is the separation of the soul from God, is inflicted on man for mortal sin. Now man never returns to life from spiritual death after receiving the sentence of his damnation. Therefore neither will there be any return from bodily death to bodily life, and so there will be no resurrection.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 19:25-26): "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the last day I shall rise out of the earth, and I shall be clothed again with my skin," etc. Therefore there will be a resurrection of the body.

Further, the gift of Christ is greater than the sin of Adam, as appears from Rm. 5:15. Now death was brought in by sin, for if sin had not been, there had been no death. Therefore by the gift of Christ man will be restored from death to life.

Further, the members should be conformed to the head. Now our Head lives and will live eternally in body and soul, since "Christ rising again from the dead dieth now no more" (Rm. 6:8). Therefore men who are His members will live in body and soul; and consequently there must needs be a resurrection of the body.

I answer that, According to the various opinions about man's last end there have been various opinions holding or denying the resurrection. For man's last end which all men desire naturally is happiness. Some have held that man is able to attain this end in this life: wherefore they had no need to admit another life after this, wherein man would be able to attain to his perfection: and so they denied the resurrection.

This opinion is confuted with sufficient probability by the changeableness of fortune, the weakness of the human body, the imperfection and instability of knowledge and virtue, all of which are hindrances to the perfection of happiness, as Augustine argues at the end of De Civ. Dei (xxii, 22).

Hence others maintained that after this there is another life wherein, after death, man lives according to the soul only, and they held that such a life sufficed to satisfy the natural desire to obtain happiness: wherefore Porphyrius said as Augustine states (De Civ. Dei. xxii, 26): "The soul, to be happy, must avoid all bodies": and consequently these did not hold the resurrection.

This opinion was based by various people on various false foundations. For certain heretics asserted that all bodily things are from the evil principle, but that spiritual things are from the good principle: and from this it follows that the soul cannot reach the height of its perfection unless it be separated from the body, since the latter withdraws it from its principle, the participation of which makes it happy. Hence all those heretical sects that hold corporeal things to have been created or fashioned by the devil deny the resurrection of the body. The falsehood of this principle has been shown at the beginning of the Second Book (Sent. ii, D, 4, qu. 1, Article 3; [FP, Question 49, Article 3]).

Others said that the entire nature of man is seated in the soul, so that the soul makes use of the body as an instrument, or as a sailor uses his ship: wherefore according to this opinion, it follows that if happiness is attained by the soul alone, man would not be balked in his natural desire for happiness, and so there is no need to hold the resurrection. But the Philosopher sufficiently destroys this foundation (De Anima ii, 2), where he shows that the soul is united to the body as form to matter. Hence it is clear that if man cannot be happy in this life, we must of necessity hold the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 1: The heavens will never be broken as to their substance, but as to the effect of their power whereby their movement is the cause of generation and corruption of lower things: for this reason the Apostle says (1 Cor. 7:31): "The fashion of this world passeth away."

Reply to Objection 2: Abraham's soul, properly speaking, is not Abraham himself, but a part of him (and the same as regards the others). Hence life in Abraham's soul does not suffice to make Abraham a living being, or to make the God of Abraham the God of a living man. But there needs to be life in the whole composite, i.e. the soul and body: and although this life were not actually when these words were uttered, it was in each part as ordained to the resurrection. Wherefore our Lord proves the resurrection with the greatest subtlety and efficacy.

Reply to Objection 3: The soul is compared to the body, not only as a worker to the instrument with which he works, but also as form to matter: wherefore the work belongs to the composite and not to the soul alone, as the Philosopher shows (De Anima i, 4). And since to the worker is due the reward of the work, it behooves man himself, who is composed of soul and body, to receive the reward of his work. Now as venial offenses are called sins as being dispositions to sin, and not as having simply and perfectly the character of sin, so the punishment which is awarded to them in purgatory is not a retribution simply, but rather a cleansing, which is wrought separately in the body, by death and by its being reduced to ashes, and in the soul by the fire of purgatory.

Reply to Objection 4: Other things being equal, the state of the soul in the body is more perfect than outside the body, because it is a part of the whole composite; and every integral part is material in comparison to the whole: and though it were conformed to God in one respect, it is not simply. Because, strictly speaking, a thing is more conformed to God when it has all that the condition of its nature requires, since then most of all it imitates the Divine perfection. Hence the heart of an animal is more conformed to an immovable God when it is in movement than when it is at rest, because the perfection of the heart is in its movement, and its rest is its undoing.

Reply to Objection 5: Bodily death was brought about by Adam's sin which was blotted out by Christ's death: hence its punishment lasts not for ever. But mortal sin which causes everlasting death through impenitence will not be expiated hereafter. Hence that death will be everlasting.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether the resurrection will be for all without exception?

Objection 1: It would seem that the resurrection will not be for all without exception. For it is written (Ps. 1:5): "The wicked shall not rise again in judgment." Now men will not rise again except at the time of the general judgment. Therefore the wicked shall in no way rise again.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Dan. 12:2): "Many of those that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." But these words imply a restriction. Therefore all will not rise again.

Objection 3: Further, by the resurrection men are conformed to Christ rising again; wherefore the Apostle argues (1 Cor. 15:12, seqq.) that if Christ rose again, we also shall rise again. Now those alone should be conformed to Christ rising again who have borne His image, and this belongs to the good alone. Therefore they alone shall rise again.

Objection 4: Further, punishment is not remitted unless the fault be condoned. Now bodily death is the punishment of original sin. Therefore, as original sin is not forgiven to all, all will not rise again.

Objection 5: Further, as we are born again by the grace of Christ, even so shall we rise again by His grace. Now those who die in their mother's womb can never be born again: therefore neither can they rise again, and consequently all will not rise again.

On the contrary, It is said (Jn. 5:28,25): "All that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God . . . and they that hear shall live." Therefore the dead shall all rise again.

Further, it is written (1 Cor. 15:51): "We shall all indeed rise again," etc.

Further, the resurrection is necessary in order that those who rise again may receive punishment or reward according to their merits. Now either punishment or reward is due to all, either for their own merits, as to adults, or for others' merits, as to children. Therefore all will rise again.

I answer that, Those things, the reason of which comes from the nature of a species, must needs be found likewise in all the members of that same species. Now such is the resurrection: because the reason thereof, as stated above (Article 1), is that the soul cannot have the final perfection of the human species, so long as it is separated from the body. Hence no soul will remain for ever separated from the body. Therefore it is necessary for all, as well as for one, to rise again.

Reply to Objection 1: As a gloss expounds these words, they refer to the spiritual resurrection whereby the wicked shall not rise again in the particular judgment. or else they refer to the wicked who are altogether unbelievers, who will not rise again to be judged, since they are already judged [Jn. 3:18].

Reply to Objection 2: Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx, 23) explains "many" as meaning "all": in fact, this way of speaking is often met with in Holy Writ. Or else the restriction may refer to the children consigned to limbo who, although they shall rise again, are not properly said to awake, since they will have no sense either of pain or of glory, and waking is the unchaining of the senses.

Reply to Objection 3: All, both good and wicked, are conformed to Christ, while living in this life, as regards things pertaining to the nature of the species, but not as regards matters pertaining to grace. Hence all will be conformed to Him in the restoration of natural life, but not in the likeness of glory, except the good alone.

Reply to Objection 4: Those who have died in original sin have, by dying, discharged the obligation of death which is the punishment of original sin. Hence, notwithstanding original sin, they can rise again from death: for the punishment of original sin is to die, rather than to be detained by death.

Reply to Objection 5: We are born again by the grace of Christ that is given to us, but we rise again by the grace of Christ whereby it came about that He took our nature, since it is by this that we are conformed to Him in natural things. Hence those who die in their mother's womb, although they are not born again by receiving grace, will nevertheless rise again on account of the conformity of their nature with Him, which conformity they acquired by attaining to the perfection of the human species.

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the resurrection is natural?

Objection 1: It would seem that the resurrection is natural. For, as the Damascene says (De Fide Orth. iii, 14), "that which is commonly observed in all, marks the nature of the individuals contained under it." Now resurrection applies commonly to all. Therefore it is natural.

Objection 2: Further, Gregory says (Moral. xiv, 55): "Those who do not hold the resurrection on the principle of obedience ought certainly to hold it on the principle of reason. For what does the world every day but imitate, in its elements, our resurrection?" And he offers as examples the light which "as it were dies . . . and is withdrawn from our sight . . . and again rises anew, as it were, and is recalled---the shrubs which lose their greenery, and again by a kind of resurrection are renewed---and the seeds which rot and die and then sprout and rise again as it were": which same example is adduced by the Apostle (1 Cor. 15:36). Now from the works of nature nothing can be known save what is natural. Therefore the resurrection is natural.

Objection 3: Further, things that are against nature abide not for long, because they are violent, so to speak. But the life that is restored by the resurrection will last for ever. Therefore the resurrection will be natural.

Objection 4: Further, that to which the entire expectation of nature looks forward would seem to be natural. Now such a thing is the resurrection and the glorification of the saints according to Rm. 8:19. Therefore the resurrection will be natural.

Objection 5: Further, the resurrection is a kind of movement towards the everlasting union of soul and body. Now movement is natural if it terminate in a natural rest (Phys. v, 6): and the everlasting union of soul and body will be natural, for since the soul is the body's proper mover, it has a body proportionate to it: so that the body is likewise for ever capable of being quickened by it, even as the soul lives for ever. Therefore the resurrection will be natural.

On the contrary, There is no natural return from privation to habit. But death is privation of life. Therefore the resurrection whereby one returns from death to life is not natural.

Further, things of the one species have one fixed way of origin: wherefore animals begotten of putrefaction are never of the same species as those begotten of seed, as the Commentator says on Phys. viii. Now the natural way of man's origin is for him to be begotten of a like in species: and such is not the case in the resurrection. Therefore it will not be natural.

I answer that, A movement or an action stands related to nature in three ways. For there is a movement or action whereof nature is neither the principle nor the term: and such a movement is sometimes from a principle above nature as in the case of a glorified body; and sometimes from any other principle whatever; for instance, the violent upward movement of a stone which terminates in a violent rest. Again, there is a movement whereof nature is both principle and term: for instance, the downward movement of a stone. And there is another movement whereof nature is the term, but not the principle, the latter being sometimes something above nature (as in giving sight to a blind man, for sight is natural, but the principle of the sight-giving is above nature), and sometimes something else, as in the forcing of flowers or fruit by artificial process. It is impossible for nature to be the principle and not the term, because natural principles are appointed to definite effects, beyond which they cannot extend.

Accordingly the action or movement that is related to nature in the first way can nowise be natural, but is either miraculous if it come from a principle above nature, or violent if from any other principle. The action or movement that is related to nature in the second way is simply natural: but the action that is related to nature in the third way cannot be described as natural simply, but as natural in a restricted sense, in so far, to wit, as it leads to that which is according to nature: but it is called either miraculous or artificial or violent. For, properly speaking, natural is that which is according to nature, and a thing is according to nature if it has that nature and whatever results from that nature (Phys. ii, 1). Consequently, speaking simply, movement cannot be described as natural unless its principle be natural.

Now nature cannot be the principle of resurrection, although resurrection terminates in the life of nature. For nature is the principle of movement in the thing wherein nature is---either the active principle, as in the movement of heavy and light bodies and in the natural alterations of animals---or the passive principle, as in the generation of simple bodies. The passive principle of natural generation is the natural passive potentiality which always has an active principle corresponding to it in nature, according to Metaphysics viii, 1: nor as to this does it matter whether the active principle in nature correspond to the passive principle in respect of its ultimate perfection, namely the form; or in respect of a disposition in virtue of which it demands the ultimate form, as in the generation of a man according to the teaching of faith, or in all other generations according to the opinions of Plato and Avicenna. But in nature there is no active principle of the resurrection, neither as regards the union of the soul with the body, nor as regards the disposition which is the demand for that union: since such a disposition cannot be produced by nature, except in a definite way by the process of generation from seed. Wherefore even granted a passive potentiality on the part of the body, or any kind of inclination to its union with the soul, it is not such as to suffice for the conditions of natural movement. Therefore the resurrection, strictly speaking, is miraculous and not natural except in a restricted sense, as we have explained.

Reply to Objection 1: Damascene is speaking of those things that are found in all individuals and are caused by the principles of nature. For supposing by a divine operation all men to be made white, or to be gathered together in one place, as happened at the time of the deluge, it would not follow that whiteness or existence in some particular place is a natural property of man.

Reply to Objection 2: From natural things one does not come by a demonstration of reason to know non-natural things, but by the induction of reason one may know something above nature, since the natural bears a certain resemblance to the supernatural. Thus the union of soul and body resembles the union of the soul with God by the glory of fruition, as the Master says (Sent. ii, D, 1): and in like manner the examples, quoted by the Apostle and Gregory, are confirmatory evidences of our faith in the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 3: This argument regards an operation which terminates in something that is not natural but contrary to nature. Such is not the resurrection, and hence the argument is not to the point.

Reply to Objection 4: The entire operation of nature is subordinate to the Divine operation, just as the working of a lower art is subordinate to the working of a higher art. Hence just as all the work of a lower art has in view an end unattainable save by the operation of the higher art that produces the form, or makes use of what has been made by art: so the last end which the whole expectation of nature has in view is unattainable by the operation of nature, and for which reason the attaining thereto is not natural.

Reply to Objection 5: Although there can be no natural movement terminating in a violent rest, there can be a non-natural movement terminating in a natural rest, as explained above.

OF THE CAUSE OF THE RESURRECTION

Prologue

We must next consider the cause of our resurrection. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether Christ's resurrection is the cause of our resurrection?
- (2) Whether the sound of the trumpet is?
- (3) Whether the angels are?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the resurrection of Christ is the cause of our resurrection?

Objection 1: It would seem that the resurrection of Christ is not the cause of our resurrection. For, given the cause, the effect follows. Yet given the resurrection of Christ the resurrection of the other dead did not follow at once. Therefore His resurrection is not the cause of ours.

Objection 2: Further, an effect cannot be unless the cause precede. But the resurrection of the dead would be even if Christ had not risen again: for God could have delivered man in some other way. Therefore Christ's resurrection is not the cause of ours.

Objection 3: Further, the same thing produces the one effect throughout the one same species. Now the resurrection will be common to all men. Since then Christ's resurrection is not its own cause, it is not the cause of the resurrection of others.

Objection 4: Further, an effect retains some likeness to its cause. But the resurrection, at least of some, namely the wicked, bears no likeness to the resurrection of Christ. Therefore Christ's resurrection will not be the cause of theirs.

On the contrary, "In every genus that which is first is the cause of those that come after it" (Metaph. ii, 1). Now Christ, by reason of His bodily resurrection, is called "the first-fruits of them that sleep" (1 Cor. 15:20), and "the first-begotten of the dead" (Apoc. 1:5). Therefore His resurrection is the cause of the resurrection of others.

Further, Christ's resurrection has more in common with our bodily resurrection than with our spiritual resurrection which is by justification. But Christ's resurrection is the cause of our justification, as appears from Rm. 4:25, where it is said that He "rose again for our justification." Therefore Christ's resurrection is the cause of our bodily resurrection.

I answer that, Christ by reason of His nature is called the mediator of God and men: wherefore the Divine gifts are bestowed on men by means of Christ's humanity. Now just as we cannot be delivered from spiritual death save by the gift of grace bestowed by God, so neither can we be delivered from bodily death except by resurrection wrought by the Divine power. And therefore as Christ, in respect of His human nature, received the firstfruits of grace from above, and His grace is the cause of our grace, because "of His fulness we all have received . . . grace for grace" (Jn. 1:16), so in Christ has our resurrection begun, and His resurrection is the cause of ours. Thus Christ as God is, as it were, the equivocal cause of our resurrection, but as God and man rising again, He is the proximate and, so to say, the univocal cause of our resurrection. Now a univocal efficient cause produces its effect in likeness to its own form, so that not only is it an efficient, but also an exemplar cause in relation to that effect. This happens in two ways. For sometimes this very form, whereby the agent is likened to its effect, is the direct principle of the action by which the effect is produced, as heat in the fire that heats: and sometimes it is not the form in respect of which this likeness is observed, that is primarily and directly the principle of that action, but the principles of that form. For instance, if a white man beget a white man, the whiteness of the begetter is not the principle of active generation, and yet the whiteness of the begetter is said to be the cause of the whiteness of the begotten, because the principles of whiteness in the begetter are the generative principles causing whiteness in the begotten. In this way the resurrection of Christ is the cause of our resurrection, because the same thing that wrought the resurrection of Christ, which is the univocal efficient cause of our resurrection, is the active cause of our resurrection, namely the power of Christ's Godhead which is common to Him and the Father. Hence it is written (Rm. 8:11): "He that raised up Jesus Christ from the dead shall quicken also your mortal bodies." And this very resurrection of Christ by virtue of His indwelling Godhead is the quasi-instrumental cause of our resurrection: since the Divine operations were wrought by means of Christ's flesh, as though it were a kind of organ; thus the Damascene instances as an example (De Fide Orth. iii, 15) the touch of His body whereby He healed the leper (Mt. 8:3).

Reply to Objection 1: A sufficient cause produces at once its effect to which it is immediately directed, but not the effect to which it is directed by means of something else, no matter how sufficient it may be: thus heat, however intense it be, does not cause heat at once in the first instant, but it begins at once to set up a movement towards heat, because heat is its effect by means of movement. Now Christ's resurrection is said to be the cause of ours, in that it works our resurrection, not immediately, but by means of its principle, namely the Divine power which will work our resurrection in likeness to the resurrection of Christ. Now God's power works by means of His will which is nearest to the effect; hence it is not necessary that our resurrection should follow straightway after He has wrought the resurrection of Christ, but that it should happen at the time which God's will has decreed.

Reply to Objection 2: God's power is not tied to any particular second causes, but that He can produce their effects either immediately or by means of other causes: thus He might work the generation of lower bodies even though there were no movement of the heaven: and yet according to the order which He has established in things, the movement of the heaven is the cause of the generation of the lower bodies. In like manner according to the order appointed to human things by Divine providence, Christ's resurrection is the cause of ours: and yet He could have appointed another order, and then our resurrection would have had another cause ordained by God.

Reply to Objection 3: This argument holds when all the things of one species have the same order to the first cause of the effect to be produced in the whole of that species. But it is not so in the case in point, because Christ's humanity is nearer to His Godhead, Whose power is the first cause of the resurrection, than is the humanity of others. Hence Christ's Godhead caused His resurrection immediately, but it causes the resurrection of others by means of Christ-man rising again.

Reply to Objection 4: The resurrection of all men will bear some resemblance to Christ's resurrection, as regards that which pertains to the life of nature, in respect of which all were conformed to Christ. Hence all will rise again to immortal life; but in the saints who were conformed to Christ by grace, there will be conformity as to things pertaining to glory.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the sound of the trumpet will be the cause of our resurrection?

Objection 1: It would seem that the sound of the trumpet will not be the cause of our resurrection. For the Damascene says (De Fide Orth. iv): "Thou must believe that the resurrection will take place by God's will, power, and nod." Therefore since these are a sufficient cause of our resurrection, we ought not to assign the sound of the trumpet as a cause thereof.

Objection 2: Further, it is useless to make sounds to one who cannot hear. But the dead will not have hearing. Therefore it is unfitting to make a sound to arouse them.

Objection 3: Further, if any sound is the cause of the resurrection, this will only be by a power given by God to the sound: wherefore a gloss on Ps. 67:34, "He will give to His voice the voice of power," says: "to arouse our bodies." Now from the moment that a power is given to a thing, though it be given miraculously, the act that ensues is natural, as instanced in the man born blind who, after being restored to sight, saw naturally. Therefore if a sound be the cause of resurrection, the resurrection would be natural: which is false.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Thess. 4:15): "The Lord Himself will come down from heaven . . . with the trumpet of God; and the dead who are in Christ shall rise."

Further, it is written (Jn. 5:28) that they "who are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God . . . and (Jn. 5:25) they that hear shall live." Now this voice is called the trumpet, as stated in the text (Sent. iv, D, 43). Therefore, etc.

I answer that, Cause and effect must needs in some way be united together, since mover and moved, maker and made, are simultaneous (Phys. vii, 2). Now Christ rising again is the univocal cause of our resurrection: wherefore at the resurrection of bodies, it behooves Christ to work the resurrection at the giving of some common bodily sign. According to some this sign will be literally Christ's voice commanding the resurrection, even as He commanded the sea and the storm ceased (Mt. 8:26). Others say that this sign will be nothing else than the manifest appearance of the Son of God in the world, according to the words of Mt. 24:27: "As lightning cometh out of the east, and appeareth even into the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." These rely on the authority of Gregory [Moral. xxxi, as quoted by St. Albert the Great, Sentent. iv, D, 42, Article 4] who says that "the sound of the trumpet is nothing else but the Son appearing to the world as judge." According to this, the visible presence of the Son of God is called His voice, because as soon as He appears all nature will obey His command in restoring human bodies: hence He is described as coming "with commandment" (1 Thess. 4:15). In this way His appearing, in so far as it has the force of a command, is called His voice: which voice, whatever it be, is sometimes called a cry [Mt 25:6], as of a crier summoning to judgment; sometimes the sound of a trumpet [1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Thess. 4:15], either on account of its distinctness, as stated in the text (Sent. iv, D, 43), or as being in keeping with the use of the trumpet in the Old Testament: for by the trumpet they were summoned to the council, stirred to the battle, and called to the feast; and those who rise again will be summoned to the council of judgment, to the battle in which "the world shall fight . . . against the unwise" (Wis. 5:21), and to the feast of everlasting solemnity.

Reply to Objection 1: In those words the Damascene touches on three things respecting the material cause of the resurrection: to wit, the Divine will which commands, the power which executes, and the ease of execution, when he adds "bidding," in resemblance to our own affairs: since it is very easy for us to do what is done at once at our word. But the ease is much more evident, if before we say a word, our servants execute our will at once at the first sign of our will, which sign is called a nod: and this nod is a kind of cause of that execution, in so far as others are led thereby to accomplish our will. And the Divine nod, at which the resurrection will take place, is nothing but the sign given by God, which all nature will obey by concurring in the resurrection of the dead. This sign is the same as the sound of the trumpet, as explained above.

Reply to Objection 2: As the forms of the Sacrament have the power to sanctify, not through being heard, but through being spoken: so this sound, whatever it be, will have an instrumental efficacy of resuscitation, not through being perceived, but through being uttered. Even so a sound by the pulsation of the air arouses the sleeper, by loosing the organ of perception, and not because it is known: since judgment about the sound that reaches the ears is subsequent to the awakening and is not its cause.

Reply to Objection 3: This argument would avail, if the power given to that sound were a complete being in nature: because then that which would proceed therefrom would have for principle a power already rendered natural. But this power is not of that kind but such as we have ascribed above to the forms of the Sacraments (Sent. iv, D, 1; FP, Question 62, Articles 1,4).

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 3. Whether the angels will do anything towards the resurrection?

Objection 1: It would seem that the angels will do nothing at all towards the resurrection. For raising the dead shows a greater power than does begetting men. Now when men are begotten, the soul is not infused into the body by means of the angels. Therefore neither will the resurrection, which is reunion of soul and body, be wrought by the ministry of the angels.

Objection 2: Further, if this is to be ascribed to the instrumentality of any angels at all, it would seem especially referable to the virtues, to whom it belongs to work miracles. Yet it is referred, not to them, but to the archangels, according to the text (Sent. iv, D, 43). Therefore the resurrection will not be wrought by the ministry of the angels.

On the contrary, It is stated (1 Thess. 4:15) that "the Lord . . . shall come down from heaven . . . with the voice of an archangel . . . and the dead shall rise again." Therefore the resurrection of the dead will be accomplished by the angelic ministry.

I answer that, According to Augustine (De Trin. iii, 4) "just as the grosser and inferior bodies are ruled in a certain order by the more subtle and more powerful bodies, so are all bodies ruled by God by the rational spirit of life": and Gregory speaks in the same sense (Dial. iv, 6). Consequently in all God's bodily works, He employs the ministry of the angels. Now in the resurrection there is something pertaining to the transmutation of the bodies, to wit the gathering together of the mortal remains and the disposal thereof for the restoration of the human body; wherefore in this respect God will employ the ministry of the angels in the resurrection. But the soul, even as it is immediately created by God, so will it be reunited to the body immediately by God without any operation of the angels: and in like manner He Himself will glorify the body without the ministry of the angels, just as He immediately glorifies man's soul. This ministry of the angels is called their voice, according to one explanation given in the text (Sent. iv, D, 43).

Hence the Reply to the First Objection is evident from what has been said.

Reply to Objection 2: This ministry will be exercised chiefly by one Archangel, namely Michael, who is the prince of the Church as he was of the Synagogue (Dan. 10:13,21). Yet he will act under the influence of the Virtues and the other higher orders: so that what he shall do, the higher orders will, in a way, do also. In like manner the lower angels will co-operate with him as to the resurrection of each individual to whose guardianship they were appointed: so that this voice can be ascribed either to one or to many angels.

OF THE TIME AND MANNER OF THE RESURRECTION

Prologue

We must now consider the time and manner of the resurrection.
Under this head there are four points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the time of the resurrection should be delayed until the end of the world?
- (2) Whether that time is hidden?
- (3) Whether the resurrection will occur at night-time?
- (4) Whether it will happen suddenly?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the time of our resurrection should be delayed till the end of the world?

Objection 1: It would seem that the time of the resurrection ought not to be delayed till the end of the world, so that all may rise together. For there is more conformity between head and members than between one member and another, as there is more between cause and effect than between one effect and another. Now Christ, Who is our Head, did not delay His resurrection until the end of the world, so as to rise again together with all men. Therefore there is no need for the resurrection of the early saints to be deferred until the end of the world, so that they may rise again together with the others.

Objection 2: Further, the resurrection of the Head is the cause of the resurrection of the members. But the resurrection of certain members that desire nobility from their being closely connected with the Head was not delayed till the end of the world, but followed immediately after Christ's resurrection, as is piously believed concerning the Blessed Virgin and John the Evangelist [Ep. de Assump. B.V., cap. ii, among St. Jerome's works]. Therefore the resurrection of others will be so much nearer Christ's resurrection, according as they have been more conformed to Him by grace and merit.

Objection 3: Further, the state of the New Testament is more perfect, and bears a closer resemblance to Christ, than the state of the Old Testament. Yet some of the fathers of the Old Testament rose again when Christ rose, according to Mt. 27:52: "Many of the bodies of the saints, that had slept, arose." Therefore it would seem that the resurrection of the Old Testament saints should not be delayed till the end of the world, so that all may rise together.

Objection 4: Further, there will be no numbering of years after the end of the world. Yet after the resurrection of the dead, the years are still reckoned until the resurrection of others, as appears from Apoc. 20:4,5. For it is stated there that "I saw . . . the souls of them that were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God," and further on: "And they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." And "the rest of the dead lived not till the thousand years were finished." Therefore the resurrection of all is not delayed until the end of the world, that all may rise together.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 14:12): "Man when he is fallen asleep shall not rise again till the heavens be broken, he shall not wake, nor rise out of his sleep," and it is a question of the sleep of death. Therefore the resurrection of men will be delayed until the end of the world when the heavens shall be broken.

Further, it is written (Heb. 11:39): "All these being approved by the testimony of faith received not the promise," i.e. full beatitude of soul and body, since "God has provided something better for us, lest they should be consummated," i.e. perfected, "without us---in order that," as a gloss observes, "through all rejoicing each one might rejoice the more." But the resurrection will not precede the glorification of bodies, because "He will reform the body of our lowness made like to the body of His glory" (Phil. 3:21), and the children of the resurrection will be "as the angels . . . in heaven" (Mt. 22:30). Therefore the resurrection will be delayed till the end of the world, when all shall rise together.

I answer that, As Augustine states (De Trin. iii, 4) "Divine providence decreed that the grosser and lower bodies should be ruled in a certain order by the more subtle and powerful bodies": wherefore the entire matter of the lower bodies is subject to variation according to the movement of the heavenly bodies. Hence it would be contrary to the order established in things by Divine providence if the matter of lower bodies were brought to the state of incorruption, so long as there remains movement in the higher bodies. And since, according to the teaching of faith, the resurrection will bring men to immortal life conformably to Christ Who "rising again from the dead dieth now no more" (Rm. 6:9), the resurrection of human bodies will be delayed until the end of the world when the heavenly movement will cease. For this reason, too, certain philosophers, who held that the movement of the heavens will never cease, maintained that human souls will return to mortal bodies such as we have now---whether, as Empedocles, they stated that the soul would return to the same body at the end of the great year, or that it would return to another body; thus Pythagoras asserted that "any soul will enter any body," as stated in De Anima i, 3.

Reply to Objection 1: Although the head is more conformed to the members by conformity of proportion (which is requisite in order that it have influence over the members) than one member is to another, yet the head has a certain causality over the members which the members have not; and in this the members differ from the head and agree with one another. Hence Christ's resurrection is an exemplar of ours, and through our faith therein there arises in us the hope of our own resurrection. But the resurrection of one of Christ's members is not the cause of the resurrection of other members, and consequently Christ's resurrection had to precede the resurrection of others who have all to rise again at the consummation of the world.

Reply to Objection 2: Although among the members some rank higher than others and are more conformed to the Head, they do not attain to the character of headship so as to be the cause of others. Consequently greater conformity to Christ does not give them a right to rise again before others as though they were exemplar and the others exemplate, as we have said in reference to Christ's resurrection: and if it has been granted to others that their resurrection should not be delayed until the general resurrection, this has been by special privilege of grace, and not as due on account of conformity to Christ.

Reply to Objection 3: Jerome, in a sermon on the Assumption [Ep. x ad Paul. et Eustoch.], seems to be doubtful of this resurrection of the saints with Christ, namely as to whether, having been witnesses to the resurrection, they died again, so that theirs was a resuscitation (as in the case of Lazarus who died again) rather than a resurrection such as will be at the end of the world---or really rose again to immortal life, to live for ever in the body, and to ascend bodily into heaven with Christ, as a gloss says on Mt. 27:52. The latter seems more probable, because, as Jerome says, in order that they might bear true witness to Christ's true resurrection, it was fitting that they should truly rise again. Nor was their resurrection hastened for their sake, but for the sake of bearing witness to Christ's resurrection: and that by bearing witness thereto they might lay the foundation of the faith of the New Testament: wherefore it was more fitting that it should be borne by the fathers of the Old Testament, than by those who died after the foundation of the New. It must, however, be observed that, although the Gospel mentions their resurrection before Christ's, we must take this statement as made in anticipation, as is often the case with writers of history. For none rose again with a true resurrection before Christ, since He is the "first-fruits of them that sleep" (1 Cor. 15:20), although some were resuscitated before Christ's resurrection, as in the case of Lazarus.

Reply to Objection 4: On account of these words, as Augustine relates (De Civ. Dei xx, 7), certain heretics asserted that there will be a first resurrection of the dead that they may reign with Christ on earth for a thousand years; whence they were called "chiliasts" or "millenarians." Hence Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 7) that these words are to be understood otherwise, namely of the spiritual resurrection, whereby men shall rise again from their sins to the gift of grace: while the second resurrection is of bodies. The reign of Christ denotes the Church wherein not only martyrs but also the other elect reign, the part denoting the whole; or they reign with Christ in glory as regards all, special mention being made of the martyrs, because they especially reign after death who fought for the truth, even unto death. The number of a thousand years denotes not a fixed number, but the whole of the present time wherein the saints now reign with Christ, because the number 1,000 designates universality more than the number 100, since 100 is the square of 10, whereas 1,000 is a cube resulting from the multiplication of ten by its square, for $10 \times 10 = 100$, and $100 \times 10 = 1,000$. Again in Ps. 104:8, "The word which He commanded to a thousand," i.e. all, "generations."

ARTICLE 2. Whether the time of our resurrection is hidden?

Objection 1: It would seem that this time is not hidden. Because when we know exactly the beginning of a thing, we can know its end exactly, since "all things are measured by a certain period" (De Generat. ii). Now the beginning of the world is known exactly. Therefore its end can also be known exactly. But this will be the time of the resurrection and judgment. Therefore that time is not hidden.

Objection 2: Further, it is stated (Apoc. 12:6) that "the woman who represents the Church had a place prepared by God, that there she might feed a thousand two hundred sixty days." Again (Dan. 12:11), a certain fixed number of days is mentioned, which apparently signify years, according to Ezech. 4:6: "A day for a year, yea a day for a year I have appointed to thee." Therefore the time of the end of the world and of the resurrection can be known exactly from Holy Writ.

Objection 3: Further, the state of the New Testament was foreshadowed in the Old Testament. Now we know exactly the time wherein the state of the Old Testament endured. Therefore we can also know exactly the time wherein the state of the New Testament will endure. But the state of the New Testament will last to the end of the world, wherefore it is said (Mt. 28:20): "Behold I am with you . . . to the consummation of the world." Therefore the time of the end of the world and of the resurrection can be known exactly.

On the contrary, That which is unknown to the angels will be much more unknown to men: because those things to which men attain by natural reason are much more clearly and certainly known to the angels by their natural knowledge. Moreover revelations are not made to men save by means of the angels as Dionysius asserts (Coel. Hier. iv). Now the angels have no exact knowledge of that time, as appears from Mt. 24:36: "Of that day and hour no one knoweth, no not the angels of heaven." Therefore that time is hidden from men.

Further, the apostles were more cognizant of God's secrets than others who followed them, because they had "the first-fruits of the spirit" (Rm. 8:23)---" before others in point of time and more abundantly," as a gloss observes. And yet when they questioned our Lord about this very matter, He answered them (Acts 1:7): "It is not for you to know the times or moments which the Father hath put in

I answer that, As Augustine says (Qq. lxxxiii, qu. 58) "as to the last age of the human race, which begins from our Lord's coming and lasts until the end of the world, it is uncertain of how many generations it will consist: even so old age, which is man's last age, has no fixed time according to the measure of the other ages, since sometimes alone it lasts as long a time as all the others." The reason of this is because the exact length of future time cannot be known except either by revelation or by natural reason: and the time until the resurrection cannot be reckoned by natural reason, because the resurrection and the end of the heavenly movement will be simultaneous as stated above (Article 1). And all things that are foreseen by natural reason to happen at a fixed time are reckoned by movement: and it is impossible from the movement of the heaven to reckon its end, for since it is circular, it is for this very reason able by its nature to endure for ever: and consequently the time between this and the resurrection cannot be reckoned by natural reason. Again it cannot be known by revelation, so that all may be on the watch and ready to meet Christ: and for this reason when the apostles asked Him about this, Christ answered (Acts 1:7): "It is not for you to know the times or moments which the Father hath put in His own power," whereby, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xviii, 53): "He scatters the fingers of all calculators and bids them be still." For what He refused to tell the apostles, He will not reveal to others: wherefore all those who have been misled to reckon the aforesaid time have so far proved to be untruthful; for some, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xviii, 53), stated that from our Lord's Ascension to His last coming 400 years would elapse, others 500, others 1,000. The falseness of these calculators is evident, as will likewise be the falseness of those who even now cease not to calculate.

Reply to Objection 1: When we know a thing's beginning and also its end it follows that its measure is known to us: wherefore if we know the beginning of a thing the duration of which is measured by the movement of the heaven, we are able to know its end, since the movement of heaven is known to us. But the measure of the duration of the heavenly movement is God's ordinance alone, which is unknown to us. Wherefore however much we may know its beginning, we are unable to know its end.

Reply to Objection 2: The thousand two hundred sixty days mentioned in the Apocalypse (12:6) denote all the time during which the Church endures, and not any definite number of years. The reason whereof is because the preaching of Christ on which the Church is built lasted three years and a half, which time contains almost an equal number of days as the aforesaid number. Again the number of days appointed by Daniel does not refer to a number of years to elapse before the end of the world or until the preaching of Antichrist, but to the time of Antichrist's preaching and the duration of his persecution.

Reply to Objection 3: Although the state of the New Testament in general is foreshadowed by the state of the Old Testament it does not follow that individuals correspond to individuals: especially since all the figures of the Old Testament were fulfilled in Christ. Hence Augustine (De Civ. Dei xviii, 52) answers certain persons who wished to liken the number of persecutions suffered by the Church to the number of the plagues of Egypt, in these words: "I do not think that the occurrences in Egypt were in their signification prophetic of these persecutions, although those who think so have shown nicety and ingenuity in adapting them severally the one to the other, not indeed by a prophetic spirit, but by the guess-work of the human mind, which sometimes reaches the truth and sometimes not." The same remarks would seem applicable to the statements of Abbot Joachim, who by means of such conjectures about the future foretold some things that were true, and in others was deceived.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the resurrection will take place at night-time?

Objection 1: It would seem that the resurrection will not be at night-time. For the resurrection will not be "till the heavens be broken" (Job 14:12). Now when the heavenly movement ceases, which is signified by its breaking, there will be no time, neither night nor day. Therefore the resurrection will not be at night-time.

Objection 2: Further, the end of a thing ought to be most perfect. Now the end of time will be then: wherefore it is said (Apoc. 10:6) that "time shall be no longer." Therefore time ought to be then in its most perfect disposition and consequently it should be the daytime.

Objection 3: Further, the time should be such as to be adapted to what is done therein: wherefore (Jn. 13:30) the night is mentioned as being the time when Judas went out from the fellowship of the light. Now, all things that are hidden at the present time will then be made most manifest, because when the Lord shall come He "will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts" (1 Cor. 4:5). Therefore it ought to be during the day.

On the contrary, Christ's resurrection is the exemplar of ours. Now Christ's resurrection was at night, as Gregory says in a homily for Easter (xxi in Evang.). Therefore our resurrection will also be at night-time.

Further, the coming of our Lord is compared to the coming of a thief into the house (Lk. 12:39,40). But the thief comes to the house at night-time. Therefore our Lord will also come in the night. Now, when He comes the resurrection will take place, as stated above (Question 76, Article 2). Therefore the resurrection will be at night-time.

I answer that, The exact time and hour at which the resurrection will be cannot be known for certain, as stated in the text (Sent. iv, D, 43). Nevertheless some assert with sufficient probability that it will be towards the twilight, the moon being in the east and the sun in the west; because the sun and moon are believed to have been created in these positions, and thus their revolutions will be altogether completed by their return to the same point. Wherefore it is said that Christ arose at such an hour.

Reply to Objection 1: When the resurrection occurs, it will not be time but the end of time; because at the very instant that the heavens will cease to move the dead will rise again. Nevertheless the stars will be in the same position as they occupy now at any fixed hour: and accordingly it is said that the resurrection will be at this or that hour.

Reply to Objection 2: The most perfect disposition of time is said to be midday, on account of the light given by the sun. But then the city of God will need neither sun nor moon, because the glory of God will enlighten it (Apoc. 22:5). Wherefore in this respect it matters not whether the resurrection be in the day or in the night.

Reply to Objection 3: That time should be adapted to manifestation as regards the things that will happen then, and to secrecy as regards the fixing of the time. Hence either may happen fittingly, namely that the resurrection be in the day or in the night.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 4. Whether the resurrection will happen suddenly or by degrees?

Objection 1: It would seem that the resurrection will not happen suddenly but by degrees. For the resurrection of the dead is foretold (Ezech. 37:7,8) where it is written: "The bones came together . . . and I saw and behold the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin was stretched out over them, but there was no spirit in them." Therefore the restoration of the bodies will precede in time their reunion with the souls, and thus the resurrection will not be sudden.

Objection 2: Further, a thing does not happen suddenly if it require several actions following one another. Now the resurrection requires several actions following one another, namely the gathering of the ashes, the refashioning of the body, the infusion of the soul. Therefore the resurrection will not be sudden.

Objection 3: Further, all sound is measured by time. Now the sound of the trumpet will be the cause of the resurrection, as stated above (Question 76, Article 2). Therefore the resurrection will take time and will not happen suddenly.

Objection 4: Further, no local movement can be sudden as stated in De Sensu et Sensato vii. Now the resurrection requires local movement in the gathering of the ashes. Therefore it will not happen suddenly.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 15:51,52): "We shall all indeed rise again . . . in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." Therefore the resurrection will be sudden.

Further, infinite power works suddenly. But the Damascene says (De Fide Orth. iv): "Thou shalt believe in the resurrection to be wrought by the power of God," and it is evident that this is infinite. Therefore the resurrection will be sudden.

I answer that, At the resurrection something will be done by the ministry of the angels, and something immediately by the power of God, as stated above (Question 76, Article 3). Accordingly that which is done by the ministry of the angels, will not be instantaneous, if by instant we mean an indivisible point of time, but it will be instantaneous if by instant we mean an imperceptible time. But that which will be done immediately by God's power will happen suddenly, namely at the end of the time wherein the work of the angels will be done, because the higher power brings the lower to perfection.

Reply to Objection 1: Ezechiel spoke, like Moses to a rough people, and therefore, just as Moses divided the works of the six days into days, in order that the uncultured people might be able to understand, although all things were made together according to Augustine (Gen. ad lit. iv), so Ezechiel expressed the various things that will happen in the resurrection, although they will all happen together in an instant.

Reply to Objection 2: Although these actions follow one another in nature, they are all together in time: because either they are together in the same instant, or one is in the instant that terminates the other.

Objection 3: The same would seem to apply to that sound as to the forms of the sacraments, namely that the sound will produce its effect in its last instant.

Reply to Objection 4: The gathering of the ashes which cannot be without local movement will be done by the ministry of the angels. Hence it will be in time though imperceptible on account of the facility of operation which is competent to the angels.

OF THE TERM "WHEREFROM" OF THE RESURRECTION

Prologue

We must now consider the term "wherefrom" of the resurrection; and under this head there are three points of inquiry:

(1) Whether death is the term "wherefrom" of the resurrection in every case?

(2) Whether ashes are, or dust?

(3) Whether this dust has a natural inclination towards the soul?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether death will be the term "wherefrom" of the resurrection in all cases?

Objection 1: It would seem that death will not be the term "wherefrom" of the resurrection in all cases. Because some shall not die but shall be clothed with immortality: for it is said in the creed that our Lord "will come to judge the living and the dead." Now this cannot refer to the time of judgment, because then all will be alive; therefore this distinction must refer to the previous time, and consequently all will not die before the judgment.

Objection 2: Further, a natural and common desire cannot be empty and vain, but is fulfilled in some cases. Now according to the Apostle (2 Cor. 5:4) it is a common desire that "we would not be unclothed but clothed upon." Therefore there will be some who will never be stripped of the body by death, but will be arrayed in the glory of the resurrection.

Objection 3: Further, Augustine says (Enchiridion cxv) that the four last petitions of the Lord's prayer refer to the present life: and one of them is: "Forgive us our debts." Therefore the Church prays that all debts may be forgiven her in this life. Now the Church's prayer cannot be void and not granted: "If you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you" (Jn. 16:23). Therefore at some time of this life the Church will receive the remission of all debts: and one of the debts to which we are bound by the sin of our first parent is that we be born in original sin. Therefore at some time God will grant to the Church that men be born without original sin. But death is the punishment of original sin. Therefore at the end of the world there will be some men who will not die: and so the same conclusion follows.

Objection 4: Further, the wise man should always choose the shortest way. Now the shortest way is for the men who shall be found living to be transferred to the impassibility of the resurrection, than for them to die first, and afterwards rise again from death to immortality. Therefore God Who is supremely wise will choose this way for those who shall be found living.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 15:36): "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die first," and he is speaking of the resurrection of the body as compared to the seed.

Further, it is written (1 Cor. 15:22): "As in Adam all die, so also in Christ all shall be made alive." Now all shall be made alive in Christ. Therefore all shall die in Adam: and so all shall rise again from death.

I answer that, The saints differ in speaking on this question, as may be seen in the text (Sent. iv, D, 43). However, the safer and more common opinion is that all shall die and rise again from death: and this for three reasons. First, because it is more in accord with Divine justice, which condemned human nature for the sin of its first parent, that all who by the act of nature derive their origin from him should contract the stain of original sin, and consequently be the debtors of death. Secondly, because it is more in agreement with Divine Scripture which foretells the resurrection of all; and resurrection is not predicted properly except of that "which has fallen and perished," as the Damascene says (De Fide Orth. iv). Thirdly, because it is more in harmony with the order of nature where we find that what is corrupted and decayed is not renewed except by means of corruption: thus vinegar does not become wine unless the vinegar be corrupted and pass into the juice of the grape. Wherefore since human nature has incurred the defect of the necessity of death, it cannot return to immortality save by means of death. It is also in keeping with the order of nature for another reason, because, as it is stated in Phys. viii, 1, "the movement of heaven is as a kind of life to all existing in nature," just as the movement of the heart is a kind of life of the whole body: wherefore even as all the members become dead on the heart ceasing to move, so when the heavenly movement ceases nothing can remain living with that life which was sustained by the influence of that movement. Now such is the life by which we live now: and therefore it follows that those who shall live after the movement of the heaven comes to a standstill must depart from this life.

Reply to Objection 1: This distinction of the dead and the living does not apply to the time itself of the judgment, nor to the whole preceding time, since all who are to be judged were living at some time, and dead at some time: but it applies to that particular time which shall precede the judgment immediately, when, to wit, the signs of the judgment shall begin to appear.

Reply to Objection 2: The perfect desire of the saints cannot be void;

but nothing prevents their conditional desire being void. Such is the desire whereby we would not be "unclothed," but "clothed upon," namely if that be possible: and this desire is called by some a "velleity."

Reply to Objection 3: It is erroneous to say that any one except Christ is conceived without original sin, because those who would be conceived without original sin would not need the redemption which was wrought by Christ, and thus Christ would not be the Redeemer of all men. Nor can it be said that they needed not this redemption, because it was granted to them that they should be conceived without sin. For, this grace was vouchsafed---either to their parents, that the sin of nature might be healed in them (because so long as that sin remained they were unable to beget without communicating original sin)---or to nature itself which was healed. Now we must allow that every one needs the redemption of Christ personally, and not only by reason of nature, and one cannot be delivered from an evil or absolved from a debt unless one incur the debt or incur the evil: and consequently all could not reap in themselves the fruit of the Lord's prayer, unless all were born debtors and subject to evil. Hence the forgiveness of debts or delivery from evil cannot be applied to one who is born without a debt or free from evil, but only to one who is born with a debt and is afterwards delivered by the grace of Christ. Nor does it follow, if it can be asserted without error that some die not, that they are born without original sin, although death is a punishment of original sin; because God can of His mercy remit the punishment which one has incurred by a past fault, as He forgave the adulterous woman without punishment (Jn. 8): and in like manner He can deliver from death those who have contracted the debt of death by being born in original sin. And thus it does not follow that if they die not, therefore they were born without original sin.

Reply to Objection 4: The shortest way is not always the one to be chosen, but only when it is more or equally adapted for attaining the end. It is not so here, as is clear from what we have said.

ARTICLE 2. Whether all will rise again from ashes?

Objection 1: It would seem that all will not rise again from ashes. For Christ's resurrection is the exemplar of ours. Yet His resurrection was not from ashes, for His flesh saw not corruption according to Ps. 15:10; Acts 2:27,31. Therefore neither will all rise again from ashes.

Objection 2: Further, the human body is not always burned. Yet a thing cannot be reduced to ashes unless it be burned. Therefore not all will rise again from ashes.

Objection 3: Further, the body of a dead man is not reduced to ashes immediately after death. But some will rise again at once after death, according to the text (Sent. iv, D, 43), namely those who will be found living. Therefore all will not rise again from ashes.

Objection 4: Further, the term "wherefrom" corresponds to the term "whereto." Now the term "whereto" of the resurrection is not the same in the good as in the wicked: "We shall all indeed rise again, but we shall not all be changed" (1 Cor. 15:51). Therefore the term "wherefrom" is not the same. And thus, if the wicked rise again from ashes, the good will not rise again from ashes.

On the contrary, Haymo says (on Rm. 5:10, "For if when we were enemies"): "All who are born in original sin lie under the sentence: Earth thou art and into earth shalt thou go." Now all who shall rise again at the general resurrection were born in original sin, either at their birth within the womb or at least at their birth from the womb. Therefore all will rise again from ashes.

Further, there are many things in the human body that do not truly belong to human nature. But all these will be removed. Therefore all bodies must needs be reduced to ashes.

I answer that, The same reasons by which we have shown (Article 1) that all rise again from death prove also that at the general resurrection all will rise again from ashes, unless the contrary, such as the hastening of their resurrection, be vouchsafed to certain persons by a special privilege of grace. For just as holy writ foretells the resurrection, so does it foretell the reformation of bodies (Phil.

3:21). And thus it follows that even as all die that the bodies of all may be able truly to rise again, so will the bodies of all perish that they may be able to be reformed. For just as death was inflicted by Divine justice as a punishment on man, so was the decay of the body, as appears from Gn. 3:19, "Earth thou art and into earth shalt thou go."

Moreover the order of nature requires the dissolution not only of the union of soul and body, but also of the mingling of the elements: even as vinegar cannot be brought back to the quality of wine unless it first be dissolved into the prejacant matter: for the mingling of the elements is both caused and preserved by the movement of the heaven, and when this ceases all mixed bodies will be dissolved into pure elements.

Reply to Objection 1: Christ's resurrection is the exemplar of ours as to the term "whereto," but not as to the term "wherefrom."

Reply to Objection 2: By ashes we mean all the remains that are left after the dissolution of the body---for two reasons. First, because it was the common custom in olden times to burn the bodies of the dead, and to keep the ashes, whence it became customary to speak of the remains of a human body as ashes. Secondly, on account of the cause of dissolution, which is the flame of the fomes [FS, Question 82, Article 3] whereby the human body is radically infected. Hence, in order to be cleansed of this infection the human body must needs be dissolved into its primary components: and when a thing is destroyed by fire it is said to be reduced to ashes. wherefore the name of ashes is given to those things into which the human body is dissolved.

Reply to Objection 3: The fire that will cleanse the face of the earth will be able to reduce suddenly to ashes the bodies of those that will be found living, even as it will dissolve other mixed bodies into their prejacant matter.

Reply to Objection 4: Movement does not take its species from its term "wherefrom" but from its term "whereto." Hence the resurrection of the saints which will be glorious must needs differ from the resurrection of the wicked which will not be glorious, in respect of the term "whereto," and not in respect of the term "wherefrom." And it often happens that the term "whereto" is not the same, whereas the term "wherefrom" is the same---for instance, a thing may be moved from blackness to whiteness and to pallor.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the ashes from which the human body will be restored have any natural inclination towards the soul which will be united to them?

Objection 1: It would seem that the ashes from which the human body will be restored will have a natural inclination towards the soul which will be united to them. For if they had no inclination towards the soul, they would stand in the same relation to that soul as other ashes. Therefore it would make no difference whether the body that is to be united to that soul were restored from those ashes or from others: and this is false.

Objection 2: Further, the body is more dependent on the soul than the soul on the body. Now the soul separated from the body is still somewhat dependent on the body, wherefore its movement towards God is retarded on account of its desire for the body, as Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xii). Much more, therefore, has the body when separated from the soul, a natural inclination towards that soul.

Objection 3: Further, it is written (Job 20:11): "His bones shall be filled with the vices of his youth, and they shall sleep with him in the dust." But vices are only in the soul. Therefore there will still remain in those ashes a natural inclination towards the soul.

On the contrary, The human body can be dissolved into the very elements, or changed into the flesh of other animals. But the elements are homogeneous, and so is the flesh of a lion or other animal. Since then in the other parts of the elements or animals there is no natural inclination to that soul, neither will there be an inclination towards the soul in those parts into which the human body has been changed. The first proposition is made evident on the authority of Augustine (Enchiridion lxxxviii): "The human body, although changed into the substance of other bodies or even into the elements, although it has become the food and flesh of any animals whatsoever, even of man, will in an instant return to that soul which erstwhile animated it, making it a living and growing man."

Further, to every natural inclination there corresponds a natural agent: else nature would fail in necessities. Now the aforesaid ashes cannot be reunited to the same soul by any natural agent. Therefore there is not in them any natural inclination to the aforesaid reunion.

I answer that, Opinion is threefold on this point. For some say that the human body is never dissolved into its very elements; and so there always remains in the ashes a certain force besides the elements, which gives a natural inclination to the same soul. But this assertion is in contradiction with the authority of Augustine quoted above, as well as with the senses and reason: since whatever is composed of contraries can be dissolved into its component parts. Wherefore others say that these parts of the elements into which the human body is dissolved retain more light, through having been united to the soul, and for this reason have a natural inclination to human souls. But this again is nonsensical, since the parts of the elements are of the same nature and have an equal share of light and darkness. Hence we must say differently that in those ashes there is no natural inclination to resurrection, but only by the ordering of Divine providence, which decreed that those ashes should be reunited to the soul: it is on this account that those parts of the elements shall be reunited and not others.

Hence the Reply to the First Objection is clear.

Reply to Objection 2: The soul separated from the body remains in the same nature that it has when united to the body. It is not so with the body, and consequently the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 3: These words of Job do not mean that the vices actually remain in the ashes of the dead, but that they remain according to the ordering of Divine justice, whereby those ashes are destined to the restoration of the body which will suffer eternally for the sins committed.

OF THE CONDITIONS OF THOSE WHO RISE AGAIN, AND FIRST OF THEIR IDENTITY

Prologue

In the next place we must consider the conditions of those who rise again. Here we shall consider: (1) Those which concern the good and wicked in common; (2) those which concern the good only; (3) those which concern only the wicked. Three things concern the good and wicked in common, namely their identity, their integrity, and their quality: and we shall inquire (1) about their identity; (2) about their integrity; (3) about their quality.

Under the first head there are three points of inquiry:

(1) Whether the body will rise again identically the same?

(2) Whether it will be the self-same man?

(3) Whether it is necessary that the same ashes should return to the same parts in which they were before?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether in the resurrection the soul will be reunited to the same identical body?

Objection 1: It would seem that the soul will not be reunited to the same identical body at the resurrection, for "thou sowest not the body that shall be, but bare grain" (1 Cor. 15:37). Now the Apostle is there comparing death to sowing and resurrection to fructifying. Therefore the same body that is laid aside in death is not resumed at the resurrection.

Objection 2: Further, to every form some matter is adapted according to its condition, and likewise to every agent some instrument. Now the body is compared to the soul as matter to form, and as instrument to agent. Since then at the resurrection the soul will not be of the same condition as now (for it will be either entirely borne away to the heavenly life to which it adhered while living in the world, or will be cast down into the life of the brutes if it lived as a brute in this world) it would seem that it will not resume the same body, but either a heavenly or a brutish body.

Objection 3: Further, after death, as stated above (Question 78, Article 3), the human body is dissolved into the elements. Now these elemental parts into which the human body has been dissolved do not agree with the human body dissolved into them, except in primary matter, even as any other elemental parts agree with that same body. But if the body were to be formed from those other elemental parts, it would not be described as identically the same. Therefore neither will it be the self-same body if it be restored from these parts.

Objection 4: Further, there cannot be numerical identity where there is numerical distinction of essential parts. Now the form of the mixed body, which form is an essential part of the human body, as being its form, cannot be resumed in numerical identity. Therefore the body will not be identically the same. The minor is proved thus: That which passes away into complete nonentity cannot be resumed in identity. This is clear from the fact that there cannot be identity where there is distinction of existence: and existence, which is the act of a being, is differentiated by being interrupted, as is any interrupted act. Now the form of a mixed body passes away into complete nonentity by death, since it is a bodily form, and so also do the contrary qualities from which the mixture results. Therefore the form of a mixed body does not return in identity.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 19:26): "In my flesh I shall see God my Saviour," where he is speaking of the vision after the resurrection, as appears from the preceding words: "In the last day I shall rise out of the earth." Therefore the selfsame body will rise again.

Further, the Damascene says (De Fide Orth. iv, 27): "Resurrection is the second rising of that which has fallen." But the body which we have now fell by death. Therefore it will rise again the same identically.

I answer that, on this point the philosophers erred and certain modern heretics err. For some of the philosophers allowed that souls separated from bodies are reunited to bodies, yet they erred in this in two ways. First, as to the mode of reunion, for some held the separated soul to be naturally reunited to a body by the way of generation. Secondly, as to the body to which it was reunited, for they held that this second union was not with the selfsame body that was laid aside in death, but with another, sometimes of the same, sometimes of a different species. Of a different species when the soul while existing in the body had led a life contrary to the ordering of reason: wherefore it passed after death from the body of a man into the body of some other animal to whose manner of living it had conformed in this life, for instance into the body of a dog on account of lust, into the body of a lion on account of robbery and violence, and so forth---and into a body of the same species when the soul has led a good life in the body, and having after death experienced some happiness, after some centuries began to wish to return to the body; and thus it was reunited to a human body.

This opinion arises from two false sources. The first of these is that they said that the soul is not united to the body essentially as form to matter, but only accidentally, as mover to the thing moved, [FP, Question 76, Article 1] or as a man to his clothes. Hence it was possible for them to maintain that the soul pre-existed before being infused into the body begotten of natural generation, as also that it is united to various bodies. The second is that they held intellect not to differ from sense except accidentally, so that man would be said to surpass other animals in intelligence, because the sensitive power is more acute in him on account of the excellence of his bodily complexion; and hence it was possible for them to assert that man's soul passes into the soul of a brute animal, especially when the human soul has been habituated to brutish actions. But these two sources are refuted by the Philosopher (De Anima ii, 1), and in consequence of these being refuted, it is clear that the above opinion is false.

In like manner the errors of certain heretics are refuted. Some of them fell into the aforesaid opinions of the philosophers: while others held that souls are reunited to heavenly bodies, or again to bodies subtle as the wind, as Gregory relates of a certain Bishop of Constantinople, in his exposition of Job 19:26, "In my flesh I shall see my God," etc. Moreover these same errors of heretics may be refuted by the fact that they are prejudicial to the truth of resurrection as witnessed to by Holy Writ. For we cannot call it resurrection unless the soul return to the same body, since resurrection is a second rising, and the same thing rises that falls: wherefore resurrection regards the body which after death falls rather than the soul which after death lives. And consequently if it be not the same body which the soul resumes, it will not be a resurrection, but rather the assuming of a new body.

Reply to Objection 1: A comparison does not apply to every particular, but to some. For in the sowing of grain, the grain sown and the grain that is born thereof are neither identical, nor of the same condition, since it was first sown without a husk, yet is born with one: and the body will rise again identically the same, but of a different condition, since it was mortal and will rise in immortality.

Reply to Objection 2: The soul rising again and the soul living in this world differ, not in essence but in respect of glory and misery, which is an accidental difference. Hence it follows that the body in rising again differs, not in identity, but in condition, so that a difference of bodies corresponds proportionally to the difference of souls.

Reply to Objection 3: That which is understood as though it were in matter before its form remains in matter after corruption, because when that which comes afterwards is removed that which came before may yet remain. Now, as the Commentator observes on the First Book of Physics and in De Substantia Orbis, in the matter of things subject to generation and corruption, we must presuppose undeterminate dimensions, by reason of which matter is divisible, so as to be able to receive various forms in its various parts. Wherefore after the separation of the substantial form from matter, these dimensions still remain the same: and consequently the matter existing under those dimensions, whatever form it receive, is more identified with that which was generated from it, than any other part of matter existing under any form whatever. Thus the matter that will be brought back to restore the human body will be the same as that body's previous matter.

Reply to Objection 4: Even as a simple quality is not the substantial form of an element, but its proper accident, and the disposition whereby its matter is rendered proper to such a form; so the form of a mixed body, which form is a quality resulting from simple qualities reduced to a mean, is not the substantial form of the mixed body, but its proper accident, and the disposition whereby the matter is in need of the form. Now the human body has no substantial form besides this form of the mixed body, except the rational soul, for if it had any previous substantial form, this would give it substantial being, and would establish it in the genus of substance: so that the soul would be united to a body already established in the genus of substance, and thus the soul would be compared to the body as artificial forms are to their matter, in respect of their being established in the genus of substance by their matter. Hence the union of the soul to the body would be accidental, which is the error of the ancient philosophers refuted by the Philosopher (De Anima ii, 2 [FP, Question 76, Article 1]). It would also follow that the human body and each of its parts would not retain their former names in the same sense, which is contrary to the teaching of the Philosopher (De Anima ii, 1). Therefore since the rational soul remains, no substantial form of the human body falls away into complete nonentity. And the variation of accidental forms does not make a difference of identity. Therefore the selfsame body will rise again, since the selfsame matter is resumed as stated in a previous reply (ad 2).

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether it will be identically the same man that shall rise again?

Objection 1: It would seem that it will not be identically the same man that shall rise again. For according to the Philosopher (De Gener. ii): "Whatsoever things are changed in their corruptible substance are not repeated identically." Now such is man's substance in his present state. Therefore after the change wrought by death the self-same man cannot be repeated .

Objection 2: Further, where there is a distinction of human nature there is not the same identical man: wherefore Socrates and Plato are two men and not one man, since each has his own distinct human nature. Now the human nature of one who rises again is distinct from that which he has now. Therefore he is not the same identical man. The minor can be proved in two ways. First, because human nature which is the form of the whole is not both form and substance as the soul is, but is a form only. Now such like forms pass away into complete nonentity, and consequently they cannot be restored. Secondly, because human nature results from union of parts. Now the same identical union as that which was heretofore cannot be resumed, because repetition is opposed to identity, since repetition implies number, whereas identity implies unity, and these are incompatible with one another. But resurrection is a repeated union: therefore the union is not the same, and consequently there is not the same human nature nor the same man.

Objection 3: Further, one same man is not several animals: wherefore if it is not the same animal it is not the same identical man. Now where sense is not the same, there is not the same animal, since animal is defined from the primary sense, namely touch. But sense, as it does not remain in the separated soul (as some maintain), cannot be resumed in identity. Therefore the man who rises again will not be the same identical animal, and consequently he will not be the same man.

Objection 4: Further, the matter of a statue ranks higher in the statue than the matter of a man does in man: because artificial things belong to the genus of substance by reason of their matter, but natural things by reason of their form, as appears from the Philosopher (Phys. ii, 1), and again from the Commentator (De Anima ii). But if a statue is remade from the same brass, it will not be the same identically. Therefore much less will it be identically the same man if he be reformed from the same ashes.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 19:27): "Whom I myself shall see . . . and not another," and he is speaking of the vision after the resurrection. Therefore the same identical man will rise again.

Further, Augustine says (De Trin. viii, 5) that "to rise again is naught else but to live again." Now unless the same identical man that died return to life, he would not be said to live again. Therefore he would not rise again, which is contrary to faith.

I answer that, The necessity of holding the resurrection arises from this---that man may obtain the last end for which he was made; for this cannot be accomplished in this life, nor in the life of the separated soul, as stated above (Question 75, Articles 1,2): otherwise man would have been made in vain, if he were unable to obtain the end for which he was made. And since it behooves the end to be obtained by the selfsame thing that was made for that end, lest it appear to be made without purpose, it is necessary for the selfsame man to rise again; and this is effected by the selfsame soul being united to the selfsame body. For otherwise there would be no resurrection properly speaking, if the same man were not reformed. Hence to maintain that he who rises again is not the selfsame man is heretical, since it is contrary to the truth of Scripture which proclaims the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 1: The Philosopher is speaking of repetition by movement or natural change. For he shows the difference between the recurrence that occurs in generation and corruption and that which is observed in the movement of the heavens. Because the selfsame heaven by local movement returns to the beginning of its movement, since it has a moved incorruptible substance. On the other hand, things subject to generation and corruption return by generation to specific but not numerical identity, because from man blood is engendered, from blood seed, and so on until a man is begotten, not the selfsame man, but the man specifically. In like manner from fire comes air, from air water, from water earth, whence fire is produced, not the selfsame fire, but the same in species. Hence it is clear that the argument, so far as the meaning of the Philosopher is concerned, is not to the point.

We may also reply that the form of other things subject to generation and corruption is not subsistent of itself, so as to be able to remain after the corruption of the composite, as it is with the rational soul. For the soul, even after separation from the body, retains the being which accrues to it when in the body, and the body is made to share that being by the resurrection, since the being of the body and the being of the soul in the body are not distinct from one another, otherwise the union of soul and body would be accidental. Consequently there has been no interruption in the substantial being of man, as would make it impossible for the self-same man to return on account of an interruption in his being, as is the case with other things that are corrupted, the being of which is interrupted altogether, since their form remains not, and their matter remains under another being.

Nevertheless neither does the self-same man recur by natural generation, because the body of the man begotten is not composed of the whole body of his begetter: hence his body is numerically distinct, and consequently his soul and the whole man.

Reply to Objection 2: There are two opinions about humanity and about any form of a whole. For some say that the form of the whole and the form of the part are really one and the same: but that it is called the form of the part inasmuch as it perfects the matter, and the form of the whole inasmuch as the whole specific nature results therefrom. According to this opinion humanity is really nothing else than the rational soul: and so, since the selfsame rational soul is resumed, there will be the same identical humanity, which will remain even after death, albeit not under the aspect of humanity, because the composite does not derive the specific nature from a separated humanity.

The other opinion, which seems nearer the truth, is Avicenna's, according to whom the form of the whole is not the form of a part only, nor some other form besides the form of the part, but is the whole resulting from the composition of form and matter, embracing both within itself. This form of the whole is called the essence or quiddity. Since then at the resurrection there will be the selfsame body, and the selfsame rational soul, there will be, of necessity, the same humanity.

The first argument proving that there will be a distinction of humanity was based on the supposition that humanity is some distinct form supervening form and matter; which is false.

The second reason does not disprove the identity of humanity, because union implies action or passion, and though there be a different union, this cannot prevent the identity of humanity, because the action and passion from which humanity resulted are not of the essence of humanity, wherefore a distinction on their part does not involve a distinction of humanity: for it is clear that generation and resurrection are not the self-same movement. Yet the identity of the rising man with the begotten man is not hindered for this reason: and in like manner neither is the identity of humanity prevented if we take union for the relation itself: because this relation is not essential to but concomitant with humanity, since humanity is not one of those forms that are composition or order (Phys. ii, 1), as are the forms of things produced by art, so that if there be another distinct composition there is another distinct form of a house.

Reply to Objection 3: This argument affords a very good proof against those who held a distinction between the sensitive and rational souls in man: because in that case the sensitive soul in man would not be incorruptible, as neither is it in other animals; and consequently in the resurrection there would not be the same sensitive soul, and consequently neither the same animal nor the same man.

But if we assert that in man the same soul is by its substance both rational and sensitive, we shall encounter no difficulty in this question, because animal is defined from sense, i.e. the sensitive soul as from its essential form: whereas from sense, i.e. the sensitive power, we know its definition as from an accidental form "that contributes more than another to our knowledge of the quiddity" (De Anima i, 1). Accordingly after death there remains the sensitive soul, even as the rational soul, according to its substance: whereas the sensitive powers, according to some, do not remain. And since these powers are accidental properties, diversity on their part cannot prevent the identity of the whole animal, not even of the animal's parts: nor are powers to be called perfections or acts of organs unless as principles of action, as heat in fire.

Reply to Objection 4: A statue may be considered in two ways, either as a particular substance, or as something artificial. And since it is placed in the genus of substance by reason of its matter, it follows that if we consider it as a particular substance, it is the selfsame statue that is remade from the same matter. On the other hand, it is placed in the genus of artificial things inasmuch as it has an accidental form which, if the statue be destroyed, passes away also. Consequently it does not return identically the same, nor can the statue be identically the same. But man's form, namely the soul, remains after the body has perished: wherefore the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the ashes of the human body must needs, by the resurrection, return to the same parts of the body that were dissolved into them?

Objection 1: It would seem necessary for the ashes of the human body to return, by the resurrection, to the same parts that were dissolved into them. For, according to the Philosopher, "as the whole soul is to the whole body, so is a part of the soul to a part of the body, as sight to the pupil" (De Anima ii, 1). Now it is necessary that after the resurrection the body be resumed by the same soul. Therefore it is also necessary for the same parts of the body to return to the same limbs, in which they were perfected by the same parts of the soul.

Objection 2: Further, difference of matter causes difference of identity. But if the ashes return not to the same parts, each part will not be remade from the same matter of which it consisted before. Therefore they will not be the same identically. Now if the parts are different the whole will also be different, since parts are to the whole as matter is to form (Phys. ii, 3). Therefore it will not be the self-same man; which is contrary to the truth of the resurrection.

Objection 3: Further, the resurrection is directed to the end that man may receive the meed of his works. Now different parts of the body are employed in different works, whether of merit or of demerit. Therefore at the resurrection each part must needs return to its former state that it may be rewarded in due measure.

On the contrary, Artificial things are more dependent on their matter than natural things. Now in artificial things, in order that the same artificial thing be remade, from the same matter, there is no need for the parts to be brought back to the same position. Neither therefore is it necessary in man.

Further, change of an accident does not cause a change of identity. Now the situation of parts is an accident. Therefore its change in a man does not cause a change of identity.

I answer that, In this question it makes a difference whether we ask what can be done without prejudice to identity, and what will be done for the sake of congruity. As regards the first it must be observed that in man we may speak of parts in two ways: first as of the various parts of a homogeneous whole, for instance the various parts of flesh, or the various parts of bone; secondly, as of various parts of various species of a heterogeneous whole, for instance bone and flesh. Accordingly if it be said that one part of matter will return to another part of the same species, this causes no change except in the position of the parts: and change of position of parts does not change the species in homogeneous wholes: and so if the matter of one part return to another part, this is nowise prejudicial to the identity of the whole. Thus is it in the example given in the text (Sent. iv, D, 44), because a statue, after being remade, is identically the same, not as to its form, but as to its matter, in respect of which it is a particular substance, and in this way a statue is homogeneous, although it is not according to its artificial form. But if it be said that the matter of one part returns to another part of another species, it follows of necessity that there is a change not only in the position of parts, but also in their identity: yet so that the whole matter, or something belonging to the truth of human nature in one is transferred to another. but not if what was superfluous in one part is transferred to another. Now the identity of parts being taken away, the identity of the whole is removed, if we speak of essential parts, but not if we speak of accidental parts, such as hair and nails, to which apparently Augustine refers (De Civ. Dei xxii). It is thus clear how the transference of matter from one part of another destroys the identity, and how it does not.

But speaking of the congruity, it is more probable that even the parts will retain their position at the resurrection, especially as regards the essential and organic parts, although perhaps not as regards the accidental parts, such as nails and hair.

Reply to Objection 1: This argument considers organic or heterogeneous parts, but no homogeneous or like parts.

Reply to Objection 2: A change in the position of the parts of matter does not cause a change of identity, although difference of matter does.

Reply to Objection 3: Operation, properly speaking, is not ascribed to the part but to the whole, wherefore the reward is due, not to the part but to the whole.

QUESTION 80

OF THE INTEGRITY OF THE BODIES IN THE RESURRECTION

Prologue

We must next consider the integrity of the bodies in the resurrection. Under this head there are five points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether all the members of the human body will rise again therein?
- (2) Whether the hair and nails will?
- (3) Whether the humors will?
- (4) Whether whatever the body contained belonging to the truth of human nature will rise again?
- (5) Whether whatever it contained materially will rise again?

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 1. Whether all the members of the human body will rise again?

Objection 1: It would seem that not all the members of the human body will rise again. For if the end be done away it is useless to repair the means. Now the end of each member is its act. Since then nothing useless is done in the Divine works, and since the use of certain members is not fitting to man after the resurrection, especially the use of the genital members, for then they "shall neither marry, nor be married" (Mt. 22:30), it would seem that not all the members shall rise again.

Objection 2: Further, the entrails are members: and yet they will not rise again. For they can neither rise full, since thus they contain impurities, nor empty, since nothing is empty in nature. Therefore the members shall not all rise again.

Objection 3: Further, the body shall rise again that it may be rewarded for the works which the soul did through it. Now the member of which a thief has been deprived for theft, and who has afterwards done penance and is saved, cannot be rewarded at the resurrection, neither for any good deed, since it has not co-operated in any, nor for evil deeds, since the punishment of the member would redound to the punishment of man. Therefore the members will not all rise again.

On the contrary, The other members belong more to the truth of human nature than hair and nails. Yet these will be restored to man at the resurrection according to the text (Sent. iv, D, 4). Much more therefore does this apply to the other members.

Further, "The works of God are perfect" (Dt. 32:4). But the resurrection will be the work of God. Therefore man will be remade perfect in all his members.

I answer that, As stated in De Anima ii, 4, "the soul stands in relation to the body not only as its form and end, but also as efficient cause." For the soul is compared to the body as art to the thing made by art, as the Philosopher says (De Anim. Gener. ii, 4), and whatever is shown forth explicitly in the product of art is all contained implicitly and originally in the art. In like manner whatever appears in the parts of the body is all contained originally and, in a way, implicitly in the soul. Thus just as the work of an art would not be perfect, if its product lacked any of the things contained in the art, so neither could man be perfect, unless the whole that is contained enfolded in the soul be outwardly unfolded in the body, nor would the body correspond in full proportion to the soul. Since then at the resurrection it behooves man's body to correspond entirely to the soul, for it will not rise again except according to the relation it bears to the rational soul, it follows that man also must rise again perfect, seeing that he is thereby repaired in order that he may obtain his ultimate perfection. Consequently all the members that are now in man's body must needs be restored at the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 1: The members may be considered in two ways in relation to the soul: either according to the relation of matter to form, or according to the relation of instrument to agent, since "the whole body is compared to the whole soul in the same way as one part is to another" (De Anima ii, 1). If then the members be considered in the light of the first relationship, their end is not operation, but rather the perfect being of the species, and this is also required after the resurrection: but if they be considered in the light of the second relationship, then their end is operation. And yet it does not follow that when the operation fails the instrument is useless, because an instrument serves not only to accomplish the operation of the agent, but also to show its virtue. Hence it will be necessary for the virtue of the soul's powers to be shown in their bodily instruments, even though they never proceed to action, so that the wisdom of God be thereby glorified.

Reply to Objection 2: The entrails will rise again in the body even as the other members: and they will be filled not with vile superfluities but with goodly humors.

Reply to Objection 3: The acts whereby we merit are not the acts, properly speaking, of hand or foot but of the whole man; even as the work of art is ascribed not to the instrument but to the craftsman. Therefore though the member which was cut off before a man's repentance did not co-operate with him in the state wherein he merits glory, yet man himself merits that the whole man may be rewarded, who with his whole being serves God.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the hair and nails will rise again in the human body?

Objection 1: It would seem that the hair and nails will not rise again in the human body. For just as hair and nails result from the surplus of food, so do urine, sweat and other superfluities or dregs. But these will not rise again with the body. Neither therefore will hair and nails.

Objection 2: Further, of all the superfluities that are produced from food, seed comes nearest to the truth of human nature, since though superfluous it is needed. Yet seed will not rise again in the human body. Much less therefore will hair and nails.

Objection 3: Further, nothing is perfected by a rational soul that is not perfected by a sensitive soul. But hair and nails are not perfected by a sensitive soul, for "we do not feel with them" (De Anima i, 5; iii, 13). Therefore since the human body rises not again except because it is perfected by a rational soul, it would seem that the hair and nails will not rise again.

On the contrary, It is written (Lk. 21:18): "A hair of your head shall not perish."

Further, hair and nails were given to man as an ornament. Now the bodies of men, especially of the elect, ought to rise again with all their adornment. Therefore they ought to rise again with the hair.

I answer that, The soul is to the animated body, as art is to the work of art, and is to the parts of the body as art to its instruments: wherefore an animated body is called an organic body. Now art employs certain instruments for the accomplishment of the work intended, and these instruments belong to the primary intention of art: and it also uses other instruments for the safe-keeping of the principal instruments, and these belong to the secondary intention of art: thus the art of warfare employs a sword for fighting, and a sheath for the safe-keeping of the sword. And so among the parts of an animated body, some are directed to the accomplishment of the souls' operations, for instance the heart, liver, hand, foot; while others are directed to the safe-keeping of the other parts as leaves to cover fruit; and thus hair and nails are in man for the protection of other parts. Consequently, although they do not belong to the primary perfection of the human body, they belong to the secondary perfection: and since man will rise again with all the perfections of his nature, it follows that hair and nails will rise again in him.

Reply to Objection 1: Those superfluities are voided by nature, as being useful for nothing. Hence they do not belong to the perfection of the human body. It is not so with the superfluities which nature reserves for the production of hair and nails which she needs for the protection of the members.

Reply to Objection 2: Seed is not required for the perfection of the individual, as hair and nails are, but only for the protection of the species.

Reply to Objection 3: Hair and nails are nourished and grow, and so it is clear that they share in some operation, which would not be possible unless they were parts in some way perfected by the soul. And since in man there is but one soul, namely the rational soul, it is clear that they are perfected by the rational soul, although not so far as to share in the operation of sense, as neither do bones, and yet it is certain that these will rise again and that they belong to the integrity of the individual.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the humors will rise again in the body?

Objection 1: It would seem that the humors will not rise again in the body. For it is written (1 Cor. 15:50): "Flesh and blood cannot possess the kingdom of God." Now blood is the chief humor. Therefore it will not rise again in the blessed, who will possess the kingdom of God, and much less in others.

Objection 2: Further, humors are intended to make up for the waste. Now after the resurrection there will be no waste. Therefore the body will not rise again with humors.

Objection 3: Further, that which is in process of generation in the human body is not yet perfected by the rational soul. Now the humors are still in process of generation because they are potentially flesh and bone. Therefore they are not yet perfected by the rational soul. Now the human body is not directed to the resurrection except in so far as it is perfected by the rational soul. Therefore the humors will not rise again.

On the contrary, Whatever enters into the constitution of the human body will rise again with it. Now this applies to the humors, as appears from the statement of Augustine (De Spir. et Anima xv) that "the body consists of functional members; the functional members of homogeneous parts; and the homogeneous parts of humors." Therefore the humors will rise again in the body.

Further, our resurrection will be conformed to the resurrection of Christ. Now in Christ's resurrection His blood rose again, else the wine would not now be changed into His blood in the Sacrament of the altar. Therefore the blood will rise again in us also, and in like manner the other humors.

I answer that, Whatever belongs to the integrity of human nature in those who take part in the resurrection will rise again, as stated above (Articles 1,2). Hence whatever humidity of the body belongs to the integrity of human nature must needs rise again in man. Now there is a threefold humidity in man. There is one which occurs as receding from the perfection of the individual---either because it is on the way to corruption, and is voided by nature, for instance urine, sweat, matter, and so forth---or because it is directed by nature to the preservation of the species in some individual, either by the act of the generative power, as seed, or by the act of the nutritive power, as milk. None of these humidities will rise again, because they do not belong to the perfection of the person rising again.

The second kind of humidity is one that has not yet reached its ultimate perfection, which nature achieves in the individual, yet it is directed thereto by nature: and this is of two kinds. For there is one kind that has a definite form and is contained among the parts of the body, for instance the blood and the other humors which nature has directed to the members that are produced or nourished therefrom: and yet they have certain definite forms like the other parts of the body, and consequently will rise again with the other parts of the body: while another kind of humidity is in transition from form to form, namely from the form of humor to the form of member.

Humidities of this kind will not rise again, because after the resurrection each part of the body will be established in its form, so that one will not pass into another. Wherefore this humidity that is actually in transition from one form to another will not rise again. Now this humidity may be considered in a twofold state---either as being at the beginning of its transformation, and thus it is called "ros," namely the humidity that is found in the cavities of the smaller veins---or as in the course of transformation and already beginning to undergo alteration, and thus it is called "cambium": but in neither state will it rise again. The third kind of humidity is that which has already reached its ultimate perfection that nature intends in the body of the individual, and has already undergone transformation and become incorporate with the members. This is called "gluten," and since it belongs to the members it will rise again just as the members will.

Reply to Objection 1: In these words of the Apostle flesh and blood do not denote the substance of flesh and blood but deeds of flesh and blood, which are either deeds of sin or the operations of the animal life. Or we may say with Augustine in his letter to Consentius (Ep. cxlvi) that "flesh and blood here signify the corruption which is now predominant in flesh and blood"; wherefore the Apostle's words continue: "Neither shall corruption possess incorruption."

Reply to Objection 2: Just as the members that serve for generation will be after the resurrection for the integrity of human nature, and not for the operation accomplished now by them, so will the humors be in the body not to make up for waste, but to restore the integrity of human nature and to show forth its natural power.

Reply to Objection 3: Just as the elements are in the course of generation in relation to mixed bodies, because they are their matter, yet not so as to be always in transition when in the mixed body, so too are the humors in relation to the members. And for this reason as the elements in the parts of the universe have definite forms, by reason of which they, like mixed bodies, belong to the perfection of the universe, so too the humors belong to the perfection of the human body, just as the other parts do, although they do not reach its entire perfection, as the other parts do, and although the elements have not perfect forms as mixed bodies have. But as all the parts of the universe receive their perfection from God, not equally, but each one according to its mode, so too the humors are in some way perfected by the rational soul, yet not in the same measure as the more perfect parts.

ARTICLE 4. Whether whatever in the body belonged to the truth of human nature will rise again in it?

Objection 1: It would seem that what was in the body, belonging to the truth of human nature, will not all rise again in it. For food is changed into the truth of human nature. Now sometimes the flesh of the ox or of other animals is taken as food. Therefore if whatever belonged to the truth of human nature will rise again, the flesh of the ox or of other animals will also rise again: which is inadmissible.

Objection 2: Further, Adam's rib belonged to the truth of human nature in him, as ours does in us. But Adam's rib will rise again not in Adam but in Eve, else Eve would not rise again at all since she was made from that rib. Therefore whatever belonged in man to the truth of human nature will not all rise again in him.

Objection 3: Further, it is impossible for the same thing from different men to rise again. Yet it is possible for something in different men to belong to the truth of human nature, for instance if a man were to partake of human flesh which would be changed into his substance. Therefore there will not rise again in man whatever belonged in him to the truth of human nature.

Objection 4: Further, if it be said that not all the flesh partaken of belongs to the truth of human nature and that consequently some of it may possibly rise again in the one man and some in the other---on the contrary: That which is derived from one's parents would especially seem to belong to the truth of human nature. But if one who partook of nothing but human flesh were to beget children that which his child derives from him must needs be of the flesh of other men partaken of by his father, since the seed is from the surplus of food, as the Philosopher proves (De Gen. Animal. i). Therefore what belongs to the truth of human nature in that child belonged also to the truth of human nature in other men of whose flesh his father had partaken.

Objection 5: Further, if it be said that what was changed into seed was not that which belong to the truth of human nature in the flesh of the men eaten, but something not belonging to the truth of human nature---on the contrary: Let us suppose that some one is fed entirely on embryos in which seemingly there is nothing but what belongs to the truth of human nature since whatever is in them is derived from the parents. If then the surplus food be changed into seed, that which belonged to the truth of human nature in the embryos---and after these have received a rational soul, the resurrection applies to them---must needs belong to the truth of human nature in the child begotten of that seed. And thus, since the same cannot rise again in two subjects, it will be impossible for whatever belonged to the truth of human nature in both to rise again in both of them.

On the contrary, Whatever belonged to the truth of human nature was perfected by the rational soul. Now it is through being perfected by the rational soul that the human body is directed to the resurrection. Therefore whatever belonged to the truth of human nature will rise again in each one.

Further, if anything belonging to the truth of human nature in a man be taken from his body, this will not be the perfect body of a man. Now all imperfection of a man will be removed at the resurrection, especially in the elect, to whom it was promised (Lk. 21:18) that not a hair of their head should perish. Therefore whatever belonged to the truth of human nature in a man will rise again in him.

I answer that, "Everything is related to truth in the same way as to being" (Metaph. ii), because a thing is true when it is as it appears to him who actually knows it. For this reason Avicenna (Metaph. ii) says that "the truth of anything is a property of the being immutably attached thereto." Accordingly a thing is said to belong to the truth of human nature, because it belongs properly to the being of human nature, and this is what shares the form of human nature, just as true gold is what has the true form of gold whence gold derives its proper being. In order therefore to see what it is that belongs to the truth of human nature, we must observe that there have been three opinions on the question. For some have maintained that nothing begins anew to belong to the truth of human nature and that whatever belongs to the truth of human nature, all of it belonged to the truth of human nature when this was created; and that this multiplies by itself, so that it is possible for the seed whereof the child is begotten to be detached therefrom by the begetter, and that again the detached part multiplies in the child, so that he reaches perfect quantity by growth, and so on, and that thus was the whole human race multiplied. Wherefore according to this opinion, whatever is produced by nourishment. although it seem to have the appearance of flesh and blood, does not belong to the truth of human nature.

Others held that something new is added to the truth of human nature by the natural transformation of the food into the human body, if we consider the truth of human nature in the species to the preservation of which the act of the generative power is directed: but that if we consider the truth of human nature in the individual, to the preservation and perfection of which the act of the nutritive power is directed, that which is added by food belongs to the truth of the human nature of the individual, not primarily but secondarily. For they assert that the truth of human nature, first and foremost, consists in the radical humor, that namely which is begotten of the seed of which the human race was originally fashioned: and that what is changed from food into true flesh and blood does not belong principally to the truth of human nature in this particular individual, but secondarily: and that nevertheless this can belong principally to the truth of human nature in another individual who is begotten of the seed of the former. For they assert that seed is the surplus from food, either mingled with something belonging principally to the truth of human nature in the begetter, according to some, or without any such admixture, as others maintain. And thus the nutrimental humor in one becomes the radical humor in another.

The third opinion is that something new begins to belong principally to the truth of human nature even in this individual, because distinction in the human body does not require that any signate material part must needs remain throughout the whole lifetime; any signate part one may take is indifferent to this, whereas it remains always as regards what belongs to the species in it, albeit as regards what is material therein it may ebb and flow. And thus the nutrimental humor is not distinct from the radical on the part of its principle (so that it be called radical when begotten of the seed, and nutrimental when produced by the food), but rather on the part of the term, so that it be called radical when it reaches the term of generation by the act of the generative, or even nutritive power, but nutrimental, when it has not yet reached this term, but is still on the way to give nourishment.

These three opinions have been more fully exposed and examined in the Second Book (Sent. ii, D, 30); wherefore there is no need for repetition here, except in so far as the question at issue is concerned. It must accordingly be observed that this question requires different answers according to these opinions.

For the first opinion on account of its explanation of the process of multiplication is able to admit perfection of the truth of human nature, both as regards the number of individuals and as regards the due quantity of each individual, without taking into account that which is produced from food; for this is not added except for the purpose of resisting the destruction that might result from the action of natural heat, as lead is added to silver lest it be destroyed in melting. Wherefore since at the resurrection it behooves human nature to be restored to its perfection, nor does the natural heat tend to destroy the natural humor, there will be no need for anything resulting from food to rise again in man, but that alone will rise again which belonged to the truth of the human nature of the individual, and this reaches the aforesaid perfection in number and quantity by being detached and multiplied.

The second opinion, since it maintains that what is produced from food is needed for the perfection of quantity in the individual and for the multiplication that results from generation, must needs admit that something of this product from food shall rise again: not all, however, but only so much as is required for the perfect restoration of human nature in all its individuals. Hence this opinion asserts that all that was in the substance of the seed will rise again in this man who was begotten of this seed; because this belongs chiefly to the truth of human nature in him: while of that which afterwards he derives from nourishment, only so much will rise again in him as is needed for the perfection of his quantity; and not all, because this does not belong to the perfection of human nature, except in so far as nature requires it for the perfection of quantity. Since however this nutrimental humor is subject to ebb and flow the restoration will be effected in this order, that what first belonged to the substance of a man's body, will all be restored, and of that which was added secondly, thirdly, and so on, as much as is required to restore quantity. This is proved by two reasons. First, because that which was added was intended to restore what was wasted at first, and thus it does not belong principally to the truth of human nature to the same extent as that which came first. Secondly, because the addition of extraneous humor to the first radical humors results in the whole mixture not sharing the truth of the specific nature as perfectly as the first did: and the Philosopher instances as an example (De Gener. i) the mixing of water with wine, which always weakens the strength of the wine, so that in the end the wine becomes watery: so that although the second water be drawn into the species of wine, it does not share the species of wine as perfectly as the first water added to the wine. Even so that which is secondly changed from food into flesh does not so perfectly attain to the species of flesh as that which was changed first, and consequently does not belong in the same degree to the truth of human nature nor to the resurrection. Accordingly it is clear that this opinion maintains that the whole of what belongs to the truth of human nature principally will rise again, but not the whole of what belongs to the truth of human nature secondarily.

The third opinion differs somewhat from the second and in some respects agrees with it. It differs in that it maintains that whatever is under the form of flesh and bone all belongs to the truth of human nature, because this opinion does not distinguish as remaining in man during his whole lifetime any signate matter that belongs essentially and primarily to the truth of human nature, besides something ebbing and flowing, that belongs to the truth of human nature merely on account of the perfection of quantity, and not on account of the primary being of the species, as the second opinion asserted. But it states that all the parts that are not beside the intention of the nature generated belong to the truth of human nature, as regards what they have of the species, since thus they remain; but not as regards what they have of matter, since thus they are indifferent to ebb and flow: so that we are to understand that the same thing happens in the parts of one man as in the whole population of a city, for each individual is cut off from the population by death, while others take their place: wherefore the parts of the people flow back and forth materially, but remain formally, since these others occupy the very same offices and positions from which the former were withdrawn, so that the commonwealth is said to remain the selfsame. In like manner, while certain parts are on the ebb and others are being restored to the same shape and position, all the parts flow back and forth as to their matter, but remain as to their species; and nevertheless the selfsame man remains.

On the other hand, The third opinion agrees with the second, because it holds that the parts which come secondly do not reach the perfection of the species so perfectly as those which come first: and consequently the third opinion asserts that the same thing rises again in man as the second opinion maintains, but not for quite the same reason. For it holds that the whole of what is produced from the seed will rise again, not because it belongs to the truth of human nature otherwise than that which comes after, but because it shares the truth of human nature more perfectly: which same order the second opinion applied to those things that are produced afterwards from food, in which point also these two opinions agree.

Reply to Objection 1: A natural thing is what it is, not from its matter but from its form; wherefore, although that part of matter which at one time was under the form of bovine flesh rises again in man under the form of human flesh, it does not follow that the flesh of an ox rises again, but the flesh of a man: else one might conclude that the clay from which Adam's body was fashioned shall rise again. The second opinion, however, grants this argument.

Reply to Objection 2: That rib did not belong to the perfection of the individual in Adam, but was directed to the multiplication of the species. Hence it will rise again not in Adam but in Eve, just as the seed will rise again, not in the begetter, but in the begotten.

Reply to Objection 3: According to the first opinion it is easy to reply to this argument, because the flesh that is eaten never belonged to the truth of human nature in the eater, but it did belong to the truth of human nature in him whose flesh was eaten: and thus it will rise again in the latter but not in the former. according to the second and third opinions, each one will rise again in that wherein he approached nearest to the perfect participation of the virtue of the species, and if he approached equally in both, he will rise again in that wherein he was first, because in that he first was directed to the resurrection by union with the rational soul of that man. Hence if there were any surplus in the flesh eaten, not belonging to the truth of human nature in the first man, it will be possible for it to rise again in the second: otherwise what belonged to the resurrection in the first will rise again in him and not in the second; but in the second its place is taken either by something of that which was the product from other food, or if he never partook of any other food than human flesh, the substitution is made by Divine power so far as the perfection of quantity requires, as it does in those who die before the perfect age. Nor does this derogate from numerical identity, as neither does the ebb and flow of parts.

Reply to Objection 4: According to the first opinion this argument is easily answered. For that opinion asserts that the seed is not from the surplus food: so that the flesh eaten is not changed into the seed whereof the child is begotten. But according to the other two opinions we must reply that it is impossible for the whole of the flesh eaten to be changed into seed, because it is after much separation that the seed is distilled from the food, since seed is the ultimate surplus of food. That part of the eaten flesh which is changed into seed belongs to the truth of human nature in the one born of the seed more than in the one of whose flesh the seed was the product. Hence according to the rule already laid down (ad 3), whatever was changed into the seed will rise again in the person born of the seed; while the remaining matter will rise again in him of whose flesh the seed was the product.

Reply to Objection 5: The embryo is not concerned with the resurrection before it is animated by a rational soul, in which state much has been added to the seminal substance from the substance of food, since the child is nourished in the mother's womb. Consequently on the supposition that a man partook of such food, and that some one were begotten of the surplus thereof, that which was in the seminal substance will indeed rise again in the one begotten of that seed; unless it contain something that would have belonged to the seminal substance in those from whose flesh being eaten the seed was produced, for this would rise again in the first but not in the second. The remainder of the eaten flesh, not being changed into seed, will clearly rise again in the first the Divine power supplying deficiencies in both. The first opinion is not troubled by this objection, since it does not hold the seed to be from the surplus food: but there are many other reasons against it as may be seen in the Second Book (Sent. ii, D, 30; FP, Question 119, Article 2).

ARTICLE 5. Whether whatever was materially in a man's members will all rise again?

Objection 1: It would seem that whatever was materially in a man's members will all rise again. For the hair, seemingly, is less concerned in the resurrection than the other members. Yet whatever was in the hair will all rise again, if not in the hair, at least in other parts of the body, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii) quoted in the text (Sent. iv, D, 44). Much more therefore whatever was materially in the other members will all rise again.

Objection 2: Further, just as the parts of the flesh are perfected as to species by the rational soul, so are the parts as to matter. But the human body is directed to the resurrection through being perfected by a rational soul. Therefore not only the parts of species but also the parts of matter will all rise again.

Objection 3: Further, the body derives its totality from the same cause as it derives its divisibility into parts. But division into parts belongs to a body in respect of matter the disposition of which is quantity in respect of which it is divided. Therefore totality is ascribed to the body in respect of its parts of matter. If then all the parts of matter rise not again, neither will the whole body rise again: which is inadmissible.

On the contrary, The parts of matter are not permanent in the body but ebb and flow, as stated in De Gener. i. If, therefore, all the parts of matter, which remain not but ebb and flow, rise again, either the body of one who rises again will be very dense, or it will be immoderate in quantity.

Further, whatever belongs to the truth of human nature in one man can all be a part of matter in another man, if the latter were to partake of his flesh. Therefore if all the parts of matter in one man were to rise again it follows that in one man there will rise again that which belongs to the truth of human nature in another: which is absurd.

I answer that, What is in man materially, is not directed to the resurrection, except in so far as it belongs to the truth of human nature; because it is in this respect that it bears a relation to the human souls. Now all that is in man materially belongs indeed to the truth of human nature in so far as it has something of the species, but not all, if we consider the totality of matter; because all the matter that was in a man from the beginning of his life to the end would surpass the quantity due to his species, as the third opinion states, which opinion seems to me more probable than the others. Wherefore the whole of what is in man will rise again, if we speak of the totality of the species which is dependent on quantity, shape, position and order of parts, but the whole will not rise again if we speak of the totality of matter. The second and first opinions, however, do not make this distinction, but distinguish between parts both of which have the species and matter. But these two opinions agree in that they both state what is produced from the seed will all rise again even if we speak of totality of matter: while they differ in this that the first opinion maintains that nothing will rise again of that which was engendered from food, whereas the second holds that something but not all, thereof will rise again, as stated above (Article 4).

Reply to Objection 1: Just as all that is in the other parts of the body will rise again, if we speak of the totality of the species, but not if we speak of material totality, so is it with the hair. In the other parts something accrues from nourishment which causes growth, and this is reckoned as another part, if we speak of totality of species, since it occupies another place and position in the body, and is under other parts of dimension: and there accrues something which does not cause growth, but serves to make up for waste by nourishing. and this is not reckoned as another part of the whole considered in relation to the species, since it does not occupy another place or position in the body than that which was occupied by the part that has passed away: although it may be reckoned another part if we consider the totality of matter. The same applies to the hair. Augustine, however, is speaking of the cutting of hair that was a part causing growth of the body; wherefore it must needs rise again, not however as regards the quantity of hair, lest it should be immoderate, but it will rise again in other parts as deemed expedient by Divine providence. Or else he refers to the case when something will be lacking to the other parts, for then it will be possible for this to be supplied from the surplus of hair.

Reply to Objection 2: According to the third opinion parts of species are the same as parts of matter: for the Philosopher does not make this distinction (De Gener. i) in order to distinguish different parts, but in order to show that the same parts may be considered both in respect of species, as to what belongs to the form and species in them, and in respect of matter, as to that which is under the form and species. Now it is clear that the matter of the flesh has no relation to the rational soul except in so far as it is under such a form, and consequently by reason thereof it is directed to the resurrection. But the first and second opinions which draw a distinction between parts of species and parts of matter say that although the rational soul perfects both parts, it does not perfect parts of matter except by means of the parts of species, wherefore they are not equally directed to the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 3: In the matter of things subject to generation and corruption it is necessary to presuppose indefinite dimensions before the reception of the substantial form. Consequently division which is made according to these dimensions belongs properly to matter. But complete and definite quantity comes to matter after the substantial form; wherefore division that is made in reference to definite quantity regards the species especially when definite position of parts belongs to the essence of the species, as in the human body.

OF THE QUALITY OF THOSE WHO RISE AGAIN

Prologue

We must now consider the quality of those who rise again. Under this head there are four points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether all will rise again in the youthful age?
- (2) Whether they will be of equal stature?
- (3) Whether all will be of the same sex?
- (4) Whether they will rise again to the animal life?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether all will rise again of the same age?

Objection 1: It would seem that all will not rise again of the same, namely the youthful age. Because God will take nothing pertaining to man's perfection from those who rise again, especially from the blessed. Now age pertains to the perfection of man, since old age is the age that demands reverence. Therefore the old will not rise again of a youthful age.

Objection 2: Further, age is reckoned according to the length of past time. Now it is impossible for past time not to have passed. Therefore it is impossible for those who were of greater age to be brought back to a youthful age.

Objection 3: Further, that which belonged most to the truth of human nature in each individual will especially rise again in him. Now the sooner a thing was in man the more would it seem to have belonged to the truth of human nature, because in the end, through the strength of the species being weakened the human body is likened to watery wine according to the Philosopher (De Gener. i). Therefore if all are to rise again of the same age, it is more fitting that they should rise again in the age of childhood.

On the contrary, It is written (Eph. 4:13): "Until we all meet . . . unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ."

Now Christ rose again of youthful age, which begins about the age of thirty years, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii). Therefore others also will rise again of a youthful age.

Further, man will rise again at the most perfect stage of nature. Now human nature is at the most perfect stage in the age of youth. Therefore all will rise again of that age.

I answer that, Man will rise again without any defect of human nature, because as God founded human nature without a defect, even so will He restore it without defect. Now human nature has a twofold defect. First, because it has not yet attained to its ultimate perfection. Secondly, because it has already gone back from its ultimate perfection. The first defect is found in children, the second in the aged: and consequently in each of these human nature will be brought by the resurrection to the state of its ultimate perfection which is in the youthful age, at which the movement of growth terminates, and from which the movement of decrease begins.

Reply to Objection 1: Old age calls for reverence, not on account of the state of the body which is at fault; but on account of the soul's wisdom which is taken for granted on account of its being advanced in years. Wherefore in the elect there will remain the reverence due to old age on account of the fulness of Divine wisdom which will be in them, but the defect of old age will not be in them.

Reply to Objection 2: We speak of age not as regards the number of years, but as regards the state which the human body acquires from years. Hence Adam is said to have been formed in the youthful age on account of the particular condition of body which he had at the first day of his formation. Thus the argument is not to the point.

Reply to Objection 3: The strength of the species is said to be more perfect in a child than in a young man, as regards the ability to transform nourishment in a certain way, even as it is more perfect in the seed than in the mature man. In youth, however, it is more perfect as regards the term of completion. Wherefore that which belonged principally to the truth of human nature will be brought to that perfection which it has in the age of youth, and not to that perfection which it has in the age of a child, wherein the humors have not yet reached their ultimate disposition.

ARTICLE 2. Whether all will rise again of the same stature?

Objection 1: It would seem that all will rise again of the same stature. For just as man is measured by dimensive quantity, so is he by the quantity of time. Now the quantity of time will be reduced to the same measure in all, since all will rise again of the same age. Therefore the dimensive quantity will also be reduced to the same measure in all, so that all will rise again of the same stature.

Objection 2: Further, the Philosopher says (De Anima ii, 4) that "all things in nature have a certain limit end measure of size and growth." Now this limitation can only arise by virtue of the form, with which the quantity as well as all the other accidents ought to agree. Therefore since all men have the same specific form, there should be the same measure of quantity in respect of matter in all, unless an error should occur. But the error of nature will be set right at the resurrection. Therefore all will rise again of the same stature.

Objection 3: Further, it will be impossible for man in rising again to be of a quantity proportionate to the natural power which first formed his body; for otherwise those who could not be brought to a greater quantity by the power of nature will never rise again of a greater quantity, which is false. Therefore that quantity must needs be proportionate to the power which will restore the human body by the resurrection, and to the matter from which it is restored. Now the selfsame, namely the Divine, power will restore all bodies; and all the ashes from which the human bodies will be restored are equally disposed to receive the action of that power. Therefore the resurrection of all men will bring them to the same quantity: and so the same conclusion follows.

On the contrary, Natural quantity results from each individual's nature. Now the nature of the individual will not be altered at the resurrection. Therefore neither will its natural quantity. But all are not of the same natural quantity. Therefore all will not rise again of the same stature.

Further, human nature will be restored by resurrection unto glory or unto punishment. But there will not be the same quantity of glory or punishment in all those who rise again. Neither therefore will there be the same quantity of stature.

I answer that, At the resurrection human nature will be restored not only in the self-same species but also in the selfsame individual: and consequently we must observe in the resurrection what is requisite not only to the specific but also to the individual nature. Now the specific nature has a certain quantity which it neither exceeds nor fails without error, and yet this quantity has certain degrees of latitude and is not to be attached to one fixed measure; and each individual in the human species aims at some degree of quantity befitting his individual nature within the bounds of that latitude, and reaches it at the end of his growth, if there has been no error in the working of nature, resulting in the addition of something to or the subtraction of something from the aforesaid quantity: the measure whereof is gauged according to the proportion of heat as expanding, and of humidity as expansive, in point of which all are not of the same power. Therefore all will not rise again of the same quantity, but each one will rise again of that quantity which would have been his at the end of his growth if nature had not erred or failed: and the Divine power will subtract or supply what was excessive or lacking in man.

Reply to Objection 1: It has already been explained (Article 1, ad 2) that all are said to rise again of the same age, not as though the same length of time were befitting to each one, but because the same state of perfection will be in all, which state is indifferent to a great or small quantity.

Reply to Objection 2: The quantity of a particular individual corresponds not only to the form of the species, but also to the nature or matter of the individual: wherefore the conclusion does not follow.

Reply to Objection 3: The quantity of those who will be raised from the dead is not proportionate to the restoring power, because the latter does not belong to the power of the body---nor to the ashes, as to the state in which they are before the resurrection---but to nature which the individual had at first. Nevertheless if the formative power on account of some defect was unable to effect the due quantity that is befitting to the species, the Divine power will supply the defect at the resurrection, as in dwarfs, and in like manner in those who by immoderate size have exceeded the due bounds of nature.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether all will rise again of the male sex?

Objection 1: It would seem that all will rise again of the male sex. For it is written (Eph. 4:13) that we shall all meet "unto a perfect man," etc. Therefore there will be none but the male sex.

Objection 2: Further, in the world to come all pre-eminence will cease, as a gloss observes on 1 Cor. 15:24. Now woman is subject to man in the natural order. Therefore women will rise again not in the female but in the male sex.

Objection 3: Further, that which is produced incidentally and beside the intention of nature will not rise again, since all error will be removed at the resurrection. Now the female sex is produced beside the intention of nature, through a fault in the formative power of the seed, which is unable to bring the matter of the fetus to the male form: wherefore the Philosopher says (De Anima xvi, i.e. De Generat. Animal. ii) that "the female is a misbegotten male." Therefore the female sex will not rise again.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii): "Those are wiser, seemingly, who doubt not that both sexes will rise again."

Further, at the resurrection God will restore man to what He made him at the creation. Now He made woman from the man's rib (Gn. 2:22). Therefore He will also restore the female sex at the resurrection.

I answer that, Just as, considering the nature of the individual, a different quantity is due to different men, so also, considering the nature of the individual, a different sex is due to different men. Moreover, this same diversity is becoming to the perfection of the species, the different degrees whereof are filled by this very difference of sex and quantity. Wherefore just as men will rise again of various stature, so will they rise again of different sex. And though there be difference of sex there will be no shame in seeing one another, since there will no lust to invite them to shameful deeds which are the cause of shame.

Reply to Objection 1: When it is said: We shall all meet "Christ unto a perfect man," this refers not to the male sex but to the strength of soul which will be in all, both men and women.

Reply to Objection 2: Woman is subject to man on account of the frailty of nature, as regards both vigor of soul and strength of body. After the resurrection, however, the difference in those points will be not on account of the difference of sex, but by reason of the difference of merits. Hence the conclusion does not follow.

Reply to Objection 3: Although the begetting of a woman is beside the intention of a particular nature, it is in the intention of universal nature, which requires both sexes for the perfection of the human species. Nor will any defect result from sex as stated above (ad 2).

ARTICLE 4. Whether all will rise again to animal life so as to exercise the functions of nutrition and generation?

Objection 1: It would seem that they will rise again to the animal life, or in other words that they will make use of the acts of the nutritive and generative powers. For our resurrection will be conformed to Christ's. But Christ is said to have ate after His resurrection (Jn. 21; Lk. 24). Therefore, after the resurrection men will eat, and in like manner beget.

Objection 2: Further, the distinction of sexes is directed to generation; and in like manner the instruments which serve the nutritive power are directed to eating. Now man will rise again with all these. Therefore he will exercise the acts of the generative and nutritive powers.

Objection 3: Further, the whole man will be beatified both in soul and in body. Now beatitude or happiness, according to the Philosopher (Ethic. i, 7), consists in a perfect operation. Therefore it must needs be that all the powers of the soul and all the members should have their respective acts after the resurrection. And so the same conclusion follows as above.

Objection 4: Further, after the resurrection there will be perfect joy in the blessed. Now such a joy includes all pleasures, since "happiness" according to Boethius is "a state rendered perfect by the accumulation of all goods" (De Consol. iii), and the perfect is that which lacks nothing. Since then there is much pleasure in the act of the generative and nutritive powers it would seem that such acts belonging to animal life will be in the blessed, and much more in others, who will have less spiritual bodies.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 22:30): "In the resurrection they shall neither marry nor be married."

Further, generation is directed to supply the defect resulting from death, and to the multiplication of the human race: and eating is directed to make up for waste, and to increase quantity. But in the state of the resurrection the human race will already have the number of individuals preordained by God, since generation will continue up to that point. In like manner each man will rise again in due quantity; neither will death be any more, nor any waste affect the parts of man. Therefore the acts of the generative and nutritive powers would be void of purpose.

I answer that, The resurrection will not be necessary to man on account of his primary perfection, which consists in the integrity of those things that belong to his nature, since man can attain to this in his present state of life by the action of natural causes; but the necessity of the resurrection regards the attainment of his ultimate perfection, which consists in his reaching his ultimate end. Consequently those natural operations which are directed to cause or preserve the primary perfection of human nature will not be in the resurrection: such are the actions of the animal life in man, the action of the elements on one another, and the movement of the heavens; wherefore all these will cease at the resurrection. And since to eat, drink, sleep, beget, pertain to the animal life, being directed to the primary perfection of nature, it follows that they will not be in the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 1: When Christ partook of that meal, His eating was an act, not of necessity as though human nature needed food after the resurrection, but of power, so as to prove that He had resumed the true human nature which He had in that state wherein He ate and drank with His disciples. There will be no need of such proof at the general resurrection, since it will be evident to all. Hence Christ is said to have ate by dispensation in the sense in which lawyers say that a "dispensation is a relaxation of the general law": because Christ made an exception to that which is common to those who rise again (namely not to partake of food) for the aforesaid motive. Hence the argument does not prove.

Reply to Objection 2: The distinction of sexes and the difference of members will be for the restoration of the perfection of human nature both in the species and in the individual. Hence it does not follow that they are without purpose, although they lack their animal operations.

Reply to Objection 3: The aforesaid operations do not belong to man as man, as also the Philosopher states (Ethic. x, 7), wherefore the happiness of the human body does not consist therein. But the human body will be glorified by an overflow from the reason whereby man is man, inasmuch as the body will be subject to reason.

Reply to Objection 4: As the Philosopher says (Ethic. vii, 12, x, 5), the pleasures of the body are medicinal, because they are applied to man for the removal of weariness; or again, they are unhealthy, in so far as man indulges in those pleasures inordinately, as though they were real pleasures: just as a man whose taste is vitiated delights in things which are not delightful to the healthy. Consequently it does not follow that such pleasures as these belong to the perfection of beatitude, as the Jews and Turks maintain, and certain heretics known as the Chiliasts asserted; who, moreover, according to the Philosopher's teaching, would seem to have an unhealthy appetite, since according to him none but spiritual pleasures are pleasures simply, and to be sought for their own sake: wherefore these alone are requisite for beatitude.

OF THE IMPASSIBILITY OF THE BODIES OF THE BLESSED AFTER THEIR RESURRECTION

Prologue

We must now consider the conditions under which the blessed rise again, and (1) the impassibility of their bodies; (2) their subtlety; (3) their agility; (4) their clarity. Under the first head there are four points of inquiry:

(1) Whether the bodies of the saints will be impassible after the resurrection?

(2) Whether all will be equally impassible?

(3) Whether this impassibility renders the glorious bodies?

(4) Whether in them all the senses are in act?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the bodies of the saints will be impassible after the resurrection?

Objection 1: It seems that the bodies of the saints will not be impassible after the resurrection. For everything mortal is passible. But man, after the resurrection, will be "a mortal rational animal," for such is the definition of man, which will never be dissociated from him. Therefore the body will be passible.

Objection 2: Further, whatever is in potentiality to have the form of another thing is passible in relation to something else; for this is what is meant by being passive to another thing (De Gener. i). Now the bodies of the saints will be in potentiality to the form of another thing after the resurrection; since matter, according as it is under one form, does not lose its potentiality to another form. But the bodies of the saints after the resurrection will have matter in common with the elements, because they will be restored out of the same matter of which they are now composed. Therefore they will be in potentiality to another form, and thus will be passible.

Objection 3: Further, according to the Philosopher (De Gener. i), contraries have a natural inclination to be active and passive towards one another. Now the bodies of the saints will be composed of contraries after the resurrection, even as now. Therefore they will be passible.

Objection 4: Further, in the human body the blood and humors will rise again, as stated above (Question 80, Articles 3,4). Now, sickness and such like passions arise in the body through the antipathy of the humors. Therefore the bodies of the saints will be passible after the resurrection.

Objection 5: Further, actual defect is more inconsistent with perfection than potential defect. But passibility denotes merely potential defect. Since then there will be certain actual defects in the bodies of the blessed, such as the scars of the wounds in the martyrs, even as they were in Christ, it would seem that their perfections will not suffer, if we grant their bodies to be passible.

On the contrary, Everything passible is corruptible, because "increase of passion results in loss of substance" [Aristotle, Topic.

vi, 1]. Now the bodies of the saints will be incorruptible after the resurrection, according to 1 Cor. 15:42, "It is sown in corruption, it shall rise in incorruption." Therefore they will be impassible.

Further, the stronger is not passive to the weaker. But no body will be stronger than the bodies of the saints, of which it is written (1 Cor. 15:43): "It is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power." Therefore they will be impassible.

I answer that, We speak of a thing being "passive" in two ways [FS, Question 22, Article 1]. First in a broad sense, and thus every reception is called a passion, whether the thing received be fitting to the receiver and perfect it, or contrary to it and corrupt it. The glorious bodies are not said to be impassible by the removal of this kind of passion, since nothing pertaining to perfection is to be removed from them. In another way we use the word "passive" properly, and thus the Damascene defines passion (De Fide Orth. ii, 22) as being "a movement contrary to nature." Hence an immoderate movement of the heart is called its passion, but a moderate movement is called its operation. The reason of this is that whatever is patient is drawn to the bounds of the agent, since the agent assimilates the patient to itself, so that, therefore, the patient as such is drawn beyond its own bounds within which it was confined. Accordingly taking passion in its proper sense there will be no potentiality to passion in the bodies of the saints after resurrection; wherefore they are said to be impassible.

The reason however of this impassibility is assigned differently by different persons. Some ascribe it to the condition of the elements, which will be different then from what it is now. For they say that the elements will remain, then, as to substance, yet that they will be deprived of their active and passive qualities. But this does not seem to be true: because the active and passive qualities belong to the perfection of the elements, so that if the elements were restored without them in the body of the man that rises again, they would be less perfect than now. Moreover since these qualities are the proper accidents of the elements, being caused by their form and matter, it would seem most absurd for the cause to remain and the effect to be removed. Wherefore others say that the qualities will remain, but deprived of their proper activities, the Divine power so doing for the preservation of the human body. This however would seem to be untenable, since the action and passion of the active and passive qualities is necessary for the mixture (of the elements), and according as one or the other preponderates the mixed (bodies) differ in their respective complexions, and this must apply to the bodies of those who rise again, for they will contain flesh and bones and like parts, all of which demand different complexions. Moreover, according to this, impassibility could not be one of their gifts, because it would not imply a disposition in the impassible substance, but merely an external preventive to passion, namely the power of God, which might produce the same effect in a human body even in this state of life. Consequently others say that in the body itself there will be something preventing the passion of a glorified body, namely the nature of a fifth: or heavenly body, which they maintain enters into the composition of a human body, to the effect of blending the elements together in harmony so as to be fitting matter for the rational soul; but that in this state of life, on account of the preponderance of the elemental nature, the human body is passible like other elements, whereas in the resurrection the nature of the fifth body will predominate, so that the human body will be made impassible in likeness to the heavenly body. But this cannot stand, because the fifth body does not enter materially into the composition of a human body, as was proved above (Sent. ii, D, 12, Q. 1, Article 1). Moreover it is absurd to say that a natural power, such as the power of a heavenly body, should endow the human body with a property of glory, such as the impassibility of a glorified body, since the Apostle ascribes to Christ's power the transformation of the human body, because "such as is the heavenly, such also are they that are heavenly" (1 Cor. 15:48), and "He will reform the body of our lowliness, made like to the body of His glory, according to the operation whereby also He is able to subdue all things unto Himself" (Phil. 3:21). And again, a heavenly nature cannot exercise such power over the human body as to take from it its elemental nature which is passible by reason of its essential constituents. Consequently we must say otherwise that all passion results from the agent overcoming the patient, else it would not draw it to its own bounds. Now it is impossible for agent to overcome patient except through the weakening of the hold which the form of the patient has over its matter, if we speak of the passion which is against nature, for it is of passion in this sense that we are speaking now: for matter is not subject to one of two contraries, except through the cessation or at least the diminution of the hold which the other contrary has on it. Now the human body and all that it contains will be perfectly subject to the rational soul, even as the soul will be perfectly subject to God. Wherefore it will be impossible for the glorified body to be subject to any change contrary to the disposition whereby it is perfected by the soul; and consequently those bodies will be impassible.

Reply to Objection 1: According to Anselm (Cur Deus Homo ii, 11), "mortal is included in the philosophers' definition of man, because they did not believe that the whole man could be ever immortal, for they had no experience of man otherwise than in this state of mortality." Or we may say that since, according to the Philosopher (Metaph. vi, 12), essential differences are unknown to us, we sometimes employ accidental differences in order to signify essential differences from which the accidental differences result. Hence "mortal" is put in the definition of man, not as though mortality were essential to man, but because that which causes passibility and mortality in the present state of life, namely composition of contraries, is essential to man, but it will not cause it then, on account of the triumph of the soul over the body.

Reply to Objection 2: Potentiality is twofold, tied and free: and this is true not only of active but also of passive potentiality. For the form ties the potentiality of matter, by determining it to one thing, and it is thus that it overcomes it. And since in corruptible things form does not perfectly overcome matter, it cannot tie it completely so as to prevent it from sometimes receiving a disposition contrary to the form through some passion. But in the saints after the resurrection, the soul will have complete dominion over the body, and it will be altogether impossible for it to lose this dominion, because it will be immutably subject to God, which was not the case in the state of innocence. Consequently those bodies will retain substantially the same potentiality as they have now to another form; yet that potentiality will remain tied by the triumph of the soul over the body, so that it will never be realized by actual passion.

Reply to Objection 3: The elemental qualities are the instruments of the soul, as stated in De Anima ii, text. 38, seqq., for the heat of fire in an animal's body is directed in the act of nutrition by the soul's power. When, however, the principal agent is perfect, and there is no defect in the instrument, no action proceeds from the instrument, except in accordance with the disposition of the principal agent. Consequently in the bodies of the saints after the resurrection, no action or passion will result from the elemental qualities that is contrary to the disposition of the soul which has the preservation of the body in view.

Reply to Objection 4: According to Augustine (Ep. ad Consent. cxlvi) "the Divine power is able to remove" whatever qualities He will "from this visible and tangible body, other qualities remaining." Hence even as in a certain respect "He deprived the flames of the Chaldees' furnace of the power to burn, since the bodies of the children were preserved without hurt, while in another respect that power remained, since those flames consumed the wood, so will He remove passibility from the humors while leaving their nature unchanged." It has been explained in the Article how this is brought about.

Reply to Objection 5: The scars of wounds will not be in the saints, nor were they in Christ, in so far as they imply a defect, but as signs of the most steadfast virtue whereby the saints suffered for the sake of justice and faith: so that this will increase their own and others' joy (Cf. TP, Question 54, Article 4, ad 3). Hence Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii, 19): "We feel an undescribable love for the blessed martyrs so as to desire to see in that kingdom the scars of the wounds in their bodies, which they bore for Christ's name. Perchance indeed we shall see them for this will not make them less comely but more glorious. A certain beauty will shine in them, a beauty though in the body, yet not of the body but of virtue." Nevertheless those martyrs who have been maimed and deprived of their limbs will not be without those limbs in the resurrection of the dead, for to them it is said (Lk. 21:18): "A hair of your head shall not perish."

ARTICLE 2. Whether all will be equally impassible?

Objection 1: It would seem that all will be equally impassible. For a gloss on 1 Cor. 15:42, "It is sown in corruption," says that "all have equal immunity from suffering." Now the gift of impassibility consists in immunity from suffering. Therefore all will be equally impassible.

Objection 2: Further, negations are not subject to be more or less. Now impassibility is a negation or privation of passibility. Therefore it cannot be greater in one subject than in another.

Objection 3: Further, a thing is more white if it have less admixture of black. But there will be no admixture of passibility in any of the saints' bodies. Therefore they will all be equally impassible.

On the contrary, Reward should be proportionate to merit. Now some of the saints were greater in merit than others. Therefore, since impassibility is a reward, it would seem to be greater in some than in others.

Further, impassibility is condivided with the gift of clarity. Now the latter will not be equal in all, according to 1 Cor. 15:41. Therefore neither will impassibility be equal in all.

I answer that, Impassibility may be considered in two ways, either in itself, or in respect of its cause. If it be considered in itself, since it denotes a mere negation or privation, it is not subject to be more or less, but will be equal in all the blessed. on the other hand, if we consider it in relation to its cause, thus it will be greater in one person than in another. Now its cause is the dominion of the soul over the body, and this dominion is caused by the soul's unchangeable enjoyment of God. Consequently in one who enjoys God more perfectly, there is a greater cause of impassibility.

Reply to Objection 1: This gloss is speaking of impassibility in itself and not in relation to its cause.

Reply to Objection 2: Although negations and privations considered in themselves are not increased nor diminished, yet they are subject to increase and diminution in relation to their causes. Thus a place is said to be more darksome from having more and greater obstacles to light.

Reply to Objection 3: Some things increase not only by receding from their contrary, but also by approach to a term: thus light increases. Consequently impassibility also is greater in one subject than in another, although there is no passibility remaining in any one.

ARTICLE 3. Whether impassibility excludes actual sensation from glorified bodies?

Objection 1: It would seem that impassibility excludes actual sensation from glorified bodies. For according to the Philosopher (De Anima ii, 11), "sensation is a kind of passion." But the glorified bodies will be impassible. Therefore they will not have actual sensation.

Objection 2: Further, natural alteration precedes spiritual alteration, just as natural being precedes intentional being. Now glorified bodies, by reason of their impassibility, will not be subject to natural alteration. Therefore they will not be subject to spiritual alteration which is requisite for sensation.

Objection 3: Further, whenever actual sensation is due to a new perception, there is a new judgment. But in that state there will be no new judgment, because "our thoughts will not then be unchangeable," as Augustine says (De Trin. xv, 16). Therefore there will be no actual sensation.

Objection 4: Further, when the act of one of the soul's powers is intense, the acts of the other powers are remiss. Now the soul will be supremely intent on the act of the contemplative power in contemplating God. Therefore the soul will have no actual sensation whatever.

On the contrary, It is written (Apoc. 1:7): "Every eye shall see Him." Therefore there will be actual sensation.

Further, according to the Philosopher (De Anima i, 2) "the animate is distinct from the inanimate by sensation and movement." Now there will be actual movement since they "shall run to and fro like sparks among the reeds" (Wis. 3:7). Therefore there will also be actual sensation.

I answer that, All are agreed that there is some sensation in the bodies of the blessed: else the bodily life of the saints after the resurrection would be likened to sleep rather than to vigilance. Now this is not befitting that perfection, because in sleep a sensible body is not in the ultimate act of life, for which reason sleep is described as half-life. But there is a difference of opinion as to the mode of sensation.

For some say that the glorified bodies will be impassible, and consequently "not susceptible to impressions from without" [Question 74, Article 4, On the contrary] and much less so than the heavenly bodies, because they will have actual sensations, not by receiving species from sensibles, but by emission of species. But this is impossible, since in the resurrection the specific nature will remain the same in man and in all his parts. Now the nature of sense is to be a passive power as the Philosopher proves (De Anima ii, text. 51,54). Wherefore if the saints, in the resurrection, were to have sensations by emitting and not by receiving species, sense in them would be not a passive but an active power, and thus it would not be the same specifically with sense as it is now, but would be some other power bestowed on them; for just as matter never becomes form, so a passive power never becomes active.

Consequently others say that the senses will be actualized by receiving species, not indeed from external sensibles, but by an outflow from the higher powers, so that as now the higher powers receive from the lower, so on the contrary the lower powers will then receive from the higher. But this mode of reception does not result in real sensation, because every passive power, according to its specific nature, is determined to some special active principle, since a power as such bears relation to that with respect to which it is said to be the power. Wherefore since the proper active principle in external sensation is a thing existing outside the soul and not an intention thereof existing in the imagination or reason, if the organ of sense be not moved by external things, but by the imagination or other higher powers, there will be no true sensation. Hence we do not say that madmen or other witless persons (in whom there is this kind of outflow of species towards the organs of sense, on account of the powerful influence of the imagination) have real sensations, but that it seems to them that they have sensations. Consequently we must say with others that sensation in glorified bodies will result from the reception of things outside the soul. It must, however, be observed that the organs of sense are transmuted by things outside the soul in two ways. First by a natural transmutation, when namely the organ is disposed by the same natural quality as the thing outside the soul which acts on that organ: for instance, when the hand is heated by touching a hot object, or becomes fragrant through contact with a fragrant object. Secondly, by a spiritual transmutation, as when a sensible quality is received in an instrument, according to a spiritual mode of being, when, namely, the species or the intention of a quality, and not the quality itself is received: thus the pupil receives the species of whiteness and yet does not itself become white. Accordingly the first reception does not cause sensation, properly speaking, because the senses are receptive of species in matter but without matter. that is to say without the material "being" which the species had outside the soul (De Anima ii, text. 121). This reception transmutes the nature of the recipient, because in this way the quality is received according to its material "being." Consequently this kind of reception will not be in the glorified bodies, but the second, which of itself causes actual sensation, without changing the nature of the recipient.

Reply to Objection 1: As already explained, by this passion that takes place in actual sensation and is no other than the aforesaid reception of species, the body is not drawn away from natural quality, but is perfected by a spiritual change. Wherefore the impassibility of glorified bodies does not exclude this kind of passion.

Reply to Objection 2: Every subject of passion receives the action of the agent according to its mode. Accordingly if there be a thing that is naturally adapted to be altered by an active principle, with a natural and a spiritual alteration, the natural alteration precedes the spiritual alteration, just as natural precedes intentional being. If however a thing be naturally adapted to be altered only with a spiritual alteration it does not follow that it is altered naturally. For instance the air is not receptive of color, according to its natural being, but only according to its spiritual being, wherefore in this way alone is it altered: whereas, on the contrary, inanimate bodies are altered by sensible qualities only naturally and not spiritually. But in the glorified bodies there cannot be any natural alteration, and consequently there will be only spiritual alteration.

Reply to Objection 3: Just as there will be new reception of species in the organs of sensation, so there will be new judgment in the common sense: but there will be no new judgment on the point in the intellect; such is the case with one who sees what he knew before. The saying of Augustine, that "there our thoughts will not be changeable," refers to the thoughts of the intellectual part: therefore it is not to the point.

Reply to Objection 4: When one of two things is the type of the other, the attention of the soul to the one does not hinder or lessen its attention to the other: thus a physician while considering urine is not less but more able to bear in mind the rules of his art concerning the colors of urine. And since God is apprehended by the saints as the type of all things that will be done or known by them, their attention to perceiving sensibles, or to contemplating or doing anything else will nowise hinder their contemplation of God, nor conversely. Or we may say that the reason why one power is hindered in its act when another power is intensely engaged is because one power does not alone suffice for such an intense operation, unless it be assisted by receiving from the principle of life the inflow that the other powers or members should receive. And since in the saints all the powers will be most perfect, one will be able to operate intensely without thereby hindering the operation of another power even as it was with Christ.

ARTICLE 4. Whether in the blessed, after the resurrection, all the senses will be in act?

Objection 1: It would seem that all the senses are not in act there. For touch is the first of all the senses (De Anima ii, 2). But the glorified body will lack the actual sense of touch, since the sense of touch becomes actual by the alteration of an animal body by some external body preponderating in some one of the active or passive qualities which touch is capable of discerning: and such an alteration will then be impossible. Therefore all the senses will not be in act there.

Objection 2: Further, the sense of taste assists the action of the nutritive power. Now after the resurrection there will be no such action, as stated above (Question 81, Article 4). Therefore taste would be useless there.

Objection 3: Further, nothing will be corrupted after the resurrection because the whole creature will be invested with a certain virtue of incorruption. Now the sense of smell cannot have its act without some corruption having taken place, because smell is not perceived without a volatile evaporation consisting in a certain dissolution. Therefore the sense of smell is not there in its act.

Objection 4: Further, "Hearing assists teaching" (De Sensu et Sensato i). But the blessed, after the resurrection, will require no teaching by means of sensible objects, since they will be filled with Divine wisdom by the very vision of God. Therefore hearing will not be there.

Objection 5: Further. seeing results from the pupil receiving the species of the thing seen. But after the resurrection this will be impossible in the blessed. Therefore there will be no actual seeing there, and yet this is the most noble of the senses. The minor is proved thus: That which is actually lightsome is not receptive of a visible species; and consequently a mirror placed under the sun's rays does not reflect the image of a body opposite to it. Now the pupil like the whole body will be endowed with clarity. Therefore it will not receive the image of a colored body.

Objection 6: Further, according to the science of perspective, whatever is seen is seen at an angle. But this does not apply to the glorified bodies. Therefore they will not have actual sense of sight. The minor is proved thus. Whenever a thing is seen at an angle, the angle must be proportionate to the distance of the object seen: because what is seen from a greater distance is less seen and at a lesser angle, so that the angle may be so small that nothing is seen of the object. Therefore if the glorified eye sees at an angle, it follows that it sees things within a certain distance, and that consequently it does not see a thing from a greater distance than we see now: and this would seem very absurd. And thus it would seem that the sense of sight will not be actual in glorified bodies.

On the contrary, A power conjoined to its act is more perfect than one not so conjoined. Now human nature in the blessed will be in its greatest perfection. Therefore all the senses will be actual there.

Further, the sensitive powers are nearer to the soul than the body is. But the body will be rewarded or punished on account of the merits or demerits of the soul. Therefore all the senses in the blessed will also be rewarded and in the wicked will be punished, with regard to pleasure and pain or sorrow which consist in the operation of the senses.

I answer that, There are two opinions on this question. For some say that in the glorified bodies there will be all the sensitive powers, but that only two senses will be in act, namely touch and sight; nor will this be owing to defective senses, but from lack of medium and object; and that the senses will not be useless, because they will conduce to the integrity of human nature and will show forth the wisdom of their Creator. But this is seemingly untrue, because the medium in these senses is the same as in the others. For in the sight the medium is the air, and this is also the medium in hearing and smelling (De Anima ii, 7). Again, the taste, like the touch, has the medium in contact, since taste is a kind of touch (De Anima ii, 9). Smell also which is the object of the sense of smell will be there, since the Church sings that the bodies of the saints will be a most sweet smell. There will also be vocal praise in heaven; hence a gloss says on Ps. 149:6, "The high praises of God shall be in their mouth" that "hearts and tongues shall not cease to praise God." The same is had on the authority of a gloss on 2 Esdra 12:27, "With singing and with cymbals." Wherefore, according to others we may say that smelling and hearing will be in act there, but taste will not be in act, in the sense of being affected by the taking of food or drink, as appears from what we have said (Question 81, Article 4): unless perchance we say that there will be taste in act through the tongue being affected by some neighboring humor.

Reply to Objection 1: The qualities perceived by the touch are those which constitute the animal body. Wherefore the body of an animal has, through its tangible qualities according to the present state of life, a natural aptitude to be affected with a natural and spiritual alteration by the object of touch. For this reason the touch is said to be the most material of the senses, since it has a greater measure of material alteration connected with it. Yet material alteration is only accidentally related to the act of sensation which is effected by a spiritual alteration. Consequently the glorified bodies, which by reason of their impassibility are immune from natural alteration, will be subject only to spiritual alteration by tangible qualities. Thus it was with the body of Adam, which could neither be burned by fire, nor pierced by sword, although he had the sense of such things.

Reply to Objection 2: Taste, in so far as it is the perception of food, will not be in act; but perhaps it will be possible in so far as it is cognizant of flavors in the way mentioned above.

Reply to Objection 3: Some have considered smell to be merely a volatile evaporation. But this opinion cannot be true; which is evident from the fact that vultures hasten to a corpse on perceiving the odor from a very great distance, whereas it would be impossible for an evaporation to travel from the corpse to a place so remote, even though the whole corpse were to be dissolved into vapor. This is confirmed by the fact that sensible objects at an equal distance exercise their influence in all directions: so that smell affects the medium sometimes, and the instrument of sensation with a spiritual alteration, without any evaporation reaching the organ. That some evaporation should be necessary is due to the fact that smell in bodies is mixed with humidity; wherefore it is necessary for dissolution to take place in order for the smell to be perceived. But in the glorified bodies odor will be in its ultimate perfection, being nowise hampered by humidity: wherefore it will affect the organ with a spiritual alteration, like the odor of a volatile evaporation. Such will be the sense of smell in the saints, because it will not be hindered by any humidity: and it will take cognizance not only of the excellences of odors, as happens with us now on account of the very great humidity of the brain, but also of the minutest differences of odors.

Reply to Objection 4: In heaven there will be vocal praise (though indeed some think otherwise), and in the blessed it will affect the organ of hearing by a merely spiritual alteration. Nor will it be for the sake of learning whereby they may acquire knowledge, but for the sake of the perfection of the sense and for the sake pleasure. How it is possible for the voice to give sound there, we have already stated (Sent. ii, D, 2; Question 2, Article 2, ad 5).

Reply to Objection 5: The intensity of light does not hinder the spiritual reception of the image of color, so long as the pupil retains its diaphanous nature; thus it is evident that however much the air be filled with light, it can be the medium of sight, and the more it is illumined, the more clearly are objects seen through it, unless there be a fault through defective sight. The fact that the image of an object placed in opposition to a mirror directly opposite the sun's rays does not appear therein, is not due to the reception being hindered, but to the hindering of reflection: because for an image to appear in a mirror it must needs be thrown back by an opaque body, for which reason lead is affixed to the glass in a mirror. The sun's ray dispels this opacity so that no image can appear in the mirror. But the clarity of a glorified body does not destroy the diaphanous nature of the pupil, since glory does not destroy nature; and consequently the greatness of clarity in the pupil renders the sight keen rather than defective.

Reply to Objection 6: The more perfect the sense the less does it require to be altered in order to perceive its object. Now the smaller the angle at which the sight is affected by the visible object, the less is the organ altered. Hence it is that a stronger sight can see from a distance more than a weaker sight; because the greater the distance the smaller the angle at which a thing is seen. And since the sight of a glorified body will be most perfect it will be able to see by the very least alteration (of the organ); and consequently at a very much smaller angle than now, and therefore from a much greater distance.

OF THE SUBTLETY OF THE BODIES OF THE BLESSED

Prologue

We must now consider the subtlety of the bodies of the blessed.
Under this head there are six points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether subtlety is a property of the glorified body?
- (2) Whether by reason of this subtlety it can be in the same place with another not glorified body?
- (3) Whether by a miracle two bodies can be in the same place?
- (4) Whether a glorified body can be in the same place with another glorified body?
- (5) Whether a glorified body necessarily requires a place equal to itself?
- (6) Whether a glorified body is palpable?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether subtlety is a property of the glorified body?

Objection 1: It would seem that subtlety is not a property of the glorified body. For the properties of glory surpass the properties of nature, even as the clarity of glory surpasses the clarity of the sun, which is the greatest in nature. Accordingly if subtlety be a property of the glorified body, it would seem that the glorified body will be more subtle than anything which is subtle in nature, and thus it will be "more subtle than the wind and the air," which was condemned by Gregory in the city of Constantinople, as he relates (Moral. xiv, 56).

Objection 2: Further, as heat and cold are simple qualities of bodies, i.e. of the elements, so is subtlety. But heat and other qualities of the elements will not be intensified in the glorified bodies any more than they are now, in fact, they will be more reduced to the mean. Neither, therefore, will subtlety be in them more than it is now.

Objection 3: Further, subtlety is in bodies as a result of scarcity of matter, wherefore bodies that have less matter within equal dimensions are said to be more subtle; as fire in comparison with air, and air as compared with water, and water as compared with earth. But there will be as much matter in the glorified bodies as there is now, nor will their dimensions be greater. Therefore they will not be more subtle than now.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 15:44): "It is sown a corruptible body, it shall rise a spiritual," i.e. a spirit-like, "body." But the subtlety of a spirit surpasses all bodily subtlety. Therefore the glorified bodies will be most subtle.

Further, the more subtle a body is the more exalted it is. But the glorified bodies will be most exalted. Therefore they will be most subtle.

I answer that, Subtlety takes its name from the power to penetrate. Hence it is said in De Gener. ii that "a subtle thing fills all the parts and the parts of parts." Now that a body has the power of penetrating may happen through two causes. First, through smallness of quantity, especially in respect of depth and breadth, but not of length, because penetration regards depth, wherefore length is not an obstacle to penetration. Secondly, through paucity of matter, wherefore rarity is synonymous with subtlety: and since in rare bodies the form is more predominant over the matter, the term "subtlety" has been transferred to those bodies which are most perfectly subject to their form, and are most fully perfected thereby: thus we speak of subtlety in the sun and moon and like bodies, just as gold and similar things may be called subtle, when they are most perfectly complete in their specific being and power. And since incorporeal things lack quantity and matter, the term "subtlety" is applied to them, not only by reason of their substance, but also on account of their power. For just as a subtle thing is said to be penetrative, for the reason that it reaches to the inmost part of a thing, so is an intellect said to be subtle because it reaches to the insight of the intrinsic principles and the hidden natural properties of a thing. In like manner a person is said to have subtle sight, because he is able to perceive by sight things of the smallest size: and the same applies to the other senses. Accordingly people have differed by ascribing subtlety to the glorified bodies in different ways.

For certain heretics, as Augustine relates (De Civ. Dei xiii, 22), ascribed to them the subtlety whereby spiritual substances are said to be subtle: and they said that at the resurrection the body will be transformed into a spirit, and that for this reason the Apostle describes as being "spiritual" the bodies of those who rise again (1 Cor. 15:44). But this cannot be maintained. First, because a body cannot be changed into a spirit, since there is no community of matter between them: and Boethius proves this (De Duab. Nat.). Secondly, because, if this were possible, and one's body were changed into a spirit, one would not rise again a man, for a man naturally consists of a soul and body. Thirdly, because if this were the Apostle's meaning, just as he speaks of spiritual bodies, so would he speak of natural [animale] bodies, as being changed into souls [animam]: and this is clearly false.

Hence certain heretics said that the body will remain at the resurrection, but that it will be endowed with subtlety by means of rarefaction, so that human bodies in rising again will be like the air or the wind, as Gregory relates (Moral. xiv, 56). But this again cannot be maintained, because our Lord had a palpable body after the Resurrection, as appears from the last chapter of Luke, and we must believe that His body was supremely subtle. Moreover the human body will rise again with flesh and bones, as did the body of our Lord, according to Lk. 24:39, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as you see Me to have," and Job 19:26, "In my flesh I shall see God," my Saviour: and the nature of flesh and bone is incompatible with the aforesaid rarity.

Consequently another kind of subtlety must be assigned to glorified bodies, by saying that they are subtle on account of the most complete perfection of the body. But this completeness is explained by some in relation to the fifth, or heavenly, essence, which will be then predominant in them. This, however, is impossible, since first of all the fifth essence can nowise enter into the composition of a body, as we have shown above (Sent. D, 12, qu. 1). Secondly, because granted that it entered into the composition of the human body, it would be impossible to account for its having a greater predominance over the elemental nature than now, unless---either the amount of the heavenly nature in human bodies were increased (thus human bodies would not be of the same stature, unless perhaps elemental matter in man were decreased, which is inconsistent with the integrity of those who rise again)---or unless elemental nature were endowed with the properties of the heavenly nature through the latter's dominion over the body, and in that case a natural power would be the cause of a property of glory, which seems absurd.

Hence others say that the aforesaid completeness by reason of which human bodies are said to be subtle will result from the dominion of the glorified soul (which is the form of the body) over the body, by reason of which dominion the glorified body is said to be "spiritual," as being wholly subject to the spirit. The first subjection whereby the body is subject to the soul is to the effect of its participating in its specific being, in so far as it is subject to the soul as matter to form; and secondly it is subject to the soul in respect of the other operations of the soul, in so far as the soul is a principle of movement. Consequently the first reason for spirituality in the body is subtlety, and, after that, agility and the other properties of a glorified body. Hence the Apostle, as the masters expound, in speaking of spirituality indicates subtlety: wherefore Gregory says (Moral. xiv, 56) that "the glorified body is said to be subtle as a result of a spiritual power."

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections which refer to the subtlety of rarefaction.

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 2. Whether by reason of this subtlety a glorified body is able to be in the same place with another body not glorified?

Objection 1: It would seem that by reason of this subtlety a body is able to be in the same place with another body not glorified. For according to Phil. 3:21, "He will reform the body of our lowliness made like to the body of His glory." Now the body of Christ was able to be in the same place with another body, as appears from the fact that after His Resurrection He went in to His disciples, the doors being shut (Jn. 20:19,26). Therefore also the glorified bodies by reason of their subtlety will be able to be in the same place with other bodies not glorified.

Objection 2: Further, glorified bodies will be superior to all other bodies. Yet by reason of their superiority certain bodies, to wit the solar rays, are able now to occupy the same place together with other bodies. Much more therefore is this befitting glorified bodies.

Objection 3: Further, a heavenly body cannot be severed, at least as regards the substance of the spheres: hence it is written (Job 37:18) that "the heavens . . . are most strong, as if they were of molten brass." If then the subtlety of a glorified body will not enable it to be in the same place together with another body, it will never be able to ascend to the empyrean, and this is erroneous.

Objection 4: Further, a body which is unable to be in the same place with another body can be hindered in its movement or even surrounded by others standing in its way. But this cannot happen to glorified bodies. Therefore they will be able to be together in the same place with other bodies.

Objection 5: Further, as point is to point, so is line to line, surface to surface, and body to body. Now two points can be coincident, as in the case of two lines touching one another, and two lines when two surfaces are in contact with one another, and two surfaces when two bodies touch one another, because "contiguous things are those whose boundaries coincide" (Phys. vi, 6). Therefore it is not against the nature of a body to be in the same place together with another body. Now whatever excellence is competent to the nature of a body will all be bestowed on the glorified body. Therefore a glorified body, by reason of its subtlety, will be able to be in the same place together with another body.

On the contrary, Boethius says (De Trin. i): "Difference of accidents makes distinction in number. For three men differ not in genus, nor in species, but in their accidents. If we were to remove absolutely every accident from them, still each one has a different place; and it is quite conceivable that they should all occupy the same place." Therefore if we suppose two bodies to occupy the same place, there will be but one body numerically.

I answer that, It cannot be maintained that a glorified body, by reason of its subtlety, is able to be in the same place with another body, unless the obstacle to its being now in the same place with another body be removed by that subtlety. Some say that in the present state this obstacle is its grossness by virtue of which it is able to occupy a place; and that this grossness is removed by the gift of subtlety. But there are two reasons why this cannot be maintained. First, because the grossness which the gift of subtlety removes is a kind of defect, for instance an inordinateness of matter in not being perfectly subject to its form. For all that pertains to the integrity of the body will rise again in the body, both as regards the matter and as regards the form. And the fact that a body is able to fill a place belongs to it by reason of that which pertains to its integrity, and not on account of any defect of nature. For since fulness is opposed to vacancy, that alone does not fill a place, which being put in a place, nevertheless leaves a place vacant. Now a vacuum is defined by the Philosopher (Phys. iv, 6,7) as being "a place not filled by a sensible body." And a body is said to be sensible by reason of its matter, form, and natural accidents, all of which pertain to the integrity of nature. It is also plain that the glorified body will be sensible even to touch, as evidenced by the body of our Lord (Lk. 24:39): nor will it lack matter, or form, or natural accidents, namely heat, cold, and so forth. Hence it is evident that the glorified body, the gift of subtlety notwithstanding, will fill a place: for it would seem madness to say that the place in which there will be a glorified body will be empty. Secondly their aforesaid argument does not avail, because to hinder the co-existence of a body in the same place is more than to fill a place. For if we suppose dimensions separate from matter, those dimensions do not fill a place. Hence some who held the possibility of a vacuum, said that a vacuum is a place wherein such like dimensions exist apart from a sensible body; and yet those dimensions hinder another body from being together with them in the same place. This is made clear by the Philosopher (Phys. iv, 1,8; Metaph. ii, 2), where he considers it impossible for a mathematical body, which is nothing but separate dimensions, to be together with another natural sensible body. Consequently, granted that the subtlety of a glorified body hindered it from filling a place, nevertheless it would not follow that for this reason it is able to be in the same place with another body, since the removal of the lesser does not involve the removal of the greater.

Accordingly we must say that the obstacle to our body's being now in the same place with another body can nowise be removed by the gift of subtlety. For nothing can prevent a body from occupying the same place together with another body, except something in it that requires a different place: since nothing is an obstacle to identity, save that which is a cause of distinction. Now this distinction of place is not required by any quality of the body, because a body demands a place, not by reason of its quality: wherefore if we remove from a body the fact of its being hot or cold, heavy or light, it still retains the necessity of the aforesaid distinction, as the Philosopher proves (Phys. iv), and as is self-evident. In like manner neither can matter cause the necessity of the aforesaid distinction, because matter does not occupy a place except through its dimensive quantity. Again neither does form occupy a place, unless it have a place through its matter. It remains therefore that the necessity for two bodies occupying each a distinct place results from the nature of dimensive quantity, to which a place is essentially befitting. For this forms part of its definition, since dimensive quantity is quantity occupying a place. Hence it is that if we remove all else in a thing from it, the necessity of this distinction is found in its dimensive quantity alone. Thus take the example of a separate line, supposing there to be two such lines, or two parts of one line, they must needs occupy distinct places, else one line added to another would not make something greater, and this is against common sense. The same applies to surfaces and mathematical bodies. And since matter demands place, through being the subject of dimension, the aforesaid necessity results in placed matter, so that just as it is impossible for there to be two lines, or two parts of a line, unless they occupy distinct places, so is it impossible for there to be two matters, or two parts of matter, without there be distinction of place. And since distinction of matter is the principle of the distinction between individuals, it follows that, as Boethius says (De Trin.), "we cannot possibly conceive two bodies occupying one place," so that this distinction of individuals requires this difference of accidents. Now subtlety does not deprive the glorified body of its dimension; wherefore it nowise removes from it the aforesaid necessity of occupying a distinct place from another body. Therefore the subtlety of a glorified body will not enable it to be in the same place together with another body, but it will be possible for it to be together with another body by the operation of the Divine power: even as the body of Peter had the power whereby the sick were healed at the passing of Peter's shadow (Acts 5:15) not through any inherent property, but by the power of God for the upbuilding of the faith. Thus will the Divine power make it possible for a glorified body to be in the same place together with another body for the perfection of glory.

Reply to Objection 1: That Christ's body was able to be together with another body in the same place was not due to its subtlety, but resulted from the power of His Godhead after His resurrection, even as in His birth [TP, Question 28, Article 2, ad 3]. Hence Gregory says (Hom. xxvi in Evang.): "The same body went into His disciples the doors being shut, which to human eyes came from the closed womb of the Virgin at His birth." Therefore there is no reason why this should be befitting to glorified bodies on account of their subtlety.

Reply to Objection 2: Light is not a body as we have said above (Sent. ii, Question 13, Article 3; FP, Question 67, Article 2): hence the objection proceeds on a false supposition.

Reply to Objection 3: The glorified body will pass through the heavenly spheres without severing them, not by virtue of its subtlety, but by the Divine power, which will assist them in all things at will.

Reply to Objection 4: From the fact that God will come to the aid of the blessed at will in whatever they desire, it follows that they cannot be surrounded or imprisoned.

Reply to Objection 5: As stated in Phys. iv, 5, "a point is not in a place": hence if it be said to be in a place, this is only accidental, because the body of which it is a term is in a place. And just as the whole place corresponds to the whole body, so the term of the place corresponds to the term of the body. But it happens that two places have one term, even as two lines terminate in one point. And consequently though two bodies must needs be in distinct places, yet the same term of two places corresponds to the two terms of the two bodies. It is in this sense that the bounds of contiguous bodies are said to coincide.

ARTICLE 3. Whether it is possible, by a miracle, for two bodies to be in the same place?

Objection 1: It would seem that not even by a miracle is it possible for two bodies to be in the same place. For it is not possible that, by a miracle, two bodies be at once two and one, since this would imply that contradictions are true at the same time. But if we suppose two bodies to be in the same place, it would follow that those two bodies are one. Therefore this cannot be done by a miracle. The minor is proved thus. Suppose two bodies A and B to be in the same place. The dimensions of A will either be the same as the dimensions of the place, or they will differ from them. If they differ, then some of the dimensions will be separate: which is impossible, since the dimensions that are within the bounds of a place are not in a subject unless they be in a placed body. If they be the same, then for the same reason the dimensions of B will be the same as the dimensions of the place. "Now things that are the same with one and the same thing are the same with one another." Therefore the dimensions of A and B are the same. But two bodies cannot have identical dimensions just as they cannot have the same whiteness. Therefore A and B are one body and yet they were two. Therefore they are at the same time one and two.

Objection 2: Further, a thing cannot be done miraculously either against the common principles---for instance that the part be not less than the whole; since what is contrary to common principles implies a direct contradiction---or contrary to the conclusions of geometry which are infallible deductions from common principles---for instance that the three angles of a triangle should not be equal to two right angles. In like manner nothing can be done to a line that is contrary to the definition of a line, because to sever the definition from the defined is to make two contradictories true at the same time. Now it is contrary to common principles, both to the conclusions of geometry and to the definition of a line, for two bodies to be in the same place. Therefore this cannot be done by a miracle. The minor is proved as follows: It is a conclusion of geometry that two circles touch one another only at a point. Now if two circular bodies were in the same place, the two circles described in them would touch one another as a whole. Again it is contrary to the definition of a line that there be more than one straight line between two points: yet this would be the case were two bodies in the same place, since between two given points in the various surfaces of the place, there would be two straight lines corresponding to the two bodies in that place.

Objection 3: Further, it would seem impossible that by a miracle a body which is enclosed within another should not be in a place, for then it would have a common and not a proper place, and this is impossible. Yet this would follow if two bodies were in the same place. Therefore this cannot be done by a miracle. The minor is proved thus. Supposing two bodies to be in the same place, the one being greater than the other as to every dimension, the lesser body will be enclosed in the greater, and the place occupied by the greater body will be its common place; while it will have no proper place, because no given surface of the body will contain it, and this is essential to place. Therefore it will not have a proper place.

Objection 4: Further, place corresponds in proportion to the thing placed. Now it can never happen by a miracle that the same body is at the same time in different places, except by some kind of transformation, as in the Sacrament of the Altar. Therefore it can nowise happen by a miracle that two bodies be together in the same place.

On the contrary, The Blessed Virgin gave birth to her Son by a miracle. Now in this hallowed birth it was necessary for two bodies to be together in the same place, because the body of her child when coming forth did not break through the enclosure of her virginal purity. Therefore it is possible for two bodies to be miraculously together in the same place.

Further, this may again be proved from the fact that our Lord went in to His disciples, the doors being shut (Jn. 20:19, 26).

I answer that, As shown above (Article 2) the reason why two bodies must needs be in two places is that distinction in matter requires distinction in place. Wherefore we observe that when two bodies merge into one, each loses its distinct being, and one indistinct being accrues to the two combined, as in the case of mixtures. Hence it is impossible for two bodies to remain two and yet be together unless each retain its distinct being which it had hitherto, in so much as each of them was a being undivided in itself and distinct from others. Now this distinct being depends on the essential principles of a thing as on its proximate causes, but on God as on the first cause. And since the first cause can preserve a thing in being, though the second causes be done away, as appears from the first proposition of De Causis, therefore by God's power and by that alone it is possible for an accident to be without substance as in the Sacrament of the Altar. Likewise by the power of God, and by that alone, it is possible for a body to retain its distinct being from that of another body, although its matter be not distinct as to place from the matter of the other body: and thus it is possible by a miracle for two bodies to be together in the same place.

Reply to Objection 1: This argument is sophistical because it is based on a false supposition, or begs the question. For it supposes the existence, between two opposite superficies of a place, of a dimension proper to the place, with which dimension a dimension of the body put in occupation of the place would have to be identified: because it would then follow that the dimensions of two bodies occupying a place would become one dimension, if each of them were identified with the dimension of the place. But this supposition is false, because if it were true whenever a body acquires a new place, it would follow that a change takes place in the dimensions of the place or of thing placed: since it is impossible for two things to become one anew, except one of them be changed. Whereas if, as is the case in truth, no other dimensions belong to a place than those of the thing occupying the place, it is clear that the argument proves nothing, but begs the question, because according to this nothing else has been said, but that the dimensions of a thing placed are the same as the dimensions of the place; excepting that the dimensions of the thing placed are contained within the bounds of the place, and that the distance between the bounds of a place is commensurate with the distance between the bounds of the thing placed, just as the former would be distant by their own dimensions if they had them. Thus that the dimensions of two bodies be the dimensions of one place is nothing else than that two bodies be in the same place, which is the chief question at issue.

Reply to Objection 2: Granted that by a miracle two bodies be together in the same place, nothing follows either against common principles, or against the definition of a line, or against any conclusions of geometry. For, as stated above (Article 2), dimensive quantity differs from all other accidents in that it has a special reason of individuality and distinction, namely on account of the placing of the parts, besides the reason of individuality and distinction which is common to it and all other accidents, arising namely from the matter which is its subject. Thus then one line may be understood as being distinct from another, either because it is in another subject (in which case we are considering a material line), or because it is placed at a distance from another (in which case we are considering a mathematical line, which is understood apart from matter). Accordingly if we remove matter, there can be no distinction between lines save in respect of a different placing: and in like manner neither can there be a distinction of points, nor of superficies, nor of any dimensions whatever. Consequently geometry cannot suppose one line to be added to another, as being distinct therefrom unless it be distinct as to place. But supposing by a Divine miracle a distinction of subject without a distinction of place, we can understand a distinction of lines; and these are not distant from one another in place, on account of the distinction of subjects. Again we can understand a difference of points, and thus different lines described on two bodies that are in the same place are drawn from different points to different points; for the point that we take is not a point fixed in the place, but in the placed body, because a line is not said to be drawn otherwise than from a point which is its term. In like manner the two circles described in two spherical bodies that occupy the same place are two, not on account of the difference of place, else they could not touch one another as a whole, but on account of the distinction of subjects, and thus while wholly touching one another they still remain two. Even so a circle described by a placed spherical body touches, as a whole, the other circle described by the locating body.

Reply to Objection 3: God could make a body not to be in a place; and yet supposing this, it would not follow that a certain body is not in a place, because the greater body is the place of the lesser body, by reason of its superficies which is described by contact with the terms of the lesser body.

Reply to Objection 4: It is impossible for one body to be miraculously in two places locally (for Christ's body is not locally on the altar), although it is possible by a miracle for two bodies to be in the same place. Because to be in several places at once is incompatible with the individual, by reason of its having being undivided in itself, for it would follow that it is divided as to place. on the other hand, to be in the same place with another body is incompatible with the individual as distinct from aught else. Now the nature of unity is perfected in indivision (Metaph. v), whereas distinction from others is a result of the nature of unity. Wherefore that one same body be locally in several places at once implies a contradiction, even as for a man to lack reason, while for two bodies to be in the same place does not imply a contradiction, as explained above. Hence the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 4. Whether one glorified body can be in the same place together with another glorified body?

Objection 1: It would seem that a glorified body can be in the same place together with another glorified body. Because where there is greater subtlety there is less resistance. If then a glorified body is more subtle than a non-glorified body, it will offer less resistance to a glorified body: and so if a glorified body can be in the same place with a non-glorified body, much more can it with a glorified body.

Objection 2: Further, even as a glorified body will be more subtle than a non-glorified body, so will one glorified body be more subtle than another. Therefore if a glorified body can be in the same place with a non-glorified body, a more subtle glorified body can be in the same place with a less subtle glorified body.

Objection 3: Further, the body of heaven is subtle, and will then be glorified. Now the glorified body of a saint will be able to be in the same place with the body of heaven, since the saints will be able at will to travel to and from earth. Therefore two glorified bodies will be able to occupy the same place.

On the contrary, The glorified bodies will be spiritual, that is like spirits in a certain respect. Now two spirits cannot be in the same place, although a body and a spirit can be in the same place, as stated above (Sent. i, D, 37, Question 3, Article 3; FP, Question 52, Article 3). Therefore neither will two glorified bodies be able to be in the same place.

Further, if two bodies occupy the same place, one is penetrated by the other. But to be penetrated is a mark of imperfection which will be altogether absent from the glorified bodies. Therefore it will be impossible for two glorified bodies to be in the same place.

I answer that, The property of a glorified body does not make it able to be in the same place with another glorified body, nor again to be in the same place with a non-glorified body. But it would be possible by the Divine power for two glorified bodies or two non-glorified bodies to be in the same place, even as a glorified body with a non-glorified body. Nevertheless it is not befitting for a glorified body to be in the same place with another glorified body, both because a becoming order will be observed in them, which demands distinction, and because one glorified body will not be in the way of another. Consequently two glorified bodies will never be in the same place.

Reply to Objection 1: This argument supposes that a glorified body is able by reason of its subtlety to be in the same place with another body: and this is not true.

The same answer applies to the Second Objection.

Reply to Objection 3: The body of heaven and the other bodies will be said equivocally to be glorified, in so far as they will have a certain share in glory, and not as though it were becoming for them to have the gifts of glorified human bodies.

ARTICLE 5. Whether by virtue of its subtlety a glorified body will no longer need to be in an equal place?

Objection 1: It would seem that by virtue of its subtlety, a glorified body will no longer need to be in an equal place. For the glorified bodies will be made like to the body of Christ according to Phil. 3:21. Now Christ's body is not bound by this necessity of being in an equal place: wherefore it is contained whole under the small or great dimensions of a consecrated host. Therefore the same will be true of the glorified bodies.

Objection 2: Further, the Philosopher proves (Phys. iv, 6), that two bodies are not in the same place, because it would follow that the greatest body would occupy the smallest place, since its various parts could be in the same part of the place: for it makes no difference whether two bodies or however many be in the same place. Now a glorified body will be in the same place with another body, as is commonly admitted. Therefore it will be possible for it to be in any place however small.

Objection 3: Further, even as a body is seen by reason of its color, so is it measured by reason of its quantity. Now the glorified body will be so subject to the spirit that it will be able at will to be seen, and not seen, especially by a non-glorified eye, as evidenced in the case of Christ. Therefore its quantity will be so subject to the spirit's will that it will be able to be in a little or great place, and to have a little or great quantity at will.

On the contrary, The Philosopher says (Phys. iv, text. 30) that "whatever is in a place occupies a place equal to itself." Now the glorified body will be in a place. Therefore it will occupy a place equal to itself.

Further, the dimensions of a place and of that which is in that place are the same, as shown in Phys. iv, text. 30, 76, 77. Therefore if the place were larger than that which is in the place the same thing would be greater and smaller than itself, which is absurd.

I answer that, A body is not related to place save through the medium of its proper dimensions, in respect of which a located body is confined through contact with the locating body. Hence it is not possible for a body to occupy a place smaller than its quantity, unless its proper quantity be made in some way less than itself: and this can only be understood in two ways. First, by a variation in quantity in respect of the same matter, so that in fact the matter which at first is subject to a greater quantity is afterwards subject to a lesser. Some have held this to be the case with the glorified bodies, saying that quantity is subject to them at will, so that when they list, they are able to have a great quantity, and when they list a small quantity. But this is impossible, because no movement affecting that which is intrinsic to a thing is possible without passion to the detriment [FS, Question 22, Article 1; FS, Question 41, Article 1] of its substance. Hence in incorruptible, i.e. heavenly, bodies, there is only local movement, which is not according to something intrinsic. Thus it is clear that change of quantity in respect of matter would be incompatible with the impassibility and incorruptibility of a glorified body. Moreover, it would follow that a glorified body would be sometimes rarer and sometimes denser, because since it cannot be deprived of any of its matter, sometimes the same matter would be under great dimensions and sometimes under small dimensions, and thus it would be rarefied and densified, which is impossible. Secondly, that the quantity of a glorified body become smaller than itself may be understood by a variation of place; so, to wit, that the parts of a glorified body insinuate themselves into one another, so that it is reduced in quantity however small it may become. And some have held this to be the case, saying that by reason of its subtlety a glorified body will be able to be in the same place with a non-glorified body: and that in like manner its parts can be one within the other, so much so that a whole glorified body will be able to pass through the minutest opening in another body: and thus they explain how Christ's body came out of the Virgin's womb; and how it went into His disciples, the doors being shut. But this is impossible; both because the glorified body will not be able, by reason of its subtlety, to be in the same place with another body, and because, even if it were able to be in the same place with another body, this would not be possible if the other were a glorified body, as many say; and again because this would be inconsistent with the right disposition of the human body, which requires the parts to be in a certain fixed place and at a certain fixed distance from one another. Wherefore this will never happen, not even by a miracle. Consequently we must say that the glorified body will always be in a place equal to itself.

Reply to Objection 1: Christ's body is not locally in the Sacrament of the Altar, as stated above (Sent. iv, D, 10, Question 1, Article 1, ad 5; TP, Question 77, Article 5).

Reply to Objection 2: The Philosopher's argument is that for the same reason one part might permeate another. But this permeation of the parts of a glorified body into one another is impossible, as stated above. Therefore the objection does not prove.

Reply to Objection 3: A body is seen because it acts on the sight: but that it does or does not act on the sight causes no change in the body. Hence it is not unfitting, if it can be seen when it will, and not seen when it will [TP, Question 55, Article 4]. On the other hand, being in a place is not an action proceeding from a body by reason of its quantity, as being seen is by reason of its color. Consequently the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the glorified body, by reason of its subtlety, will be impalpable?

Objection 1: It would seem that the glorified body, by reason of its subtlety, is impalpable. For Gregory says (Hom. xxv in Evang.): "What is palpable must needs be corruptible." But the glorified body is incorruptible. Therefore it is impalpable.

Objection 2: Further, whatever is palpable resists one who handles it. But that which can be in the same place with another does not resist it. Since then a glorified body can be in the same place with another body, it will not be palpable.

Objection 3: Further, every palpable body is tangible. Now every tangible body has tangible qualities in excess of the qualities of the one touching it. Since then in the glorified bodies the tangible qualities are not in excess but are reduced to a supreme degree of equality, it would seem that they are impalpable.

On the contrary, our Lord rose again with a glorified body; and yet His body was palpable, as appears from Lk. 24:39: "Handle, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones." Therefore the glorified bodies also will be palpable.

Further, this is the heresy of Eutychius, Bishop of Constantinople, as Gregory states (Moral. xxiv): for he said that in the glory of the resurrection our bodies will be impalpable.

I answer that, Every palpable body is tangible, but not conversely. For every body is tangible that has qualities whereby the sense of touch has a natural aptitude to be affected: wherefore air, fire, and the like are tangible bodies: but a palpable body, in addition to this, resists the touch; wherefore the air which never resists that which passes through it, and is most easily pierced, is tangible indeed but not palpable. Accordingly it is clear that a body is said to be palpable for two reasons, namely on account of its tangible qualities, and on account of its resisting that which touches it, so as to hinder it from piercing it. And since the tangible qualities are hot and cold and so forth, which are not found save in heavy and light bodies, which through being contrary to one another are therefore corruptible, it follows that the heavenly bodies, which by their nature are incorruptible, are sensible to the sight but not tangible, and therefore neither are they palpable. This is what Gregory means when he says (Hom. xxv in Evang.) that "whatever is palpable must needs be corruptible." Accordingly the glorified body has by its nature those qualities which have a natural aptitude to affect the touch, and yet since the body is altogether subject to the spirit, it is in its power thereby to affect or not to affect the touch. In like manner it is competent by its nature to resist any other passing body, so that the latter cannot be in the same place together with it: although, according to its pleasure, it may happen by the Divine power that it occupy the same place with another body, and thus offer no resistance to a passing body. Wherefore according to its nature the glorified body is palpable, but it is competent for it to be impalpable to a non-glorified body by a supernatural power. Hence Gregory says (Hom. xxv in Evang.) that "our Lord offered His flesh to be handled, which He had brought in through the closed doors, so as to afford a complete proof that after His resurrection His body was unchanged in nature though changed in glory."

Reply to Objection 1: The incorruptibility of a glorified body does not result from the nature of its component parts; and it is on account of that nature that whatever is palpable is corruptible, as stated above. Hence the argument does not prove.

Reply to Objection 2: Although in a way it is possible for a glorified body to be in the same place with another body: nevertheless the glorified body has it in its power to resist at will any one touching it, and thus it is palpable.

Reply to Objection 3: In the glorified bodies the tangible qualities are not reduced to the real mean that is measured according to equal distance from the extremes, but to the proportionate mean, according as is most becoming to the human complexion in each part. Wherefore the touch of those bodies will be most delightful, because a power always delights in a becoming object, and is grieved by excess.

OF THE AGILITY OF THE BODIES OF THE BLESSED

Prologue

We must now consider the agility of the bodies of the blessed in the resurrection. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the glorified bodies will be agile?
- (2) Whether they will move?
- (3) Whether they will move instantaneously?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the glorified bodies will be agile?

Objection 1: It would seem that the glorified bodies will not be agile. For that which is agile by itself needs not to be carried in order to move. But the glorified bodies will, after the resurrection, be taken up by the angels (according to a gloss) in the clouds "to meet Christ, into the air" (1 Thess. 4:16). Therefore the glorified bodies will not be agile.

Objection 2: Further, no body that moves with labor and pain can be said to be agile. Yet the glorified bodies will move thus, since the principle of their movement, namely the soul, moves them counter to their nature, else they would always move in the same direction. Therefore they are not agile.

Objection 3: Further, of all the animal operations sense surpasses movement in nobility and priority. Yet no property is ascribed to glorified bodies as perfecting them in sensation. Therefore neither should agility be ascribed to them as perfecting them in movement.

Objection 4: Further, nature gives different animals instruments of different disposition according to their different powers: hence she does not give instruments of the same disposition to slow as to fleet animals. Now God's works are much more orderly than those of nature. Since then the glorified body's members will have the same disposition, shape and quantity as they now have, it would seem that it will have no agility other than it has now.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 15:43): "It is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power," that is, according to a gloss, "mobile and living." But mobility can only signify agility in movement. Therefore the glorified bodies will be agile.

Further, slowness of movement would seem especially inconsistent with the nature of a spirit. But the glorified bodies will be most spiritual according to 1 Cor. 15:44. Therefore they will be agile.

I answer that, The glorified body will be altogether subject to the glorified soul, so that not only will there be nothing in it to resist the will of the spirit, for it was even so in the case of Adam's body, but also from the glorified soul there will flow into the body a certain perfection, whereby it will become adapted to that subjection: and this perfection is called "the gift of the glorified body." Now the soul is united to body not only as its form, but also as its mover; and in both ways the glorified body must needs be most perfectly subject to the glorified soul. Wherefore even as by the gift of subtlety the body is wholly subject to the soul as its form, whence it derives its specific being, so by the gift of agility it is subject to the soul as its mover, so that it is prompt and apt to obey the spirit in all the movements and actions of the soul.

Some, however, ascribe the cause of this agility to the fifth, i.e. the heavenly essence, which will then be predominant in the glorified bodies. But of this we have frequently observed that it does not seem probable (Question 82, Article 1; Question 83, Article 1). Wherefore it is better to ascribe it to the soul, whence glory flows to the body.

Reply to Objection 1: Glorified bodies are said to be borne by the angels and also on the clouds, not as though they needed them, but in order to signify the reverence which both angels and all creatures will show them.

Reply to Objection 2: The more the power of the moving soul dominates over the body, the less is the labor of movement, even though it be counter to the body's nature. Hence those in whom the motive power is stronger, and those who through exercise have the body more adapted to obey the moving spirit, labor less in being moved. And since, after the resurrection, the soul will perfectly dominate the body, both on account of the perfection of its own power, and on account of the glorified body's aptitude resulting from the outflow of glory which it receives from the soul, there will be no labor in the saints' movements, and thus it may be said that the bodies of the saints' will be agile.

Reply to Objection 3: By the gift of agility the glorified body will be rendered apt not only for local movement but also for sensation, and for the execution of all the other operations of the soul.

Reply to Objection 4: Even as nature gives to fleeter animals instruments of a different disposition in shape and quantity, so God will give to the bodies of the saints a disposition other than that which they have now, not indeed in shape and quantity, but in that property of glory which is called agility.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether the saints will never use their agility for the purpose of movement?

Objection 1: It would seem that the saints will never use their agility for the purpose of movement. For, according to the Philosopher (Phys. iii, 2), "movement is the act of the imperfect." But there will be no imperfection in glorified bodies. Neither therefore will there be any movement.

Objection 2: Further, all movement is on account of some need, because whatever is in motion is moved for the sake of obtaining some end. But glorified bodies will have no need, since as Augustine says (De Spiritu et Anima, lxiii [Question 70, Article 2, ad 1]), "all thou wilt be there, and nothing that thou wilt not." Therefore they will not move.

Objection 3: Further, according to the Philosopher (De Coelo et Mundo ii), "that which shares the Divine goodness without movement shares it more excellently than that which shares it with movement." Now the glorified body shares the Divine goodness more excellently than any other body. Since then certain bodies, like the heavenly bodies, will remain altogether without movement, it seems that much more will human bodies remain so.

Objection 4: Further, Augustine says (De Vera Relig. xii) that the soul being established in God will in consequence establish its body. Now the soul will be so established in God, that in no way will it move away from Him. Therefore in the body there will be no movement caused by the soul.

Objection 5: Further, the more noble a body is, the more noble a place is due to it: wherefore Christ's body which is the most exalted of all has the highest place of all, according to Heb. 7:26, "Made higher than the heavens," where a gloss says, "in place and dignity." And again each glorified body will, in like manner, have a place befitting it according to the measure of its dignity. Now a fitting place is one of the conditions pertaining to glory. Since then after the resurrection the glory of the saints will never vary, neither by increase nor by decrease, because they will then have reached the final term of all, it would seem that their bodies will never leave the place assigned to them, and consequently will not be moved.

On the contrary, It is written (Is. 40:31): "They shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint"; and (Wis. 3:7): "(The just) shall run to and fro like sparks among the reeds." Therefore there will be some movement in glorified bodies.

I answer that, It is necessary to suppose that the glorified bodies are moved sometimes, since even Christ's body was moved in His ascension, and likewise the bodies of the saints, which will arise from the earth, will ascend to the empyrean. But even after they have climbed the heavens, it is likely that they will sometimes move according as it pleases them; so that by actually putting into practice that which is in their power, they may show forth the excellence of Divine wisdom, and that furthermore their vision may be refreshed by the beauty of the variety of creatures, in which God's wisdom will shine forth with great evidence: for sense can only perceive that which is present, although glorified bodies can perceive from a greater distance than non-glorified bodies. And yet movement will nowise diminish their happiness which consists in seeing God, for He will be everywhere present to them; thus Gregory says of the angels (Hom. xxxiv in Evang.) that "wherever they are sent their course lies in God."

Reply to Objection 1: Local movement changes nothing that is intrinsic to a thing, but only that which is without namely place. Hence that which is moved locally is perfect as to those things which are within (Phys. viii, 7), although it has an imperfection as to place, because while it is in one place it is in potentiality with regard to another place, since it cannot be in several places at the same time, for this belongs to God alone. But this defect is not inconsistent with the perfection of glory, as neither is the defect whereby a creature is formed from nothing. Hence such like defects will remain in glorified bodies.

Reply to Objection 2: A person is said to need a thing in two ways, namely absolutely and relatively. One needs absolutely that without which one cannot retain one's being or one's perfection: and thus movement in glorified bodies will not be on account of a need, because their happiness will suffice them for all such things. But we need a thing relatively when without it some end we have in view cannot be obtained by us, or not so well, or not in some particular way. It is thus that movement will be in the blessed on account of need, for they will be unable to show forth their motive power practically, unless they be in motion, since nothing prevents a need of this kind being in glorified bodies.

Reply to Objection 3: This argument would prove if the glorified body were unable even without movement to share the Divine goodness much more perfectly than the heavenly bodies, which is untrue. Hence glorified bodies will be moved, not in order to gain a perfect participation in the Divine goodness (since they have this through glory), but in order to show the soul's power. On the other hand, the movement of the heavenly bodies could not show their power, except the power they have in moving lower bodies to generation and corruption, which is not becoming to that state. Hence the argument does not prove.

Reply to Objection 4: Local movement takes nothing away from the stability of the soul that is established in God, since it does not affect that which is intrinsic to a thing, as stated above (ad 1).

Reply to Objection 5: The fitting place assigned to each glorified body according to the degree of its dignity belongs to the accidental reward. Nor does it follow that this reward is diminished whenever the body is outside its place; because that place pertains to reward, not as actually containing the body located therein (since nothing flows therefrom into the glorified body, but rather does it receive splendor therefrom), but as being due to merits. Wherefore, though out of that place, they will still continue to rejoice in it.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the movement of the saints will be instantaneous?

Objection 1: It would seem that movement of the saints will be instantaneous. For Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii, 30) that "wherever the spirit listeth there will the body be." Now the movement of the will, whereby the spirit wishes to be anywhere, is instantaneous. Therefore the body's movement will be instantaneous.

Objection 2: Further, the Philosopher (Phys. iv, 8) proves that there is no movement through a vacuum, because it would follow that something moves instantaneously, since a vacuum offers no resistance whatever to a thing that is in motion, whereas the plenum offers resistance; and so there would be no proportion between the velocity of movement in a vacuum and that of movement in a plenum, since the ratio of movements in point of velocity is as the ratio of the resistance offered by the medium. Now the velocities of any two movements that take place in time must needs be proportional, since any one space of time is proportional to any other. But in like manner no full place can resist a glorified body since this can be in the same place with another body, no matter how this may occur; even as neither can a vacuum resist a body. Therefore if it moves at all, it moves instantaneously.

Objection 3: Further, the power of a glorified soul surpasses the power of a non-glorified soul, out of all proportion so to speak. Now the non-glorified soul moves the body in time. Therefore the glorified soul moves the body instantaneously.

Objection 4: Further, whatever is moved equally soon to what is near and what is distant, is moved instantaneously. Now such is the movement of a glorified body, for however distant the space to which it is moved, the time it takes to be moved is imperceptible: wherefore Augustine says (Questions. De Resurrectione, Ep. cii, qu. 1) that "the glorified body reaches equally soon to any distance, like the sun's ray." Therefore the glorified body is moved instantaneously.

Objection 5: Further, whatever is in motion is moved either in time or in an instant. Now after the resurrection the glorified body will not be moved in time, since time will not be then according to Apoc. 10:6. Therefore this movement will be instantaneous.

On the contrary, In local movement space. movement and time are equally divisible, as is demonstrated in Phys. vi, 4. Now the space traversed by a glorified body in motion is divisible. Therefore both the movement and the time are divisible. But an instant is indivisible. Therefore this movement will not be instantaneous.

Further, a thing cannot be at the same time wholly in one place and partly in another place, since it would follow that the remaining part is in two places at the same time, which is impossible. But whatever is in motion is partly in a term "wherefrom" and partly in a term "whereto," as is proved in Phys. vi, 6: while whatever has been in motion is wholly in the term whereto the movement is directed; and it is impossible at the same time for it to be moved and to have been moved. Now that which is moved instantaneously is being moved and has been moved at the same time. Therefore the local movement of a glorified body cannot be instantaneous.

I answer that, Opinion is much divided on this point. For some say that a glorified body passes from one place to another without passing through the interval, just as the will passes from one place to another without passing through the interval, and that consequently it is possible for the movement of a glorified body like that of the will to be instantaneous. But this will not hold: because the glorified body will never attain to the dignity of the spiritual nature, just as it will never cease to be a body. Moreover, when the will is said to move from one place to another, it is not essentially transferred from place to place, because in neither place is it contained essentially, but it is directed to one place after being directed by the intention to another: and in this sense it is said to move from one place to another.

Hence others [Alexander of Hales, Sum. Th. III, Question 23, mem. 3] say that it is a property of the nature of a glorified body, since it is a body, to pass through the interval and consequently to be moved in time, but that by the power of glory, which raises it to a certain infinitude above the power of nature, it is possible for it not to pass through the interval, and consequently to be moved instantaneously. But this is impossible since it implies a contradiction: which is proved as follows. Suppose a body which we will call Z to be in motion from A to B. It is clear that Z, as long as it is wholly in A is not in motion; and in like manner when it is wholly in B, because then the movement is past. Therefore if it is at any time in motion it must needs be neither wholly in A nor wholly in B. Therefore while it is in motion, it is either nowhere, or partly in A, and partly in B, or wholly in some other intervening place, say C, or partly in A and C and partly in C and B. But it is impossible for it to be nowhere, for then there would be a dimensive quantity without a place, which is impossible. Nor again is it possible for it to be partly in A and partly in B without being in some way in the intervening space. for since B is a place distant from A, it would follow that in the intervening space the part of Z which is in B is not continuous with the part which is in A. Therefore it follows that it is either wholly in C, or partly in C, and partly in some other place that intervenes between C and A, say D, and so forth. Therefore it follows that Z does not pass from A to B unless first of all it be in all the intervening places: unless we suppose that it passes from A to B without ever being moved, which implies a contradiction, because the very succession of places is local movement. The same applies to any change whatever having two opposite terms, each of which is a positive entity, but not to those changes which have only one positive term, the other being a pure privation, since between affirmation and negation or privation there is no fixed distance: wherefore that which is in the negation may be nearer to or more remote from affirmation, and conversely, by reason of something that causes either of them or disposes thereto: so that while that which is moved is wholly under a negation it is changed into affirmation, and "vice versa"; wherefore in such things "to be changing precedes to be changed," as is proved in Phys. vi, 5. Nor is there any comparison with the movement of an angel, because being in a place is predicated equivocally of a body and an angel. Hence it is clear that it is altogether impossible for a body to pass from one place to another, unless it pass through every interval.

Wherefore others grant this, and yet they maintain that the glorified body is moved instantaneously. But it follows from this that a glorified body is at the same instant in two or more places together, namely in the ultimate term, and in all the intervening places, which is impossible.

To this, however, they reply that, although it is the same instant really, it is not the same logically, like a point at which different lines terminate. But this is not enough, because an instant measures the instantaneous, according to its reality and not according to our way of considering it. Wherefore an instant through being considered in a different way is not rendered capable of measuring things that are not simultaneous in time, just as a point through being considered in a different way does not make it possible for one point of place to contain things that are locally distant from one another.

Hence others with greater probability hold that a glorified body moves in time, but that this time is so short as to be imperceptible; and that nevertheless one glorified body can pass through the same space in less time than another, because there is no limit to the divisibility of time, no matter how short a space we may take.

Reply to Objection 1: That which is little lacking is as it were not lacking at all (Phys. ii, 5); wherefore we say: "I do so and so at once," when it is to be done after a short time. It is in this sense that Augustine speaks when he says that "wheresoever the will shall be, there shall the body be forthwith." Or we may say that in the blessed there will never be an inordinate will: so that they never will wish their body to be instantaneously where it cannot be, and consequently whatever instant the will shall choose, at that same instant the body will be in whatever place the will shall determine.

Reply to Objection 2: Some have demurred to this proposition of the Philosopher's, as the Commentator thereon observes. They say that the ratio of one whole movement to another whole movement is not necessarily as the ratio of one resisting medium to another resisting medium, but that the ratio of the intervening mediums gives us the ratio of retardations attending the movements on account of the resistance of the medium. For every movement has a certain fixed speed, either fast or slow, through the mover overcoming the movable, although there be no resistance on the part of the medium; as evidenced in heavenly bodies, which have nothing to hinder their movement; and yet they do not move instantaneously, but in a fixed time proportionate to the power of the mover in comparison with the movable. Consequently it is clear that even if we suppose something to move in a vacuum, it does not follow that it moves instantaneously, but that nothing is added to the time which that movement requires in the aforesaid proportion of the mover to the movable, because the movement is not retarded.

But this reply, as the Commentator observes, proceeds from an error in the imagination; for it is imagined that the retardation resulting from the resistance of the medium is a part of movement added to the natural movement, the quantity of which is in proportion to the mover in comparison with the movable, as when one line is added to another: for the proportion of one total to the other is not the same as the proportion of the lines to which an addition has been made. And so there would not be the same proportion between one whole sensible movement and another, as between the retardations resulting from the resistance of the medium. This is an error of the imagination, because each part of a movement has as much speed as the whole movement: whereas not every part of a line has as much of the dimensive quantity as the whole line has. Hence any retardation or acceleration affecting the movement affects each of its parts, which is not the case with lines: and consequently the retardation that comes to a movement is not another part of the movement, whereas in the case of the lines that which is added is a part of the total line.

Consequently, in order to understand the Philosopher's argument, as the Commentator explains, we must take the whole as being one, that is we must take not only the resistance of the movable to the moving power, but also the resistance of the medium through which the movement takes place, and again the resistance of anything else, so that we take the amount of retardation in the whole movement as being proportionate to the moving power in comparison with the resisting movable, no matter in what way it resist, whether by itself or by reason of something extrinsic. For the movable must needs always resist the mover somewhat, since mover and moved, agent and patient, as such, are opposed to one another. Now sometimes it is to be observed that the moved resists the mover by itself, either because it has a force inclining it to a contrary movement, as appears in violent movements, or at least because it has a place contrary to the place which is in the intention of the mover; and such like resistance even heavenly bodies offer their movers. Sometimes the movable resists the power of the mover, by reason only of something else and not by itself. This is seen in the natural movement of heavy and light things, because by their very form they are inclined to such a movement: for the form is an impression of their generator, which is the mover as regards heavy and light bodies. On the part of matter we find no resistance, neither of a force inclining to a contrary movement nor of a contrary place, since place is not due to matter except in so far as the latter, being circumscribed by its dimensions, is perfected by its natural form. Hence there can be no resistance save on the part of the medium, and this resistance is connatural to their movement. Sometimes again the resistance results from both, as may be seen in the movements of animals.

Accordingly when in a movement there is no resistance save on the part of the movable, as in the heavenly bodies, the time of the movement is measured according to the proportion of the mover to the movable, and the Philosopher's argument does not apply to these, since if there be no medium at all their movement is still a movement in time. on the other hand, in those movements where there is resistance on the part of the medium only, the measure of time is taken only according to the obstacle on the part of the medium, so that if the medium be removed there will be no longer an obstacle; and so either it will move instantaneously, or it will move in an equal time through a vacuum and through a plenum, because granted that it moves in time through a vacuum, that time will bear some proportion to the time in which it moves through a plenum. Now it is possible to imagine another body more subtle in the same proportion than the body which filled the space, and then if this body fill some other equal space it will move in as little time through that plenum as it did previously through a vacuum, since by as much as the subtlety of the medium is increased by so much is the length of time decreased, and the more subtle the medium the less it resists. But in those other movements where resistance is offered by both the movable and the medium, the quantity of time must be proportionate to the power of the mover as compared with the resistance of both movable and medium together. Hence granted that the medium be taken away altogether, or that it cease to hinder, it does not follow that the movement is instantaneous, but that the time is measured according only to the resistance of the movable. Nor will there be any inconsistency if it move in an equal time through a vacuum, and through a space filled with the most subtle body imaginable, since the greater the subtlety we ascribe to the medium the less is it naturally inclined to retard the movement. Wherefore it is possible to imagine so great a subtlety, as will naturally retard the movement less than does the resistance of the movable, so that the resistance of the medium will add no retardation to the movement.

It is therefore evident that although the medium offer no resistance to the glorified bodies, in so far as it is possible for them to be in the same place with another body, nevertheless their movement will not be instantaneous, because the movable body itself will resist the motive power from the very fact that it has a determinate place, as we have said in reference to the heavenly bodies.

Reply to Objection 3: Although the power of a glorified soul surpasses immeasurably the power of a non-glorified soul, it does not surpass it infinitely, because both powers are finite: hence it does not follow that it causes instantaneous movement. And even if its power were simply infinite, it would not follow that it causes an instantaneous movement, unless the resistance of the movable were overcome altogether. Now although the resistance of the movable to the mover, that results from opposition to such a movement by reason of its being inclined to a contrary movement, can be altogether overcome by a mover of infinite power, nevertheless the resistance it offers through contrariety towards the place which the mover intends by the movement cannot be overcome altogether except by depriving it of its being in such and such a place or position. For just as white resists black by reason of whiteness, and all the more according as whiteness is the more distant from blackness, so a body resists a certain place through having an opposite place and its resistance is all the greater, according as the distance is greater. Now it is impossible to take away from a body its being in some place or position, except one deprive it of its corporeity, by reason of which it requires a place or position: wherefore so long as it retains the nature of a body, it can nowise be moved instantaneously, however greater be the motive power. Now the glorified body will never lose its corporeity, and therefore it will never be possible for it to be moved instantaneously.

Reply to Objection 4: In the words of Augustine, the speed is said to be equal because the excess of one over the other is imperceptible, just as the time taken by the whole movement is imperceptible.

Reply to Objection 5: Although after the resurrection the time which is the measure of the heaven's movement will be no more, there will nevertheless be time resulting from the before and after in any kind of movement.

OF THE CLARITY OF THE BEATIFIED BODIES

Prologue

We must now consider the clarity of the beatified bodies at the resurrection. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether there will be clarity in the glorified bodies?
- (2) Whether this clarity will be visible to the non-glorified eye?
- (3) Whether a glorified body will of necessity be seen by a non-glorified body?

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether clarity is becoming to the glorified body?

Objection 1: It would seem that clarity is unbecoming to the glorified body. Because according to Avicenna (Natural. vi, 2), "every luminous body consists of transparent parts." But the parts of a glorified body will not be transparent, since in some of them, such as flesh and bones, earth is predominant. Therefore glorified bodies are not lightsome.

Objection 2: Further, every lightsome body hides one that is behind it; wherefore one luminary behind another is eclipsed, and a flame of fire prevents one seeing what is behind it. But the glorified bodies will not hide that which is within them, for as Gregory says on Job 28:17, "Gold or crystal cannot equal it" (Moral. xviii, 48). "There," that is in the heavenly country, "the grossness of the members will not hide one's mind from another's eyes, and the very harmony of the body will be evident to the bodily sight." Therefore those bodies will not be lightsome.

Objection 3: Further, light and color require a contrary disposition in their subject, since "light is the extreme point of visibility in an indeterminate body; color, in a determinate body" (De Sensu et Sensato iii). But glorified bodies will have color, for as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii, 3), "the body's beauty is harmony of parts with a certain charm of color": and it will be impossible for the glorified bodies to lack beauty. Therefore the glorified bodies will not be lightsome.

Objection 4: Further, if there be clarity in the glorified bodies, it will need to be equal in all the parts of the body, just as all the parts will be equally impassible, subtle and agile. But this is not becoming, since one part has a greater disposition to clarity than another, for instance the eye than the hand, the spirits than the bones, the humors than the flesh or nerves. Therefore it would seem unfitting for those bodies to be lightsome.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 13:43): "The just shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father," and (Wis. 3:7): "The just shall shine, and shall run to and fro like sparks among the reeds."

Further, it is written (1 Cor. 15:43): "It is sown in dishonor, it shall rise in glory," which refers to clarity, as evidenced by the previous context where the glory of the rising bodies is compared to the clarity of the stars. Therefore the bodies of the saints will be lightsome.

I answer that, It is necessary to assert that after the resurrection the bodies of the saints will be lightsome, on account of the authority of Scripture which makes this promise. But the cause of this clarity is ascribed by some to the fifth or heavenly essence, which will then predominate in the human body. Since, however, this is absurd, as we have often remarked (Question 84, Article 1), it is better to say that this clarity will result from the overflow of the soul's glory into the body. For whatever is received into anything is received not according to the mode of the source whence it flows, but according to the mode of the recipient. Wherefore clarity which in the soul is spiritual is received into the body as corporeal. And consequently according to the greater clarity of the soul by reason of its greater merit, so too will the body differ in clarity, as the Apostle affirms (1 Cor. 15:41). Thus in the glorified body the glory of the soul will be known, even as through a crystal is known the color of a body contained in a crystal vessel, as Gregory says on Job 28:17, "Gold or crystal cannot equal it."

Reply to Objection 1: Avicenna is speaking of a body that has clarity through the nature of its component parts. It is not thus but rather by merit of virtue that the glorified body will have clarity.

Reply to Objection 2: Gregory compares the glorified body to gold on account of clarity, and to crystal on account of its transparency. Wherefore seemingly we should say that they will be both transparent and lightsome; for that a lightsome body be not transparent is owing to the fact that the clarity of that body results from the density of the lightsome parts, and density is opposed to transparency. Then, however, clarity will result from another cause, as stated above: and the density of the glorified body will not deprive it of transparency, as neither does the density of a crystal deprive crystal.

Some, on the other hand, say that they are compared to crystal, not because they are transparent, but on account of this likeness, for as much as that which is enclosed in crystal is visible, so the glory of the soul enclosed in the glorified body will not be hidden. But the first explanation is better, because it safeguards better the dignity of the glorified body, and is more consistent with the words of Gregory.

Reply to Objection 3: The glory of the body will not destroy nature but will perfect it. Wherefore the body will retain the color due to it by reason of the nature of its component parts, but in addition to this it will have clarity resulting from the soul's glory. Thus we see bodies which have color by their nature aglow with the resplendence of the sun, or from some other cause extrinsic or intrinsic.

Reply to Objection 4: Even as the clarity of glory will overflow from the soul into the body according to the mode of the body, and is there otherwise than in the soul, so again it will overflow into each part of the soul according to the mode of that part. Hence it is not unreasonable that the different parts should have clarity in different ways, according as they are differently disposed thereto by their nature. Nor is there any comparison with the other gifts of the body, for the various parts of the body are not differently disposed in their regard.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the clarity of the glorified body is visible to the non-glorified eye?

Objection 1: It would seem that the clarity of the glorified body is invisible to the non-glorified eye. For the visible object should be proportionate to the sight. But a non-glorified eye is not proportionate to see the clarity of glory, since this differs generically from the clarity of nature. Therefore the clarity of the glorified body will not be seen by a non-glorified eye.

Objection 2: Further, the clarity of the glorified body will be greater than the clarity of the sun is now, since the clarity of the sun also will then be greater than it is now, according to Is. 30:26, and the clarity of the glorified body will be much greater still, for which reason the sun and the entire world will receive greater clarity. Now a non-glorified eye is unable to gaze on the very orb of the sun on account of the greatness of its clarity. Therefore still less will it be able to gaze on the clarity of a glorified body.

Objection 3: Further, a visible object that is opposite the eyes of the seer must needs be seen, unless there be some lesion to the eye. But the clarity of a glorified body that is opposite to non-glorified eyes is not necessarily seen by them: which is evident in the case of the disciples who saw our Lord's body after the resurrection, without witnessing its clarity. Therefore this clarity will be invisible to a non-glorified eye.

On the contrary, A gloss on Phil. 3:21, "Made like to the body of His glory," says: "It will be like the clarity which He had in the Transfiguration." Now this clarity was seen by the non-glorified eyes of the disciples. Therefore the clarity of the glorified body will be visible to non-glorified eyes also.

Further, the wicked will be tortured in the judgment by seeing the glory of the just, according to Wis. 5:2. But they would not fully see their glory unless they gazed on their clarity. Therefore, etc.

I answer that, Some have asserted that the clarity of the glorified body will not be visible to the non-glorified eye, except by a miracle. But this is impossible, unless this clarity were so named equivocally, because light by its essence has a natural tendency to move the sight, and sight by its essence has a natural tendency to perceive light, even as the true is in relation to the intellect, and the good to the appetite. Wherefore if there were a sight altogether incapable of perceiving a light, either this sight is so named equivocally, or else this light is. This cannot be said in the point at issue, because then nothing would be made known to us when we are told that the glorified bodies will be lightsome: even so a person who says that a dog [the dog star] is in the heavens conveys no knowledge to one who knows no other dog than the animal. Hence we must say that the clarity of a glorified body is naturally visible to the non-glorified eye.

Reply to Objection 1: The clarity of glory will differ generically from the clarity of nature, as to its cause, but not as to its species. Hence just as the clarity of nature is, by reason of its species, proportionate to the sight, so too will the clarity of glory be.

Reply to Objection 2: Just as a glorified body is not passible to a passion of nature but only to a passion of the soul [Question 82, Article 1], so in virtue of its property of glory it acts only by the action of the soul. Now intense clarity does not disturb the sight, in so far as it acts by the action of the soul, for thus it rather gives delight, but it disturbs it in so far as it acts by the action of nature by heating and destroying the organ of sight, and by scattering the spirits asunder. Hence, though the clarity of a glorified body surpasses the clarity of the sun, it does not by its nature disturb the sight but soothes it: wherefore this clarity is compared to the jasper-stone (Apoc. 21:11).

Reply to Objection 3: The clarity of the glorified body results from the merit of the will and therefore will be subject to the will, so as to be seen or not seen according to its command. Therefore it will be in the power of the glorified body to show forth its clarity or to hide it: and this was the opinion of Praepositivus.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether a glorified body will be necessarily seen by a non-glorified body?

Objection 1: It would seem that a glorified body will be necessarily seen by a non-glorified body. For the glorified bodies will be lightsome. Now a lightsome body reveals itself and other things. Therefore the glorified bodies will be seen of necessity.

Objection 2: Further, every body which hides other bodies that are behind it is necessarily perceived by the sight, from the very fact that the other things behind it are hidden. Now the glorified body will hide other bodies that are behind it from being seen, because it will be a colored body. Therefore it will be seen of necessity.

Objection 3: Further, just as quantity is something in a body, so is the quality whereby a body is seen. Now quantity will not be subject to the will, so that the glorified body be able to be of greater or smaller quantity. Therefore neither will the quality of visibility be subject to the will, so that a body be able not to be seen.

On the contrary, our body will be glorified in being made like to the body of Christ after the resurrection. Now after the resurrection Christ's body was not necessarily seen; in fact it vanished from the sight of the disciples at Emmaus (Lk. 24:31). Therefore neither will the glorified body be necessarily seen.

Further, there the body will be in complete obedience to the will. Therefore as the soul lists the body will be visible or invisible.

I answer that, A visible object is seen, inasmuch as it acts on the sight. Now there is no change in a thing through its acting or not acting on an external object. Wherefore a glorified body may be seen or not seen without any property pertaining to its perfection being changed. Consequently it will be in the power of a glorified soul for its body to be seen or not seen, even as any other action of the body will be in the soul's power; else the glorified body would not be a perfectly obedient instrument of its principal agent.

Reply to Objection 1: This clarity will be obedient to the glorified body so that this will be able to show it or hide it.

Reply to Objection 2: A body's color does not prevent its being transparent except in so far as it affects the sight, because the sight cannot be affected by two colors at the same time, so as to perceive them both perfectly. But the color of the glorified body will be completely in the power of the soul, so that it can thereby act or not act on the sight. Hence it will be in its power to hide or not to hide a body that is behind it.

Reply to Objection 3: Quantity is inherent to the glorified body itself, nor would it be possible for the quantity to be altered at the soul's bidding without the glorified body suffering some alteration incompatible with its impassibility. Hence there is no comparison between quantity and visibility, because even this quality whereby it is visible cannot be removed at the soul's bidding, but the action of that quality will be suspended, and thus the body will be hidden at the soul's command.

OF THE CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH THE BODIES OF THE DAMNED WILL RISE AGAIN

Prologue

We must next consider the conditions in which the bodies of the damned will rise again. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the bodies of the damned will rise again with their deformities?
- (2) Whether their bodies will be corruptible?
- (3) Whether they will be impassible?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the bodies of the damned will rise again with their deformities?

Objection 1: It would seem that the bodies of the damned will rise again with their deformities. For that which was appointed as a punishment for sin should not cease except the sin be forgiven. Now the lack of limbs that results from mutilation, as well as all other bodily deformities, are appointed as punishments for sin. Therefore these deformities will not be taken away from the damned, seeing that they will not have received the forgiveness of their sins.

Objection 2: Further, just as the saints will rise again to final happiness, so the wicked will rise again to final unhappiness. Now when the saints rise again nothing will be taken from them that can pertain to their perfection, therefore nothing pertaining to the defect or unhappiness of the wicked will be taken from them at the resurrection. But such are their deformities. Therefore, etc.

Objection 3: Further, just as deformity is a defect of the passible body, so is slowness of movement. Now slowness of movement will not be taken from the bodies of the damned at the resurrection, since their bodies will not be agile. Therefore for the same reason neither will their deformity be taken away.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 15:52): "The dead shall rise again incorruptible"; where a gloss says: "The dead, i.e. sinners, or all the dead in general shall rise again incorruptible, i.e. without the loss of any limbs." Therefore the wicked will rise again without their deformities.

Further, there will be nothing in the damned to lessen the sense of pain. But sickness hinders the sense of pain by weakening the organ of sense, and in like manner the lack of a limb would prevent pain from affecting the whole body. Therefore the damned will rise again without these defects.

I answer that, Deformity in the human body is of two kinds. One arises from the lack of a limb: thus we say that a mutilated person is deformed, because he lacks due proportion of the parts to the whole. Deformities of this kind, without any doubt, will not be in the bodies of the damned, since all bodies of both wicked and good will rise again whole. Another deformity arises from the undue disposition of the parts, by reason of undue quantity, quality, or place---which deformity is, moreover, incompatible with due proportion of parts to whole. Concerning these deformities and like defects such as fevers and similar ailments which sometimes result in deformity, Augustine remained undecided and doubtful (Enchiridion xcii) as the Master remarks (Sent. iv, D, 44). Among modern masters, however, there are two opinions on this point. For some say that such like deformities and defects will remain in the bodies of the damned, because they consider that those who are damned are sentenced to utmost unhappiness wherefrom no affliction should be rebated. But this would seem unreasonable. For in the restoration of the rising body we look to its natural perfection rather than to its previous condition: wherefore those who die under perfect age will rise again in the stature of youth, as stated above (Question 81, Article 1). Consequently those who had natural defects in the body, or deformities resulting therefrom, will be restored without those defects or deformities at the resurrection, unless the demerit of sin prevent; and so if a person rise again with such defects and deformities, this will be for his punishment. Now the mode of punishment is according to the measure of guilt. And a sinner who is about to be damned may be burdened with less grievous sins and yet have deformities and defects which one who is about to be damned has not, while burdened with more grievous sins. Wherefore if he who had deformities in this life rise again with them, while the other who had them not in this life, and therefore, as is clear, will rise again without them, though deserving of greater punishment, the mode of the punishment would not correspond to the amount of guilt; in fact it would seem that a man is more punished on account of the pains which he suffered in this world; which is absurd.

Hence others say with more reason, that He Who fashioned nature will wholly restore the body's nature at the resurrection. Wherefore whatever defect or deformity was in the body through corruption, or weakness of nature or of natural principles (for instance fever, purblindness, and so forth) will be entirely done away at the resurrection: whereas those defects in the human body which are the natural result of its natural principles, such as heaviness, passibility, and the like, will be in the bodies of the damned, while they will be removed from the bodies of the elect by the glory of the resurrection.

Reply to Objection 1: Since in every tribunal punishment is inflicted according to the jurisdiction of the tribunal, the punishments which in this temporal life are inflicted for some particular sin are themselves temporal, and extend not beyond the term of this life. Hence although the damned are not pardoned their sins, it does not follow that there they will undergo the same punishments as they have in this world: but the Divine justice demands that there they shall suffer more severe punishment for eternity.

Reply to Objection 2: There is no parity between the good and the wicked, because a thing can be altogether good, but not altogether evil. Hence the final happiness of the saints requires that they should be altogether exempt from all evil; whereas the final unhappiness of the wicked will not exclude all good, because "if a thing be wholly evil it destroys itself," as the Philosopher says (Ethic. iv, 5). Hence it is necessary for the good of their nature to underlie the unhappiness of the damned, which good is the work of their perfect Creator, Who will restore that same nature to the perfection of its species.

Reply to Objection 3: Slowness of movement is one of those defects which are the natural result of the principles of the human body; but deformity is not, and consequently the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the bodies of the damned will be incorruptible?

Objection 1: It would seem that the bodies of the damned will be corruptible. For everything composed of contraries must necessarily be corruptible. Now the bodies of the damned will be composed of the contraries whereof they are composed even now, else they would not be the same, neither specifically nor, in consequence, numerically. Therefore they will be corruptible.

Objection 2: Further, if the bodies of the damned will not be corruptible, this will be due either to nature, or to grace, or to glory. But it will not be by nature, since they will be of the same nature as now; nor will it be by grace or glory, since they will lack these things altogether. Therefore they will be corruptible.

Objection 3: Further, it would seem inconsistent to withdraw the greatest of punishments from those who are in the highest degree of unhappiness. Now death is the greatest of punishments, as the Philosopher declares (Ethic. iii, 6). Therefore death should not be withdrawn from the damned, since they are in the highest degree of unhappiness. Therefore their bodies will be corruptible.

On the contrary, It is written (Apoc. 9:6): "In those days men shall seek death, and shall not find it, and they shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them."

Further, the damned will be punished with an everlasting punishment both in soul and body (Mt. 25:46): "These shall go into everlasting punishment." But this would not be possible if their bodies were corruptible. Therefore their bodies will be incorruptible.

I answer that, Since in every movement there must needs be a principle of movement, movement or change may be withdrawn from a movable in two ways: first through absence of a principle of movement, secondly through an obstacle to the principle of movement. Now corruption is a kind of change: and consequently a body which is corruptible on account of the nature of its principles may be rendered incorruptible in two ways. First by the total removal of the principle which leads to corruption, and in this way the bodies of the damned will be incorruptible. For since the heaven is the first principle of alteration in virtue of its local movement, and all other secondary agents act in virtue thereof and as though moved thereby, it follows that at the cessation of the heavenly movement there is no longer any agent that can change the body by altering it from its natural property. Wherefore after the resurrection, and the cessation of the heavenly movement, there will be no quality capable of altering the human body from its natural quality. Now corruption, like generation, is the term of alteration. Hence the bodies of the damned will be incorruptible, and this will serve the purpose of Divine justice, since living for ever they will be punished for ever. This is in keeping with the demands of Divine justice, as we shall state further on (Article 3), even as now the corruptibility of bodies serves the purpose of Divine providence, by which through the corruption of one thing another is generated.

Secondly, this happens through the principle of corruption being hindered, and in this way the body of Adam was incorruptible, because the conflicting qualities that exist in man's body were withheld by the grace of innocence from conducing to the body's dissolution: and much more will they be withheld in the glorified bodies, which will be wholly subject to the spirit. Thus after the general resurrection the two aforesaid modes of incorruptibility will be united together in the bodies of the blessed.

Reply to Objection 1: The contraries of which bodies are composed are conducive to corruption as secondary principles. For the first active principle thereof is the heavenly movement: wherefore given the movement of the heaven, it is necessary for a body composed of contraries to be corrupted unless some more powerful cause prevent it: whereas if the heavenly movement be withdrawn, the contraries of which a body is composed do not suffice to cause corruption, even in accordance with nature, as explained above. But the philosophers were ignorant of a cessation in the heavenly movement; and consequently they held that a body composed of contraries is without fail corrupted in accordance with nature.

Reply to Objection 2: This incorruptibility will result from nature, not as though there were some principle of incorruption in the bodies of the damned, but on account of the cessation of the active principle of corruption, as shown above.

Reply to Objection 3: Although death is simply the greatest of punishments, yet nothing prevents death conducing, in a certain respect, to a cessation of punishments; and consequently the removal of death may contribute to the increase of punishment. For as the Philosopher says (Ethic. ix, 9), "Life is pleasant to all, for all desire to be . . . But we must not apply this to a wicked or corrupt life, nor one passed in sorrow." Accordingly just as life is simply pleasant, but not the life that is passed in sorrows, so too death, which is the privation of life, is painful simply, and the greatest of punishments, inasmuch as it deprives one of the primary good, namely being, with which other things are withdrawn. But in so far as it deprives one of a wicked life, and of such as is passed in sorrow, it is a remedy for pains, since it puts an end to them. and consequently the withdrawal of death leads to the increase of punishments by making them everlasting. If however we say that death is penal by reason of the bodily pain which the dying feel, without doubt the damned will continue to feel a far greater pain: wherefore they are said to be in "everlasting death," according to the Psalm (48:15): "Death shall feed upon them."

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the bodies of the damned will be impassible?

Objection 1: It would seem that the bodies of the damned will be impassible. For, according to the Philosopher (Topic. vi), "increase of passion results in loss of substance." Now "if a finite thing be continually lessened, it must needs at length be done away" (Phys. i, 4). Therefore if the bodies of the damned will be passible, and will be ever suffering, they will at length be done away and corrupted: and this has been shown to be false (Article 2). Therefore they will be impassible.

Objection 2: Further, every agent likens the patient to itself. If then the bodies of the damned are passive to the fire the fire will liken them to itself. Now fire does not consume bodies except in so far as in likening them to itself it disintegrates them. Therefore if the bodies of the damned will be passible they will at length be consumed by the fire, and thus the same conclusion follows as before.

Objection 3: Further, those animals, for instance the salamander, which are said to remain living in fire without being destroyed, are not distressed by the fire: because an animal is not distressed by bodily pain, unless the body in some way is hurt thereby. If therefore the bodies of the damned can, like the aforesaid animals, remain in the fire without being corrupted, as Augustine asserts (De Civ. Dei xxi, 2,4), it would seem that they will suffer no distress there: which would not be the case unless their bodies were impassible. Therefore, etc.

Objection 4: Further, if the bodies of the damned be passible, the pain resulting from their suffering, seemingly, will surpass all present bodily pain, even as the joy of the saints will surpass all present joy. Now in this life it sometimes happens that the soul is severed from the body through excess of pain. Much more therefore if those bodies will be passible, the souls will be separate from the bodies through excess of pain, and thus those bodies will be corrupted: which is false. Therefore those bodies will be impassible.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 15:52): "And we shall be changed": and a gloss says: "We---the good alone---will be changed with the unchangeableness and impassibility of glory."

Further, even as the body co-operates with the soul in merit, so does it co-operate in sin. Now on account of the former co-operation not only the soul but also the body will be rewarded after the resurrection. Therefore in like manner the bodies of the damned will be punished; which would not be the case were they impassible. Therefore they will be passible.

I answer that, The principal cause of the bodies of the damned not being consumed by fire will be the Divine justice by which their bodies will be consigned to everlasting punishment. Now the Divine justice is served also by the natural disposition, whether on the part of the passive body or on the part of the active causes; for since passiveness is a kind of receptiveness, there are two kinds of passion, corresponding to two ways in which one thing is receptive of another. For a form may be received into a subject materially according to its natural being, just as the air receives heat from fire materially; and corresponding to this manner of reception there is a kind of passion which we call "passion of nature." In another way one thing is received into another spiritually by way of an "intention," just as the likeness of whiteness is received into the air and in the pupil: this reception is like that whereby the soul receives the likeness of things: wherefore corresponding to this mode of reception is another mode of passion which we call "passion of the soul." Since therefore after the resurrection and the cessation of the heavenly movement it will be impossible for a body to be altered by its natural quality, as stated above (Article 2), it will not be possible for any body to be passive with a passion of nature. Consequently as regards this mode of passion the bodies of the damned will be impassible even as they will be incorruptible. Yet after the heaven has ceased to move, there will still remain the passion which is after the manner of the soul, since the air will both receive light from the sun, and will convey the variety of colors to the sight. Wherefore in respect of this mode of passion the bodies of the damned will be passible. But the glorified bodies, albeit they receive something, and are in a manner patient to sensation, will nevertheless not be passive, since they will receive nothing to distress or hurt them, as will the bodies of the damned, which for this reason are said to be passible.

Reply to Objection 1: The Philosopher is speaking of the passion whereby the patient is changed from its natural disposition. But this kind of passion will not be in the bodies of the damned, as stated

Reply to Objection 2: The likeness of the agent is in the patient in two ways. First, in the same way as in the agent, and thus it is in all univocal agents, for instance a thing that is hot makes another thing hot, and fire generates fire. Secondly, otherwise than in the agent, and thus it is in all equivocal agents. In these it happens sometimes that a form which is in the agent spiritually is received into the patient materially: thus the form of the house built by the craftsman is materially in itself, but spiritually in the mind of the craftsman. On the other hand, sometimes it is in the agent materially, but is received into the patient spiritually: thus whiteness is materially on the wall wherein it is received, whereas it is spiritually in the pupil and in the transferring medium. And so it is in the case at issue, because the species which is in the fire materially is received spiritually into the bodies of the damned; thus it is that the fire will assimilate the bodies of the damned to itself, without consuming them withal.

Reply to Objection 3: According to the Philosopher (De Prop. Element.), "no animal can live in fire." Galen also (De simp. medic.) says "that there is no body which at length is not consumed by fire"; although sometimes certain bodies may remain in fire without hurt, such as ebony. The instance of the salamander is not altogether apposite, since it cannot remain in the fire without being at last consumed, as do the bodies of the damned in hell. Nor does it follow that because the bodies of the damned suffer no corruption from the fire, they therefore are not tormented by the fire, because the sensible object has a natural aptitude to please or displease the senses, not only as regards its natural action of stimulating or injuring the organ, but also as regards its spiritual action: since when the sensible object is duly proportionate to the sense, it pleases, whereas the contrary is the result when it is in excess or defect. Hence subdued colors and harmonious sounds are pleasing, whereas discordant sounds displease the hearing.

Reply to Objection 4: Pain does not sever the soul from the body, in so far as it is confined to a power of the soul which feels the pain, but in so far as the passion of the soul leads to the body being changed from its natural disposition. Thus it is that we see that through anger the body becomes heated, and through fear, chilled: whereas after the resurrection it will be impossible for the body to be changed from its natural disposition, as stated above (Article 2).

Consequently, however great the pain will be, it will not sever the body from the soul.

OF THE KNOWLEDGE WHICH, AFTER RISING AGAIN, MEN WILL HAVE AT THE JUDGMENT CONCERNING MERITS AND DEMERITS

Prologue

In the next place we must treat of those things which follow the resurrection. The first of these to be considered will be the knowledge, which after rising again, men will have at the judgment, concerning merits and demerits; the second will be the general judgment itself, as also the time and place at which it will be; thirdly we shall consider who will judge and who will be judged; fourthly we shall treat of the form wherein the judge will come to judge; and fifthly we shall consider what will be after the judgment, the state of the world and of those who will have risen again.

Under the first head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether at the judgment every man will know all his sins?
- (2) Whether every one will be able to read all that is on another's conscience?
- (3) Whether one will be able at one glance to see all merits and demerits?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether after the resurrection every one will know what sins he has committed?

Objection 1: It seems that after the resurrection everyone will not be able to know all the sins he has committed. For whatever we know, either we receive it anew through the senses, or we draw it from the treasure house of the memory. Now after the resurrection men will be unable to perceive their sins by means of sense, because they will be things of the past, while sense perceives only the present: and many sins will have escaped the sinner's memory, and he will be unable to recall them from the treasure house of his memory. Therefore after rising again one will not be cognizant of all the sins one has committed.

Objection 2: Further, it is stated in the text (Sent. iv, D, 43), that "there are certain books of the conscience, wherein each one's merits are inscribed." Now one cannot read a thing in a book, unless it be marked down in the book: and sin leaves its mark upon the conscience according to a gloss of Origen on Rm. 2:15, "Their conscience bearing witness," etc. which mark, seemingly, is nothing else than the guilt or stain. Since then in many persons the guilt or stain of many sins is blotted out by grace, it would seem that one cannot read in one's conscience all the sins one has committed: and thus the same conclusion follows as before.

Objection 3: Further, the greater the cause the greater the effect. Now the cause which makes us grieve for the sins which we recall to memory is charity. Since then charity is perfect in the saints after the resurrection, they will grieve exceedingly for their sins, if they recall them to memory: yet this is impossible, seeing that according to Apoc. 21:4, "Sorrow and mourning shall flee away from them." Therefore they will not recall their own sins to memory.

Objection 4: Further, at the resurrection the damned will be to the good they once did as the blessed to the sins they once committed. Now seemingly the damned after rising again will have no knowledge of the good they once did, since this would alleviate their pain considerably. Neither therefore will the blessed have any knowledge of the sins they had committed.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx) that "a kind of Divine energy will come to our aid, so that we shall recall all of our sins to mind."

Further, as human judgment is to external evidence, so is the Divine judgment to the witness of the conscience, according to 1 Kgs. 16:7, "Man seeth those things that appear, but the Lord beholdeth the heart." Now man cannot pass a perfect judgment on a matter unless evidence be taken on all the points that need to be judged. Therefore, since the Divine judgment is most perfect, it is necessary for the conscience to witness to everything that has to be judged. But all works, both good and evil, will have to be judged (2 Cor. 5:10): "We must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he hath done, whether it be good or evil." Therefore each one's conscience must needs retain all the works he has done, whether good or evil.

I answer that, According to Rm. 2:15,16, "In the day when God shall judge" each one's conscience will bear witness to him and his thoughts will accuse and defend him. And since in every judicial hearing, the witness, the accuser, and the defendant need to be acquainted with the matter on which judgment has to be pronounced, and since at the general judgment all the works of men will be submitted to judgment, it will behoove every man to be cognizant then of all his works. Wherefore each man's conscience will be as a book containing his deeds on which judgment will be pronounced, even as in the human court of law we make use of records. Of these books it is written in the Apocalypse (20:12): "The books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged by those things which were written in the books, according to their works." According to Augustine's exposition (De Civ. Dei xx) the books which are here said to be opened "denote the saints of the New and Old Testaments in whom God's commandments are exemplified." Hence Richard of St. Victor (De judic. potest.) says: "Their hearts will be like the code of law." But the book of life, of which the text goes on to speak, signifies each one's conscience, which is said to be one single book, because the one Divine power will cause all to recall their deeds, and this energy, in so far as it reminds a man of his deeds, is called the "book of life" [FP, Question 24, Article 1, ad 1]. Or else we may refer the first books to the conscience, and by the second book we may understand the Judge's sentence as expressed in His providence.

Reply to Objection 1: Although many merits and demerits will have escaped our memory, yet there will be none of them but will remain somewhat in its effect, because those merits which are not deadened will remain in the reward accorded to them, while those that are deadened remain in the guilt of ingratitude, which is increased through the fact that a man sinned after receiving grace. In like manner those demerits which are not blotted out by repentance remain in the debt of punishment due to them, while those which have been blotted out by repentance remain in the remembrance of repentance, which they will recall together with their other merits. Hence in each man there will be something whereby he will be able to recollect his deeds. Nevertheless, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx), the Divine energy will especially conduce to this.

Reply to Objection 2: Each one's conscience will bear certain marks of the deeds done by him; and it does not follow that these marks are the guilt alone, as stated above.

Reply to Objection 3: Although charity is now the cause of sorrow for sin, yet the saints in heaven will be so full of joy, that they will have no room for sorrow; and so they will not grieve for their sins, but rather will they rejoice in the Divine mercy, whereby their sins are forgiven them. Even so do the angels rejoice now in the Divine justice whereby those whom they guard fall headlong into sin through being abandoned by grace. and whose salvation none the less they eagerly watch over.

Reply to Objection 4: The wicked will know all the good they have done, and this will not diminish their pain; indeed, it will increase it, because the greatest sorrow is to have lost many goods: for which reason Boethius says (De Consol. ii) that "the greatest misfortune is to have been happy."

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether every one will be able to read all that is in another's conscience?

Objection 1: It seems that it will be impossible for every one to read all that is in another's conscience. For the knowledge of those who rise again will not be clearer than that of the angels, equality with whom is promised us after the resurrection (Mt. 22:30). Now angels cannot read one another's thoughts in matters dependent on the free-will, wherefore they need to speak in order to notify such things to one another [FP, Question 107]. Therefore after rising again we shall be unable to read what is contained in another's conscience.

Objection 2: Further, whatever is known is known either in itself, or in its cause, or in its effect. Now the merits or demerits contained in a person's conscience cannot be known by another in themselves, because God alone enters the heart and reads its secrets. Neither will it be possible for them to be known in their cause, since all will not see God Who alone can act on the will, whence merits and demerits proceed. Nor again will it be possible to know them from their effect, since there will be many demerits, which through being wholly blotted out by repentance will leave no effect remaining. Therefore it will not be possible for every one to know all that is in another's conscience.

Objection 3: Further, Chrysostom says (Hom. xxxi in Ep. ad Hebr.), as we have quoted before (Sent. iv, D, 17): "If thou remember thy sins now, and frequently confess them before God and beg pardon for them, thou wilt very soon blot them out; but if thou forget them, thou wilt then remember them unwillingly, when they will be made public, and declared before all thy friends and foes, and in the presence of the holy angels." Hence it follows that this publication will be the punishment of man's neglect in omitting to confess his sins. Therefore the sins which a man has confessed will not be made known to others.

Objection 4: Further, it is a relief to know that one has had many associates in sin, so that one is less ashamed thereof. If therefore every one were to know the sin of another, each sinner's shame would be much diminished, which is unlikely. Therefore every one will not know the sins of all.

On the contrary, A gloss on 1 Cor. 4:5, "will . . . bring to light the hidden things of darkness," says: "Deeds and thoughts both good and evil will then be revealed and made known to all."

Further, the past sins of all the good will be equally blotted out. Yet we know the sins of some saints, for instance of Magdalen, Peter, and David. Therefore in like manner the sins of the other elect will be known, and much more those of the damned.

I answer that, At the last and general judgment it behooves the Divine justice, which now is in many ways hidden, to appear evidently to all. Now the sentence of one who condemns or rewards cannot be just, unless it be delivered according to merits and demerits. Therefore just as it behooves both judge and jury to know the merits of a case, in order to deliver a just verdict, so is it necessary, in order that the sentence appear to be just, that all who know the sentence should be acquainted with the merits. Hence, since every one will know of his reward or condemnation, so will every one else know of it, and consequently as each one will recall his own merits or demerits, so will he be cognizant of those of others. This is the more probable and more common opinion, although the Master (Sent. iv, D, 43) says the contrary, namely that a man's sins blotted out by repentance will not be made known to others at the judgment. But it would follow from this that neither would his repentance for these sins be perfectly known, which would detract considerably from the glory of the saints and the praise due to God for having so mercifully delivered them.

Reply to Objection 1: All the preceding merits or demerits will come to a certain amount in the glory or unhappiness of each one rising again. Consequently through eternal things being seen, all things in their consciences will be visible, especially as the Divine power will conduce to this so that the Judge's sentence may appear just to all.

Reply to Objection 2: It will be possible for a man's merits or demerits to be made known by their effects as stated above (Article 1, ad 1), or by the power of God, although the power of the created intellect is not sufficient for this.

Reply to Objection 3: The manifestation of his sins to the confusion of the sinner is a result of his neglect in omitting to confess them. But that the sins of the saints be revealed cannot be to their confusion or shame, as neither does it bring confusion to Mary Magdalen that her sins are publicly recalled in the Church, because shame is "fear of disgrace," as Damascene says (De Fide Orth. ii), and this will be impossible in the blessed. But this manifestation will bring them great glory on account of the penance they did, even as the confessor hails a man who courageously confesses great crimes. Sins are said to be blotted out because God sees them not for the purpose of punishing them.

Reply to Objection 4: The sinner's confusion will not be diminished, but on the contrary increased, through his seeing the sins of others, for in seeing that others are blameworthy he will all the more acknowledge himself to be blamed. For that confusion be diminished by a cause of this kind is owing to the fact that shame regards the esteem of men, who esteem more lightly that which is customary. But then confusion will regard the esteem of God, which weighs every sin according to the truth, whether it be the sin of one man or of many.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether all merits and demerits, one's own as well as those of others, will be seen by anyone at a single glance?

Objection 1: It would seem that not all merits and demerits, one's own as well as those of others, will be seen by anyone at a single glance. For things considered singly are not seen at one glance. Now the damned will consider their sins singly and will bewail them, wherefore they say (Wis. 5:8): "What hath pride profited us?" Therefore they will not see them all at a glance.

Objection 2: Further, the Philosopher says (Topic. ii) that "we do not arrive at understanding several things at the same time." Now merits and demerits, both our own and those of others, will not be visible save to the intellect. Therefore it will be impossible for them all to be seen at the same time.

Objection 3: Further, the intellect of the damned after the resurrection will not be clearer than the intellect of the blessed and of the angels is now, as to the natural knowledge whereby they know things by innate species. Now by such knowledge the angels do not see several things at the same time. Therefore neither will the damned be able then to see all their deeds at the same time.

On the contrary, A gloss on Job 8:22, "They . . . shall be clothed with confusion," says: "As soon as they shall see the Judge, all their evil deeds will stand before their eyes." Now they will see the Judge suddenly. Therefore in like manner will they see the evil they have done, and for the same reason all others.

Further, Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx) considers it unfitting that at the judgment a material book should be read containing the deeds of each individual written therein, for the reason that it would be impossible to measure the size of such a book, or the time it would take to read. But in like manner it would be impossible to estimate the length of time one would require in order to consider all one's merits and demerits and those of others, if one saw these various things one after the other. Therefore we must admit that each one sees them all at the same time.

I answer that, There are two opinions on this question. For some say that one will see all merits and demerits, both one's own and those of others, at the same time in an instant. This is easily credible with regard to the blessed, since they will see all things in the Word: and consequently it is not unreasonable that they should see several things at the same time. But with regard to the damned, a difficulty presents itself, since their intellect is not raised so that they can see God and all else in Him. Wherefore others say that the wicked will see all their sins and those of others generically at the same time: and this suffices for the accusation or absolution necessary for the judgment; but that they will not see them all down to each single one at the same time. But neither does this seem consonant with the words of Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx), who says that they will count them all with one glance of the mind; and what is known generically is not counted. Hence we may choose a middle way, by holding that they will consider each sin not instantaneously, but in a very short time, the Divine power coming to their aid. This agrees with the saying of Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx) that "they will be discerned with wondrous rapidity." Nor is this impossible, since in a space of time, however short, is potentially an infinite number of instants. This suffices for the replies to the objections on either side of the question.

OF THE GENERAL JUDGMENT, AS TO THE TIME AND PLACE AT WHICH IT WILL BE

Prologue

We must next consider the general judgment, as to the time and place at which it will be. Under this head there are four points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether there will be a general judgment?
- (2) Whether as regards the debate it will be conducted by word of mouth?
- (3) Whether it will take place at an unknown time?
- (4) Whether it will take place in the valley of Josaphat?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether there will be a general judgment?

Objection 1: It would seem that there will not be a general judgment. For according to Nahum 1:9, following the Septuagint version, "God will not judge the same thing a second time." But God judges now of mans' every work, by assigning punishments and rewards to each one after death, and also by rewarding and punishing certain ones in this life for their good or evil deeds. Therefore it would seem that there will be no other judgment.

Objection 2: Further, in no judicial inquiry is the sentence carried cut before judgment is pronounced. But the sentence of the Divine judgment on man regards the acquisition of the kingdom or exclusion from the kingdom (Mt. 25:34,41). Therefore since some obtain possession of the kingdom now, and some are excluded from it for ever, it would seem that there will be no other judgment.

Objection 3: Further, the reason why certain things are submitted to judgment is that we may come to a decision about them. Now before the end of the world each of the damned is awarded his damnation, and each of the blessed his beatitude. Therefore, etc.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 12:41): "The men of Nineve shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it." Therefore there will be a judgment after the resurrection.

Further, it is written (Jn. 5:29): "They that have done good things shall come forth unto the resurrection of life, but they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of judgment." Therefore it would seem that after the resurrection there will be a judgment.

I answer that, Just as operation refers to the beginning wherefrom things receive their being, so judgment belongs to the term, wherein they are brought to their end. Now we distinguish a twofold operation in God. One is that whereby He first gave things their being, by fashioning their nature and by establishing the distinctions which contribute to the perfection thereof: from this work God is stated to have rested (Gn. 2:2). His other operation is that whereby He works in governing creatures; and of this it is written (Jn. 5:17): "My Father worketh until now; and I work." Hence we distinguish in Him a twofold judgment, but in the reverse order. One corresponds to the work of governance which cannot be without judgment: and by this judgment each one is judged individually according to his works, not only as adapted to himself, but also as adapted to the government of the universe. Hence one man's reward is delayed for the good of others (Heb. 11:13,39,40), and the punishment of one conduces to the profit of another. Consequently it is necessary that there should be another, and that a general judgment corresponding on the other hand with the first formation of things in being, in order that, to wit, just as then all things proceeded immediately from God, so at length the world will receive its ultimate complement, by each one receiving finally his own personal due. Hence at this judgment the Divine justice will be made manifest in all things, whereas now it remains hidden, for as much as at times some persons are dealt with for the profit of others, otherwise than their manifest works would seem to require. For this same reason there will then be a general separation of the good from the wicked, because there will be no further motive for the good to profit by the wicked, or the wicked by the good: for the sake of which profit the good are meanwhile mingled with the wicked, so long as this state of life is governed by Divine providence.

Reply to Objection 1: Each man is both an individual person and a part of the whole human race: wherefore a twofold judgment is due to him. One, the particular judgment, is that to which he will be subjected after death, when he will receive according as he hath done in the body [2 Cor. 5:10], not indeed entirely but only in part since he will receive not in the body but only in the soul. The other judgment will be passed on him as a part of the human race: thus a man is said to be judged according to human justice, even when judgment is pronounced on the community of which he is a part. Hence at the general judgment of the whole human race by the general separation of the good from the wicked, it follows that each one will be judged. And yet God will not judge "the same thing a second time," since He will not inflict two punishments for one sin, and the punishment which before the judgment was not inflicted completely will be completed at the last judgment, after which the wicked will be tormented at the same time in body and soul.

Reply to Objection 2: The sentence proper to this general judgment is the general separation of the good from the wicked, which will not precede this judgment. Yet even now, as regards the particular sentence on each individual, the judgment does not at once take full effect since even the good will receive an increase of reward after the judgment, both from the added glory of the body and from the completion of the number of the saints. The wicked also will receive an increase of torment from the added punishment of the body and from the completion of the number of damned to be punished, because the more numerous those with whom they will burn, the more will they themselves burn.

Reply to Objection 3: The general judgment will regard more directly the generality of men than each individual to be judged, as stated above. Wherefore although before that judgment each one will be certain of his condemnation or reward, he will not be cognizant of the condemnation or reward of everyone else. Hence the necessity of the general judgment.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the judgment will take place by word of mouth?

Objection 1: It would seem that this judgment, as regards the inquiry and sentence, will take place by word of mouth. For according to Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx) "it is uncertain how many days this judgment will last." But it would not be uncertain if the things we are told will take place at the judgment were to be accomplished only in the mind. Therefore this judgment will take place by word of mouth and not only in the mind.

Objection 2: Further, Gregory says (Moral. xxvi): "Those at least will hear the words of the Judge, who have confessed their faith in Him by words." Now this cannot be understood as referring to the inner word, because thus all will hear the Judge's words, since all the deeds of other men will be known to all both good and wicked. Therefore it seems that this judgment will take place by word of mouth.

Objection 3: Further, Christ will judge according to His human form, so as to be visible in the body to all. Therefore in like manner it seems that He will speak with the voice of the body, so as to be heard by all.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx) that the book of life which is mentioned Apoc. 20:12,15 "is a kind of Divine energy enabling each one to remember all his good or evil works, and to discern them with the gaze of the mind, with wondrous rapidity, his knowledge accusing or defending his conscience, so that all and each will be judged at the same moment." But if each one's merits were discussed by word of mouth, all and each could not be judged at the same moment. Therefore it would seem that this judgment will not take place by word of mouth.

Further, the sentence should correspond proportionately to the evidence. Now the evidence both of accusation and of defense will be mental, according to Rm. 2:15,16, "Their conscience bearing witness to them, and their thoughts between themselves accusing or also defending one another in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men." Therefore seemingly, this sentence and the entire judgment will take place mentally.

I answer that, It is not possible to come to any certain conclusion about the truth of this question. It is, however, the more probable opinion that the whole of this judgment, whether as regards the inquiry, or as regards the accusation of the wicked and the approval of the good or again as regards the sentence on both, will take place mentally. For if the deeds of each individual were to be related by word of mouth, this would require an inconceivable length of time. Thus Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx) that "if we suppose the book, from the pages of which all will be judged according to Apoc. 20, to be a material book, who will be able to conceive its size and length? or the length of time required for the reading of a book that contains the entire life of every individual?" Nor is less time requisite for telling by word of mouth the deeds of each individual, than for reading them if they were written in a material book. Hence, probably we should understand that the details set forth in Mt. 25 will be fulfilled not by word of mouth but mentally.

Reply to Objection 1: The reason why Augustine says that "it is uncertain how many days this judgment will last" is precisely because it is not certain whether it will take place mentally or by word of mouth. For if it were to take place by word of mouth, a considerable time would be necessary. but if mentally, it is possible for it to be accomplished in an instant.

Reply to Objection 2: Even if the judgment is accomplished solely in the mind, the saying of Gregory stands, since though all will be cognizant of their own and of others' deeds, as a result of the Divine energy which the Gospel describes as speech (Mt. 25:84-46), nevertheless those who have had the faith which they received through God's words will be judged from those very words, for it is written (Rm. 2:12): "Whosoever have sinned in the Law shall be judged by the Law." Hence in a special way something will be said to those who had been believers, which will not be said to unbelievers.

Reply to Objection 3: Christ will appear in body, so that the Judge may be recognized in the body by all, and it is possible for this to take place suddenly. But speech which is measured by time would require an immense length of time, if the judgment took place by word of mouth.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the time of the future judgment is unknown?

Objection 1: It would seem that the time of the future judgment is not unknown. For just as the holy Fathers looked forward to the first coming, so do we look forward to the second. But the holy Fathers knew the time of the first coming, as proved by the number of weeks mentioned in Daniel 9: wherefore the Jews are reproached for not knowing the time of Christ's coming (Lk. 12:56): "You hypocrites, you know how to discern the face of the heaven and of the earth, but how is it that you do not discern this time?" Therefore it would seem that the time of the second coming when God will come to judgment should also be certified to us.

Objection 2: Further, we arrive by means of signs at the knowledge of the things signified. Now many signs of the coming judgment are declared to us in Scripture (Mt. 24, Mk. 13, Lk. 21). Therefore we can arrive at the knowledge of that time.

Objection 3: Further, the Apostle says (1 Cor. 10:11): "It is on us that the ends of the world are come," and (1 Jn. 2:18): "Little children, it is the last hour," etc. Since then it is a long time since these things were said, it would seem that now at least we can know that the last judgment is nigh.

Objection 4: Further, there is no need for the time of the judgment to be hidden, except that each one may be careful to prepare himself for judgment, being in ignorance of the appointed time. Yet the same care would still be necessary even were the time known for certain, because each one is uncertain about the time of his death, of which Augustine says (Ep. ad Hesych. cxcix) that "as each one's last day finds him, so will the world's last day find him." Therefore there is no necessity for the time of the judgment to be uncertain.

On the contrary, It is written (Mk. 13:32): "Of that day or hour no man knoweth, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father." The Son, however, is said not to know in so far as He does not impart the knowledge to us.

Further, it is written (1 Thess. 5:2): "The day of the Lord shall so come as a thief in the night." Therefore seemingly, as the coming of a thief in the night is altogether uncertain, the day of the last judgment is altogether uncertain.

I answer that, God is the cause of things by His knowledge [FP, Question 14, Article 8]. Now He communicates both these things to His creatures, since He both endows some with the power of action on others whereof they are the cause, and bestows on some the knowledge of things. But in both cases He reserves something to Himself, for He operates certain things wherein no creature co-operates with Him, and again He knows certain things which are unknown to any mere creature. Now this should apply to none more than to those things which are subject to the Divine power alone, and in which no creature co-operates with Him. Such is the end of the world when the day of judgment will come. For the world will come to an end by no created cause, even as it derived its existence immediately from God. Wherefore the knowledge of the end of the world is fittingly reserved to God. Indeed our Lord seems to assign this very reason when He said (Acts 1:7): "It is not for you to know the times or moments which the Father hath put in His own power," as though He were to say, "which are reserved to His power alone."

Reply to Objection 1: At His first coming Christ came secretly according to Is. 45:15, "Verily Thou art a hidden God, the God of Israel, the Saviour." Hence, that He might be recognized by believers, it was necessary for the time to be fixed beforehand with certainty. On the other hand, at the second coming, He will come openly, according to Ps. 49:3, "God shall come manifestly." Consequently there can be no error affecting the knowledge of His coming. Hence the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 2: As Augustine says, in his letter to Hesychius concerning the day of judgment (Ep. cxcix), "the signs mentioned in the Gospels do not all refer to the second advent which will happen at the end of the world, but some of them belong to the time of the sack of Jerusalem, which is now a thing of the past, while some, in fact many of them, refer to the advent whereby He comes daily to the Church, whom He visits spiritually when He dwells in us by faith and love." Moreover, the details mentioned in the Gospels and Epistles in connection with the last advent are not sufficient to enable us to determine the time of the judgment, for the trials that are foretold as announcing the proximity of Christ's coming occurred even at the time of the Early Church, in a degree sometimes more sometimes less marked; so that even the days of the apostles were called the last days (Acts 2:17) when Peter expounded the saying of Joel 2:28, "It shall come to pass in the last days," etc., as referring to that time. Yet it was already a long time since then: and sometimes there were more and sometimes less afflictions in the Church. Consequently it is impossible to decide after how long a time it will take place, nor fix the month, year, century, or thousand years as Augustine says in the same book (Ep. ad Hesych. cxcix). And even if we are to believe that at the end these calamities will be more frequent, it is impossible to fix what amount of such calamities will immediately precede the judgment day or the coming of Antichrist, since even at the time of the Early Church persecutions were so bitter, and the corruptions of error were so numerous, that some looked forward to the coming of Antichrist as being near or imminent; as related in Eusebius' History of the Church (vi, 7) and in Jerome's book De Viris Illustribus lii.

Reply to Objection 3: The statement, "It is the last hour" and similar expressions that are to be found in Scripture do not enable us to know the exact length of time. For they are not intended to indicate a short length of time, but to signify the last state of the world, which is the last age of all, and it is not stated definitely how long this will last. Thus neither is fixed duration appointed to old age, which is the last age of man, since sometimes it is seen to last as long as or even longer than all the previous ages, as Augustine remarks (Qq. 83, qu. lviii). Hence also the Apostle (2 Thess. 2:2) disclaims the false signification which some had given to his words, by believing that the day of the Lord was already at hand.

Reply to Objection 4: Notwithstanding the uncertainty of death, the uncertainty of the judgment conduces to watchfulness in two ways. First, as regards the thing ignored, since its delay is equal to the length of man's life, so that on either side uncertainty provokes him to greater care. Secondly, for the reason that a man is careful not only of his own person, but also of his family, or of his city or kingdom, or of the whole Church, the length of whose duration is not dependent on the length of man's life. And yet it behooves each of these to be so ordered that the day of the Lord find us not unprepared.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the judgment will take place in the valley of Josaphat?

Objection 1: It would seem that the judgment will not take place in the valley of Josaphat or in the surrounding locality. For at least it will be necessary for those to be judged to stand on the ground, and those alone to be raised aloft whose business it will be to judge. But the whole land of promise would not be able to contain the multitude of those who are to be judged. Therefore it is impossible for the judgment to take place in the neighborhood of that valley.

Objection 2: Further, to Christ in His human form judgment is given that He may judge justly, since He was judged unjustly in the court of Pilate, and bore the sentence of an unjust judgment on Golgotha. Therefore these places would be more suitably appointed for the judgment.

Objection 3: Further, clouds result from the exhalation of vapors. But then there will be no evaporation or exhalation. Therefore it will be impossible for the just to be "taken up . . . in the clouds to meet Christ, into the air": and consequently it will be necessary for both good and wicked to be on the earth, so that a much larger place than this valley will be required.

On the contrary, It is written (Joel 3:2): "I will gather together all nations and will bring them down into the valley of Josaphat, and I will plead with them there."

Further, it is written (Acts 1:11): "(This Jesus) . . . shall so come as you have seen Him going into heaven." Now He ascended into heaven from Mount Olivet which overlooks the valley of Josaphat. Therefore He will come to judge in the neighborhood of that place.

I answer that, We cannot know with any great certainty the manner in which this judgment will take place, nor how men will gather together to the place of judgment; but it may be gathered from Scripture that in all probability He will descend in the neighborhood of Mount Olivet, even as He ascended from there, so as to show that He who descends is the same as He who ascended.

Reply to Objection 1: A great multitude can be enclosed in a small space. And all that is required is that in the neighborhood of that locality there be a space, however great, to contain the multitude of those who are to be judged, provided that Christ can be seen thence since being raised in the air, and shining with exceeding glory, He will be visible from a great distance.

Reply to Objection 2: Although through being sentenced unjustly Christ merited His judiciary power, He will not judge with the appearance of infirmity wherein He was judged unjustly, but under the appearance of glory wherein He ascended to the Father. Hence the place of His ascension is more suitable to the judgment than the place where He was condemned.

Reply to Objection 3: In the opinion of some the name of clouds is here given to certain condensations of the light shining from the bodies of the saints, and not to evaporations from earth and water. Or we may say that those clouds will be produced by Divine power in order to show the parallel between His coming to judge and His ascension; so that He Who ascended in a cloud may come to judgment in a cloud.

Again the cloud on account of its refreshing influence indicates the mercy of the Judge.

QUESTION 89

OF THOSE WHO WILL JUDGE AND OF THOSE WHO WILL BE JUDGED AT THE GENERAL JUDGMENT

Prologue

We must next consider who will judge and who will be judged at the general judgment. Under this head there are eight points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether any men will judge together with Christ?
- (2) Whether the judicial power corresponds to voluntary poverty?
- (3) Whether the angels also will judge?
- (4) Whether the demons will carry out the Judge's sentence on the damned?
- (5) Whether all men will come up for judgment?
- (6) Whether any of the good will be judged?
- (7) Whether any of the wicked will be judged?
- (8) Whether the angels also will be judged?

ARTICLE 1. Whether any men will judge together with Christ?

Objection 1: It would seem that no men will judge with Christ. For it is written (Jn. 5:22,23): "The Father . . . hath given all judgment to the Son, that all men may honor the Son." Therefore, etc.

Objection 2: Further, whoever judges has authority over that which he judges. Now those things about which the coming judgment will have to be, such as human merits and demerits, are subject to Divine authority alone. Therefore no one is competent to judge of those things.

Objection 3: Further, this judgment will take place not vocally but mentally. Now the publication of merits and demerits in the hearts of all men (which is like an accusation or approval), or the repayment of punishment and reward (which is like the pronouncement of the sentence) will be the work of God alone. Therefore none but Christ Who is God will judge.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 19:28): "You also shall sit on twelve seats judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Therefore, etc.

Further, "The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of His people" (Is. 3:14). Therefore it would seem that others also will judge together with Christ.

I answer that, To judge has several significations. First it is used causally as it were, when we say it of that which proves that some person ought to be judged. In this sense the expression is used of certain people in comparison, in so far as some are shown to be deserving of judgment through being compared with others: for instance (Mt. 12:41): "The men of Nineve shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it." To rise in judgment thus is common to the good and the wicked. Secondly, the expression "to judge" is used equivalently, so to say; for consent to an action is considered equivalent to doing it. Wherefore those who will consent with Christ the Judge, by approving His sentence, will be said to judge. In this sense it will belong to all the elect to judge: wherefore it is written (Wis. 3:7,8): "The just . . . shall judge nations." Thirdly, a person is said to judge assessorially and by similitude, because he is like the judge in that his seat is raised above the others: and thus assessors are said to judge. Some say that the perfect to whom judiciary power is promised (Mt. 19:28) will judge in this sense, namely that they will be raised to the dignity of assessors, because they will appear above others at the judgment, and go forth "to meet Christ, into the air." But this apparently does not suffice for the fulfilment of our Lord's promise (Mt. 19:28): "You shall sit . . . judging," for He would seem to make "judging" something additional to "sitting." Hence there is a fourth way of judging, which will be competent to perfect men as containing the decrees of Divine justice according to which men will be judged: thus a book containing the law might be said to judge: wherefore it is written (Apoc. 20:12): "Judgment took her seat and the books were opened." Richard of St. Victor expounds this judging in this way (De judic. potest.), wherefore he says: "Those who persevere in Divine contemplation, who read every day the book of wisdom, transcribe, so to speak, in their hearts whatever they grasp by their clear insight of the truth"; and further on: "What else are the hearts of those who judge, divinely instructed in all truth, but a codex of the law?" Since, however, judging denotes an action exercised on another person, it follows that, properly speaking, he is said to judge who pronounces judgment on another. But this happens in two ways. First, by his own authority: and this belongs to the one who has dominion and power over others, and to whose ruling those who are judged are subject, wherefore it belongs to him to pass judgment on them. In this sense to judge belongs to God alone. Secondly, to judge is to acquaint others of the sentence delivered by another's authority, that is to announce the verdict already given. In this way perfect men will judge, because they will lead others to the knowledge of Divine justice, that these may know what is due to them on account of their merits: so that this very revelation of justice is called judgment. Hence Richard of St. Victor says (De judic. potest.) that for "the judges to open the books of their decree in the presence of those who are to be judged signifies that they open their hearts to the gaze of all those who are below them, and that they reveal their knowledge in whatever pertains to the judgment."

Reply to Objection 1: This objection considers the judgment of authority which belongs to Christ alone: and the same answer applies to the Second Objection.

Reply to Objection 3: There is no reason why some of the saints should not reveal certain things to others, either by way of enlightenment, as the higher angels enlighten the lower [FP, Question 106],: or by way of speech as the lower angels speak to the higher [FP, Question 107, Article 2].

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether the judicial power corresponds to voluntary poverty?

Objection 1: It would seem that the judicial power does not correspond to voluntary poverty. For it was promised to none but the twelve apostles (Mt. 19:28): "You shall sit on twelve seats, judging," etc. Since then those who are voluntarily poor are not all apostles, it would seem that the judicial power is not competent to all.

Objection 2: Further, to offer sacrifice to God of one's own body is more than to do so of outward things. Now martyrs and also virgins offer sacrifice to God of their own body. whereas the voluntarily poor offer sacrifice of outward things. Therefore the sublimity of the judicial power is more in keeping with martyrs and virgins than with those who are voluntarily poor.

Objection 3: Further, it is written (Jn. 5:45): "There is one that accuseth you, Moses in whom you trust---because you believe not his voice," according to a gloss, and (Jn. 12:48): "The word that I have spoken shall judge him in the last day." Therefore the fact that a man propounds a law, or exhorts men by word to lead a good life, gives him the right to judge those who scorn his utterances. But this belongs to doctors. Therefore it is more competent to doctors than to those who are poor voluntarily.

Objection 4: Further, Christ through being judged unjustly merited as man to be judge of all in His human nature [TP, Question 59, Article 6], according to Jn. 5:27, "He hath given Him power to do judgment, because He is the Son of man." Now those who suffer persecution for justice' sake are judged unjustly. Therefore the judicial power is competent to them rather than to the voluntarily poor.

Objection 5: Further, a superior is not judged by his inferior. Now many who will have made lawful use of riches will have greater merit than many of the voluntarily poor. Therefore the voluntarily poor will not judge where those are to be judged.

On the contrary, It is written (Job 36:6): "He saveth not the wicked, and He giveth judgment to the poor."

Further, a gloss on Mt. 19:28, "You who have left all things' " says:

"Those who left all things and followed God will be the judges; those who made right use of what they had lawfully will be judged," and thus the same conclusion follows as before.

I answer that, The judicial power is due especially to poverty on three counts. First, by reason of congruity, since voluntary poverty belongs to those who despise all the things of the world and cleave to Christ alone. Consequently there is nothing in them to turn away their judgment from justice, so that they are rendered competent to be judges as loving the truth of justice above all things. Secondly, by reason of merit, since exaltation corresponds by way of merit to humility. Now of all the things that make man contemptible in this world humility is the chief: and for this reason the excellence of judicial power is promised to the poor, so that he who humbles himself for Christ's sake shall be exalted. Thirdly, because poverty disposes a man to the aforesaid manner of judging. For the reason why one of the saints will be said to judge as stated above [Article 1], is that he will have the heart instructed in all Divine truth which he will be thus able to make known to others. Now in the advancement to perfection, the first thing that occurs to be renounced is external wealth, because this is the last thing of all to be acquired. And that which is last in the order of generation is the first in the order of destruction: wherefore among the beatitudes whereby we advance to perfection, the first place is given to poverty. Thus judicial power corresponds to poverty, in so far as this is the disposition to the aforesaid perfection. Hence also it is that this same power is not promised to all who are voluntarily poor, but to those who leave all and follow Christ in accordance with the perfection of life.

Reply to Objection 1: According to Augustine (De Civ. Dei xx), "we must not imagine that because He says that they will sit on twelve seats only twelve men will judge with Him. else since we read that Matthias was appointed apostle in the place of the traitor Judas, Paul who worked more than the rest will have nowhere to sit as judge." Hence "the number twelve," as he states (De Civ. Dei xx), "signifies the whole multitude of those who will judge, because the two parts of seven, namely three and four, being multiplied together make twelve." Moreover twelve is a perfect number, being the double of six, which is a perfect number.

Reply to Objection 2: Virginity and martyrdom do not dispose man to retain the precepts of Divine justice in his heart in the same degree as poverty does: even so, on the other hand, outward riches choke the word of God by the cares which they entail (Lk. 8:14). Or we may reply that poverty does not suffice alone to merit judicial power, but is the fundamental part of that perfection to which the judicial power corresponds. Wherefore among those things regarding perfection which follow after poverty we may reckon both virginit

Reply to Objection 3: He who propounded the law or urged men to good will judge, in the causal (Cf. Article 1) sense, because others will be judged in reference to the words he has uttered or propounded. Hence the judicial power does not properly correspond to preaching or teaching. or we may reply that, as some say, three things are requisite for the judicial power; first, that one renounce temporal cares, lest the mind be hindered from the contemplation of wisdom; secondly that one possess Divine justice by way of habit both as to knowledge and as to observance; thirdly that one should have taught others this same justice; and this teaching will be the perfection whereby a man merits to have judicial power.

Reply to Objection 4: Christ humbled Himself in that He was judged unjustly; for "He was offered because it was His own will" (Is. 53:7): and by His humility He merited His exaltation to judicial power, since all things are made subject to Him (Phil. 2:8,9). Hence, judicial power is more due to them who humble themselves of their own will by renouncing temporal goods, on account of which men are honored by worldlings, than to those who are humbled by others.

Reply to Objection 5: An inferior cannot judge a superior by his own authority, but he can do so by the authority of a superior, as in the case of a judge-delegate. Hence it is not unfitting that it be granted to the poor as an accidental reward to judge others, even those who have higher merit in respect of the essential reward.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the angels will judge?

Objection 1: It would seem that the angels will judge. For it is written (Mt. 25:31): "When the Son of man shall come in His majesty, and all the angels with Him." Now He is speaking of His coming to judgment. Therefore it would seem that also the angels will judge.

Objection 2: Further, the orders of the angels take their names from the offices which they fulfill. Now one of the angelic orders is that of the Thrones, which would seem to pertain to the judicial power, since a throne is the "judicial bench, a royal seat, a professor's chair" [St. Isidore, Etym. vii, 5]. Therefore some of the angels will judge.

Objection 3: Further, equality with the angels is promised the saints after this life (Mt. 22:30). If then men will have this power of judging, much more will the angels have it.

On the contrary, It is written (Jn. 5:27): "He hath given Him power to judgment, because He is the Son of man." But the angels have not the human nature in common with Him. Neither therefore do they share with Him in the judicial power.

Further, the same person is not judge and judge's minister. Now in this judgment the angels will act as ministers of the Judge and, according to Mt. 13:41: "The Son of man shall send His angels and they shall gather out of His kingdom all scandals." Therefore the angels will not judge.

I answer that, The judge's assessors must be conformed to the judge. Now judgment is ascribed to the Son of man because He will appear to all, both good and wicked, in His human nature, although the whole Trinity will judge by authority. Consequently it behooves also the Judge's assessors to have the human nature, so as to be visible to all, both good and wicked. Hence it is not fitting for the angels to judge, although in a certain sense we may say that the angels will judge, namely by approving the sentence [Article 1].

Reply to Objection 1: As a gloss on this passage observes, the angels will come with Christ, not to judge, but "as witnesses of men's deeds because it was under their guardianship that men did well or ill."

Reply to Objection 2: The name of Thrones is given to angels in reference to the judgment which God is ever pronouncing, by governing all things with supreme justice: of which judgment angels are in a way the executors and promulgators. On the other hand, the judgment of men by the man Christ will require human assessors.

Reply to Objection 3: Equality with angels is promised to men as regards the essential reward. But nothing hinders an accidental reward from being bestowed on men to the exclusion of the angels, as in the case of the virgins' and martyrs' crowns: and the same may be said of the judicial power.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the demons will carry out the sentence of the Judge on the damned?

Objection 1: It would seem that the demons will not carry out the sentence of the Judge on the damned after the day of judgment. For, according to the Apostle (1 Cor. 15:24): "He will then bring to naught all principality, and power, and virtue." Therefore all supremacy will cease then. But the carrying out of the Judge's sentence implies some kind of supremacy. Therefore after the judgment day the demons will not carry out the Judge's sentence.

Objection 2: Further, the demons sinned more grievously than men. Therefore it is not just that men should be tortured by demons.

Objection 3: Further, just as the demons suggest evil things to men, so good angels suggest good things. Now it will not be the duty of the good angels to reward the good, but this will be done by God, immediately by Himself. Therefore neither will it be the duty of the demons to punish the wicked.

On the contrary, Sinners have subjected themselves to the devil by sinning. Therefore it is just that they should be subjected to him in their punishments, and punished by him as it were.

I answer that, The Master in the text of Sentent. iv, D, 47 mentions two opinions on this question, both of which seem consistent with Divine justice, because it is just for man to be subjected to the devil for having sinned, and yet it is unjust for the demon to be over him. Accordingly the opinion which holds that after the judgment day the demons will not be placed over men to punish them, regards the order of Divine justice on the part of the demons punishing; while the contrary opinion regards the order of Divine justice on the part of the men punished.

Which of these opinions is nearer the truth we cannot know for certain. Yet I think it truer to say that just as, among the saved, order will be observed so that some will be enlightened and perfected by others (because all the orders of the heavenly hierarchies will continue for ever) [FP, Question 108, Articles 7,8], so, too, will order be observed in punishments, men being punished by demons, lest the Divine order, whereby the angels are placed between the human nature and the Divine, be entirely set aside. Wherefore just as the Divine illuminations are conveyed to men by the good angels, so too the demons execute the Divine justice on the wicked. Nor does this in any way diminish the punishment of the demons, since even in torturing others they are themselves tortured, because then the fellowship of the unhappy will not lessen but will increase unhappiness.

Reply to Objection 1: The supremacy which, it is declared, will be brought to nought by Christ in the time to come must be taken in the sense of the supremacy which is in keeping with the state of this world: wherein men are placed over men, angels over men, angels over angels, demons over demons, and demons over men; in every case so as either to lead towards the end or to lead astray from the end. But then when all things will have attained to that end there will be no supremacy to lead astray from the end or to lead to it, but only that which maintains in the end, good or evil.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the demerit of the demons does not require that they be placed over men, since they made men subject to them unjustly, yet this is required by the order of their nature in relation to human nature: since "natural goods remain in them unimpaired" as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv).

Reply to Objection 3: The good angels are not the cause of the principal reward in the elect, because all receive this immediately from God. Nevertheless the angels are the cause of certain accidental rewards in men, in so far as the higher angels enlighten those beneath them, both angels and men, concerning certain hidden things of God, which do not belong to the essence of beatitude. In like manner the damned will receive their principal punishment immediately from God, namely the everlasting banishment from the Divine vision: but there is no reason why the demons should not torture men with other sensible punishments. There is, however, this difference: that merit exalts, whereas sin debases. Wherefore since the angelic nature is higher than the human, some on account of the excellence of their merit will be so far exalted as to be raised above the angels both in nature and rewards [FP, Question 108, Article 8], so that some angels will be enlightened by some men. On the other hand, no human sinners will, on account of a certain degree of virtue, attain to the eminence that attaches to the nature of the demons.

ARTICLE 5. Whether all men will be present at the judgment?

Objection 1: It would seem that men will not all be present at the judgment. For it is written (Mt. 19:28): "You . . . shall sit on twelve seats, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." But all men do not belong to those twelve tribes. Therefore it would seem that men will not all be present at the judgment.

Objection 2: Further, the same apparently is to be gathered from Ps. 1:5, "The wicked shall not rise again in judgment."

Objection 3: Further, a man is brought to judgment that his merits may be discussed. But some there are who have acquired no merits, such as children who died before reaching the perfect age. Therefore they need not be present at the judgment. Now there are many such. Therefore it would seem that not all will be present.

On the contrary, It is written (Acts 10:42) that Christ "was appointed by God to be judge of the living and of the dead." Now this division comprises all men, no matter how the living be distinct from the dead. Therefore all men will be present at the judgment.

Further, it is written (Apoc. 1:7): "Behold He cometh with the clouds, and every eye shall see Him." Now this would not be so unless all were present at the judgment. Therefore, etc.

I answer that, The judicial power was bestowed on Christ as man, in reward for the humility which He showed forth in His passion. Now in His passion He shed His blood for all in point of sufficiency, although through meeting with an obstacle in some, it had not its effect in all. Therefore it is fitting that all men should assemble at the judgment, to see His exaltation in His human nature, in respect of which "He was appointed by God to be judge of the living and of the dead."

Reply to Objection 1: As Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 5), "it does not follow from the saying, 'Judging the twelve tribes of Israel,' that the tribe of Levi, which is the thirteenth, is not to be judged, or that they will judge that people alone, and not other nations." The reason why all other nations are denoted by the twelve tribes is because they were called by Christ to take the place of the twelve tribes.

Reply to Objection 2: The words, "The wicked shall not rise in judgment," if referred to all sinners, mean that they will not arise to judge. But if the wicked denote unbelievers, the sense is that they will not arise to be judged, because they are "already judged" (Jn. 3:18). All, however, will rise again to assemble at the judgment and witness the glory of the Judge.

Reply to Objection 3: Even children who have died before reaching the perfect age will be present at the judgment, not to be judged, but to see the Judge's glory.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the good will be judged at the judgment?

Objection 1: It would seem that none of the good will be judged at the judgment. For it is declared (Jn. 3:18) that "he that believeth in Him is not judged." Now all the good believed in Him. Therefore they will not be judged.

Objection 2: Further, those who are uncertain of their bliss are not blessed: whence Augustine proves (Gen. ad lit. xi) that the demons were never blessed. But the saints are now blessed. Therefore they are certain of their bliss. Now what is certain is not submitted to judgment. Therefore the good will not be judged.

Objection 3: Further, fear is incompatible with bliss. But the last judgment, which above all is described as terrible, cannot take place without inspiring fear into those who are to be judged. Hence Gregory observes on Job 41:16 "When he shall raise him up, the angels shall fear," etc. (Moral. xxxiv): "Consider how the conscience of the wicked will then be troubled when even the just are disturbed about their life." Therefore the blessed will not be judged.

On the contrary, It would seem that all the good will be judged, since it is written (2 Cor. 5:10): "We must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he hath done, whether it be good or evil." Now there is nothing else to be judged. Therefore all, even the good, will be judged.

Further, the "general" includes all. Now this is called the general judgment. Therefore all will be judged.

I answer that, The judgment comprises two things, namely the discussion of merits and the payment of rewards. As regards the payment of rewards, all will be judged, even the good, since the Divine sentence will appoint to each one the reward corresponding to his merit. But there is no discussion of merits save where good and evil merits are mingled together. Now those who build on the foundation of faith, "gold, silver, and precious stones" (1 Cor. 3:12), by devoting themselves wholly to the Divine service, and who have no notable admixture of evil merit, are not subjected to a discussion of their merits. Such are those who have entirely renounced the things of the world and are solicitously thoughtful of the things that are of God: wherefore they will be saved but will not be judged. Others, however, build on the foundation of faith, wood, hay, stubble [FS, Question 89, Article 2]; they, in fact, love worldly things and are busy about earthly concerns, yet so as to prefer nothing to Christ, but strive to redeem their sins with alms, and these have an admixture of good with evil merits. Hence they are subjected to a discussion of their merits, and consequently in this account will be judged, and yet they will be saved.

Reply to Objection 1: Since punishment is the effect of justice, while reward is the effect of mercy, it follows that punishment is more especially ascribed antonomastically to judgment which is the act of justice; so that judgment is sometimes used to express condemnation. It is thus that we are to understand the words quoted, as a gloss on the passage remarks.

Reply to Objection 2: The merits of the elect will be discussed, not to remove the uncertainty of their beatitude from the hearts of those who are to be judged, but that it may be made manifest to us that their good merits outweigh their evil merits, and thus God's justice be proved.

Reply to Objection 3: Gregory is speaking of the just who will still be in mortal flesh, wherefore he had already said: "Those who will still be in the body, although already brave and perfect, yet through being still in the flesh must needs be troubled with fear in the midst of such a whirlwind of terror." Hence it is clear that this fear refers to the time immediately before the judgment, most terrible indeed to the wicked, but not to the good, who will have no apprehension of evil.

The arguments in the contrary sense consider judgment as regards the payment of rewards.

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 7. Whether the wicked will be judged?

Objection 1: It would seem that none of the wicked will be judged. For even as damnation is certain in the case of unbelievers, so is it in the case of those who die in mortal sin. Now it is declared because of the certainty of damnation (Jn. 3:18): "He that believeth not is already judged." Therefore in like manner neither will other sinners be judged.

Objection 2: Further, the voice of the Judge is most terrible to those who are condemned by His judgment. Now according to the text of Sentent. iv, D, 47 and in the words of Gregory (Moral. xxvi) "the Judge will not address Himself to unbelievers." If therefore He were to address Himself to the believers about to be condemned, the unbelievers would reap a benefit from their unbelief, which is absurd.

On the contrary, It would seem that all the wicked are to be judged, because all the wicked will be sentenced to punishment according to the degree of their guilt. But this cannot be done without a judicial pronouncement. Therefore all the wicked will be judged.

I answer that, The judgment as regards the sentencing to punishment for sin concerns all the wicked. whereas the judgment as regards the discussion of merits concerns only believers. Because in unbelievers the foundation of faith is lacking, without which all subsequent works are deprived of the perfection of a right intention, so that in them there is no admixture of good and evil works or merits requiring discussion. But believers in whom the foundation of faith remains, have at least a praiseworthy act of faith, which though it is not meritorious without charity, yet is in itself directed to merit, and consequently they will be subjected to the discussion of merits. Consequently, believers who were at least counted as citizens of the City of God will be judged as citizens, and sentence of death will not be passed on them without a discussion of their merits; whereas unbelievers will be condemned as foes, who are wont among men to be exterminated without their merits being discussed.

Reply to Objection 1: Although it is certain that those who die in mortal sin will be damned, nevertheless since they have an admixture of certain things connected with meriting well, it behooves, for the manifestation of Divine justice, that their merits be subjected to discussion, in order to make it clear that they are justly banished from the city of the saints, of which they appeared outwardly to be citizens.

Reply to Objection 2: Considered under this special aspect the words addressed to the believers about to be condemned will not be terrible, because they will reveal in them certain things pleasing to them, which it will be impossible to find in unbelievers, since "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6). But the sentence of condemnation which will be passed on them all will be terrible to all of them.

The argument in the contrary sense considered the judgment of retribution.

ARTICLE 8. Whether at the coming judgment the angels will be judged?

Objection 1: It would seem that the angels will be judged at the coming judgment. For it is written (1 Cor. 6:3): "Know you not that we shall judge angels?" But this cannot refer to the state of the present time. Therefore it should refer to the judgment to come.

Objection 2: Further, it is written concerning Behemoth or Leviathan, whereby the devil is signified (Job 40:28): "In the sight of all he shall be cast down"; and (Mk. 1:24) the demon cried out to Christ: "Why art Thou come to destroy us before the time?" for, according to a gloss, "the demons seeing our Lord on earth thought they were to be judged forthwith." Therefore it would seem that a final judgment is in store for them.

Objection 3: Further, it is written (2 Pt. 2:4): "God spared not the angels that sinned, but delivered them drawn down by infernal ropes to the lower hell, unto torments, to be reserved unto judgment." Therefore it seems that the angels will be judged.

On the contrary, It is written (Nahum 1:9) according to the Septuagint version: "God will not judge the same thing a second time." But the wicked angels are already judged, wherefore it is written (Jn. 16:11): "The prince of this world is already judged." Therefore the angels will not be judged in the time to come.

Further, goodness and wickedness are more perfect in the angels than in men who are wayfarers. Now some men, good and wicked, will not be judged as stated in the text of Sentent. iv, D, 47. Therefore neither will good or wicked angels be judged.

I answer that, The judgment of discussion nowise concerns either the good or the wicked angels, since neither is any evil to be found in the good angels, nor is any good liable to judgment to be found in the wicked angels. But if we speak of the judgment of retribution, we must distinguish a twofold retribution. One corresponds to the angels' personal merits and was made to both from the beginning when some were raised to bliss, and others plunged into the depths of woe. The other corresponds to the merits, good or evil, procured through the angels, and this retribution will be made in the judgment to come, because the good angels will have an increased joy in the salvation of those whom they have prompted to deeds of merit, while the wicked will have an increase of torment through the manifold downfall of those whom they have incited to evil deeds.

Consequently the judgment will not regard the angels directly, neither as judging nor as judged, but only men; but it will regard the angels indirectly somewhat, in so far as they were concerned in men's deeds.

Reply to Objection 1: This saying of the Apostle refers to the judgment of comparison, because certain men will be found to be placed higher than the angels.

Reply to Objection 2: The demons will then be cast down in the sight of all because they will be imprisoned for ever in the dungeon of hell, so that they will no more be free to go out, since this was permitted to them only in so far as they were directed by Divine providence to try the life of man.

The same answer applies to the Third Objection.

OF THE FORM OF THE JUDGE IN COMING TO THE JUDGMENT

Prologue

We must now consider the form of the Judge in coming to the judgment. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether Christ will judge under the form or His humanity?
- (2) Whether He will appear under the form of His glorified humanity?
- (3) Whether His Godhead can be seen without joy?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether Christ will judge under the form of His humanity?

Objection 1: It would seem that Christ will not judge under the form of His humanity. For judgment requires authority in the judge. Now Christ has authority over the quick and the dead as God, for thus is He the Lord and Creator of all. Therefore He will judge under the form of His Godhead.

Objection 2: Further, invincible power is requisite in a judge; wherefore it is written (Eccles. 7:6): "Seek not to be made a judge, unless thou have strength enough to extirpate iniquities." Now invincible power belongs to Christ as God. Therefore He will judge under the form of the Godhead.

Objection 3: Further, it is written (Jn. 5:22,23): "The Father . . . hath given all judgment to the Son, that all men may honor the Son as they honor the Father." Now equal honor to that of the Father is not due to the Son in respect of His human nature. Therefore He will not judge under His human form.

Objection 4: Further, it is written (Dan. 7:9): "I beheld till thrones were placed and the Ancient of days sat." Now the thrones signify judicial power, and God is called the Ancient by reason of His eternity, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. x). Therefore it becomes the Son to judge as being eternal; and consequently not as man.

Objection 5: Further, Augustine says (Tract. xix in Joan.) that "the resurrection of the soul is the work of the Word the Son of God, and the resurrection of the body is the work of the Word made the Son of man in the flesh." Now that last judgment regards the soul rather than the body. Therefore it becomes Christ to judge as God rather than as man.

On the contrary, It is written (Jn. 5:27): "He hath given Him power to do judgment, because He is the Son of man."

Further, it is written (Job 36:17): "Thy cause hath been judged as that of the wicked---by Pilate" according to a gloss---therefore, "cause and judgment thou shalt recover---that thou mayest judge justly," according to the gloss. Now Christ was judged by Pilate with regard to His human nature. Therefore He will judge under the human nature.

Further, to Him it belongs to judge who made the law. Now Christ gave us the law of the Gospel while appearing in the human nature. Therefore He will judge under that same nature.

I answer that, Judgment requires a certain authority in the judge. Wherefore it is written (Rm. 14:4): "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" Hence it is becoming that Christ should judge in respect of His having authority over men to whom chiefly the last judgment will be directed. Now He is our Lord, not only by reason of the Creation, since "the Lord He is God, He made us and not we ourselves" (Ps. 99:3), but also by reason of the Redemption, which pertains to Him in respect of His human nature. Wherefore "to this end Christ died and rose again, that He might be Lord both of the dead and of the living" (Rm. 14:9). But the goods of the Creation would not suffice us to obtain the reward of eternal life, without the addition of the boon of the Redemption, on account of the obstacle accruing to created nature through the sin of our first parent. Hence, since the last judgment is directed to the admission of some to the kingdom, and the exclusion of others therefrom, it is becoming that Christ should preside at that judgment under the form of His human nature, since it is by favor of that same nature's Redemption that man is admitted to the kingdom. In this sense it is stated (Acts 10:42) that "He . . . was appointed by God to be Judge of the living and of the dead." And forasmuch as by redeeming mankind He restored not only man but all creatures without exception---inasmuch as all creatures are bettered through man's restoration, according to Col. 1:20, "Making peace through the blood of His cross, both as to things on earth, and the things that are in heaven"---it follows that through His Passion Christ merited lordship and judicial power not over man alone, but over all creatures, according to Mt. 28:18, "All power is given to Me, in heaven and in earth" [TP, Question 59].

Reply to Objection 1: Christ, in respect of His Divine nature, has authority of lordship over all creatures by right of creation; but in respect of His human nature He has authority of lordship merited through His Passion. The latter is secondary so to speak and acquired, while the former is natural and eternal.

Reply to Objection 2: Although Christ as man has not of Himself invincible power resulting from the natural power of the human species, nevertheless there is also in His human nature an invincible power derived from His Godhead, whereby all things are subjected under His feet (1 Cor. 15:25-28; Heb. 2:8,9). Hence He will judge in His human nature indeed, but by the power of His Godhead.

Reply to Objection 3: Christ would not have sufficed for the redemption of mankind, had He been a mere man. Wherefore from the very fact that He was able as man to redeem mankind, and thereby obtained judicial power, it is evident that He is God, and consequently is to be honored equally with the Father, not as man but as God.

Reply to Objection 4: In that vision of Daniel the whole order of the judicial power is clearly expressed. This power is in God Himself as its first origin, and more especially in the Father Who is the fount of the entire Godhead; wherefore it is stated in the first place that the "Ancient of days sat." But the judicial power was transmitted from the Father to the Son, not only from eternity in respect of the Divine nature, but also in time in respect of the human nature wherein He merited it. Hence in the aforesaid vision it is further stated (Dan. 7:13,14): "Lo, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and He came even to the Ancient of days . . . And He gave Him power and glory, and a kingdom."

Reply to Objection 5: Augustine is speaking by a kind of appropriation, so as to trace the effects which Christ wrought in the human nature to causes somewhat similar to them. And since we are made to the image and likeness of God in respect of our soul, and are of the same species as the man Christ in respect of our body, he ascribes to the Godhead the effects wrought by Christ in our souls, and those which He wrought or will work in our bodies he ascribes to His flesh; although His flesh, as being the instrument of His Godhead, has also its effect on our souls as Damascene asserts (De Fide Orth. iii, 15), according to the saying of Heb. 9:14, that His "blood" hath cleansed "our conscience from dead works." And thus that "the Word was made flesh" is the cause of the resurrection of souls; wherefore also according to His human nature He is becomingly the Judge not only of bodily but also of spiritual goods [TP, Question 56, Article 2, ad 1].

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether at the judgment Christ will appear in His glorified humanity?

Objection 1: It would seem that at the judgment Christ will not appear in His glorified humanity. For a gloss [St. Augustine, Tract. cxx in Joan.] on Jn. 19:37, "They shall look on him whom they pierced," says: "Because He will come in the flesh wherein He was crucified." Now He was crucified in the form of weakness. Therefore He will appear in the form of weakness and not in the form of glory.

Objection 2: Further, it is stated (Mt. 24:30) that "the sign of the Son of man shall appear in heaven," namely, "the sign of the cross," as Chrysostom says (Hom. lxxvii in Matth.), for "Christ when coming to the judgment will show not only the scars of His wounds but even His most shameful death." Therefore it seems that He will not appear in the form of glory.

Objection 3: Further, Christ will appear at the judgment under that form which can be gazed upon by all. Now Christ will not be visible to all, good and wicked, under the form of His glorified humanity: because the eye that is not glorified is seemingly unproportionate to see the clarity of a glorified body. Therefore He will not appear under a glorified form.

Objection 4: Further, that which is promised as a reward to the righteous is not granted to the unrighteous. Now it is promised as a reward to the righteous that they shall see the glory of His humanity (Jn. 10:9): "He shall go in, and go out, and shall find pastures, i.e. refreshment in His Godhead and humanity," according to the commentary of Augustine and Is. 33:17: "His eyes shall see the King in his beauty." Therefore He will not appear to all in His glorified form.

Objection 5: Further, Christ will judge in the form wherein He was judged: wherefore a gloss [St. Augustine, Tract. xix, in Joan.] on Jn. 5:21, "So the Son also giveth life to whom He will," says: "He will judge justly in the form wherein He was judged unjustly, that He may be visible to the wicked." Now He was judged in the form of weakness. Therefore He will appear in the same form at the judgment.

On the contrary, It is written (Lk. 21:27): "Then they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud with great power and majesty." Now majesty and power pertain to glory. Therefore He will appear in the form of glory.

Further, he who judges should be more conspicuous than those who are judged. Now the elect who will be judged by Christ will have a glorified body. Much more therefore will the Judge appear in a glorified form.

Further, as to be judged pertains to weakness, so to judge pertains to authority and glory. Now at His first coming when Christ came to be judged, He appeared in the form of weakness. Therefore at the second coming, when He will come to judge, He will appear in the form of glory.

I answer that, Christ is called the mediator of God and men (1 Tim. 2:5) inasmuch as He satisfies for men and intercedes for them to the Father, and confers on men things which belong to the Father, according to Jn. 17:22, "The glory which Thou hast given Me, I have given to them." Accordingly then both these things belong to Him in that He communicates with both extremes: for in that He communicates with men, He takes their part with the Father, and in that He communicates with the Father, He bestows the Father's gifts on men. Since then at His first coming He came in order to make satisfaction for us to the Father, He came in the form of our weakness. But since at His second coming He will come in order to execute the Father's justice on men, He will have to show forth His glory which is in Him by reason of His communication with the Father: and therefore He will appear in the form of glory.

Reply to Objection 1: He will appear in the same flesh, but not under the same form.

Reply to Objection 2: The sign of the cross will appear at the judgment, to denote not a present but a past weakness: so as to show how justly those were condemned who scorned so great mercy, especially those who persecuted Christ unjustly. The scars which will appear in His body will not be due to weakness, but will indicate the exceeding power whereby Christ overcame His enemies by His Passion and infirmity. He will also show forth His most shameful death, not by bringing it sensibly before the eye, as though

He suffered it there; but by the things which will appear then, namely the signs of His past Passion, He will recall men to the thought of His past death.

Reply to Objection 3: A glorified body has it in its power to show itself or not to show itself to an eye that is not glorified, as stated above (Question 85, Article 2, ad 3). Hence Christ will be visible to all in His glorified form.

Reply to Objection 4: Even as our friend's glory gives us pleasure, so the glory and power of one we hate is most displeasing to us. Hence as the sight of the glory of Christ's humanity will be a reward to the righteous, so will it be a torment to Christ's enemies: wherefore it is written (Is. 26:11): "Let the envious people see and be confounded and let fire" (i.e. envy) "devour Thy enemies."

Reply to Objection 5: Form is taken there for human nature wherein He was judged and likewise will judge; but not for a quality of nature, namely of weakness, which will not be the same in Him when judging as when judged (Cf. ad 2).

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the Godhead can be seen by the wicked without joy?

Objection 1: It would seem that the Godhead can be seen by the wicked without joy. For there can be no doubt that the wicked will know with the greatest certainty that Christ is God. Therefore they will see His Godhead, and yet they will not rejoice in seeing Christ. Therefore it will be possible to see it without joy.

Objection 2: Further, the perverse will of the wicked is not more adverse to Christ's humanity than to His Godhead. Now the fact that they will see the glory of His humanity will conduce to their punishment, as stated above (Article 2, ad 4). Therefore if they were to see His Godhead, there would be much more reason for them to grieve rather than rejoice.

Objection 3: Further, the course of the affections is not a necessary sequel to that which is in the intellect: wherefore Augustine says (In Ps. 118: conc. 8): "The intellect precedes, the affections follow slowly or not at all." Now vision regards the intellect, whereas joy regards the affections. Therefore it will be possible to see the Godhead without joy.

Objection 4: Further, whatever is received into "a thing is received according to the mode of the receiver and not of the received." But whatever is seen is, in a way, received into the seer. Therefore although the Godhead is in itself supremely enjoyable, nevertheless when seen by those who are plunged in grief, it will give no joy but rather displeasure.

Objection 5: Further, as sense is to the sensible object, so is the intellect to the intelligible object. Now in the senses, "to the unhealthy palate bread is painful, to the healthy palate sweet," as Augustine says (Confess. vii), and the same happens with the other senses. Therefore since the damned have the intellect indisposed, it would seem that the vision of the uncreated light will give them pain rather than joy.

On the contrary, It is written (Jn. 17:3): "This is eternal life: That they may know Thee, the . . . true God." Wherefore it is clear that the essence of bliss consists in seeing God. Now joy is essential to bliss. Therefore the Godhead cannot be seen without joy.

Further, the essence of the Godhead is the essence of truth. Now it is delightful to every one to see the truth, wherefore "all naturally desire to know," as stated at the beginning of the Metaphysics. Therefore it is impossible to see the Godhead without joy.

Further, if a certain vision is not always delightful, it happens sometimes to be painful. But intellective vision is never painful since "the pleasure we take in objects of understanding has no grief opposed to it," according to the Philosopher (Topic. ii). Since then the Godhead cannot be seen save by the intellect, it seems that the Godhead cannot be seen without joy.

I answer that, In every object of appetite or of pleasure two things may be considered, namely the thing which is desired or which gives pleasure, and the aspect of appetibility or pleasurable in that thing. Now according to Boethius (De Hebdom.) that which is can have something besides what it is, but 'being' itself has no admixture of aught else beside itself. Hence that which is desirable or pleasant can have an admixture of something rendering it undesirable or unpleasant; but the very aspect of pleasurable has not and cannot have anything mixed with it rendering it unpleasant or undesirable. Now it is possible for things that are pleasurable, by participation of goodness which is the aspect of appetibility or pleasurable, not to give pleasure when they are apprehended, but it is impossible for that which is good by its essence not to give pleasure when it is apprehended. Therefore since God is essentially His own goodness, it is impossible for the Godhead to be seen without joy.

Reply to Objection 1: The wicked will know most clearly that Christ is God, not through seeing His Godhead, but on account of the most manifest signs of His Godhead.

Reply to Objection 2: No one can hate the Godhead considered in itself, as neither can one hate goodness itself. But God is said to be hated by certain persons in respect of some of the effects of the Godhead, in so far as He does or commands something contrary to their will [SS, Question 34, Article 1]. Therefore the vision of the Godhead can be painful to no one.

Reply to Objection 3: The saying of Augustine applies when the thing apprehended previously by the intellect is good by participation and not essentially, such as all creatures are; wherefore there may be something in them by reason of which the affections are not moved. In like manner God is known by wayfarers through His effects, and their intellect does not attain to the very essence of His goodness. Hence it is not necessary that the affections follow the intellect, as they would if the intellect saw God's essence which is His goodness.

Reply to Objection 4: Grief denotes not a disposition but a passion. Now every passion is removed if a stronger contrary cause supervene, and does not remove that cause. Accordingly the grief of the damned would be done away if they saw God in His essence.

Reply to Objection 5: The indisposition of an organ removes the natural proportion of the organ to the object that has a natural aptitude to please, wherefore the pleasure is hindered. But the indisposition which is in the damned does not remove the natural proportion whereby they are directed to the Divine goodness, since its image ever remains in them. Hence the comparison fails.

OF THE QUALITY OF THE WORLD AFTER THE JUDGMENT

Prologue

We must next discuss the quality which the world and those who rise again will have after the judgment. Here a threefold matter offers itself to our consideration: (1) The state and quality of the world; (2) The state of the blessed; (3) The state of the wicked.

Under the first head there are five points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether there will be a renewal of the world?
- (2) Whether the movement of the heavenly bodies will cease?
- (3) Whether the heavenly bodies will be more brilliant?
- (4) Whether the elements will receive an additional clarity?
- (5) Whether the animals and plants will remain?

ARTICLE 1. Whether the world will be renewed?

Objection 1: It would seem that the world will never be renewed. For nothing will be but what was at some time as to its species: "What is it that hath been? the same thing that shall be" (Eccles. 1:9). Now the world never had any disposition other than it has now as to essential parts, both genera and species. Therefore it will never be renewed.

Objection 2: Further, renewal is a kind of alteration. But it is impossible for the universe to be altered; because whatever is altered argues some alterant that is not altered, which nevertheless is a subject of local movement: and it is impossible to place such a thing outside the universe. Therefore it is impossible for the world to be renewed.

Objection 3: Further, it is stated (Gn. 2:2) that "God . . . rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had done," and holy men explain that "He rested from forming new creatures." Now when things were first established, the mode imposed upon them was the same as they have now in the natural order. Therefore they will never have any other.

Objection 4: Further, the disposition which things have now is natural to them. Therefore if they be altered to another disposition, this disposition will be unnatural to them. Now whatever is unnatural and accidental cannot last for ever (De Coelo et Mundo i). Therefore this disposition acquired by being renewed will be taken away from them; and thus there will be a cycle of changes in the world as Empedocles and Origen (Peri Archon. ii, 3) maintained, and after this world there will be another, and after that again another.

Objection 5: Further, newness of glory is given to the rational creature as a reward. Now where there is no merit, there can be no reward. Since then insensible creatures have merited nothing, it would seem that they will not be renewed.

On the contrary, It is written (Is. 65:17): "Behold I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former things shall not be in remembrance"; and (Apoc. 21:1): "I saw a new heaven and a new earth. For the first heaven and the first earth was gone."

Further, the dwelling should befit the dweller. But the world was made to be man's dwelling. Therefore it should befit man. Now man will be renewed. Therefore the world will be likewise.

Further, "Every beast loveth its like" (Ecclus. 13:19), wherefore it is evident that likeness is the reason of love. Now man has some likeness to the universe, wherefore he is called "a little world." Hence man loves the whole world naturally and consequently desires its good. Therefore, that man's desire be satisfied the universe must needs also be made better.

I answer that, We believe all corporeal things to have been made for man's sake, wherefore all things are stated to be subject to him [Ps. 8:5, seqq.]. Now they serve man in two ways, first, as sustenance to his bodily life, secondly, as helping him to know God, inasmuch as man sees the invisible things of God by the things that are made (Rm. 1:20). Accordingly glorified man will nowise need creatures to render him the first of these services, since his body will be altogether incorruptible, the Divine power effecting this through the soul which it will glorify immediately. Again man will not need the second service as to intellective knowledge, since by that knowledge he will see God immediately in His essence. The carnal eye, however, will be unable to attain to this vision of the Essence; wherefore that it may be fittingly comforted in the vision of God, it will see the Godhead in Its corporeal effects, wherein manifest proofs of the Divine majesty will appear, especially in Christ's flesh, and secondarily in the bodies of the blessed, and afterwards in all other bodies. Hence those bodies also will need to receive a greater inflow from the Divine goodness than now, not indeed so as to change their species, but so as to add a certain perfection of glory: and such will be the renewal of the world. Wherefore at the one same time, the world will be renewed, and man will be glorified.

Reply to Objection 1: Solomon is speaking there of the natural course: this is evident from his adding: "Nothing under the sun is new." For since the movement of the sun follows a circle, those things which are subject to the sun's power must needs have some kind of circular movement. This consists in the fact that things which were before return the same in species but different in the individual (De Generat. i). But things belonging to the state of glory are not "under the sun."

Reply to Objection 2: This argument considers natural alteration which proceeds from a natural agent, which acts from natural necessity. For such an agent cannot produce different dispositions, unless it be itself disposed differently. But things done by God proceed from freedom of will, wherefore it is possible, without any change in God Who wills it, for the universe to have at one time one disposition, and another at another time. Thus this renewal will not be reduced to a cause that is moved, but to an immovable principle, namely God.

Reply to Objection 3: God is stated to have ceased on the seventh day forming new creatures, for as much as nothing was made afterwards that was not previously in some likeness [FP, Question 73, Article 1] either generically, or specifically, or at least as in a seminal principle, or even as in an obediential potentiality [FP, Question 115, Article 2, ad 4; TP, Question 11, Article 1]. I say then that the future renewal of the world preceded in the works of the six days by way of a remote likeness, namely in the glory and grace of the angels. Moreover it preceded in the obediential potentiality which was then bestowed on the creature to the effect of its receiving this same renewal by the Divine agency.

Reply to Objection 4: This disposition of newness will be neither natural nor contrary to nature, but above nature (just as grace and glory are above the nature of the soul): and it will proceed from an everlasting agent which will preserve it for ever.

Reply to Objection 5: Although, properly speaking, insensible bodies will not have merited this glory, yet man merited that this glory should be bestowed on the whole universe, in so far as this conduces to man's increase of glory. Thus a man merits to be clothed in more splendid robes, which splendor the robes nowise merited themselves.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the movement of the heavenly bodies will cease?

Objection 1: It seems that when the world is thus renewed the movement of the heavenly bodies will not cease. For it is written (Gn. 8:22): "All the days of the earth . . . cold and heat, summer and winter, night and day shall not cease." Now night and day, summer and winter result from the movement of the sun. Therefore the movement of the sun will never cease.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Jer. 31:35,36): "Thus saith the Lord Who giveth the sun for the light of the day, the order of the moon and of the stars for the light of the night: Who stirreth up the sea, and the waves thereof roar . . . If these ordinances shall fail before Me . . . then also the seed of Israel shall fail, so as not to be a nation before Me for ever." Now the seed of Israel shall never fail, but will remain for ever. Therefore the laws of day and of the sea waves, which result from the heavenly movement, will remain for ever. Therefore the movement of the heaven will never cease.

Objection 3: Further, the substance of the heavenly bodies will remain for ever. Now it is useless to admit the existence of a thing unless you admit the purpose for which it was made: and the heavenly bodies were made in order "to divide the day and the night"; and to be "for signs, and for seasons, and for days and for years" (Gn. 1:14). But they cannot do this except by movement. Therefore their movement will remain for ever, else those bodies would remain without a purpose.

Objection 4: Further, in this renewal of the world the whole world will be bettered. Therefore no body will be deprived of what pertains to its perfection. Now movement belongs to the perfection of a heavenly body, because, as stated in De Coelo et Mundo ii, "those bodies participate of the Divine goodness by their movement." Therefore the movement of the heaven will not cease.

Objection 5: Further, the sun successively gives light to the various parts of the world, by reason of its circular movement. Therefore if the circular movement of the heaven ceases, it follows that in some part of the earth's surface there will be perpetual darkness, which is unbecoming to the aforesaid renewal.

Objection 6: Further, if the movement were to cease, this could only be because movement causes some imperfection in the heaven, for instance wear and tear, which is impossible, since this movement is natural, and the heavenly bodies are impassible, wherefore they are not worn out by movement (De Coelo et Mundo ii). Therefore the movement of the heaven will never cease.

Objection 7: Further, a potentiality is useless if it be not reduced to act. Now in whatever position the heavenly body is placed it is in potentiality to another position. Therefore unless this potentiality be reduced to act, it would remain useless, and would always be imperfect. But it cannot be reduced to act save by local movement. Therefore it will always be in motion.

Objection 8: Further, if a thing is indifferent in relation to more than one alternation, either both are ascribed to it, or neither. Now the sun is indifferent to being in the east or in the west, else its movement would not be uniform throughout, since it would move more rapidly to the place which is more natural to it. Therefore either neither position is ascribed to the sun, or both. But neither both nor neither can be ascribed to it, except successively by movement; for if it stand still, it must needs stand in some position. Therefore the solar body will always be in motion, and in like manner all other heavenly bodies.

Objection 9: Further, the movement of the heaven is the cause of time. Therefore if the movement of the heaven fail, time must needs fail: and if this were to fail, it would fail in an instant. Now an instant is defined (Phys. viii) "the beginning of the future and the end of the past." Consequently there would be time after the last instant of time, which is impossible. Therefore the movement of the heavens will never cease.

Objection 10: Further, glory does not remove nature. But the movement of the heaven is natural. Therefore it is not deprived thereof by glory.

On the contrary, It is stated (Apoc. 10:6) that the angel who appeared, "swore by him that liveth for ever and ever . . . that time shall be no longer," namely after the seventh angel shall have sounded the trumpet, at the sound of which "the dead shall rise again" (1 Cor. 15:52). Now if time be not, there is no movement of the heaven. Therefore the movement of the heaven will cease.

Further: "Thy sun shall go down no more, and thy moon shall not decrease" (Is. 60:20). Now the setting of the sun and the phases of the moon are caused by the movement of the heavens. Therefore the heavenly movement will cease at length.

Further, it is shown in De Gener. ii that "the movement of the heaven is for the sake of continual generation in this lower world." But generation will cease when the number of the elect is complete. Therefore the movement of the heaven will cease.

Further, all movement is for some end (Metaph. ii). But all movement for an end ceases when the end is obtained. Therefore either the movement of the heaven will never obtain its end, and thus it would be useless, or it will cease at length.

Further, rest is more noble than movement, because things are more likened to God, Who is supremely immovable, by being themselves unmoved. Now the movement of lower bodies terminates naturally in rest. Therefore since the heavenly bodies are far nobler, their movement terminates naturally in rest.

I answer that, There are three opinions touching this question. The first is of the philosophers who assert that the movement of the heaven will last for ever. But this is not in keeping with our faith, which holds that the elect are in a certain number preordained by God, so that the begetting of men will not last for ever, and for the same reason, neither will other things that are directed to the begetting of men, such as the movement of the heaven and the variations of the elements. Others say that the movement of the heaven will cease naturally. But this again is false, since every body that is moved naturally has a place wherein it rests naturally, whereto it is moved naturally, and whence it is not moved except by violence. Now no such place can be assigned to the heavenly body, since it is not more natural to the sun to move towards a point in the east than to move away from it, wherefore either its movement would not be altogether natural, or its movement would not naturally terminate in rest. Hence we must agree with others who say that the movement of the heaven will cease at this renewal of the world, not indeed by any natural cause, but as a result of the will of God. For the body in question, like other bodies, was made to serve man in the two ways above mentioned (Article 1): and hereafter in the state of glory man will no longer need one of these services, that namely in respect of which the heavenly bodies serve man for the sustenance of his bodily life. Now in this way the heavenly bodies serve man by their movement, in so far as by the heavenly movement the human race is multiplied, plants and animals needful for man's use generated, and the temperature of the atmosphere rendered conducive to health. Therefore the movement of the heavenly body will cease as soon as man is glorified.

Reply to Objection 1: These words refer to the earth in its present state, when it is able to be the principle of the generation and corruption of plants. This is evident from its being said there: "All the days of the earth, seed time and harvest," etc. And it is simply to be granted that as long as the earth is fit for seed time and harvest, the movement of the heaven will not cease.

We reply in like manner to OBJ 2 that the Lord is speaking there of the duration of the seed of Israel with regard to the present state. This is evident from the words: "Then also the seed of Israel shall fail, so as not to be a nation before Me for ever." For after this state there will be no succession of days: wherefore the laws also which He had mentioned will cease after this state.

Reply to Objection 3: The end which is there assigned to the heavenly bodies is their proximate end, because it is their proper act. But this act is directed further to another end, namely the service of man, which is shown by the words of Dt. 4:19: "Lest perhaps lifting up thy eyes to heaven, thou see the sun and the moon and all the stars of heaven, and being deceived by error thou adore and serve them, which the Lord thy God created for the service of all the nations, that are under heaven." Therefore we should form our judgment of the heavenly bodies from the service of man, rather than from the end assigned to them in Genesis. Moreover the heavenly bodies, as stated above, will serve glorified man in another way; hence it does not follow that they will remain without a purpose.

Reply to Objection 4: Movement does not belong to the perfection of a heavenly body, except in so far as thereby it is the cause of generation and corruption in this lower world: and in that respect also this movement makes the heavenly body participate in the Divine goodness by way of a certain likeness of causality. But movement does not belong to the perfection of the substance of the heaven, which substance will remain. Wherefore it does not follow that, when this movement ceases, the substance of the heaven will lose something of its perfection.

Reply to Objection 5: All the elemental bodies will have in themselves a certain clarity of glory. Hence though part of the surface of the earth be not lit up by the sun, there will by no means be any darkness there.

Reply to Objection 6: A gloss of Ambrose on Rm. 8:22, "Every creature groaneth," etc. says explicitly that "all the elements labor to fulfill their offices: thus the sun and moon fill the places appointed to them not without work: this is for our sake, wherefore they will rest when we are taken up to heaven." This work, in my opinion, does not signify that any stress or passion occurs to these bodies from their movement, since this movement is natural to them and nowise violent, as is proved in De Coelo et Mundo i. But work here denotes a defect in relation to the term to which a thing tends. Hence since this movement is ordained by Divine providence to the completion of the number of the elect, it follows that as long as the latter is incomplete, this movement has not reached the term whereto it was ordained: hence it is said metaphorically to labor, as a man who has not what he intends to have. This defect will be removed from the heaven when the number of the elect is complete. Or it may refer to the desire of the future renewal which it awaits from the Divine disposal.

Reply to Objection 7: In a heavenly body there is no potentiality that can be perfected by place, or that is made for this end which is to be in such and such a place. But potentiality to situation in a place is related to a heavenly body, as the craftsman's potentiality to construct various houses of one kind: for if he construct one of these he is not said to have the potentiality uselessly, and in like manner in whatever situation a heavenly body be placed, its potentiality to be in a place will not remain incomplete or without a purpose.

Reply to Objection 8: Although a heavenly body, so far as regards its nature, is equally inclined to every situation that it can possibly occupy, nevertheless in comparison with things outside it, it is not equally inclined to every situation: but in respect of one situation it has a more noble disposition in comparison with certain things than in respect of another situation; thus in our regard the sun has a more noble disposition at daytime than at night-time. Hence it is probable, since the entire renewal of the world is directed to man, that the heaven will have in this renewal the most noble situation possible in relation to our dwelling there. Or, according to some, the heaven will rest in that situation wherein it was made, else one of its revolutions would remain incomplete. But this argument seems improbable, for since a revolution of the heaven takes no less than 36,000 years to complete, it would follow that the world must last that length of time, which does not seem probable. Moreover according to this it would be possible to know when the world will come to an end. For we may conclude with probability from astronomers in what position the heavenly bodies were made, by taking into consideration the number of years that have elapsed since the beginning of the world: and in the same way it would be possible to know the exact number of years it would take them to return to a like position: whereas the time of the world's end is stated to be unknown.

Reply to Objection 9: Time will at length cease, when the heavenly movement ceases. Yet that last "now" will not be the beginning of the future. For the definition quoted applies to the "now" only as continuous with the parts of time, not as terminating the whole of time.

Reply to Objection 1:: The movement of the heaven is said to be natural, not as though it were part of nature in the same way as we speak of natural principles; but because it has its principle in the nature of a body, not indeed its active but its receptive principle. Its active principle is a spiritual substance, as the Commentator says on De Coelo et Mundo; and consequently it is not unreasonable for this movement to be done away by the renewal of glory, since the nature of the heavenly body will not alter through the cessation of that movement.

We grant the other objections which argue in the contrary sense, namely the first three, because they conclude in due manner. But since the remaining two seem to conclude that the movement of heaven will cease naturally, we must reply to them. To the first, then, we reply that movement ceases when its purpose is attained, provided this is a sequel to, and does not accompany the movement. Now the purpose of the heavenly movement, according to philosophers, accompanies that movement, namely the imitation of the Divine goodness in the causality of that movement with respect to this lower world. Hence it does not follow that this movement ceases naturally.

To the second we reply that although immobility is simply nobler than movement, yet movement in a subject which thereby can acquire a perfect participation of the Divine goodness is nobler than rest in a subject which is altogether unable to acquire that perfection by movement. For this reason the earth which is the lowest of the elements is without movement: although God Who is exalted above all things is without movement, by Whom the more noble bodies are moved. Hence also it is that the movements of the higher bodies might be held to be perpetual, so far as their natural power is concerned, and never to terminate in rest, although the movement of lower bodies terminates in rest.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the brightness of the heavenly bodies will be increased at this renewal?

Objection 1: It would seem that the brightness of the heavenly bodies will not be increased at this renewal. For this renewal as regards the lower bodies will be caused by the cleansing fire. But the cleansing fire will not reach the heavenly bodies. Therefore the heavenly bodies will not be renewed by receiving an increase of brightness.

Objection 2: Further, just as the heavenly bodies are the cause of generation in this lower world by their movement, so are they by their light. But, when generation ceases, movement will cease as stated above (Article 2). Therefore in like manner the light of the heavenly bodies will cease rather than increase.

Objection 3: Further, if the heavenly bodies will be renewed when man is renewed, it follows that when man deteriorated they deteriorated likewise. But this does not seem probable, since these bodies are unalterable as to their substance. Therefore neither will they be renewed when man is renewed.

Objection 4: Further, if they deteriorated then it follows that their deterioration was on a par with the amelioration which, it is said, will accrue to them at man's renewal. Now it is written (Is. 30:26) that "the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun." Therefore in the original state before sin the moon shone as much as the sun does now. Therefore whenever the moon was over the earth, it made it to be day as the sun does now: which is proved manifestly to be false from the statement of Gn. 1:16 that the moon was made "to rule the night." Therefore when man sinned the heavenly bodies were not deprived of their light; and so their light will not be increased, so it seems, when man is glorified.

Objection 5: Further, the brightness of the heavenly bodies, like other creatures, is directed to the use of man. Now, after the resurrection, the brightness of the sun will be of no use to man: for it is written (Is. 60:19): "Thou shalt no more have the sun for thy light by day, neither shall the brightness of the moon enlighten thee," and (Apoc. 21:23): "The city hath no need of the sun, nor of the moon to shine in it." Therefore their brightness will not be increased.

Objection 6: Further, it were not a wise craftsman who would make very great instruments for the making of a small work. Now man is a very small thing in comparison with the heavenly bodies, which by their huge bulk surpass the size of man almost beyond comparison: in fact the size of the whole earth in comparison with the heaven is as a point compared with a sphere, as astronomers say. Since then God is most wise it would seem that man is not the end of the creation of the heavens, and so it is unseemly that the heaven should deteriorate when he sinned, or that it should be bettered when he is glorified.

On the contrary, It is written (Is. 30:26): "The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold."

Further, the whole world will be renewed for the better. But the heaven is the more noble part of the corporeal world. Therefore it will be altered for the better. But this cannot be unless it shine out with greater brightness. Therefore its brightness will be bettered and will increase.

Further, "every creature that groaneth and travaileth in pain, awaiteth the revelation of the glory of the children of God" (Rm. 8:21,22). Now such are the heavenly bodies, as a gloss says on the same passage. Therefore they await the glory of the saints. But they would not await it unless they were to gain something by it. Therefore their brightness will increase thereby, since it is their chief beauty.

I answer that, The renewal of the world is directed to the end that, after this renewal has taken place, God may become visible to man by signs so manifest as to be perceived as it were by his senses. Now creatures lead to the knowledge of God chiefly by their comeliness and beauty, which show forth the wisdom of their Maker and Governor; wherefore it is written (Wis. 13:5): "By the greatness of the beauty and of the creature, the Creator of them may be seen, so as to be known thereby." And the beauty of the heavenly bodies consists chiefly in light; wherefore it is written (Ecclus. 43:10): "The glory of the stars is the beauty of heaven, the Lord enlighteneth the world on high." Hence the heavenly bodies will be bettered, especially as regards their brightness. But to what degree and in what way this betterment will take place is known to Him alone Who will bring it about.

Reply to Objection 1: The cleansing fire will not cause the form of the renewal, but will only dispose thereto, by cleansing from the vileness of sin and the impurity resulting from the mingling of bodies, and this is not to be found in the heavenly bodies. Hence although the heavenly bodies are not to be cleansed by fire, they are nevertheless to be Divinely renewed.

Reply to Objection 2: Movement does not denote perfection in the thing moved, considered in itself, since movement is the act of that which is imperfect: although it may pertain to the perfection of a body in so far as the latter is the cause of something. But light belongs to the perfection of a lightsome body, even considered in its substance: and consequently after the heavenly body has ceased to be the cause of generation, its brightness will remain, while its movement will cease.

Reply to Objection 3: A gloss on Is. 30:26, "The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun," says: "All things made for man's sake deteriorated at his fall, and sun and moon diminished in light." This diminishment is understood by some to mean a real lessening of light. Nor does it matter that the heavenly bodies are by nature unalterable, because this alteration was brought about by the Divine power. Others, however, with greater probability, take this diminishment to mean, not a real lessening of light, but a lessening in reference to man's use; because after sin man did not receive as much benefit from the light of the heavenly bodies as before. In the same sense we read (Gn. 3:17,18): "Cursed is the earth in thy work . . . Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee"; although it would have brought forth thorns and thistles before sin, but not as a punishment to man. Nor does it follow that, supposing the light of the heavenly bodies not to have been lessened essentially through man sinning, it will not really be increased at man's glorification, because man's sin wrought no change upon the state of the universe, since both before and after sin man had an animal life, which needs the movement and generation of a corporeal creature; whereas man's glorification will bring a change upon the state of all corporeal creatures, as stated above (Question 76, Article 7). Hence there is no comparison.

Reply to Objection 4: This diminution, according to the more probable opinion, refers not to the substance but to the effect. Hence it does not follow that the moon while over the earth would have made it to be day, but that man would have derived as much benefit from the light of the moon then as now from the light of the sun. After the resurrection, however, when the light of the moon will be increased in very truth, there will be night nowhere on earth but only in the center of the earth, where hell will be, because then, as stated, the moon will shine as brightly as the sun does now; the sun seven times as much as now, and the bodies of the blessed seven times more than the sun, although there be no authority or reason to prove this.

Reply to Objection 5: A thing may be useful to man in two ways. First, by reason of necessity, and thus no creature will be useful to man because he will have complete sufficiency from God. This is signified (Apoc. 21:23) by the words quoted, according to which that "city hath no need of the sun," nor "of the moon." Secondly, on account of a greater perfection, and thus man will make use of other creatures, yet not as needful to him in order to obtain his end, in which way he makes use of them now.

Reply to Objection 6: This is the argument of Rabbi Moses who endeavors to prove (Dux errantium iii) that the world was by no means made for man's use. Wherefore he maintains that what we read in the Old Testament about the renewal of the world, as instanced by the quotations from Isaias, is said metaphorically: and that even as the sun is said to be darkened in reference to a person when he encounters a great sorrow so as not to know what to do (which way of speaking is customary to Scripture), so on the other hand the sun is said to shine brighter for a person, and the whole world to be renewed, when he is brought from a state of sorrow to one of very great joy. But this is not in harmony with the authority and commentaries of holy men. Consequently we must answer this argument by saying that although the heavenly bodies far surpass the human body, yet the rational soul surpasses the heavenly bodies far more than these surpass the human body. Hence it is not unreasonable to say that the heavenly bodies were made for man's sake; not, however as though this were the principal end, since the principal end of all things is God.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the elements will be renewed by an addition of brightness?

Objection 1: It would seem that the elements will not be renewed by receiving some kind of brightness. For just as light is a quality proper to a heavenly body, so are hot and cold, wet and dry. qualities proper to the elements. Therefore as the heaven is renewed by an increase of brightness, so ought the elements to be renewed by an increase of active and passive qualities.

Objection 2: Further, rarity, and density are qualities of the elements, and the elements will not be deprived of them at this renewal. Now the rarity and density of the elements would seem to be an obstacle to brightness, since a bright body needs to be condensed, for which reason the rarity of the air seems incompatible with brightness, and in like manner the density of the earth which is an obstacle to transparency. Therefore it is impossible for the elements to be renewed by the addition of brightness.

Objection 3: Further, it is agreed that the damned will be in the earth. Yet they will be in darkness not only internal but also external. Therefore the earth will not be endowed with brightness in this renewal, nor for the same reason will the other elements.

Objection 4: Further, increase of brightness in the elements implies an increase of heat. If therefore at this renewal the brightness of the elements be greater than it is now, their heat will likewise be greater; and thus it would seem that they will be changed from their natural qualities, which are in them according to a fixed measure: and this is absurd.

Objection 5: Further, the good of the universe which consists in the order and harmony of the parts is more excellent than the good of any individual creature. But if one creature be bettered, the good of the universe is done away, since there will no longer be the same harmony. Therefore if the elemental bodies, which according to their natural degree in the universe should be devoid of brightness, were to be endowed with brightness, the perfection of the universe would be diminished thereby rather than increased.

On the contrary, It is written (Apoc. 21:1): "I saw a new heaven and a new earth." Now the heaven will be renewed by an increase of brightness. Therefore the earth and likewise the other elements will also.

Further, the lower bodies, like the higher, are for man's use. Now the corporeal creature will be rewarded for its services to man, as a gloss of Ambrose seems to say on Rm. 8:22, "Every creature groaneth," and a gloss of Jerome on Is. 30:26, "And the light of the moon shall be," etc. Therefore the elements will be glorified as well as the heavenly bodies.

Further, man's body is composed of the elements. Therefore the elemental particles that are in man's body will be glorified by the addition of brightness when man is glorified. Now it is fitting that whole and part should have the same disposition. Therefore it is fitting that the elements themselves should be endowed with brightness.

I answer that, Just as there is a certain order between the heavenly spirits and the earthly or human spirits, so is there an order between heavenly bodies and earthly bodies. Since then the corporeal creature was made for the sake of the spiritual and is ruled thereby, it follows that corporeal things are dealt with similarly to spiritual things. Now in this final consummation of things the lower spirits will receive the properties of the higher spirits, because men will be as the angels in heaven (Mt. 22:30): and this will be accomplished by conferring the highest degree of perfection on that in which the human spirit agrees with the angelic. Wherefore, in like manner, since the lower bodies do not agree with the heavenly bodies except in the nature of light and transparency (De Anima ii), it follows that the lower bodies are to be perfected chiefly as regards brightness. Hence all the elements will be clothed with a certain brightness, not equally, however, but according to their mode: for it is said that the earth on its outward surface will be as transparent as glass, water as crystal, the air as heaven, fire as the lights of heaven.

Reply to Objection 1: As stated above (Article 1), the renewal of the world is directed to the effect that man even by his senses may as it were see the Godhead by manifest signs. Now the most spiritual and subtle of our senses is the sight. Consequently all the lower bodies need to be bettered, chiefly as regards the visible qualities the principle of which is light. On the other hand, the elemental qualities regard the touch, which is the most material of the senses, and the excess of their contrariety is more displeasing than pleasant; whereas excess of light will be pleasant, since it has no contrariety, except on account of a weakness in the organ, such as will not be then.

Reply to Objection 2: The air will be bright, not as casting forth rays, but as an enlightened transparency; while the earth, although it is opaque through lack of light, yet by the Divine power its surface will be clothed with the glory of brightness, without prejudice to its density.

Reply to Objection 3: The earth will not be glorified with brightness in the infernal regions; but instead of this glory, that part of the earth will have the rational spirits of men and demons who though weak by reason of sin are nevertheless superior to any corporeal quality by the dignity of their nature. or we may say that, though the whole earth be glorified, the wicked will nevertheless be in exterior darkness, since even the fire of hell, while shining for them in one respect, will be unable to enlighten them in another.

Reply to Objection 4: This brightness will be in these bodies even as it is in the heavenly bodies, in which it causes no heat, because these bodies will then be unalterable, as the heavenly bodies are now.

Reply to Objection 5: The order of the universe will not be done away by the betterment of the elements, because all the other parts will also be bettered, and so the same harmony will remain.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the plants and animals will remain in this renewal?

Objection 1: It would seem that the plants and animals will remain in this renewal. For the elements should be deprived of nothing that belongs to their adornment. Now the elements are said to be adorned by the animals and plants [Gn. 1:11,12,20,21,24,25]. Therefore they will not be removed in this renewal.

Objection 2: Further, just as the elements served man, so also did animals, plants and mineral bodies. But on account of this service the elements will be glorified. Therefore both animals and plants and mineral bodies will be glorified likewise.

Objection 3: Further, the universe will remain imperfect if anything belonging to its perfection be removed. Now the species of animals, plants, and mineral bodies belong to the perfection of the universe. Since then we must not say that the world will remain imperfect when it is renewed, it seems that we should assert that the plants and animals will remain.

Objection 4: Further, animals and plants have a more noble form than the elements. Now the world, at this final renewal, will be changed for the better. Therefore animals and plants should remain rather than the elements, since they are nobler.

Objection 5: Further, it is unseemly to assert that the natural appetite will be frustrated. But by their natural appetite animals and plants desire to be for ever, if indeed not as regards the individual, at least as regards the species: and to this end their continual generation is directed (De Generat. ii). Therefore it is unseemly to say that these species will at length cease to be.

On the contrary, If plants and animals are to remain, either all of them will, or some of them. If all of them, then dumb animals, which had previously died, will have to rise again just as men will rise again. But this cannot be asserted for since their form comes to nothing, they cannot resume the same identical form. On the other hand if not all but some of them remain, since there is no more reason for one of them remaining for ever rather than another, it would seem that none of them will. But whatever remains after the world has been renewed will remain for ever, generation and corruption being done away. Therefore plants and animals will altogether cease after the renewal of the world.

Further, according to the Philosopher (De Generat. ii) the species of animals, plants and such like corruptible things, are not perpetuated except by the continuance of the heavenly movement. Now this will cease then. Therefore it will be impossible for those species to be perpetuated.

Further, if the end cease, those things which are directed to the end should cease. Now animals and plants were made for the upkeep of human life; wherefore it is written (Gn. 9:3): "Even as the green herbs have I delivered all flesh to you." Therefore when man's animal life ceases, animals and plants should cease. But after this renewal animal life will cease in man. Therefore neither plants nor animals ought to remain.

I answer that, Since the renewal of the world will be for man's sake it follows that it should be conformed to the renewal of man. Now by being renewed man will pass from the state of corruption to incorruptibility and to a state of everlasting rest, wherefore it is written (1 Cor. 15:53): "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality"; and consequently the world will be renewed in such a way as to throw off all corruption and remain for ever at rest. Therefore it will be impossible for anything to be the subject of that renewal, unless it be a subject of incorruption. Now such are the heavenly bodies, the elements, and man. For the heavenly bodies are by their very nature incorruptible both as to their whole and as to their part: the elements are corruptible as to their parts but incorruptible as a whole: while men are corruptible both in whole and in part, but this is on the part of their matter not on the part of their form, the rational soul to wit, which will remain incorrupt after the corruption of man. on the other hand, dumb animals, plants, and minerals, and all mixed bodies, are corruptible both in their whole and in their parts, both on the part of their matter which loses its form, and on the part of their form which does not remain actually; and thus they are in no way subjects of incorruption. Hence they will not remain in this renewal, but those things alone which we have mentioned above.

Reply to Objection 1: These bodies are said to adorn the elements, inasmuch as the general active and passive forces which are in the elements are applied to specific actions: hence they adorn the elements in their active and passive state. But this state will not remain in the elements: wherefore there is no need for animals or plants to remain.

Reply to Objection 2: Neither animals nor plants nor any other bodies merited anything by their services to man, since they lack free-will. However, certain bodies are said to be rewarded in so far as man merited that those things should be renewed which are adapted to be renewed. But plants and animals are not adapted to the renewal of incorruption, as stated above. Wherefore for this very reason man did not merit that they should be renewed, since no one can merit for another, or even for himself that which another or himself is incapable of receiving. Hence, granted even that dumb animals merited by serving man, it would not follow that they are to be renewed.

Reply to Objection 3: Just as several kinds of perfection are ascribed to man (for there is the perfection of created nature and the perfection of glorified nature), so also there is a twofold perfection of the universe, one corresponding to this state of changeableness, the other corresponding to the state of a future renewal. Now plants and animals belong to its perfection according to the present state, and not according to the state of this renewal, since they are not capable thereof.

Reply to Objection 4: Although animals and plants as to certain other respects are more noble than the elements, the elements are more noble in relation to incorruption, as explained above [Question 74, Article 1, ad 3].

Reply to Objection 5: The natural desire to be for ever that is in animals and plants must be understood in reference to the movement of the heaven, so that they may continue in being as long as the movement of the heaven lasts: since there cannot be an appetite for an effect to last longer than its cause. Wherefore if at the cessation of movement in the first movable body, plants and animals cease as to their species, it does not follow that the natural appetite is frustrated.

OF THE VISION OF THE DIVINE ESSENCE IN REFERENCE TO THE BLESSED

Prologue

In the next place we must consider matters concerning the blessed after the general judgment. We shall consider: (1) Their vision of the Divine essence, wherein their bliss consists chiefly; (2) Their bliss and their mansions; (3) Their relations with the damned; (4) Their gifts, which are contained in their bliss; (5) The crowns which perfect and adorn their happiness.

Under the first head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the saints will see God in His essence?
- (2) Whether they will see Him with the eyes of the body?
- (3) Whether in seeing God they will see all that God sees?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the human intellect can attain to the vision of God in His essence?

Objection 1: It would seem that the human intellect cannot attain to the vision of God in His essence. For it is written (Jn. 1:18): "No man hath seen God at any time"; and Chrysostom in his commentary says (Hom. xiv in Joan.) that "not even the heavenly essences, namely the Cherubim and Seraphim, have ever been able to see Him as He is." Now, only equality with the angels is promised to men (Mt. 22:30): "They . . . shall be as the angels of God in heaven." Therefore neither will the saints in heaven see God in His essence.

Objection 2: Further, Dionysius argues thus (Div. Nom. i): "Knowledge is only of existing things." Now whatever exists is finite, since it is confined to a certain genus: and therefore God, since He is infinite, is above all existing things. Therefore there is no knowledge of Him, and He is above all knowledge.

Objection 3: Further, Dionysius (De Myst. Theol. i) shows that the most perfect way in which our intellect can be united to God is when it is united to Him as to something unknown. Now that which is seen in its essence is not unknown. Therefore it is impossible for our intellect to see God in His essence.

Objection 4: Further, Dionysius says (Ep. ad Caium Monach.) that "the darkness"---for thus he calls the abundance of light---"which screens God is impervious to all illuminations, and hidden from all knowledge: and if anyone in seeing God understood what he saw, he saw not God Himself, but one of those things that are His." Therefore no created intellect will be able to see God in His essence.

Objection 5: Further, according to Dionysius (Ep. ad Hieroth.) "God is invisible on account of His surpassing glory." Now His glory surpasses the human intellect in heaven even as on the way. Therefore since He is invisible on the way, so will He be in heaven.

Objection 6: Further, since the intelligible object is the perfection of the intellect, there must needs be proportion between intelligible and intellect, as between the visible object and the sight. But there is no possible proportion between our intellect and the Divine essence, since an infinite distance separates them. Therefore our intellect will be unable to attain to the vision of the Divine essence.

Objection 7: Further, God is more distant from our intellect than the created intelligible is from our senses. But the senses can nowise attain to the sight of a spiritual creature. Therefore neither will our intellect be able to attain to the vision of the Divine essence.

Objection 8: Further, whenever the intellect understands something actually it needs to be informed with the likeness of the object understood, which likeness is the principle of the intellectual operation terminating in that object, even as heat is the principle of heating. Accordingly if our intellect understands God, this must be by means of some likeness informing the intellect itself. Now this cannot be the very essence of God, since form and thing informed must needs have one being, while the Divine essence differs from our intellect in essence and being. Therefore the form whereby our intellect is informed in understanding God must needs be a likeness impressed by God on our intellect. But this likeness, being something created, cannot lead to the knowledge of God except as an effect leads to the knowledge of its cause. Therefore it is impossible for our intellect to see God except through His effect. But to see God through His effect is not to see Him in His essence. Therefore our intellect will be unable to see God in His essence.

Objection 9: Further, the Divine essence is more distant from our intellect than any angel or intelligence. Now according to Avicenna (Metaph. iii), "the existence of an intelligence in our intellect does not imply that its essence is in our intellect," because in that case our knowledge of the intelligence would be a substance and not an accident, "but that its likeness is impressed on our intellect." Therefore neither is God in our intellect, to be understood by us, except in so far as an impression of Him is in our intellect. But this impression cannot lead to the knowledge of the Divine essence, for since it is infinitely distant from the Divine essence, it degenerates to another image much more than if the image of a white thing were to degenerate to the image of a black thing. Therefore, just as a person in whose sight the image of a white thing degenerates to the image of a black thing, on account of an indisposition in the organ, is not said to see a white thing, so neither will our intellect be able to see God in His essence, since it understands God only by means of this impression.

Objection 1:: Further, "In things devoid of matter that which understands is the same as that which is understood" (De Anima iii). Now God is supremely devoid of matter. Since then our intellect, which is created, cannot attain to be an uncreated essence, it is impossible for our intellect to see God in His essence.

Objection 1:: Further, whatever is seen in its essence is known as to what it is. But our intellect cannot know of God what He is, but only what He is not as Dionysius (Coel. Hier. ii) and Damascene (De Fide Orth. i) declare. Therefore our intellect will be unable to see God in His essence.

Objection 1:: Further, every infinite thing, as such, is unknown. But God is in every way infinite. Therefore He is altogether unknown. Therefore it will be impossible for Him to be seen in His essence by a created intellect.

Objection 1:: Further, Augustine says (De Videndo Deo: Ep. cxlvii): "God is by nature invisible." Now that which is in God by nature cannot be otherwise. Therefore it is impossible for Him to be seen in His essence.

Objection 1:: Further, whatever is in one way and is seen in another way is not seen as it is. Now God is in one way and will be seen in another way by the saints in heaven: for He according to His own mode, but will be seen by the saints according to their mode. Therefore He will not be seen by the saints as He is, and thus will not be seen in His essence.

Objection 1:: Further, that which is seen through a medium is not seen in its essence. Now God will be seen in heaven through a medium which is the light of glory, according to Ps. 35:10, "In Thy light we shall see light." Therefore He will not be seen in His essence.

Objection 1:: Further, in heaven God will be seen face to face, according to 1 Cor. 13:12. Now when we see a man face to face, we see him through his likeness. Therefore in heaven God will be seen through His likeness, and consequently not in His essence.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 13:12): "We see now through a glass in a dark manner, but then face to face." Now that which is seen face to face is seen in its essence. Therefore God will be seen in His essence by the saints in heaven.

Further, it is written (1 Jn. 3:2): "When He shall appear we shall be like to Him, because we shall see Him as He is." Therefore we shall see Him in His essence.

Further, a gloss on 1 Cor. 15:24, "When He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God and the Father," says: "Where," i.e. in heaven, "the essence of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost shall be seen: this is given to the clean of heart alone and is the highest bliss." Therefore the blessed will see God in His essence.

Further, it is written (Jn. 14:21): "He that loveth Me shall be loved of My Father; and I will love him, and will manifest Myself to him." Now that which is manifested is seen in its essence. Therefore God will be seen in His essence by the saints in heaven.

Further, Gregory commenting (Moral. xviii) on the words of Ex. 33:20, "Man shall not see Me and live," disapproves of the opinion of those who said that "in this abode of bliss God can be seen in His glory but not in His nature; for His glory differs not from His nature." But His nature is His essence. Therefore He will be seen in His essence.

Further, the desire of the saints cannot be altogether frustrated. Now the common desire of the saints is to see God in His essence, according to Ex. 33:13, "Show me Thy glory"; Ps. 79:20, "Show Thy face and we shall be saved"; and Jn. 14:8, "Show us the Father and it is enough for us." Therefore the saints will see God in His essence.

I answer that, Even as we hold by faith that the last end of man's life is to see God, so the philosophers maintained that man's ultimate happiness is to understand immaterial substances according to their being. Hence in reference to this question we find that philosophers and theologians encounter the same difficulty and the same difference of opinion. For some philosophers held that our passive intellect can never come to understand separate substances. thus Alfarabius expresses himself at the end of his Ethics, although he says the contrary in his book On the Intelligence, as the Commentator attests (De Anima iii). In like manner certain theologians held that the human intellect can never attain to the vision of God in His essence. on either side they were moved by the distance which separates our intellect from the Divine essence and from separate substances. For since the intellect in act is somewhat one with the intelligible object in act, it would seem difficult to understand how the created intellect is made to be an uncreated essence. Wherefore Chrysostom says (Hom. xiv in Joan.): "How can the creature see the uncreated?" Those who hold the passive intellect to be the subject of generation and corruption, as being a power dependent on the body, encounter a still greater difficulty not only as regards the vision of God but also as regards the vision of any separate substances. But this opinion is altogether untenable. First, because it is in contradiction to the authority of canonical scripture, as Augustine declares (De Videndo Deo: Ep. cxlvii). Secondly, because, since understanding is an operation most proper to man, it follows that his happiness must be held to consist in that operation when perfected in him. Now since the perfection of an intelligent being as such is the intelligible object, if in the most perfect operation of his intellect man does not attain to the vision of the Divine essence, but to something else, we shall be forced to conclude that something other than God is the object of man's happiness: and since the ultimate perfection of a thing consists in its being united to its principle, it follows that something other than God is the effective principle of man, which is absurd, according to us, and also according to the philosophers who maintain that our souls emanate from the separate substances, so that finally we may be able to understand these substances. Consequently, according to us, it must be asserted that our intellect will at length attain to the vision of the Divine essence, and according to the philosophers, that it will attain to the vision of separate substances.

It remains, then, to examine how this may come about. For some, like Alfarabius and Avempace, held that from the very fact that our intellect understands any intelligible objects whatever, it attains to the vision of a separate substance. To prove this they employ two arguments. The first is that just as the specific nature is not diversified in various individuals, except as united to various individuating principles, so the idea understood is not diversified in me and you, except in so far as it is united to various imaginary forms: and consequently when the intellect separates the idea understood from the imaginary forms, there remains a quiddity understood, which is one and the same in the various persons understanding it, and such is the quiddity of a separate substance. Hence, when our intellect attains to the supreme abstraction of any intelligible quiddity, it thereby understands the quiddity of the separate substance that is similar to it. The second argument is that our intellect has a natural aptitude to abstract the quiddity from all intelligible objects having a quiddity. If, then, the quiddity which it abstracts from some particular individual be a quiddity without a quiddity, the intellect by understanding it understands the quiddity of the separate substance which has a like disposition, since separate substances are subsisting quiddities without quiddities; for the quiddity of a simple thing is the simple thing itself, as Avicenna says (Met. iii). On the other hand if the quiddity abstracted from this particular sensible be a quiddity that has a quiddity, it follows that the intellect has a natural aptitude to abstract this quiddity, and consequently since we cannot go on indefinitely, we shall come to some quiddity without a quiddity, and this is what we understand by a separate quiddity [FP, Question 88, Article 2].

But this reasoning is seemingly inconclusive. First, because the quiddity of the material substance, which the intellect abstracts, is not of the same nature as the quiddity of the separate substances, and consequently from the fact that our intellect abstracts the quiddities of material substances and knows them, it does not follow that it knows the quiddity of a separate substance, especially of the Divine essence, which more than any other is of a different nature from any created quiddity. Secondly, because granted that it be of the same nature, nevertheless the knowledge of a composite thing would not lead to the knowledge of a separate substance, except in the point of the most remote genus, namely substance: and such a knowledge is imperfect unless it reach to the properties of a thing. For to know a man only as an animal is to know him only in a restricted sense and potentially: and much less is it to know only the nature of substance in him. Hence to know God thus, or other separate substances, is not to see the essence of God or the quiddity of a separate substance, but to know Him in His effect and in a mirror as it were. For this reason Avicenna in his Metaphysics. propounds another way of understanding separate substances, to wit that separate substances are understood by us by means of intentions of their quiddities, such intentions being images of their substances, not indeed abstracted therefrom, since they are immaterial, but impressed thereby on our souls. But this way also seems inadequate to the Divine vision which we seek. For it is agreed that "whatever is received into any thing is therein after the mode of the recipient": and consequently the likeness of the Divine essence impressed on our intellect will be according to the mode of our intellect: and the mode of our intellect falls short of a perfect reception of the Divine likeness. Now the lack of perfect likeness may occur in as many ways, as unlikeness may occur. For in one way there is a deficient likeness, when the form is participated according to the same specific nature, but not in the same measure of perfection: such is the defective likeness in a subject that has little whiteness in comparison with one that has much. In another way the likeness is yet more defective, when it does not attain to the same specific nature but only to the same generic nature: such is the likeness of an orange-colored or yellowish object in comparison with a white one. In another way, still more defective is the likeness when it does not attain to the same generic nature, but only to a certain analogy or proportion: such is the likeness of whiteness to man, in that each is a being: and in this way every likeness received into a creature is defective in comparison with the Divine essence. Now in order that the sight know whiteness, it is necessary for it to receive the likeness of whiteness according to its specific nature, although not according to the same manner of being because the form has a manner of being in the sense other from that which it has in the thing outside the soul: for if the form of yellowness were received into the eye, the eye would not be said to see whiteness. In like manner in order that the intellect understand a quiddity, it is necessary for it to receive its likeness according to the same specific nature, although there may possibly not be the same manner of being on either side: for the form which is in the intellect or sense is not the principle of knowledge according to its manner of being on both sides, but according to its common ratio with the external object. Hence it is clear that by no likeness received in the created intellect can God be understood, so that His essence be seen immediately. And for this reason those who held the Divine essence to be seen in this way alone, said that the essence itself will not be seen, but a certain brightness, as it were a radiance thereof. Consequently neither does this way suffice for the Divine vision that we seek.

Therefore we must take the other way, which also certain philosophers held, namely Alexander and Averroes (De Anima iii.). For since in every knowledge some form is required whereby the object is known or seen, this form by which the intellect is perfected so as to see separate substances is neither a quiddity abstracted by the intellect from composite things, as the first opinion maintained, nor an impression left on our intellect by the separate substance, as the second opinion affirmed; but the separate substance itself united to our intellect as its form, so as to be both that which is understood, and that whereby it is understood. And whatever may be the case with other separate substances, we must nevertheless allow this to be our way of seeing God in His essence, because by whatever other form our intellect were informed, it could not be led thereby to the Divine essence. This, however, must not be understood as though the Divine essence were in reality the form of our intellect, or as though from its conjunction with our intellect there resulted one being simply, as in natural things from the natural form and matter: but the meaning is that the proportion of the Divine essence to our intellect is as the proportion of form to matter. For whenever two things, one of which is the perfection of the other, are received into the same recipient, the proportion of one to the other, namely of the more perfect to the less perfect, is as the proportion of form to matter: thus light and color are received into a transparent object, light being to color as form to matter. When therefore intellectual light is received into the soul, together with the indwelling Divine essence, though they are not received in the same way, the Divine essence will be to the intellect as form to matter: and that this suffices for the intellect to be able to see the Divine essence by the Divine essence itself may be shown as follows.

As from the natural form (whereby a thing has being) and matter, there results one thing simply, so from the form whereby the intellect understands, and the intellect itself, there results one thing intelligibly. Now in natural things a self-subsistent thing cannot be the form of any matter, if that thing has matter as one of its parts, since it is impossible for matter to be the form of a thing. But if this self-subsistent thing be a mere form, nothing hinders it from being the form of some matter and becoming that whereby the composite itself is as instanced in the soul. Now in the intellect we must take the intellect itself in potentiality as matter, and the intelligible species as form; so that the intellect actually understanding will be the composite as it were resulting from both. Hence if there be a self-subsistent thing, that has nothing in itself besides that which is intelligible, such a thing can by itself be the form whereby the intellect understands. Now a thing is intelligible in respect of its actuality and not of its potentiality (Met. ix): in proof of which an intelligible form needs to be abstracted from matter and from all the properties of matter. Therefore, since the Divine essence is pure act, it will be possible for it to be the form whereby the intellect understands: and this will be the beatific vision. Hence the Master says (Sent. ii, D, 1) that the union of the body with the soul is an illustration of the blissful union of the spirit with God.

Reply to Objection 1: The words quoted can be explained in three ways, according to Augustine (De Videndo Deo: Ep. cxlvii). In one way as excluding corporeal vision, whereby no one ever saw or will see God in His essence; secondly, as excluding intellectual vision of God in His essence from those who dwell in this mortal flesh; thirdly, as excluding the vision of comprehension from a created intellect. It is thus that Chrysostom understands the saying wherefore he adds: "By seeing, the evangelist means a most clear perception, and such a comprehension as the Father has of the Son." This also is the meaning of the evangelist, since he adds: "The Only-begotten Son Who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him": his intention being to prove the Son to be God from His comprehending God.

Reply to Objection 2: Just as God, by His infinite essence, surpasses all existing things which have a determinate being, so His knowledge, whereby He knows, is above all knowledge. Wherefore as our knowledge is to our created essence, so is the Divine knowledge to His infinite essence. Now two things contribute to knowledge, to wit, the knower and the thing known. Again, the vision whereby we shall see God in His essence is the same whereby God sees Himself, as regards that whereby He is seen, because as He sees Himself in His essence so shall we also see Him. But as regards the knower there is the difference that is between the Divine intellect and ours. Now in the order of knowledge the object known follows the form by which we know, since by the form of a stone we see a stone: whereas the efficacy of knowledge follows the power of the knower: thus he who has stronger sight sees more clearly. Consequently in that vision we shall see the same thing that God sees, namely His essence, but not so effectively.

Reply to Objection 3: Dionysius is speaking there of the knowledge whereby wayfarers know God by a created form, whereby our intellect is informed so as to see God. But as Augustine says (De Videndo Deo: Ep. cxlvii), "God evades every form of our intellect," because whatever form our intellect conceive, that form is out of proportion to the Divine essence. Hence He cannot be fathomed by our intellect: but our most perfect knowledge of Him as wayfarers is to know that He is above all that our intellect can conceive, and thus we are united to Him as to something unknown. In heaven, however, we shall see Him by a form which is His essence, and we shall be united to Him as to something known.

Reply to Objection 4: God is light (Jn. 1:9). Now illumination is the impression of light on an illuminated object. And since the Divine essence is of a different mode from any likeness thereof impressed on the intellect, he (Dionysius) says that the "Divine darkness is impervious to all illumination," because, to wit, the Divine essence, which he calls "darkness" on account of its surpassing brightness, remains undemonstrated by the impression on our intellect, and consequently is "hidden from all knowledge." Therefore if anyone in seeing God conceives something in his mind, this is not God but one of God's effects.

Reply to Objection 5: Although the glory of God surpasses any form by which our intellect is informed now, it does not surpass the Divine essence, which will be the form of our intellect in heaven: and therefore although it is invisible now, it will be visible then.

Reply to Objection 6: Although there can be no proportion between finite and infinite, since the excess of the infinite over the finite is indeterminate, there can be proportionateness or a likeness to proportion between them: for as a finite thing is equal to some finite thing, so is an infinite thing equal to an infinite thing. Now in order that a thing be known totally, it is sometimes necessary that there be proportion between knower and known, because the power of the knower needs to be adequate to the knowableness of the thing known, and equality is a kind of proportion. Sometimes, however, the knowableness of the thing surpasses the power of the knower, as when we know God, or conversely when He knows creatures: and then there is no need for proportion between knower and known, but only for proportionateness; so that, to wit, as the knower is to the knowable object, so is the knowable object to the fact of its being known: and this proportionateness suffices for the infinite to be known by the finite, or conversely.

We may also reply that proportion according to the strict sense in which it is employed signifies a ratio of quantity to quantity based on a certain fixed excess or equality; but is further transferred to denote any ratio of any one thing to another; and in this sense we say that matter should be proportionate to its form. In this sense nothing hinders our intellect, although finite, being described as proportionate to the vision of the Divine essence; but not to the comprehension thereof, on account of its immensity.

Reply to Objection 7: Likeness and distance are twofold. One is according to agreement in nature; and thus God is more distant from the created intellect than the created intelligible is from the sense. The other is according to proportionateness; and thus it is the other way about, for sense is not proportionate to the knowledge of the immaterial, as the intellect is proportionate to the knowledge of any immaterial object whatsoever. It is this likeness and not the former that is requisite for knowledge, for it is clear that the intellect understanding a stone is not like it in its natural being; thus also the sight apprehends red honey and red gall, though it does not apprehend sweet honey, for the redness of gall is more becoming to honey as visible, than the sweetness of honey to honey.

Reply to Objection 8: In the vision wherein God will be seen in His essence, the Divine essence itself will be the form, as it were, of the intellect, by which it will understand: nor is it necessary for them to become one in being, but only to become one as regards the act of understanding.

Reply to Objection 9: We do not uphold the saying of Avicenna as regards the point at issue, for in this other philosophers also disagree with him. Unless perhaps we might say that Avicenna refers to the knowledge of separate substances, in so far as they are known by the habits of speculative sciences and the likeness of other things. Hence he makes this statement in order to prove that in us knowledge is not a substance but an accident. Nevertheless, although the Divine essence is more distant, as to the property of its nature, from our intellect, than is the substance of an angel, it surpasses it in the point of intelligibility, since it is pure act without any admixture of potentiality, which is not the case with other separate substances. Nor will that knowledge whereby we shall see God in His essence be in the genus of accident as regards that whereby He will be seen, but only as regards the act of the one who understands Him, for this act will not be the very substance either of the person understanding or of the thing understood.

Reply to Objection 1:: A substance that is separate from matter understands both itself and other things; and in both cases the authority quoted can be verified. For since the very essence of a separate substance is of itself intelligible and actual, through being separate from matter, it is clear that when a separate substance understands itself, that which understands and that which is understood are absolutely identical, for it does not understand itself by an intention abstracted from itself, as we understand material objects. And this is apparently the meaning of the Philosopher (De Anima iii.) as indicated by the Commentator (De Anima iii). But when it understands other things, the object actually understood becomes one with the intellect in act, in so far as the form of the object understood becomes the form of the intellect, for as much as the intellect is in act; not that it becomes identified with the essence of the intellect, as Avicenna proves (De Natural. vi.), because the essence of the intellect remains one under two forms whereby it understands two things in succession, in the same way as primary matter remains one under various forms. Hence also the Commentator (De Anima iii.) compares the passive intellect, in this respect, to primary matter. Thus it by no means follows that our intellect in seeing God becomes the very essence of God, but that the latter is compared to it as its perfection or form.

Reply to Objection 1:: These and all like authorities must be understood to refer to the knowledge whereby we know God on the way, for the reason given above.

Reply to Objection 1:: The infinite is unknown if we take it in the privative sense, as such, because it indicates removal of completion whence knowledge of a thing is derived. Wherefore the infinite amounts to the same as matter subject to privation, as stated in Phys. iii. But if we take the infinite in the negative sense, it indicates the absence of limiting matter, since even a form is somewhat limited by its matter. Hence the infinite in this sense is of itself most knowable; and it is in this way that God is infinite.

Reply to Objection 1:: Augustine is speaking of bodily vision, by which God will never be seen. This is evident from what precedes: "For no man hath seen God at any time, nor can any man see Him as these things which we call visible are seen: in this way He is by nature invisible even as He is incorruptible." As, however, He is by nature supremely being, so He is in Himself supremely intelligible. But that He be for a time not understood by us is owing to our defect: wherefore that He be seen by us after being unseen is owing to a change not in Him but in us.

Reply to Objection 1:: In heaven God will be seen by the saints as He is, if this be referred to the mode of the object seen, for the saints will see that God has the mode which He has. But if we refer the mode to the knower, He will not be seen as He is, because the created intellect will not have so great an efficacy in seeing, as the Divine essence has to the effect of being seen.

Reply to Objection 1:: There is a threefold medium both in bodily and in intellectual vision. The first is the medium "under which" the object is seen, and this is something perfecting the sight so as to see in general, without determining the sight to any particular object. Such is bodily light in relation to bodily vision; and the light of the active intellect in relation to the passive intellect, in so far as this light is a medium. The second is the light "by which" the object is seen, and this is the visible form whereby either sight is determined to a special object, for instance by the form of a stone to know a stone. The third is the medium "in which" it is seen; and this is something by gazing on which the sight is led to something else: thus by looking in a mirror it is led to see the things reflected in the mirror, and by looking at an image it is led to the thing represented by the image. In this way, too, the intellect from knowing an effect is led to the cause, or conversely. Accordingly in the heavenly vision there will be no third medium, so that, to wit, God be known by the images of other things, as He is known now, for which reason we are said to see now in a glass: nor will there be the second medium, because the essence itself of God will be that whereby our intellect will see God. But there will only be the first medium, which will upraise our intellect so that it will be possible for it to be united to the uncreated substance in the aforesaid manner. Yet this medium will not cause that knowledge to be mediate, because it does not come in between the knower and the thing known, but is that which gives the knower the power to know [FP, Question 12, Article 5].

Reply to Objection 1:: Corporeal creatures are not said to be seen immediately, except when that which in them is capable of being brought into conjunction with the sight is in conjunction therewith. Now they are not capable of being in conjunction with the sight of their essence on account of their materiality: hence they are seen immediately when their image is in conjunction with the sight. But God is able to be united to the intellect by His essence: wherefore He would not be seen immediately, unless His essence were united to the intellect: and this vision, which is effected immediately, is called "vision of face." Moreover the likeness of the corporeal object is received into the sight according to the same ratio as it is in the object, although not according to the same mode of being. Wherefore this likeness leads to the object directly: whereas no likeness can lead our intellect in this way to God, as shown above: and for this reason the comparison fails.

ARTICLE 2. Whether after the resurrection the saints will see God with the eyes of the body?

Objection 1: It would seem that after the resurrection the saints will see God with the eyes of the body. Because the glorified eye has greater power than one that is not glorified. Now the blessed Job saw God with his eyes (Job 42:5): "With the hearing of the ear, I have heard Thee, but now my eye seeth Thee." Much more therefore will the glorified eye be able to see God in His essence.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Job 19:26): "In my flesh I shall see God my Saviour." Therefore in heaven God will be seen with the eyes of the body.

Objection 3: Further. Augustine, speaking of the sight of the glorified eyes, expresses himself as follows (De Civ. Dei xxii): "A greater power will be in those eyes, not to see more keenly, as certain serpents or eagles are reported to see (for whatever acuteness of vision is possessed by these animals they can see only corporeal things), but to see even incorporeal things." Now any power that is capable of knowing incorporeal things can be upraised to see God. Therefore the glorified eyes will be able to see God.

Objection 4: Further, the disparity of corporeal to incorporeal things is the same as of incorporeal to corporeal. Now the incorporeal eye can see corporeal things. Therefore the corporeal eye can see the incorporeal: and consequently the same conclusion follows.

Objection 5: Further, Gregory, commenting on Job 4:16, "There stood one whose countenance I knew not," says (Moral. v): "Man who, had he been willing to obey the command, would have been spiritual in the flesh, became, by sinning, carnal even in mind." Now through becoming carnal in mind, "he thinks only of those things which he draws to his soul by the images of bodies" (Moral. v). Therefore when he will be spiritual in the flesh (which is promised to the saints after the resurrection), he will be able even in the flesh to see spiritual things. Therefore the same conclusion follows.

Objection 6: Further, man can be beatified by God alone. Now he will be beatified not only in soul but also in body. Therefore God will be visible not only to his intellect but also to his flesh.

Objection 7: Further, even as God is present to the intellect by His essence, so will He be to the senses, because He will be "all in all" (1 Cor. 15:28). Now He will be seen by the intellect through the union of His essence therewith. Therefore He will also be visible to the sense.

On the contrary, Ambrose, commenting on Lk. 1:2, "There appeared to him an angel," says: "God is not sought with the eyes of the body, nor surveyed by the sight, nor clasped by the touch." Therefore God will by no means be visible to the bodily sense.

Further, Jerome, commenting on Is. 6:1, "I saw the Lord sitting," says: "The Godhead not only of the Father, but also of the Son and of the Holy Ghost is visible, not to carnal eyes, but only to the eyes of the mind, of which it is said: Blessed are the pure in heart."

Further, Jerome says again (as quoted by Augustine, Ep. cxlvii): "An incorporeal thing is invisible to a corporeal eye." But God is supremely incorporeal. Therefore, etc.

Further, Augustine says (De Videndo Deo, Ep. cxlvii): "No man hath seen God as He is at any time, neither in this life, nor in the angelic life, in the same way as these visible things which are seen with the corporeal sight." Now the angelic life is the life of the blessed, wherein they will live after the resurrection. Therefore, etc.

Further, according to Augustine (De Trin. xiv.), "man is said to be made to God's image inasmuch as he is able to see God." But man is in God's image as regards his mind, and not as regards his flesh. Therefore he will see God with his mind and not with his flesh.

I answer that, A thing is perceptible to the senses of the body in two ways, directly and indirectly. A thing is perceptible directly if it can act directly on the bodily senses. And a thing can act directly either on sense as such or on a particular sense as such. That which acts directly in this second way on a sense is called a proper sensible, for instance color in relation to the sight, and sound in relation to the hearing. But as sense as such makes use of a bodily organ, nothing can be received therein except corporeally, since whatever is received into a thing is therein after the mode of the recipient. Hence all sensibles act on the sense as such, according to their magnitude: and consequently magnitude and all its consequences, such as movement, rest, number, and the like, are called common sensibles, and yet they are direct objects of sense.

An indirect object of sense is that which does not act on the sense, neither as sense nor as a particular sense, but is annexed to those things that act on sense directly: for instance Socrates; the son of Diaries; a friend and the like which are the direct object of the intellect's knowledge in the universal, and in the particular are the object of the cogitative power in man, and of the estimative power in other animals. The external sense is said to perceive things of this kind, although indirectly, when the apprehensive power (whose province it is to know directly this thing known), from that which is sensed directly, apprehends them at once and without any doubt or discourse (thus we see that a person is alive from the fact that he speaks): otherwise the sense is not said to perceive it even indirectly.

I say then that God can nowise be seen with the eyes of the body, or perceived by any of the senses, as that which is seen directly, neither here, nor in heaven: for if that which belongs to sense as such be removed from sense, there will be no sense, and in like manner if that which belongs to sight as sight be removed therefrom, there will be no sight. Accordingly seeing that sense as sense perceives magnitude, and sight as such a sense perceives color, it is impossible for the sight to perceive that which is neither color nor magnitude, unless we call it a sense equivocally. Since then sight and sense will be specifically the same in the glorified body, as in a non-glorified body, it will be impossible for it to see the Divine essence as an object of direct vision; yet it will see it as an object of indirect vision, because on the one hand the bodily sight will see so great a glory of God in bodies, especially in the glorified bodies and most of all in the body of Christ, and, on the other hand, the intellect will see God so clearly, that God will be perceived in things seen with the eye of the body, even as life is perceived in speech. For although our intellect will not then see God from seeing His creatures, yet it will see God in His creatures seen corporeally. This manner of seeing God corporeally is indicated by Augustine (De Civ. Dei xxii), as is clear if we take note of his words, for he says: "It is very credible that we shall so see the mundane bodies of the new heaven and the new earth, as to see most clearly God everywhere present, governing all corporeal things, not as we now see the invisible things of God as understood by those that are made, but as when we see men . . . we do not believe but see that they live."

Reply to Objection 1: This saying of Job refers to the spiritual eye, of which the Apostle says (Eph. 1:18): "The eyes of our heart enlightened."

Reply to Objection 2: The passage quoted does not mean that we are to see God with the eyes of the flesh, but that, in the flesh, we shall see God.

Reply to Objection 3: In these words Augustine speaks as one inquiring and conditionally. This appears from what he had said before: "Therefore they will have an altogether different power, if they shall see that incorporeal nature": and then he goes on to say: "Accordingly a greater power," etc., and afterwards he explains himself.

Reply to Objection 4: All knowledge results from some kind of abstraction from matter. Wherefore the more a corporeal form is abstracted from matter, the more is it a principle of knowledge. Hence it is that a form existing in matter is in no way a principle of knowledge, while a form existing in the senses is somewhat a principle of knowledge, in so far as it is abstracted from matter, and a form existing in the intellect is still better a principle of knowledge. Therefore the spiritual eye, whence the obstacle to knowledge is removed, can see a corporeal object: but it does not follow that the corporeal eye, in which the cognitive power is deficient as participating in matter, be able to know perfectly incorporeal objects of knowledge.

Reply to Objection 5: Although the mind that has become carnal cannot think but of things received from the senses, it thinks of them immaterially. In like manner whatever the sight apprehends it must always apprehend it corporeally: wherefore it cannot know things which cannot be apprehended corporeally.

Reply to Objection 6: Beatitude is the perfection of man as man. And since man is man not through his body but through his soul, and the body is essential to man, in so far as it is perfected by the soul: it follows that man's beatitude does not consist chiefly otherwise than in an act of the soul, and passes from the soul on to the body by a kind of overflow, as explained above (Question 85, Article 1). Yet our body will have a certain beatitude from seeing God in sensible creatures: and especially in Christ's body.

Reply to Objection 7: The intellect can perceive spiritual things, whereas the eyes of the body cannot: wherefore the intellect will be able to know the Divine essence united to it, but the eyes of the body will not.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the saints, seeing God, see all that God sees?

Objection 1: It would seem that the saints, seeing God in His essence, see all that God sees in Himself. For as Isidore says (De Sum. Bon. 1.): "The angels know all things in the World of God, before they happen." Now the saints will be equal to the angels of God (Mt. 22:30). Therefore the saints also in seeing God see all things.

Objection 2: Further, Gregory says (Dial. iv.): "Since all see God there with equal clearness, what do they not know, who know Him Who knows all things?" and he refers to the blessed who see God in His essence. Therefore those who see God in His essence know all things.

Objection 3: Further, it is stated in De Anima (iii, text. 7), that "when an intellect understands the greatest things, it is all the more able to understand the least things." Now God is the greatest of intelligible things. Therefore the power of the intellect is greatly increased by understanding Him. Therefore the intellect seeing Him understands all things.

Objection 4: Further, the intellect is not hindered from understanding a thing except by this surpassing it. Now no creature surpasses the intellect that understands God, since, as Gregory says (Dial. ii.), "to the soul which sees its Creator all creatures are small." Therefore those who see God in His essence know all things.

Objection 5: Further, every passive power that is not reduced to act is imperfect. Now the passive intellect of the human soul is a power that is passive as it were to the knowledge of all things, since "the passive intellect is in which all are in potentiality" (De Anima iii, text. 18). If then in that beatitude it were not to understand all things, it would remain imperfect, which is absurd.

Objection 6: Further, whoever sees a mirror sees the things reflected in the mirror. Now all things are reflected in the Word of God as in a mirror, because He is the type and image of all. Therefore the saints who see the Word in its essence see all created things.

Objection 7: Further, according to Prov. 10:24, "to the just their desire shall be given." Now the just desire to know all things, since "all men desire naturally to know," and nature is not done away by glory. Therefore God will grant them to know all things.

Objection 8: Further, ignorance is one of the penalties of the present life [FS, Question 85, Article 3]. Now all penalty will be removed from the saints by glory. Therefore all ignorance will be removed: and consequently they will know all.

Objection 9: Further, the beatitude of the saints is in their soul before being in their body. Now the bodies of the saints will be reformed in glory to the likeness of Christ's body (Phil. 3:21). Therefore their souls will be perfected in likeness to the soul of Christ. Now Christ's soul sees all things in the Word. Therefore all the souls of the saints will also see all things in the Word.

Objection 1:: Further, the intellect, like the senses, knows all the things with the image of which it is informed. Now the Divine essence shows a thing forth more clearly than any other image thereof. Therefore since in that blessed vision the Divine essence becomes the form as it were of our intellect, it would seem that the saints seeing God see all.

Objection 1:: Further, the Commentator says (De Anima iii), that "if the active intellect were the form of the passive intellect, we should understand all things." Now the Divine essence represents all things more clearly than the active intellect. Therefore the intellect that sees God in His essence knows all things.

Objection 1:: Further, the lower angels are enlightened by the higher about the things they are ignorant of, for the reason that they know not all things. Now after the day of judgment, one angel will not enlighten another; for then all superiority will cease, as a gloss observes on 1 Cor. 15:24, "When He shall have brought to nought," etc. Therefore the lower angels will then know all things, and for the same reason all the other saints who will see God in His essence.

On the contrary, Dionysius says (Hier. Eccles. vi): "The higher angels cleanse the lower angels from ignorance." Now the lower angels see the Divine essence. Therefore an angel while seeing the Divine essence may be ignorant of certain things. But the soul will not see God more perfectly than an angel. Therefore the souls seeing God will not necessarily see all things.

Further, Christ alone has the spirit not "by measure" (Jn. 3:34). Now it becomes Christ, as having the spirit without measure, to know all things in the Word: wherefore it is stated in the same place (Jn. 3:35) that "the Father . . . hath given all things into His hand." Therefore none but Christ is competent to know all things in the Word.

Further, the more perfectly a principle is known, the more of its effects are known thereby. Now some of those who see God in His essence will know God more perfectly than others. Therefore some will know more things than others, and consequently every one will not know all.

I answer that, God by seeing his essence knows all things whatsoever that are, shall be, or have been: and He is said to know these things by His "knowledge of vision," because He knows them as though they were present in likeness to corporeal vision. Moreover by seeing this essence He knows all that He can do, although He never did them, nor ever will: else He would not know His power perfectly; since a power cannot be known unless its objects be known: and this is called His "science" or "knowledge of simple intelligence." Now it is impossible for a created intellect, by seeing the Divine essence, to know all that God can do, because the more perfectly a principle is known, the more things are known in it; thus in one principle of demonstration one who is quick of intelligence sees more conclusions than one who is slow of intelligence. Since then the extent of the Divine power is measured according to what it can do, if an intellect were to see in the Divine essence all that God can do, its perfection in understanding would equal in extent the Divine power in producing its effects, and thus it would comprehend the Divine power, which is impossible for any created intellect to do. Yet there is a created intellect, namely the soul of Christ [TP, Question 16, Article 2], which knows in the Word all that God knows by the knowledge of vision. But regarding others who see the Divine essence there are two opinions. For some say that all who see God in His essence see all that God sees by His knowledge of vision. This, however, is contrary to the sayings of holy men, who hold that angels are ignorant of some things; and yet it is clear that according to faith all the angels see God in His essence. Wherefore others say that others than Christ, although they see God in His essence, do not see all that God sees because they do not comprehend the Divine essence. For it is not necessary that he who knows a cause should know all its effects, unless he comprehend the cause: and this is not in the competency of a created intellect. Consequently of those who see God in His essence, each one sees in His essence so much the more things according as he sees the Divine essence the more clearly: and hence it is that one is able to instruct another concerning these things. Thus the knowledge of the angels and of the souls of the saints can go on increasing until the day of judgment, even as other things pertaining to the accidental reward. But afterwards it will increase no more, because then will be the final state of things, and in that state it is possible that all will know everything that God knows by the knowledge of vision.

Reply to Objection 1: The saying of Isidore, that "the angels know in the Word all things before they happen," cannot refer to those things which God knows only by the knowledge of simple intelligence, because those things will never happen; but it must refer to those things which God knows only by the knowledge of vision. Even of these he does not say that all the angels know them all, but that perhaps some do; and that even those who know do not know all perfectly. For in one and the same thing there are many intelligible aspects to be considered, such as its various properties and relations to other things: and it is possible that while one thing is known in common by two persons, one of them perceives more aspects, and that the one learns these aspects from the other. Hence Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv) that "the lower angels learn from the higher angels the intelligible aspects of things." Wherefore it does not follow that even the angels who know all creatures are able to see all that can be understood in them.

Reply to Objection 2: It follows from this saying of Gregory that this blessed vision suffices for the seeing of all things on the part of the Divine essence, which is the medium by which one sees, and whereby God sees all things. That all things, however, are not seen is owing to the deficiency of the created intellect which does not comprehend the Divine essence.

Reply to Objection 3: The created intellect sees the Divine essence not according to the mode of that same essence, but according to its own mode which is finite. Hence its efficacy in knowing would need to be infinitely increased by reason of that vision in order for it to know all things.

Reply to Objection 4: Defective knowledge results not only from excess and deficiency of the knowable object in relation to the intellect, but also from the fact that the aspect of knowableness is not united to the intellect: thus sometimes the sight sees not a stone, through the image of the stone not being united to it. And although the Divine essence which is the type of all things is united to the intellect of one who sees God, it is united thereto not as the type of all things, but as the type of some and of so much the more according as one sees the Divine essence more fully.

Reply to Objection 5: When a passive power is perceptible by several perfections in order, if it be perfected with its ultimate perfection, it is not said to be imperfect, even though it lack some of the preceding dispositions. Now all knowledge by which the created intellect is perfected is directed to the knowledge of God as its end. Wherefore he who sees God in His essence, even though he know nothing else, would have a perfect intellect: nor is his intellect more perfect through knowing something else besides Him, except in so far as it sees Him more fully. Hence Augustine says (Confess. v.): "Unhappy is he who knoweth all these" (namely, creatures), "and knoweth not Thee: but happy whoso knoweth Thee, though he know not these. And whoso knoweth both Thee and them is not the happier for them but for Thee only."

Reply to Objection 6: This mirror has a will: and even as He will show Himself to whom He will, so will He show in Himself whatsoever He will. Nor does the comparison with a material mirror hold, for it is not in its power to be seen or not to be seen.

We may also reply that in a material mirror both object and mirror are seen under their proper image; although the mirror be seen through an image received from the thing itself, whereas the stone is seen through its proper image reflected in some other thing, where the reason for seeing the one is the reason for seeing the other. But in the uncreated mirror a thing is seen through the form of the mirror, just as an effect is seen through the image of its cause and conversely. Consequently it does not follow that whoever sees the eternal mirror sees all that is reflected in that mirror: since he who sees the cause does not of necessity see all its effects, unless he comprehend the cause.

Reply to Objection 7: The desire of the saints to know all things will be fulfilled by the mere fact of their seeing God: just as their desire to possess all good things will be fulfilled by their possessing God. For as God suffices the affections in that He has perfect goodness, and by possessing Him we possess all goods as it were, so does the vision of Him suffice the intellect: "Lord, show us the Father and it is enough for us" (Jn. 14:8).

Reply to Objection 8: Ignorance properly so called denotes a privation and thus it is a punishment: for in this way ignorance is nescience of things, the knowledge of which is a duty or a necessity. Now the saints in heaven will not be ignorant of any of these things. Sometimes, however, ignorance is taken in a broad sense of any kind of nescience: and thus the angels and saints in heaven will be ignorant of certain things. Hence Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv) that "the angels will be cleansed from their ignorance." In this sense ignorance is not a penalty but a defect. Nor is it necessary for all such defects to be done away by glory: for thus we might say that it was a defect in Pope Linus that he did not attain to the glory of Peter.

Reply to Objection 9: Our body will be conformed to the body of Christ in glory, in likeness but not in equality, for it will be endowed with clarity even as Christ's body, but not equally. In like manner our soul will have glory in likeness to the soul of Christ, but not in equality thereto: thus it will have knowledge even as Christ's soul, but not so great, so as to know all as Christ's soul does.

Reply to Objection 1:: Although the Divine essence is the type of all things knowable it will not be united to each created intellect according as it is the type of all. Hence the objection proves nothing.

Reply to Objection 1:: The active intellect is a form proportionate to the passive intellect; even as the passive power of matter is proportionate to the power of the natural agent, so that whatsoever is in the passive power of matter or the passive intellect is in the active power of the active intellect or of the natural agent. Consequently if the active intellect become the form of the passive intellect, the latter must of necessity know all those things to which the power of the active intellect extends. But the Divine essence is not a form proportionate to our intellect in this sense. Hence the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 1:: Nothing hinders us from saying that after the judgment day, when the glory of men and angels will be consummated once for all, all the blessed will know all that God knows by the knowledge of vision, yet so that not all will see all in the Divine essence. Christ's soul, however, will see clearly all things therein, even as it sees them now; while others will see therein a greater or lesser number of things according to the degree of clearness wherewith they will know God: and thus Christ's soul will enlighten all other souls concerning those things which it sees in the Word better than others. Hence it is written (Apoc. 21:23): "The glory of God shall enlighten the city of Jerusalem, and the Lamb is the lamp thereof." In like manner the higher souls will enlighten the lower (not indeed with a new enlightening, so as to increase the knowledge of the lower), but with a kind of continued enlightenment; thus we might understand the sun to enlighten the atmosphere while at a standstill. Wherefore it is written (Dan. 12:3): "They that instruct many to justice" shall shine "as stars for all eternity." The statement that the superiority of the orders will cease refers to their present ordinate ministry in our regard, as is clear from the same gloss.

QUESTION 93

OF THE HAPPINESS OF THE SAINTS AND THEIR MANSIONS

Prologue

We must next consider the happiness of the saints and their mansions. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the happiness of the saints will increase after the judgment?
- (2) Whether the degrees of happiness should be called mansions?
- (3) Whether the various mansions differ according to various degrees of charity?

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the happiness of the saints will be greater after the judgment than before?

Objection 1: It would seem that the happiness of the saints will not be greater after the judgment than before. For the nearer a thing approaches to the Divine likeness, the more perfectly does it participate happiness. Now the soul is more like God when separated from the body than when united to it. Therefore its happiness is greater before being reunited to the body than after.

Objection 2: Further, power is more effective when it is united than when divided. Now the soul is more united when separated from the body than when it is joined to the body. Therefore it has then greater power for operation, and consequently has a more perfect share of happiness, since this consists in action [FS, Question 3, Article 2].

Objection 3: Further, beatitude consists in an act of the speculative intellect. Now the intellect, in its act, makes no use of a bodily organ; and consequently by being reunited to the body the soul does not become capable of more perfect understanding. Therefore the soul's happiness is not greater after than before the judgment.

Objection 4: Further, nothing can be greater than the infinite, and so the addition of the finite to the infinite does not result in something greater than the infinite by itself. Now the beatified soul before its reunion with the body is rendered happy by rejoicing in the infinite good, namely God; and after the resurrection of the body it will rejoice in nothing else except perhaps the glory of the body, and this is a finite good. Therefore their joy after the resumption of the body will not be greater than before.

On the contrary, A gloss on Apoc. 6:9, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain," says: "At present the souls of the saints are under the altar, i.e. less exalted than they will be." Therefore their happiness will be greater after the resurrection than after their death.

Further, just as happiness is bestowed on the good as a reward, so is unhappiness awarded to the wicked. But the unhappiness of the wicked after reunion with their bodies will be greater than before, since they will be punished not only in the soul but also in the body.

Therefore the happiness of the saints will be greater after the resurrection of the body than before.

I answer that, It is manifest that the happiness of the saints will increase in extent after the resurrection, because their happiness will then be not only in the soul but also in the body. Moreover, the soul's happiness also will increase in extent, seeing that the soul will rejoice not only in its own good, but also in that of the body. We may also say that the soul's happiness will increase in intensity. For man's body may be considered in two ways: first, as being dependent on the soul for its completion; secondly, as containing something that hampers the soul in its operations, through the soul not perfectly completing the body. As regards the first way of considering the body, its union with the soul adds a certain perfection to the soul, since every part is imperfect, and is completed in its whole; wherefore the whole is to the part as form to matter. Consequently the soul is more perfect in its natural being, when it is in the whole---namely, man who results from the union of soul and body---than when it is a separate part. But as regards the second consideration the union of the body hampers the perfection of the soul, wherefore it is written (Wis. 9:15) that "the corruptible body is a load upon the soul." If, then, there be removed from the body all those things wherein it hampers the soul's action, the soul will be simply more perfect while existing in such a body than when separated therefrom. Now the more perfect a thing is in being, the more perfectly is it able to operate: wherefore the operation of the soul united to such a body will be more perfect than the operation of the separated soul. But the glorified body will be a body of this description, being altogether subject to the spirit. Therefore, since beatitude consists in an operation [FS, Question 3, Article 2, seqq.], the soul's happiness after its reunion with the body will be more perfect than before. For just as the soul separated from a corruptible body is able to operate more perfectly than when united thereto, so after it has been united to a glorified body, its operation will be more perfect than while it was separated. Now every imperfect thing desires its perfection. Hence the separated soul naturally desires reunion with the body and on account of this desire which proceeds from the soul's imperfection its operation whereby it is borne towards God is less intense. This agrees with the saying of Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xii, 35) that "on account of the body's desire it is held back from tending with all its might to that sovereign good."

Reply to Objection 1: The soul united to a glorified body is more like to God than when separated therefrom, in so far as when united it has more perfect being. For the more perfect a thing is the more it is like to God: even so the heart, the perfection of whose life consists in movement, is more like to God while in movement than while at rest, although God is never moved.

Reply to Objection 2: A power which by its own nature is capable of being in matter is more effective when subjected in matter than when separated from matter, although absolutely speaking a power separate from matter is more effective.

Reply to Objection 3: Although in the act of understanding the soul does not make use of the body, the perfection of the body will somewhat conduce to the perfection of the intellectual operation in so far as through being united to a glorified body, the soul will be more perfect in its nature, and consequently more effective in its operation, and accordingly the good itself of the body will conduce instrumentally, as it were, to the operation wherein happiness consists: thus the Philosopher asserts (Ethic. i, 8,10) that external goods conduce instrumentally to the happiness of life.

Reply to Objection 4: Although finite added to infinite does not make a greater thing, it makes more things, since finite and infinite are two things, while infinite taken by itself is one. Now the greater extent of joy regards not a greater thing but more things. Wherefore joy is increased in extent, through referring to God and to the body's glory, in comparison with the joy which referred to God. Moreover, the body's glory will conduce to the intensity of the joy that refers to God, in so far as it will conduce to the more perfect operation whereby the soul tends to God: since the more perfect is a becoming operation, the greater the delight [FS, Question 32, Article 1], as stated in Ethic. x, 8.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the degrees of beatitude should be called mansions?

Objection 1: It would seem that the degrees of beatitude should not be called mansions. For beatitude implies the notion of a reward: whereas mansion denotes nothing pertaining to a reward. Therefore the various degrees of beatitude should not be called mansions.

Objection 2: Further, mansion seemingly denotes a place. Now the place where the saint will be beatified is not corporeal but spiritual, namely God Who is one. Therefore there is but one mansion: and consequently the various degrees of beatitude should not be called mansions.

Objection 3: Further, as in heaven there will be men of various merits, so are there now in purgatory, and were in the limbo of the fathers. But various mansions are not distinguished in purgatory and limbo. Therefore in like manner neither should they be distinguished in heaven.

On the contrary, It is written (Jn. 14:2): "In My Father's house there are many mansions": and Augustine expounds this in reference to the different degrees of rewards (Tract. lxxvii in Joan.).

Further, in every well-ordered city there is a distinction of mansions. Now the heavenly kingdom is compared to a city (Apoc. 21:2). Therefore we should distinguish various mansions there according to the various degrees of beatitude.

I answer that, Since local movement precedes all other movements, terms of movement, distance and the like are derived from local movement to all other movements according to the Philosopher (Phys., liber viii, 7). Now the end of local movement is a place, and when a thing has arrived at that place it remains there at rest and is maintained therein. Hence in every movement this very rest at the end of the movement is called an establishment [collocatio] or mansion. Wherefore since the term movement is transferred to the actions of the appetite and will, the attainment of the end of an appetitive movement is called a mansion or establishment: so that the unity of a house corresponds to the unity of beatitude which unity is on the part of the object, and the plurality of mansions corresponds to the differences of beatitude on the part of the blessed: even so we observe in natural things that there is one same place above to which all light objects tend, whereas each one reaches it more closely, according as it is lighter, so that they have various mansions corresponding to their various lightness.

Reply to Objection 1: Mansion implies the notion of end and consequently of reward which is the end of merit.

Reply to Objection 2: Though there is one spiritual place, there are different degrees of approaching thereto: and the various mansions correspond to these.

Reply to Objection 3: Those who were in limbo or are now in purgatory have not yet attained to their end. Wherefore various mansions are not distinguished in purgatory or limbo, but only in heaven and hell, wherein is the end of the good and of the wicked.

ARTICLE 3. Whether the various mansions are distinguished according to the various degrees of charity?

Objection 1: It would seem that the various mansions are not distinguished according to the various degrees of charity. For it is written (Mt. 25:15): "He gave to every one according to his proper virtue." Now the proper ability of a thing is its natural power. Therefore the gifts also of grace and glory are distributed according to the different degrees of natural power.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Ps. 61:12): "Thou wilt render to every man according to his works." Now that which is rendered is the measure of beatitude. Therefore the degrees of beatitude are distinguished according to the diversity of works and not according to the diversity of charity.

Objection 3: Further, reward is due to act and not to habit: hence "it is not the strongest who are crowned but those who engage in the conflict" (Ethic. i, 8) and "he . . . shall not be crowned except he strive lawfully." Now beatitude is a reward. Therefore the various degrees of beatitude will be according to the various degrees of works and not according to the various degrees of charity.

On the contrary, The more one will be united to God the happier will one be. Now the measure of charity is the measure of one's union with God. Therefore the diversity of beatitude will be according to the difference of charity.

Further, "if one thing simply follows from another thing simply, the increase of the former follows from the increase of the latter." Now to have beatitude follows from having charity. Therefore to have greater beatitude follows from having greater charity.

I answer that, The distinctive principle of the mansions or degrees of beatitude is twofold, namely proximate and remote. The proximate principle is the difference of disposition which will be in the blessed, whence will result the difference of perfection in them in respect to the beatific operation: while the remote principle is the merit by which they have obtained that beatitude. In the first way the mansions are distinguished according to the charity of heaven, which the more perfect it will be in any one, the more will it render him capable of the Divine clarity, on the increase of which will depend the increase in perfection of the Divine vision. In the second way the mansions are distinguished according to the charity of the way. For our actions are meritorious, not by the very substance of the action, but only by the habit of virtue with which they are informed. Now every virtue obtains its meritorious efficacy from charity [FS, Question 114, Article 4], which has the end itself for its object [SS, Question 24, Article 3, ad 1]. Hence the diversity of merit is all traced to the diversity of charity, and thus the charity of the way will distinguish the mansions by way of merit.

Reply to Objection 1: In this passage "virtue" denotes not the natural ability alone, but the natural ability together with the endeavour to obtain grace [SS, Question 23, Article 8]. Consequently virtue in this sense will be a kind of material disposition to the measure of grace and glory that one will receive. But charity is the formal complement of merit in relation to glory, and therefore the distinction of degrees in glory depends on the degrees of charity rather than on the degrees of the aforesaid virtue.

Reply to Objection 2: Works in themselves do not demand the payment of a reward, except as informed by charity: and therefore the various degrees of glory will be according to the various degrees of charity.

Reply to Objection 3: Although the habit of charity or of any virtue whatever is not a merit to which a reward is due, it is none the less the principle and reason of merit in the act: and consequently according to its diversity is the diversity of rewards. This does not prevent our observing a certain degree of merit in the act considered generically, not indeed in relation to the essential reward which is joy in God, but in relation to some accidental reward, which is joy in some created good.

OF THE RELATIONS OF THE SAINTS TOWARDS THE DAMNED

Prologue

We must next consider the relations of the saints towards the damned. Under this head there are three points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the saints see the sufferings of the damned?
- (2) Whether they pity them?
- (3) Whether they rejoice in their sufferings?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the blessed in heaven will see the sufferings of the damned?

Objection 1: It would seem that the blessed in heaven will not see the sufferings of the damned. For the damned are more cut off from the blessed than wayfarers. But the blessed do not see the deeds of wayfarers: wherefore a gloss on Is. 63:16, "Abraham hath not known us," says: "The dead, even the saints, know not what the living, even their own children, are doing" [St. Augustine, De cura pro mortuis xiii, xv]. Much less therefore do they see the sufferings of the damned.

Objection 2: Further, perfection of vision depends on the perfection of the visible object: wherefore the Philosopher says (Ethic. x, 4) that "the most perfect operation of the sense of sight is when the sense is most disposed with reference to the most beautiful of the objects which fall under the sight." Therefore, on the other hand, any deformity in the visible object redounds to the imperfection of the sight. But there will be no imperfection in the blessed. Therefore they will not see the sufferings of the damned wherein there is extreme deformity.

On the contrary, It is written (Is. 66:24): "They shall go out and see the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against Me"; and a gloss says: "The elect will go out by understanding or seeing manifestly, so that they may be urged the more to praise God."

I answer that, Nothing should be denied the blessed that belongs to the perfection of their beatitude. Now everything is known the more for being compared with its contrary, because when contraries are placed beside one another they become more conspicuous. Wherefore in order that the happiness of the saints may be more delightful to them and that they may render more copious thanks to God for it, they are allowed to see perfectly the sufferings of the damned.

Reply to Objection 1: This gloss speaks of what the departed saints are able to do by nature: for it is not necessary that they should know by natural knowledge all that happens to the living. But the saints in heaven know distinctly all that happens both to wayfarers and to the damned. Hence Gregory says (Moral. xii) that Job's words

(14:21), "'Whether his children come to honour or dishonour, he shall not understand,' do not apply to the souls of the saints, because since they possess the glory of God within them, we cannot believe that external things are unknown to them."

Reply to Objection 2: Although the beauty of the thing seen conduces to the perfection of vision, there may be deformity of the thing seen without imperfection of vision: because the images of things whereby the soul knows contraries are not themselves contrary. Wherefore also God Who has most perfect knowledge sees all things, beautiful and deformed.

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 2. Whether the blessed pity the unhappiness of the damned?

Objection 1: It would seem that the blessed pity the unhappiness of the damned. For pity proceeds from charity [SS, Question 30]; and charity will be most perfect in the blessed. Therefore they will most especially pity the sufferings of the damned.

Objection 2: Further, the blessed will never be so far from taking pity as God is. Yet in a sense God compassionates our afflictions, wherefore He is said to be merciful.

On the contrary, Whoever pities another shares somewhat in his unhappiness. But the blessed cannot share in any unhappiness. Therefore they do not pity the afflictions of the damned.

I answer that, Mercy or compassion may be in a person in two ways: first by way of passion, secondly by way of choice. In the blessed there will be no passion in the lower powers except as a result of the reason's choice. Hence compassion or mercy will not be in them, except by the choice of reason. Now mercy or compassion comes of the reason's choice when a person wishes another's evil to be dispelled: wherefore in those things which, in accordance with reason, we do not wish to be dispelled, we have no such compassion. But so long as sinners are in this world they are in such a state that without prejudice to the Divine justice they can be taken away from a state of unhappiness and sin to a state of happiness. Consequently it is possible to have compassion on them both by the choice of the will---in which sense God, the angels and the blessed are said to pity them by desiring their salvation---and by passion, in which way they are pitied by the good men who are in the state of wayfarers. But in the future state it will be impossible for them to be taken away from their unhappiness: and consequently it will not be possible to pity their sufferings according to right reason. Therefore the blessed in glory will have no pity on the damned.

Reply to Objection 1: Charity is the principle of pity when it is possible for us out of charity to wish the cessation of a person's unhappiness. But the saints cannot desire this for the damned, since it would be contrary to Divine justice. Consequently the argument does not prove.

Reply to Objection 2: God is said to be merciful, in so far as He succors those whom it is befitting to be released from their afflictions in accordance with the order of wisdom and justice: not as though He pitied the damned except perhaps in punishing them less than they deserve.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 3. Whether the blessed rejoice in the punishment of the wicked?

Objection 1: It would seem that the blessed do not rejoice in the punishment of the wicked. For rejoicing in another's evil pertains to hatred. But there will be no hatred in the blessed. Therefore they will not rejoice in the unhappiness of the damned.

Objection 2: Further, the blessed in heaven will be in the highest degree conformed to God. Now God does not rejoice in our afflictions. Therefore neither will the blessed rejoice in the afflictions of the damned.

Objection 3: Further, that which is blameworthy in a wayfarer has no place whatever in a comprehensor. Now it is most reprehensible in a wayfarer to take pleasure in the pains of others, and most praiseworthy to grieve for them. Therefore the blessed nowise rejoice in the punishment of the damned.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 57:11): "The just shall rejoice when he shall see the revenge."

Further, it is written (Is. 56:24): "They shall satiate the sight of all flesh." Now satiety denotes refreshment of the mind. Therefore the blessed will rejoice in the punishment of the wicked.

I answer that, A thing may be a matter of rejoicing in two ways. First directly, when one rejoices in a thing as such: and thus the saints will not rejoice in the punishment of the wicked. Secondly, indirectly, by reason namely of something annexed to it: and in this way the saints will rejoice in the punishment of the wicked, by considering therein the order of Divine justice and their own deliverance, which will fill them with joy. And thus the Divine justice and their own deliverance will be the direct cause of the joy of the blessed: while the punishment of the damned will cause it indirectly.

Reply to Objection 1: To rejoice in another's evil as such belongs to hatred, but not to rejoice in another's evil by reason of something annexed to it. Thus a person sometimes rejoices in his own evil as when we rejoice in our own afflictions, as helping us to merit life: "My brethren, count it all joy when you shall fall into divers temptations" (James 1:2).

Reply to Objection 2: Although God rejoices not in punishments as such, He rejoices in them as being ordered by His justice.

Reply to Objection 3: It is not praiseworthy in a wayfarer to rejoice in another's afflictions as such: yet it is praiseworthy if he rejoice in them as having something annexed. However it is not the same with a wayfarer as with a comprehensor, because in a wayfarer the passions often forestall the judgment of reason, and yet sometimes such passions are praiseworthy, as indicating the good disposition of the mind, as in the case of shame pity and repentance for evil: whereas in a comprehensor there can be no passion but such as follows the judgment of reason.

OF THE GIFTS OF THE BLESSED

Prologue

We must now consider the gifts of the blessed; under which head there are five points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether any gifts should be assigned to the blessed?
- (2) Whether a gift differs from beatitude?
- (3) Whether it is fitting for Christ to have gifts?
- (4) Whether this is competent to the angels?
- (5) Whether three gifts of the soul are rightly assigned?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether any gifts should be assigned as dowry to the blessed?

Objection 1: It would seem that no gifts should be assigned as dowry to the blessed. For a dowry (Cod. v, 12, De jure dot. 20: Dig. xxiii, 3, De jure dot.) is given to the bridegroom for the upkeep of the burdens of marriage. But the saints resemble not the bridegroom but the bride, as being members of the Church. Therefore they receive no dowry.

Objection 2: Further, the dowry is given not by the bridegroom's father, but by the father of the bride (Cod. v, 11, De dot. promiss., 1: Dig. xxiii, 2, De rit. nup.). Now all the beatific gifts are bestowed on the blessed by the father of the bridegroom, i.e. Christ: "Every best gift and every perfect gift is from above coming down from the Father of lights." Therefore these gifts which are bestowed on the blessed should not be called a dowry.

Objection 3: Further, in carnal marriage a dowry is given that the burdens of marriage may be the more easily borne. But in spiritual marriage there are no burdens, especially in the state of the Church triumphant. Therefore no dowry should be assigned to that state.

Objection 4: Further, a dowry is not given save on the occasion of marriage. But a spiritual marriage is contracted with Christ by faith in the state of the Church militant. Therefore if a dowry is befitting the blessed, for the same reason it will be befitting the saints who are wayfarers. But it is not befitting the latter: and therefore neither is it befitting the blessed.

Objection 5: Further, a dowry pertains to external goods, which are styled goods of fortune: whereas the reward of the blessed will consist of internal goods. Therefore they should not be called a dowry.

On the contrary, It is written (Eph. 5:32): "This is a great sacrament: but I speak in Christ and in the Church." Hence it follows that the spiritual marriage is signified by the carnal marriage. But in a carnal marriage the dowered bride is brought to the dwelling of the bridegroom. Therefore since the saints are brought to Christ's dwelling when they are beatified, it would seem that they are dowered with certain gifts.

Further, a dowry is appointed to carnal marriage for the ease of marriage. But the spiritual marriage is more blissful than the carnal marriage. Therefore a dowry should be especially assigned thereto.

Further, the adornment of the bride is part of the dowry. Now the saints are adorned when they are taken into glory, according to Is. 61:10, "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation . . . as a bride adorned with her jewels." Therefore the saints in heaven have a dowry.

I answer that, Without doubt the blessed when they are brought into glory are dowered by God with certain gifts for their adornment, and this adornment is called their dowry by the masters. Hence the dower of which we speak now is defined thus: "The dowry is the everlasting adornment of soul and body adequate to life, lasting for ever in eternal bliss." This description is taken from a likeness to the material dowry whereby the bride is adorned and the husband provided with an adequate support for his wife and children, and yet the dowry remains inalienable from the bride, so that if the marriage union be severed it reverts to her. As to the reason of the name there are various opinions. For some say that the name "dowry" is taken not from a likeness to the corporeal marriage, but according to the manner of speaking whereby any perfection or adornment of any person whatever is called an endowment; thus a man who is proficient in knowledge is said to be endowed with knowledge, and in this sense Ovid employed the word "endowment" (De Arte Amandi i, 538): "By whatever endowment thou canst please, strive to please." But this does not seem quite fitting, for whenever a term is employed to signify a certain thing principally, it is not usually transferred to another save by reason of some likeness. Wherefore since by its primary signification a dowry refers to carnal marriage, it follows that in every other application of the term we must observe some kind of likeness to its principal signification. Consequently others say that the likeness consists in the fact that in carnal marriage a dowry is properly a gift bestowed by the bridegroom on the bride for her adornment when she is taken to the bridegroom's dwelling: and that this is shown by the words of Sicheim to Jacob and his sons (Gn. 34:12): "Raise the dowry, and ask gifts," and from Ex. 22:16: "If a man seduce a virgin . . . and lie with her, he shall endow her, and have her to wife." Hence the adornment bestowed by Christ on the saints, when they are brought into the abode of glory, is called a dowry. But this is clearly contrary to what jurists say, to whom it belongs to treat of these matters. For they say that a dowry, properly speaking, is a donation on the part of the wife made to those who are on the part of the husband, in view of the marriage burden which the husband has to bear; while that which the bridegroom gives the bride is called "a donation in view of marriage." In this sense dowry is taken (3 Kgs. 9:16) where it is stated that "Pharoa, the king of Egypt, took Gezer . . . and gave it for a dowry to his daughter, Solomon's wife." Nor do the authorities quoted prove anything to the contrary. For although it is customary for a dowry to be given by the maiden's parents, it happens sometimes that the bridegroom or his father gives the dowry instead of the bride's father; and this happens in two ways: either by reason of his very great love for the bride as in the case of Sichem's father Hemor, who on account of his son's great love for the maiden wished to give the dowry which he had a right to receive; or as a punishment on the bridegroom, that he should out of his own possessions give a dowry to the virgin seduced by him, whereas he should have received it from the girl's father. In this sense Moses speaks in the passage quoted above. Wherefore in the opinion of others we should hold that in carnal marriage a dowry, properly speaking, is that which is given by those on the wife's side to those on the husband's side, for the bearing of the marriage burden, as stated above. Yet the difficulty remains how this signification can be adapted to the case in point, since the heavenly adornments are given to the spiritual spouse by the Father of the Bridegroom. This shall be made clear by replying to the objections.

Reply to Objection 1: Although in carnal marriage the dowry is given to the bridegroom for his use, yet the ownership and control belong to the bride: which is evident by the fact that if the marriage be dissolved, the dowry reverts to the bride according to law (Cap. 1,2,3, De donat. inter virum et uxorem). Thus also in spiritual marriage, the very adornments bestowed on the spiritual bride, namely the Church in her members, belong indeed to the Bridegroom, in so far as they conduce to His glory and honor, yet to the bride as adorned thereby.

Reply to Objection 2: The Father of the Bridegroom, that is of Christ, is the Person of the Father alone: while the Father of the bride is the whole Trinity, since that which is effected in creatures belongs to the whole Trinity. Hence in spiritual marriage these endowments, properly speaking, are given by the Father of the bride rather than by the Father of the Bridegroom. Nevertheless, although this endowment is made by all the Persons, it may be in a manner appropriated to each Person. To the Person of the Father, as endowing, since He possesses authority; and fatherhood in relation to creatures is also appropriated to Him, so that He is Father of both Bridegroom and bride. To the Son it is appropriated, inasmuch as it is made for His sake and through Him: and to the Holy Ghost, inasmuch as it is made in Him and according to Him, since love is the reason of all giving [FP, Question 38, Article 2].

Reply to Objection 3: That which is effected by the dowry belongs to the dowry by its nature, and that is the ease of marriage: while that which the dowry removes, namely the marriage burden which is lightened thereby, belongs to it accidentally: thus it belongs to grace by its nature to make a man righteous, but accidentally to make an ungodly man righteous. Accordingly, though there are no burdens in the spiritual marriage, there is the greatest gladness; and that this gladness may be perfected the bride is dowered with gifts, so that by their means she may be happily united with the bridegroom.

Reply to Objection 4: The dowry is usually settled on the bride not when she is espoused, but when she is taken to the bridegroom's dwelling, so as to be in the presence of the bridegroom, since "while we are in the body we are absent from the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:6). Hence the gifts bestowed on the saints in this life are not called a dowry, but those which are bestowed on them when they are received into glory, where the Bridegroom delights them with His presence.

Reply to Objection 5: In spiritual marriage inward comeliness is required, wherefore it is written (Ps. 44:14): "All the glory of the king's daughter is within," etc. But in carnal marriage outward comeliness is necessary. Hence there is no need for a dowry of this kind to be appointed in spiritual marriage as in carnal marriage.

ARTICLE 2. Whether the dowry is the same as beatitude?

Objection 1: It would seem that the dowry is the same as beatitude. For as appears from the definition of dowry (Article 1), the dowry is "the everlasting adornment of body and soul in eternal happiness." Now the happiness of the soul is an adornment thereof. Therefore beatitude is a dowry.

Objection 2: Further, a dowry signifies something whereby the union of bride and bridegroom is rendered delightful. Now such is beatitude in the spiritual marriage. Therefore beatitude is a dowry.

Objection 3: Further, according to Augustine (In Ps. 92) vision is "the whole essence of beatitude." Now vision is accounted one of the dowries. Therefore beatitude is a dowry.

Objection 4: Further, fruition gives happiness. Now fruition is a dowry. Therefore a dowry gives happiness and thus beatitude is a dowry.

Objection 5: Further, according to Boethius (De Consol. iii), "beatitude is a state made perfect by the aggregate of all good things." Now the state of the blessed is perfected by the dowries. Therefore the dowries are part of beatitude.

On the contrary, The dowries are given without merits: whereas beatitude is not given, but is awarded in return for merits. Therefore beatitude is not a dowry.

Further, beatitude is one only, whereas the dowries are several. Therefore beatitude is not a dowry.

Further, beatitude is in man according to that which is principal in him (Ethic. x, 7): whereas a dowry is also appointed to the body. Therefore dowry and beatitude are not the same.

I answer that, There are two opinions on this question. For some say that beatitude and dowry are the same in reality but differ in aspect: because dowry regards the spiritual marriage between Christ and the soul, whereas beatitude does not. But seemingly this will not stand, since beatitude consists in an operation, whereas a dowry is not an operation, but a quality or disposition. Wherefore according to others it must be stated that beatitude and dowry differ even in reality, beatitude being the perfect operation itself by which the soul is united to God, while the dowries are habits or dispositions or any other qualities directed to this same perfect operation, so that they are directed to beatitude instead of being in it as parts thereof.

Reply to Objection 1: Beatitude, properly speaking, is not an adornment of the soul, but something resulting from the soul's adornment; since it is an operation, while its adornment is a certain comeliness of the blessed themselves.

Reply to Objection 2: Beatitude is not directed to the union but is the union itself of the soul with Christ. This union is by an operation, whereas the dowries are gifts disposing to this same union.

Reply to Objection 3: Vision may be taken in two ways. First, actually, i.e. for the act itself of vision; and thus vision is not a dowry, but beatitude itself. Secondly, it may be taken habitually, i.e. for the habit whereby this act is elicited, namely the clarity of glory, by which the soul is enlightened from above to see God: and thus it is a dowry and the principle of beatitude, but not beatitude itself. The same answer applies to OBJ 4.

Reply to Objection 5: Beatitude is the sum of all goods not as though they were essential parts of beatitude, but as being in a way directed to beatitude, as stated above.

▪ Index

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 3. Whether it is fitting that Christ should receive a dowry?

Objection 1: It would seem fitting that Christ should receive a dowry. For the saints will be conformed to Christ through glory, according to Phil. 3:21, "Who will reform the body of our lowliness made like to the body of His glory." Therefore Christ also will have a dowry.

Objection 2: Further, in the spiritual marriage a dowry is given in likeness to a carnal marriage. Now there is a spiritual marriage in Christ, which is peculiar to Him, namely of the two natures in one Person, in regard to which the human nature in Him is said to have been espoused by the Word, as a gloss [St. Augustine, De Consensu Evang. i, 40] has it on Ps. 18:6, "He hath set His tabernacle in the sun," etc., and Apoc. 21:3, "Behold the tabernacle of God with men." Therefore it is fitting that Christ should have a dowry.

Objection 3: Further, Augustine says (De Doctr. Christ. iii) that Christ, according to the Rule [Liber regularum] of Tyconius, on account of the unity of the mystic body that exists between the head and its members, calls Himself also the Bride and not only the Bridegroom, as may be gathered from Is. 61:10, "As a bridegroom decked with a crown, and as a bride adorned with her jewels." Since then a dowry is due to the bride, it would seem that Christ ought to receive a dowry.

Objection 4: Further, a dowry is due to all the members of the Church, since the Church is the spouse. But Christ is a member of the Church according to 1 Cor. 12:27, "You are the body of Christ, and members of member, i.e. of Christ," according to a gloss. Therefore the dowry is due to Christ.

Objection 5: Further, Christ has perfect vision, fruition, and joy. Now these are the dowries. Therefore, etc.

On the contrary, A distinction of persons is requisite between the bridegroom and the bride. But in Christ there is nothing personally distinct from the Son of God Who is the Bridegroom, as stated in Jn. 3:29, "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom." Therefore since the dowry is allotted to the bride or for the bride, it would seem unfitting for Christ to have a dowry.

Further, the same person does not both give and receive a dowry. But it is Christ Who gives spiritual dowries. Therefore it is not fitting that Christ should have a dowry.

I answer that, There are two opinions on this point. For some say that there is a threefold union in Christ. One is the union of concord, whereby He is united to God in the bond of love; another is the union of condescension, whereby the human nature is united to the Divine; the third is the union whereby Christ is united to the Church. They say, then, that as regards the first two unions it is fitting for Christ to have the dowries as such, but as regards the third, it is fitting for Him to have the dowries in the most excellent degree, considered as to that in which they consist, but not considered as dowries; because in this union Christ is the bridegroom and the Church the bride, and a dowry is given to the bride as regards property and control, although it is given to the bridegroom as to use. But this does not seem congruous. For in the union of Christ with the Father by the concord of love, even if we consider Him as God, there is not said to be a marriage, since it implies no subjection such as is required in the bride towards the bridegroom. Nor again in the union of the human nature with the Divine, whether we consider the Personal union or that which regards the conformity of will, can there be a dowry, properly speaking, for three reasons. First, because in a marriage where a dowry is given there should be likeness of nature between bridegroom and bride, and this is lacking in the union of the human nature with the Divine; secondly, because there is required a distinction of persons, and the human nature is not personally distinct from the Word; thirdly, because a dowry is given when the bride is first taken to the dwelling of the bridegroom and thus would seem to belong to the bride, who from being not united becomes united; whereas the human nature, which was assumed into the unity of Person by the Word, never was otherwise than perfectly united. Wherefore in the opinion of others we should say that the notion of dowry is either altogether unbecoming to Christ, or not so properly as to the saints; but that the things which we call dowries befit Him in the highest degree.

Reply to Objection 1: This conformity must be understood to refer to the thing which is a dowry and not to the notion of a dowry being in Christ: for it is not requisite that the thing in which we are conformed to Christ should be in the same way in Christ and in us.

Reply to Objection 2: Human nature is not properly said to be a bride in its union with the Word, since the distinction of persons, which is requisite between bridegroom and bride, is not observed therein. That human nature is sometimes described as being espoused in reference to its union with the Word is because it has a certain act of the bride, in that it is united to the Bridegroom inseparably, and in this union is subject to the Word and ruled by the Word, as the bride by the bridegroom.

Reply to Objection 3: If Christ is sometimes spoken of as the Bride, this is not because He is the Bride in very truth, but in so far as He personifies His spouse, namely the Church, who is united to Him spiritually. Hence nothing hinders Him, in this way of speaking, from being said to have the dowries, not that He Himself is dowered, but the Church.

Reply to Objection 4: The term Church is taken in two senses. For sometimes it denotes the body only, which is united to Christ as its Head. In this way alone has the Church the character of spouse: and in this way Christ is not a member of the Church, but is the Head from which all the members receive. In another sense the Church denotes the head and members united together; and thus Christ is said to be a member of the Church, inasmuch as He fulfills an office distinct from all others, by pouring forth life into the other members: although He is not very properly called a member, since a member implies a certain restriction, whereas in Christ spiritual good is not restricted but is absolutely entire [TP, Question 8, Article 1], so that He is the entire good of the Church, nor is He together with others anything greater than He is by Himself. Speaking of the Church in this sense, the Church denotes not only the bride, but the bridegroom and bride, in so far as one thing results from their spiritual union. Consequently although Christ be called a member of the Church in a certain sense, He can by no means be called a member of the bride; and therefore the idea of a dowry is not becoming to Him.

Reply to Objection 5: There is here a fallacy of "accident"; for these things are not befitting to Christ if we consider them under the aspect of dowry.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the angels receive the dowries?

Objection 1: It would seem that the angels receive dowries. For a gloss on Cantic of Canticles 6:8, "One is my dove," says: "One is the Church among men and angels." But the Church is the bride, wherefore it is fitting for the members of the Church to have the dowries. Therefore the angels have the dowries.

Objection 2: Further, a gloss on Lk. 12:36, "And you yourselves like to men who wait for their lord, when he shall return from the wedding," says: "Our Lord went to the wedding when after His resurrection the new Man espoused to Himself the angelic host." Therefore the angelic hosts are the spouse of Christ and consequently it is fitting that they should have the dowries.

Objection 3: Further, the spiritual marriage consists in a spiritual union. Now the spiritual union between the angels and God is no less than between beatified men and God. Since, then, the dowries of which we treat now are assigned by reason of a spiritual marriage, it would seem that they are becoming to the angels.

Objection 4: Further, a spiritual marriage demands a spiritual bridegroom and a spiritual bride. Now the angels are by nature more conformed than men to Christ as the supreme spirit. Therefore a spiritual marriage is more possible between the angels and Christ than between men and Christ.

Objection 5: Further, a greater conformity is required between the head and members than between bridegroom and bride. Now the conformity between Christ and the angels suffices for Christ to be called the Head of the angels. Therefore for the same reason it suffices for Him to be called their bridegroom.

On the contrary, Origen at the beginning of the prologue to his commentary on the Canticles, distinguishes four persons, namely "the bridegroom with the bride, the young maidens, and the companions of the bridegroom": and he says that "the angels are the companions of the bridegroom." Since then the dowry is due only to the bride, it would seem that the dowries are not becoming to the angels.

Further, Christ espoused the Church by His Incarnation and Passion: wherefore this is foreshadowed in the words (Ex. 4:25), "A bloody spouse thou art to me." Now by His Incarnation and Passion Christ was not otherwise united to the angels than before. Therefore the angels do not belong to the Church, if we consider the Church as spouse. Therefore the dowries are not becoming to the angels.

I answer that, Without any doubt, whatever pertains to the endowments of the soul is befitting to the angels as it is to men. But considered under the aspect of dowry they are not as becoming to the angels as to men, because the character of bride is not so properly becoming to the angels as to men. For there is required a conformity of nature between bridegroom and bride, to wit that they should be of the same species. Now men are in conformity with Christ in this way, since He took human nature, and by so doing became conformed to all men in the specific nature of man. on the other hand, He is not conformed to the angels in unity of species, neither as to His Divine nor as to His human nature. Consequently the notion of dowry is not so properly becoming to angels as to men. Since, however, in metaphorical expressions, it is not necessary to have a likeness in every respect, we must not argue that one thing is not to be said of another metaphorically on account of some lack of likeness; and consequently the argument we have adduced does not prove that the dowries are simply unbecoming to the angels, but only that they are not so properly befitting to angels as to men, on account of the aforesaid lack of likeness.

Reply to Objection 1: Although the angels are included in the unity of the Church, they are not members of the Church according to conformity of nature, if we consider the Church as bride: and thus it is not properly fitting for them to have the dowries.

Reply to Objection 2: Espousal is taken there in a broad sense, for union without conformity of specific nature: and in this sense nothing prevents our saying that the angels have the dowries taking these in a broad sense.

Reply to Objection 3: In the spiritual marriage although there is no other than a spiritual union, those whose union answers to the idea of a perfect marriage should agree in specific nature. Hence espousal does not properly befit the angels.

Reply to Objection 4: The conformity between the angels and Christ as God is not such as suffices for the notion of a perfect marriage, since so far are they from agreeing in species that there is still an infinite distance between them.

Reply to Objection 5: Not even is Christ properly called the Head of the angels, if we consider the head as requiring conformity of nature with the members. We must observe, however, that although the head and the other members are parts of an individual of one species, if we consider each one by itself, it is not of the same species as another member, for a hand is another specific part from the head. Hence, speaking of the members in themselves, the only conformity required among them is one of proportion, so that one receive from another, and one serve another. Consequently the conformity between God and the angels suffices for the notion of head rather than for that of bridegroom.

ARTICLE 5. Whether three dowries of the soul are suitably assigned?

Objection 1: It would seem unfitting to assign to the soul three dowries, namely, "vision," "love" and "fruition." For the soul is united to God according to the mind wherein is the image of the Trinity in respect of the memory, understanding, and will. Now love regards the will, and vision the understanding. Therefore there should be something corresponding to the memory, since fruition regards not the memory but the will.

Objection 2: Further, the beatific dowries are said to correspond to the virtues of the way, which united us to God: and these are faith, hope, and charity, whereby God Himself is the object. Now love corresponds to charity, and vision to faith. Therefore there should be something corresponding to hope, since fruition corresponds rather to charity.

Objection 3: Further, we enjoy God by love and vision only, since "we are said to enjoy those things which we love for their own sake," as Augustine says (De Doctr. Christ. i, 4). Therefore fruition should not be reckoned a distinct dowry from love.

Objection 4: Further, comprehension is required for the perfection of beatitude: "So run that you may comprehend" (1 Cor. 9:24). Therefore we should reckon a fourth dowry

Objection 5: Further, Anselm says (De Simil. xlviii) that the following pertain to the soul's beatitude: "wisdom, friendship, concord, power, honor, security, joy": and consequently the aforesaid dowries are reckoned unsuitably.

Objection 6: Further, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii) that "in that beatitude God will be seen unendingly, loved without wearying, praised untiringly." Therefore praise should be added to the aforesaid dowries.

Objection 7: Further, Boethius reckons five things pertaining to beatitude (De Consol. iii) and these are: Sufficiency which wealth offers, joy which pleasure offers, celebrity which fame offers, security which power offers, reverence which dignity offers.

Consequently it seems that these should be reckoned as dowries rather than the aforesaid.

I answer that, All agree in reckoning three dowries of the soul, in different ways however. For some say that the three dowries of the soul are vision, love, and fruition. others reckon them to be vision, comprehension, and fruition; others, vision, delight, and comprehension. However, all these reckonings come to the same, and their number is assigned in the same way. For it has been said (Article 2) that a dowry is something inherent to the soul, and directing it to the operation in which beatitude consists. Now two things are requisite in this operation: its essence which is vision, and its perfection which is delight: since beatitude must needs be a perfect operation. Again, a vision is delightful in two ways: first, on the part of the object, by reason of the thing seen being delightful; secondly, on the part of the vision, by reason of the seeing itself being delightful, even as we delight in knowing evil things, although the evil things themselves delight us not. And since this operation wherein ultimate beatitude consists must needs be most perfect, this vision must needs be delightful in both ways. Now in order that this vision be delightful on the part of the vision, it needs to be made connatural to the seer by means of a habit; while for it to be delightful on the part of the visible object, two things are necessary, namely that the visible object be suitable, and that it be united to the seer. Accordingly for the vision to be delightful on its own part a habit is required to elicit the vision, and thus we have one dowry, which all call vision. But on the part of the visible object two things are necessary. First, suitableness, which regards the affections---and in this respect some reckon love as a dowry, others fruition (in so far as fruition regards the affective part) since what we love most we deem most suitable. Secondly, union is required on the part of the visible object, and thus some reckon comprehension, which is nothing else than to have God present and to hold Him within ourself [FS, Question 4, Article 3]; while others reckon fruition, not of hope, which is ours while on the way, but of possession which is in heaven.

Thus the three dowries correspond to the three theological virtues, namely vision to faith, comprehension (or fruition in one sense) to hope, and fruition (or delight according to another reckoning to charity). For perfect fruition such as will be had in heaven includes delight and comprehension, for which reason some take it for the one, and some for the other.

Others, however, ascribe these three dowries to the three powers of the soul, namely vision to the rational, delight to the concupiscible, and fruition to the irascible, seeing that this fruition is acquired by a victory. But this is not said properly, because the irascible and concupiscible powers are not in the intellective but in the sensitive part, whereas the dowries of the soul are assigned to the mind.

Reply to Objection 1: Memory and understanding have but one act: either because understanding is itself an act of memory, or---if understanding denote a power---because memory does not proceed to act save through the medium of the understanding, since it belongs to the memory to retain knowledge. Consequently there is only one habit, namely knowledge, corresponding to memory and understanding: wherefore only one dowry, namely vision, corresponds to both.

Reply to Objection 2: Fruition corresponds to hope, in so far as it includes comprehension which will take the place of hope: since we hope for that which we have not yet; wherefore hope chafes somewhat on account of the distance of the beloved: for which reason it will not remain in heaven [SS, Question 18, Article 2] but will be succeeded by comprehension.

Reply to Objection 3: Fruition as including comprehension is distinct from vision and love, but otherwise than love from vision. For love and vision denote different habits, the one belonging to the intellect, the other to the affective faculty. But comprehension, or fruition as denoting comprehension, does not signify a habit distinct from those two, but the removal of the obstacles which made it impossible for the mind to be united to God by actual vision. This is brought about by the habit of glory freeing the soul from all defects; for instance by making it capable of knowledge without phantasms, of complete control over the body, and so forth, thus removing the obstacles which result in our being pilgrims from the Lord.

Reply to Objection 4: is clear from what has been said.

Reply to Objection 5: Properly speaking, the dowries are the immediate principles of the operation in which perfect beatitude consists and whereby the soul is united to Christ. The things mentioned by Anselm do not answer to this description; but they are such as in any way accompany or follow beatitude, not only in relation to the Bridegroom, to Whom "wisdom" alone of the things mentioned by him refers, but also in relation to others. They may be either one's equals, to whom "friendship" refers as regards the union of affections, and "concord" as regards consent in actions, or one's inferiors, to whom "power" refers, so far as inferior things are ordered by superior, and "honor" as regards that which inferiors offer to their superiors. Or again (they may accompany or follow beatitude) in relation to oneself: to this "security" refers as regards the removal of evil, and "joy" as regards the attainment of good.

Reply to Objection 6: Praise, which Augustine mentions as the third of those things which will obtain in heaven, is not a disposition to beatitude but rather a sequel to beatitude: because from the very fact of the soul's union with God, wherein beatitude consists, it follows that the soul breaks forth into praise. Hence praise has not the necessary conditions of a dowry.

Reply to Objection 7: The five things aforesaid mentioned by Boethius are certain conditions of beatitude, but not dispositions to beatitude or to its act, because beatitude by reason of its perfection has of itself alone and undividedly all that men seek in various things, as the Philosopher declares (Ethic. i, 7; x, 7,8). Accordingly Boethius shows that these five things obtain in perfect beatitude, because they are what men seek in temporal happiness. For they pertain either, as "security," to immunity from evil, or to the attainment either of the suitable good, as "joy," or of the perfect good, as "sufficiency," or to the manifestation of good, as "celebrity," inasmuch as the good of one is made known to others, or as "reverence," as indicating that good or the knowledge thereof, for reverence is the showing of honor which bears witness to virtue. Hence it is evident that these five should not be called dowries, but conditions of beatitude.

OF THE AUREOLES

Prologue

In the next place we must consider the aureoles. Under this head there are thirteen points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether the aureoles differ from the essential reward?
- (2) Whether they differ from the fruit?
- (3) Whether a fruit is due to the virtue of continence only?
- (4) Whether three fruits are fittingly assigned to the three parts of continence?
- (5) Whether an aureole is due to virgins?
- (6) Whether it is due to martyrs?
- (7) Whether it is due to doctors?
- (8) Whether it is due to Christ?
- (9) Whether to the angels?
- (10) Whether it is due to the human body?
- (11) Whether three aureoles are fittingly assigned?
- (12) Whether the virgin's aureole is the greatest?
- (13) Whether one has the same aureole in a higher degree than another?

■ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether the aureole is the same as the essential reward which is called the aurea?

Objection 1: It would seem that the aureole is not distinct from the essential reward which is called the "aurea." For the essential reward is beatitude itself. Now according to Boethius (De Consol. iii), beatitude is "a state rendered perfect by the aggregate of all goods." Therefore the essential reward includes every good possessed in heaven; so that the aureole is included in the "aurea."

Objection 2: Further, "more" and "less" do not change a species. But those who keep the counsels and commandments receive a greater reward than those who keep the commandments only, nor seemingly does their reward differ, except in one reward being greater than another. Since then the aureole denotes the reward due to works of perfection it would seem that it does not signify something distinct from the "aurea."

Objection 3: Further, reward corresponds to merit. Now charity is the root of all merit. Since then the "aurea" corresponds to charity, it would seem that there will be no reward in heaven other than the "aurea."

Objection 4: Further, "All the blessed are taken into the angelic orders" as Gregory declares (Hom. xxxiv in Evang.). Now as regards the angels, "though some of them receive certain gifts in a higher degree, nothing is possessed by any of them exclusively, for all gifts are in all of them, though not equally, because some are endowed more highly than others with gifts which, however, they all possess," as Gregory says (Hom. xxxiv in Evang.). Therefore as regards the blessed, there will be no reward other than that which is common to all. Therefore the aureole is not a distinct reward from the "aurea."

Objection 5: Further, a higher reward is due to higher merit. If, then, the "aurea" is due to works which are of obligation, and the aureole to works of counsel, the aureole will be more perfect than the "aurea," and consequently should not be expressed by a diminutive. Therefore it would seem that the aureole is not a distinct reward from the "aurea."

On the contrary, A gloss [Ven. Bede, De Tabernaculis i, 6] on Ex.

25:24,25, "Thou shalt make . . . another little golden crown [coronam aureolam]," says: "This crown denotes the new hymn which the virgins alone sing in the presence of the Lamb." Wherefore apparently the aureole is a crown awarded, not to all, but especially to some: whereas the aurea is awarded to all the blessed. Therefore the aureole is distinct from the "aurea."

Further, a crown is due to the fight which is followed by victory: "He . . . is not crowned except he strive lawfully" (2 Tim. 2:5). Hence where there is a special kind of conflict, there should be a special crown. Now in certain works there is a special kind of conflict. Therefore they deserve a special kind of crown, which we call an aureole.

Further, the Church militant comes down from the Church triumphant: "I saw the Holy City," etc. (Apoc. 21:2). Now in the Church militant special rewards are given to those who perform special deeds, for instance a crown to the conqueror, a prize to the runner. Therefore the same should obtain in the Church triumphant.

I answer that, Man's essential reward, which is his beatitude, consists in the perfect union of the soul with God, inasmuch as it enjoys God perfectly as seen and loved perfectly. Now this reward is called a "crown" or "aurea" metaphorically, both with reference to merit which is gained by a kind of conflict---since "the life of man upon earth is a warfare" (Job 7:1)---and with reference to the reward whereby in a way man is made a participator of the Godhead, and consequently endowed with regal power: "Thou hast made us to our God a kingdom," etc. (Apoc. 5:10); for a crown is the proper sign of regal power.

In like manner the accidental reward which is added to the essential has the character of a crown. For a crown signifies some kind of perfection, on account of its circular shape, so that for this very reason it is becoming to the perfection of the blessed. Since, however, nothing can be added to the essential, but what is less than it, the additional reward is called an "aureole." Now something may be added in two ways to this essential reward which we call the "aurea." First, in consequence of a condition attaching to the nature of the one rewarded: thus the glory of the body is added to the beatitude of the soul, wherefore this same glory of the body is sometimes called an "aureole." Thus a gloss of Bede on Ex. 25:25, "Thou . . . shalt make another little golden crown," says that "finally the aureole is added, when it is stated in the Scriptures that a higher degree of glory is in store for us when our bodies are resumed." But it is not in this sense that we speak of an aureole now. Secondly, in consequence of the nature of the meritorious act. Now this has the character of merit on two counts, whence also it has the character of good. First, to wit, from its root which is charity, since it is referred to the last end, and thus there is due to it the essential reward, namely the attainment of the end, and this is the "aurea." Secondly, from the very genus of the act which derives a certain praiseworthiness from its due circumstances, from the habit eliciting it and from its proximate end, and thus is due to it a kind of accidental reward which we call an "aureole": and it is in this sense that we regard the aureole now. Accordingly it must be said that an "aureole" denotes something added to the "aurea," a kind of joy, to wit, in the works one has done, in that they have the character of a signal victory: for this joy is distinct from the joy in being united to God, which is called the "aurea." Some, however, affirm that the common reward, which is the "aurea," receives the name of "aureole," according as it is given to virgins, martyrs, or doctors: even as money receives the name of debt through being due to some one, though the money and the debt are altogether the same. And that nevertheless this does not imply that the essential reward is any greater when it is called an "aureole"; but that it corresponds to a more excellent act, more excellent not in intensity of merit but in the manner of meriting; so that although two persons may have the Divine vision with equal clearness, it is called an "aureole" in one and not in the other in so far as it corresponds to higher merit as regards the way of meriting. But this would seem contrary to the meaning of the gloss quoted above. For if "aurea" and "aureole" were the same, the "aureole" would not be described as added to the "aurea." Moreover, since reward corresponds to merit, a more excellent reward must needs correspond to this more excellent way of meriting: and it is this excellence that we call an "aureole." Hence it follows that an "aureole" differs from the "aurea."

Reply to Objection 1: Beatitude includes all the goods necessary for man's perfect life consisting in his perfect operation. Yet some things can be added, not as being necessary for that perfect operation as though it were impossible without them, but as adding to the glory of beatitude. Hence they regard the well-being of beatitude and a certain fitness thereto. Even so civic happiness is embellished by nobility and bodily beauty and so forth, and yet it is possible without them as stated in Ethic. i, 8: and thus is the aureole in comparison with the happiness of heaven.

Reply to Objection 2: He who keeps the counsels and the commandments always merits more than he who keeps the commandments only, if we gather the notion of merit in works from the very genus of those works; but not always if we gauge the merit from its root, charity: since sometimes a man keeps the commandments alone out of greater charity than one who keeps both commandments and counsels. For the most part, however, the contrary happens, because the "proof of love is in the performance of deeds," as Gregory says (Hom. xxx in Evang.). Wherefore it is not the more excellent essential reward that is called an aureole, but that which is added to the essential reward without reference to the essential reward of the possessor of an aureole being greater, or less than, or equal to the essential reward of one who has no aureole.

Reply to Objection 3: Charity is the first principle of merit: but our actions are the instruments, so to speak, whereby we merit. Now in order to obtain an effect there is requisite not only a due disposition in the first mover, but also a right disposition in the instrument. Hence something principal results in the effect with reference to the first mover, and something secondary with reference to the instrument. Wherefore in the reward also there is something on the part of charity, namely the "aurea," and something on the part of the kind of work, namely the "aureole."

Reply to Objection 4: All the angels merited their beatitude by the same kind of act namely by turning to God: and consequently no particular reward is found in anyone which another has not in some way. But men merit beatitude by different kinds of acts: and so the comparison fails.

Nevertheless among men what one seems to have specially, all have in common in some way, in so far as each one, by charity, deems another's good his own. Yet this joy whereby one shares another's joy cannot be called an aureole, because it is not given him as a reward for his victory, but regards more the victory of another: whereas a crown is awarded the victors themselves and not to those who rejoice with them in the victory.

Reply to Objection 5: The merit arising from charity is more excellent than that which arises from the kind of action: just as the end to which charity directs us is more excellent than the things directed to that end, and with which our actions are concerned. Wherefore the reward corresponding to merit by reason of charity, however little it may be, is greater than any reward corresponding to an action by reason of its genus. Hence "aureole" is used as a diminutive in comparison with "aurea."

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 2. Whether the aureole differs from the fruit?

Objection 1: It would seem that the aureole does not differ from the fruit. For different rewards are not due to the same merit. Now the aureole and the hundredfold fruit correspond to the same merit, according to a gloss on Mt. 13:8, "Some a hundredfold." Therefore the aureole is the same as the fruit.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (De Virgin xlv) that the "hundredfold fruit is due to the martyrs, and also to virgins." Therefore the fruit is a reward common to virgins and martyrs. But the aureole also is due to them. Therefore the aureole is the same as the fruit.

Objection 3: Further, there are only two rewards in beatitude, namely the essential, and the accidental which is added to the essential. Now that which is added to the essential reward is called an aureole, as evidenced by the statement (Ex. 25:25) that the little crown [aureola] is added to the crown. But the fruit is not the essential reward, for in that case it would be due to all the blessed. Therefore it is the same as the aureole.

On the contrary, Things which are not divided in the same way are not of the same nature. Now fruit and aureole are not divided in the same way, since aureole is divided into the aureole of virgins, of martyrs, and of doctors: whereas fruit is divided into the fruit of the married, of widows, and of virgins. Therefore fruit and aureole are not the same.

Further, if fruit and aureole were the same, the aureole would be due to whomsoever the fruit is due. But this is manifestly untrue, since a fruit is due to widowhood, while an aureole is not. Therefore, etc.

I answer that, Metaphorical expressions can be taken in various ways, according as we find resemblances to the various properties of the thing from which the comparison is taken. Now since fruit, properly speaking, is applied to material things born of the earth, we employ it variously in a spiritual sense, with reference to the various conditions that obtain in material fruits. For the material fruit has sweetness whereby it refreshes so far as it is used by man: again it is the last thing to which the operation of nature attains: moreover it is that to which husbandry looks forward as the result of sowing or any other process. Accordingly fruit is taken in a spiritual sense sometimes for that which refreshes as being the last end: and according to this signification we are said to enjoy [frui] God perfectly in heaven, and imperfectly on the way. From this signification we have fruition which is a dowry: but we are not speaking of fruit in this sense now. Sometimes fruit signifies spiritually that which refreshes only, though it is not the last end; and thus the virtues are called fruits, inasmuch as "they refresh the mind with genuine sweetness," as Ambrose says [De Parad. xiii]. In this sense fruit is taken (Gal. 6:22): "The fruit of the Spirit is charity, joy," etc. Nor again is this the sense in which we speak of fruit now; for we have treated of this already [FS, Question 70, Article 1, ad 2].

We may, however, take spiritual fruit in another sense, in likeness to material fruit, inasmuch as material fruit is a profit expected from the labor of husbandry: so that we call fruit that reward which man acquires from his labor in this life: and thus every reward which by our labors we shall acquire for the future life is called a "fruit." In this sense fruit is taken (Rm. 6:22): "You have your fruit unto sanctification, and the end life everlasting." Yet neither in this sense do we speak of fruit now, but we are treating of fruit as being the product of seed: for it is in this sense that our Lord speaks of fruit (Mt. 13:23), where He divides fruit into thirtyfold, sixtyfold, and hundredfold. Now fruit is the product of seed in so far as the seed power is capable of transforming the humors of the soil into its own nature; and the more efficient this power, and the better prepared the soil, the more plentiful fruit will result. Now the spiritual seed which is sown in us is the Word of God: wherefore the more a person is transformed into a spiritual nature by withdrawing from carnal things, the greater is the fruit of the Word in him. Accordingly the fruit of the Word of God differs from the aurea and the aureole, in that the "aurea" consists in the joy one has in God, and the "aureole" in the joy one has in the perfection of one's works, whereas the "fruit" consists in the joy that the worker has in his own disposition as to his degree of spirituality to which he has attained through the seed of God's Word.

Some, however, distinguish between aureole and fruit, by saying that the aureole is due to the fighter, according to 2 Tim. 2:5, "He . . . shall not be crowned, except he strive lawfully"; whereas the fruit is due to the laborer, according to the saying of Wis. 3:15, "The fruit of good labors is glorious." Others again say that the "aurea" regards conversion to God, while the "aureole" and the "fruit" regard things directed to the end; yet so that the fruit regards the will rather, and the aureole the body. Since, however, labor and strife are in the same subject and about the same matter, and since the body's reward depends on the soul's, these explanations of the difference between fruit, aurea and aureole would only imply a logical difference: and this cannot be, since fruit is assigned to some to whom no aureole is assigned.

Reply to Objection 1: There is nothing incongruous if various rewards correspond to the same merit according to the various things contained therein. Wherefore to virginity corresponds the aurea in so far as virginity is kept for God's sake at the command of charity; the aureole, in so far as virginity is a work of perfection having the character of a signal victory; and the fruit, in so far as by virginity a person acquires a certain spirituality by withdrawing from carnal things.

Reply to Objection 2: Fruit, according to the proper acceptation as we are speaking of it now, does not denote the reward common to martyrdom and virginity, by that which corresponds to the three degrees of continency. This gloss which states that the hundredfold fruit corresponds to martyrs takes fruit in a broad sense, according as any reward is called a fruit, the hundredfold fruit thus denoting the reward due to any perfect works whatever.

Reply to Objection 3: Although the aureole is an accidental reward added to the essential reward, nevertheless not every accidental reward is an aureole, but only that which is assigned to works of perfection, whereby man is most conformed to Christ in the achievement of a perfect victory. Hence it is not unfitting that another accidental reward, which is called the fruit, be due sometimes to the withdrawal from a carnal life.

ARTICLE 3. Whether a fruit is due to the virtue of continence alone?

Objection 1: It would seem that a fruit is not due to the virtue of continence alone. For a gloss on 1 Cor. 15:41, "One is the glory of the sun," says that "the worth of those who have the hundredfold fruit is compared to the glory of the sun; to the glory of the moon those who have the sixtyfold fruit; and to the stars those who have the thirtyfold fruit." Now this difference of glory, in the meaning of the Apostle, regards any difference whatever of beatitude. Therefore the various fruits should correspond to none but the virtue of continence.

Objection 2: Further, fruits are so called from fruition. But fruition belongs to the essential reward which corresponds to all the virtues. Therefore, etc.

Objection 3: Further, fruit is due to labor: "The fruit of good labors is glorious" (Wis. 3:15). Now there is greater labor in fortitude than in temperance or continence. Therefore fruit does not correspond to continence alone.

Objection 4: Further, it is more difficult not to exceed the measure in food which is necessary for life, than in sexual matters without which life can be sustained: and thus the labor of frugality is greater than that of continence. Therefore fruit corresponds to frugality rather than to continence.

Objection 5: Further, fruit implies delight, and delight regards especially the end. Since then the theological virtues have the end for their object, namely God Himself, it would seem that to them especially the fruit should correspond.

On the contrary, is the statement of the gloss on Mt. 13:23, "The one a hundredfold," which assigns the fruits to virginity, widowhood, and conjugal continence, which are parts of continence.

I answer that, A fruit is a reward due to a person in that he passes from the carnal to the spiritual life. Consequently a fruit corresponds especially to that virtue which more than any other frees man from subjection to the flesh. Now this is the effect of continence, since it is by sexual pleasures that the soul is especially subject to the flesh; so much so that in the carnal act, according to Jerome (Ep. ad Ageruch.), "not even the spirit of prophecy touches the heart of the prophet," nor "is it possible to understand anything in the midst of that pleasure," as the Philosopher says (Ethic. vii, 11). Therefore fruit corresponds to continence rather than to another virtue.

Reply to Objection 1: This gloss takes fruit in a broad sense, according as any reward is called a fruit.

Reply to Objection 2: Fruition does not take its name from fruit by reason of any comparison with fruit in the sense in which we speak of it now, as evidenced by what has been said.

Reply to Objection 3: Fruit, as we speak of it now, corresponds to labor not as resulting in fatigue, but as resulting in the production of fruit. Hence a man calls his crops his labor, inasmuch as he labored for them, or produced them by his labor. Now the comparison to fruit, as produced from seed, is more adapted to continence than to fortitude, because man is not subjected to the flesh by the passions of fortitude, as he is by the passions with which continence is concerned.

Reply to Objection 4: Although the pleasures of the table are more necessary than the pleasures of sex, they are not so strong: wherefore the soul is not so much subjected to the flesh thereby.

Reply to Objection 5: Fruit is not taken here in the sense in which fruition applies to delight in the end; but in another sense as stated above (Article 2). Hence the argument proves nothing.

ARTICLE 4. Whether three fruits are fittingly assigned to the three parts of continence?

Objection 1: It would seem that three fruits are unfittingly assigned to the three parts of continence: because twelve fruits of the Spirit are assigned, "charity, joy, peace," etc. (Gal. 5:22). Therefore seemingly we should reckon only three.

Objection 2: Further, fruit denotes a special reward. Now the reward assigned to virgins, widows, and married persons is not a special reward, because all who are to be saved are comprised under one of these three, since no one is saved who lacks continence, and continence is adequately divided by these three. Therefore three fruits are unfittingly assigned to the three aforesaid.

Objection 3: Further, just as widowhood surpasses conjugal continence, so does virginity surpass widowhood. But the excess of sixtyfold over thirtyfold is not as the excess of a hundredfold over sixtyfold; neither in arithmetical proportion, since sixty exceeds thirty by thirty, and a hundred exceeds sixty by forty; nor in geometrical proportion, since sixty is twice thirty and a hundred surpasses sixty as containing the whole and two-thirds thereof. Therefore the fruits are unfittingly adapted to the degrees of continence.

Objection 4: Further, the statements contained in Holy Writ stand for all time: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away" (Lk. 21:33): whereas human institutions are liable to change every day. Therefore human institutions are not to be taken as a criterion of the statements of Holy Writ: and it would seem in consequence that the explanation of these fruits given by Bede is unfitting. For he says (Expos. in Luc. iii, 8) that "the thirtyfold fruit is assigned to married persons, because in the signs drawn on the 'abacus' the number 30 is denoted by the thumb and index finger touching one another at the tips as though kissing one another: so that the number 30 denotes the embraces of married persons. The number 60 is denoted by the contact of the index finger above the middle joint of the thumb, so that the index finger by lying over the thumb and weighing on it, signifies the burden which widows have to bear in this world. When, however, in the course of enumeration we come to the number 100 we pass from the left to the right hand, so that the number 100 denotes virginity, which has a share in the angelic excellence; for the angels are on the right hand, i.e. in glory, while we are on the left on account of the imperfection of the present life."

I answer that, By continence, to which the fruit corresponds, man is brought to a kind of spiritual nature, by withdrawing from carnal things. Consequently various fruits are distinguished according to the various manners of the spirituality resulting from continence. Now there is a certain spirituality which is necessary, and one which is superabundant. The spirituality that is necessary consists in the rectitude of the spirit not being disturbed by the pleasures of the flesh: and this obtains when one makes use of carnal pleasures according to the order of right reason. This is the spirituality of married persons. Spirituality is superabundant when a man withdraws himself entirely from those carnal pleasures which stifle the spirit. This may be done in two ways: either in respect of all time past, present, and future, and this is the spirituality of virgins; or in respect of a particular time, and this is the spirituality of widows. Accordingly to those who keep conjugal continence, the thirtyfold fruit is awarded; to those who keep the continence of widows, the sixtyfold fruit; and to those who keep virginal continence, the hundredfold fruit: and this for the reason given by Bede quoted above, although another motive may be found in the very nature of the numbers. For 30 is the product of 3 multiplied by 10. Now 3 is the number of everything, as stated in De Coelo et Mundo i, and contains a certain perfection common to all, namely of beginning, middle, and end. Wherefore the number 30 is fittingly assigned to married persons, in whom no other perfection is added to the observance of the Decalogue, signified by the number 10, than the common perfection without which there is no salvation. The number six the multiplication of which by 10 amounts to 60 has perfection from its parts, being the aggregate of all its parts taken together; wherefore it corresponds fittingly to widowhood, wherein we find perfect withdrawal from carnal pleasures as to all its circumstances (which are the parts so to speak of a virtuous act), since widowhood uses no carnal pleasures in connection with any person, place, or any other circumstance; which was not the case with conjugal continence. The number 100 corresponds fittingly to virginity; because the number 10 of which 100 is a multiple is the limit of numbers: and in like manner virginity occupies the limit of spirituality, since no further spirituality can be added to it. The number 100 also being a square number has perfection from its figure: for a square figure is perfect through being equal on all sides, since all its sides are equal: wherefore it is adapted to virginity wherein incorruption is found equally as to all times.

Reply to Objection 1: Fruit is not taken there in the sense in which we are taking it now.

Reply to Objection 2: Nothing obliges us to hold that fruit is a reward that is not common to all who will be saved. For not only the essential reward is common to all, but also a certain accidental reward, such as joy in those works without which one cannot be saved. Yet it may be said that the fruits are not becoming to all who will be saved, as is evidently the case with those who repent in the end after leading an incontinent life, for to such no fruit is due but only the essential reward.

Reply to Objection 3: The distinction of the fruits is to be taken according to the species and figures of the numbers rather than according to their quantity. Nevertheless even if we regard the excess in point of quantity, we may find an explanation. For the married man abstains only from one that is not his, the widow from both hers and not hers, so that in the latter case we find the notion of double, just as 60 is the double of 30. Again 100 is 60 X 40, which latter number is the product of 4 X 10, and the number 4 is the first solid and square number. Thus the addition of this number is fitting to virginity, which adds perpetual incorruption to the perfection of widowhood.

Reply to Objection 4: Although these numerical signs are a human institution, they are founded somewhat on the nature of things, in so far as the numbers are denoted in gradation, according to the order of the aforesaid joints and contacts.

ARTICLE 5. Whether an aureole is due on account of virginity?

Objection 1: It would seem that an aureole is not due on account of virginity. For where there is greater difficulty in the work, a greater reward is due. Now widows have greater difficulty than virgins in abstaining from the works of the flesh. For Jerome says (Ep. ad Ageruch.) that the greater difficulty certain persons experience in abstaining from the allurements of pleasure, the greater their reward, and he is speaking in praise of widows. Moreover, the Philosopher says (De Anim. Hist. vii) that "young women who have been deflowered desire sexual intercourse the more for the recollection of the pleasure." Therefore the aureole which is the greatest reward is due to widows more than to virgins.

Objection 2: Further, if an aureole were due to virginity, it would be especially found where there is the most perfect virginity. Now the most perfect virginity is in the Blessed Virgin, wherefore she is called the Virgin of virgins: and yet no aureole is due to her because she experienced no conflict in being continent, for she was not infected with the corruption of the fomes [TP, Question 27, Article 3]. Therefore an aureole is not due to virginity.

Objection 3: Further, a special reward is not due to that which has not been at all times praiseworthy. Now it would not have been praiseworthy to observe virginity in the state of innocence, since then was it commanded: "Increase and multiply and fill the earth" (Gn. 1:28): nor again during the time of the Law, since the barren were accursed. Therefore an aureole is not due to virginity.

Objection 4: Further, the same reward is not due to virginity observed, and virginity lost. Yet an aureole is sometimes due to lost virginity; for instance if a maiden be violated unwillingly at the order of a tyrant for confessing Christ. Therefore an aureole is not due to virginity.

Objection 5: Further, a special reward is not due to that which is in us by nature. But virginity is inborn in every man both good and wicked. Therefore an aureole is not due to virginity.

Objection 6: Further, as widowhood is to the sixtyfold fruit, so is virginity to the hundredfold fruit, and to the aureole. Now the sixtyfold fruit is not due to every widow, but only, as some say, to one who vows to remain a widow. Therefore it would seem that neither is the aureole due to any kind of virginity, but only to that which is observed by vow.

Objection 7: Further, reward is not given to that which is done of necessity, since all merit depends on the will. But some are virgins of necessity, such as those who are naturally cold-blooded, and eunuchs. Therefore an aureole is not always due to virginity.

On the contrary, A gloss on Ex. 25:25: "Thou shalt also make a little golden crown [coronam aureolam]" says: "This crown denotes the new hymn which the virgins sing in the presence of the Lamb, those, to wit, who follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." Therefore the reward due to virginity is called an aureole.

Further, It is written (Is. 56:4): "Thus saith the Lord to the eunuchs": and the text continues (Is. 56: 5): "I will give to them . . . a name better than sons and daughters": and a gloss [St. Augustine, De Virginit. xxv] says: "This refers to their peculiar and transcendent glory." Now the eunuchs "who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven" (Mt. 19:12) denote virgins. Therefore it would seem that some special reward is due to virginity, and this is called the aureole.

I answer that, Where there is a notable kind of victory, a special crown is due. Wherefore since by virginity a person wins a signal victory over the flesh, against which a continuous battle is waged: "The flesh lusteth against the spirit," etc. (Gal. 5:17), a special crown called the aureole is due to virginity. This indeed is the common opinion of all; but all are not agreed as to the kind of virginity to which it is due. For some say that the aureole is due to the act. So that she who actually remains a virgin will have the aureole provided she be of the number of the saved. But this would seem unreasonable, because in this case those who have the will to marry and nevertheless die before marrying would have the aureole. Hence others hold that the aureole is due to the state and not to the act: so that those virgins alone merit the aureole who by vow have placed themselves in the state of observing perpetual virginity. But this also seems unreasonable, because it is possible to have the same intention of observing virginity without a vow as with a vow. Hence it may be said otherwise that merit is due to every virtuous act commanded by charity. Now virginity comes under the genus of virtue in so far as perpetual incorruption of mind and body is an object of choice, as appears from what has been said above (Sent. iv, D, 33, Question 3, Articles 1,2) [TP, Question 152, Articles 1,3]. Consequently the aureole is due to those virgins alone, who had the purpose of observing perpetual virginity, whether or no they have confirmed this purpose by vow---and this I say with reference to the aureole in its proper signification of a reward due to merit---although this purpose may at some time have been interrupted, integrity of the flesh remaining withal, provided it be found at the end of life, because virginity of the mind may be restored, although virginity of the flesh cannot. If, however, we take the aureole in its broad sense for any joy added to the essential joy of heaven, the aureole will be applicable even to those who are incorrupt in flesh, although they had not the purpose of observing perpetual virginity. For without doubt they will rejoice in the incorruption of their body, even as the innocent will rejoice in having been free from sin, although they had no opportunity of sinning, as in the case of baptized children. But this is not the proper meaning of an aureole, although it is very commonly taken in this sense.

Reply to Objection 1: In some respects virgins experience a greater conflict in remaining continent; and in other respects, widows, other things being equal. For virgins are inflamed by concupiscence, and by the desire of experience, which arises from a certain curiosity as it were, which makes man more willing to see what he has never seen. Sometimes, moreover, this concupiscence is increased by their esteeming the pleasure to be greater than it is in reality, and by their failing to consider the grievances attaching to this pleasure. In these respects widows experience the lesser conflict, yet theirs is the greater conflict by reason of their recollection of the pleasure. Moreover, in different subjects one motive is stronger than another, according to the various conditions and dispositions of the subject, because some are more susceptible to one, and others to another. However, whatever we may say of the degree of conflict, this is certain---that the virgin's victory is more perfect than the widow's, for the most perfect and most brilliant kind of victory is never to have yielded to the foe: and the crown is due, not to the battle but to the victory gained by the battle.

Reply to Objection 2: There are two opinions about this. For some say that the Blessed Virgin has not an aureole in reward of her virginity, if we take aureole in the proper sense as referring to a conflict, but that she has something more than an aureole, on account of her most perfect purpose of observing virginity. Others say that she has an aureole even in its proper signification, and that a most transcendent one: for though she experienced no conflict, she had a certain conflict of the flesh, but owing to the exceeding strength of her virtue, her flesh was so subdued that she did not feel this conflict. This, however, would seem to be said without reason, for since we believe the Blessed Virgin to have been altogether immune from the inclination of the fomes on account of the perfection of her sanctification, it is wicked to suppose that there was in her any conflict with the flesh, since such like conflict is only from the inclination of the fomes, nor can temptation from the flesh be without sin, as declared by a gloss [St. Augustine, De Civ. Dei xix, 4] on 2 Cor. 12:7, "There was given me a sting of my flesh." Hence we must say that she has an aureole properly speaking, so as to be conformed in this to those other members of the Church in whom virginity is found: and although she had no conflict by reason of the temptation which is of the flesh, she had the temptation which is of the enemy, who feared not even Christ (Mt. 4).

Reply to Objection 3: The aureole is not due to virginity except as adding some excellence to the other degrees of continence. If Adam had not sinned, virginity would have had no perfection over conjugal continence, since in that case marriage would have been honorable, and the marriage-bed unsullied, for it would not have been dishonored by lust: hence virginity would not then have been observed, nor would an aureole have been due to it. But the condition of human nature being changed, virginity has a special beauty of its own, and consequently a special reward is assigned to it.

During the time of the Mosaic law, when the worship of God was to be continued by means of the carnal act, it was not altogether praiseworthy to abstain from carnal intercourse: wherefore no special reward would be given for such a purpose unless it came from a Divine inspiration, as is believed to have been the case with Jeremias and Elias, of whose marriage we do not read.

Reply to Objection 4: If a virgin is violated, she does not forfeit the aureole, provided she retain unfailingly the purpose of observing perpetual virginity, and nowise consent to the act. Nor does she forfeit virginity thereby; and be this said, whether she be violated for the faith, or for any other cause whatever. But if she suffer this for the faith, this will count to her for merit, and will be a kind of martyrdom: wherefore Lucy said: "If thou causest me to be violated against my will, my chastity will receive a double crown" [Office of S. Lucy; lect. vi of Dominican Breviary, December 13th]; not that she has two aureoles of virginity, but that she will receive a double reward, one for observing virginity, the other for the outrage she has suffered. Even supposing that one thus violated should conceive, she would not for that reason forfeit her virginity: nor would she be equal to Christ's mother, in whom there was integrity of the flesh together with integrity of the mind [SS, Question 64, Article 3, ad 3; SS, Question 124, Article 4, ad 2; SS, Question 152, Article 1].

Reply to Objection 5: Virginity is inborn in us as to that which is material in virginity: but the purpose of observing perpetual incorruption, whence virginity derives its merit, is not inborn, but comes from the gift of grace.

Reply to Objection 6: The sixtyfold fruit is due, not to every widow, but only to those who retain the purpose of remaining widows, even though they do not make it the matter of a vow, even as we have said in regard to virginity.

Reply to Objection 7: If cold-blooded persons and eunuchs have the will to observe perpetual incorruption even though they were capable of sexual intercourse, they must be called virgins and merit the aureole: for they make a virtue of necessity. If, on the other hand, they have the will to marry if they could, they do not merit the aureole. Hence Augustine says (De Sancta Virgin. xxiv): "For those like eunuchs whose bodies are so formed that they are unable to beget, it suffices when they become Christians and keep the commandments of God, that they have a mind to have a wife if they could, in order to rank with the faithful who are married."

ARTICLE 6. Whether an aureole is due to martyrs?

Objection 1: It would seem that an aureole is not due to martyrs. For an aureole is a reward given for works of supererogation, wherefore Bede commenting on Ex. 25:25, "Thou shalt also make another . . . crown," says: "This may be rightly referred to the reward of those who by freely choosing a more perfect life go beyond the general commandments." But to die for confessing the faith is sometimes an obligation, and not a work of supererogation as appears from the words of Rm. 10:10, "With the heart, we believe unto justice, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Therefore an aureole is not always due to martyrdom.

Objection 2: Further, according to Gregory (Moral. ix [St. Augustine, De Adult. Conjug. i, 14]) "the freer the service, the more acceptable it is." Now martyrdom has a minimum of freedom, since it is a punishment inflicted by another person with force. Therefore an aureole is not due to martyrdom, since it is accorded to surpassing merit.

Objection 3: Further, martyrdom consists not only in suffering death externally, but also in the interior act of the will: wherefore Bernard in a sermon on the Holy Innocents distinguishes three kinds of martyr---in will and not in death, as John; in both will and death, as Stephen; in death and not in will, as the Innocents. Accordingly if an aureole were due to martyrdom, it would be due to voluntary rather than external martyrdom, since merit proceeds from will. Yet such is not the case. Therefore an aureole is not due to martyrdom.

Objection 4: Further, bodily suffering is less than mental, which consists of internal sorrow and affliction of soul. But internal suffering is also a kind of martyrdom: wherefore Jerome says in a sermon on the Assumption [Ep. ad Paul. et Eustoch.]: "I should say rightly that the Mother of God was both virgin and martyr, although she ended her days in peace, wherefore: Thine own soul a sword hath pierced---namely for her Son's death." Since then no aureole corresponds to interior sorrow, neither should one correspond to outward suffering.

Objection 5: Further, penance itself is a kind of martyrdom, wherefore Gregory says (Hom. iii in Evang.): "Although persecution has ceased to offer the opportunity, yet the peace we enjoy is not without its martyrdom; since even if we no longer yield the life of the body to the sword, yet do we slay fleshly desires in the soul with the sword of the spirit." But no aureole is due to penance which consists in external works. Neither therefore is an aureole due to every external martyrdom.

Objection 6: Further, an aureole is not due to an unlawful work. Now it is unlawful to lay hands on oneself, as Augustine declares (De Civ. Dei i), and yet the Church celebrates the martyrdom of some who laid hands upon themselves in order to escape the fury of tyrants, as in the case of certain women at Antioch (Eusebius, Eccles. Hist. viii, 24). Therefore an aureole is not always due to martyrdom.

Objection 7: Further, it happens at times that a person is wounded for the faith, and survives for some time. Now it is clear that such a one is a martyr, and yet seemingly an aureole is not due to him, since his conflict did not last until death. Therefore an aureole is not always due to martyrdom.

Objection 8: Further, some suffer more from the loss of temporal goods than from the affliction even of their own body and this is shown by their bearing many afflictions for the sake of gain. Therefore if they be despoiled of their temporal goods for Christ's sake they would seem to be martyrs, and yet an aureole is not apparently due to them. Therefore the same conclusion follows as before.

Objection 9: Further, a martyr would seem to be no other than one who dies for the faith, wherefore Isidore says (Etym. vii): "They are called martyrs in Greek, witnesses in Latin: because they suffered in order to bear witness to Christ, and strove unto death for the truth." Now there are virtues more excellent than faith, such as justice, charity, and so forth, since these cannot be without grace, and yet no aureole is due to them. Therefore seemingly neither is an aureole due to martyrdom.

Objection 1:: Further, even as the truth of faith is from God, so is all other truth, as Ambrose declares, since "every truth by whomsoever uttered is from the Holy Ghost." Therefore if an aureole is due to one who suffers death for the truth of faith, in like manner it is also due to those who suffer death for any other virtue: and yet apparently this is not the case.

Objection 1:: Further, the common good is greater than the good of the individual. Now if a man die in a just war in order to save his country, an aureole is not due to him. Therefore even though he be put to death in order to keep the faith that is in himself, no aureole is due to him: and consequently the same conclusion follows as above.

Objection 1:: Further, all merit proceeds from the free will. Yet the Church celebrates the martyrdom of some who had not the use of the free will. Therefore they did not merit an aureole: and consequently an aureole is not due to all martyrs.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Sancta Virgin. xlvi): "No one, methinks, would dare prefer virginity to martyrdom." Now an aureole is due to virginity, and consequently also to martyrdom.

Further, the crown is due to one who has striven. But in martyrdom the strife presents a special difficulty. Therefore a special aureole is due thereto.

I answer that, Just as in the spirit there is a conflict with the internal concupiscences, so is there in man a conflict with the passion that is inflicted from without. Wherefore, just as a special crown, which we call an aureole, is due to the most perfect victory whereby we triumph over the concupiscences of the flesh, in a word to virginity, so too an aureole is due to the most perfect victory that is won against external assaults. Now the most perfect victory over passion caused from without is considered from two points of view. First from the greatness of the passion. Now among all passions inflicted from without, death holds the first place, just as sexual concupiscences are chief among internal passions. Consequently, when a man conquers death and things directed to death, his is a most perfect victory. Secondly, the perfection of victory is considered from the point of view of the motive of conflict, when, to wit, a man strives for the most honorable cause; which is Christ Himself. Both these things are to be found in martyrdom, which is death suffered for Christ's sake: for "it is not the pain but the cause that makes the martyr," as Augustine says (Contra Crescon. iii). Consequently an aureole is due to martyrdom as well as to virginity.

Reply to Objection 1: To suffer death for Christ's sake, is absolutely speaking, a work of supererogation; since every one is not bound to confess his faith in the face of a persecutor: yet in certain cases it is necessary for salvation, when, to wit, a person is seized by a persecutor and interrogated as to his faith which he is then bound to confess. Nor does it follow that he does not merit an aureole. For an aureole is due to a work of supererogation, not as such, but as having a certain perfection. Wherefore so long as this perfection remains, even though the supererogation cease, one merits the aureole.

Reply to Objection 2: A reward is due to martyrdom, not in respect of the exterior infliction, but because it is suffered voluntarily: since we merit only through that which is in us. And the more that which one suffers voluntarily is difficult and naturally repugnant to the will the more is the will that suffers it for Christ's sake shown to be firmly established in Christ, and consequently a higher reward is due to him.

Reply to Objection 3: There are certain acts which, in their very selves, contain intense pleasure or difficulty: and in such the act always adds to the character of merit or demerit, for as much as in the performance of the act the will, on account of the aforesaid intensity, must needs undergo an alteration from the state in which it was before. Consequently, other things being equal, one who performs an act of lust sins more than one who merely consents in the act, because in the very act the will is increased. In like manner since in the act of suffering martyrdom there is a very great difficulty, the will to suffer martyrdom does not reach the degree of merit due to actual martyrdom by reason of its difficulty: although, indeed it may possibly attain to a higher reward, if we consider the root of merit since the will of one man to suffer martyrdom may possibly proceed from a greater charity than another man's act of martyrdom. Hence one who is willing to be a martyr may by his will merit an essential reward equal to or greater than that which is due to an actual martyr. But the aureole is due to the difficulty inherent to the conflict itself of martyrdom: wherefore it is not due to those who are martyrs only in will.

Reply to Objection 4: Just as pleasures of touch, which are the matter of temperance, hold the chief place among all pleasures both internal and external, so pains of touch surpass all other pains. Consequently an aureole is due to the difficulty of suffering pains of touch, for instance, from blows and so forth, rather than to the difficulty of bearing internal sufferings, by reason of which, however, one is not properly called a martyr, except by a kind of comparison. It is in this sense that Jerome speaks.

Reply to Objection 5: The sufferings of penance are not a martyrdom properly speaking, because they do not consist in things directed to the causing of death, since they are directed merely to the taming of the flesh: and if any one go beyond this measure, such afflictions will be deserving of blame. However such afflictions are spoken of as a martyrdom by a kind of comparison. and they surpass the sufferings of martyrdom in duration but not in intensity.

Reply to Objection 6: According to Augustine (De Civ. Dei i) it is lawful to no one to lay hands on himself for any reason whatever; unless perchance it be done by Divine instinct as an example of fortitude that others may despise death. Those to whom the objection refers are believed to have brought death on themselves by Divine instinct, and for this reason the Church celebrates their martyrdom [SS, Question 64, Article 5].

Reply to Objection 7: If any one receive a mortal wound for the faith and survive, without doubt he merits the aureole: as instanced in blessed Cecilia who survived for three days, and many martyrs who died in prison. But, even if the wound he receives be not mortal, yet be the occasion of his dying, he is believed to merit the aureole: although some say that he does not merit the aureole if he happen to die through his own carelessness or neglect. For this neglect would not have occasioned his death, except on the supposition of the wound which he received for the faith: and consequently this wound previously received for the faith is the original occasion of his death, so that he would not seem to lose. the aureole for that reason, unless his neglect were such as to involve a mortal sin, which would deprive him of both aurea and aureole. If, however, by some chance or other he were not to die of the mortal wound received, or again if the wounds received were not mortal, and he were to die while in prison, he would still merit the aureole. Hence the martyrdom of some saints is celebrated in the Church for that they died in prison, having been wounded long before, as in the case of Pope Marcellus. Accordingly in whatever way suffering for Christ's sake be continued unto death, whether death ensue or not, a man becomes a martyr and merits the aureole. If, however, it be not continued unto death, this is not a reason for calling a person a martyr, as in the case of the blessed Sylvester, whose feast the Church does not solemnize as a martyr's, since he ended his days in peace, although previously he had undergone certain sufferings.

Reply to Objection 8: Even as temperance is not about pleasures of money, honors, and the like, but only about pleasures of touch as being the principal of all, so fortitude is about dangers of death as being the greatest of all (Ethic. iii, 6). Consequently the aureole is due to such injuries only as are inflicted on a person's own body and are of a nature to cause death. Accordingly whether a person lose his temporalities, or his good name, or anything else of the kind, for Christ's sake, he does not for that reason become a martyr, nor merit the aureole. Nor is it possible to love ordinate external things more than one's body; and inordinate love does not help one to merit an aureole: nor again can sorrow for the loss of corporeal things be equal to the sorrow for the slaying of the body and other like things [SS, Question 124, Article 5].

Reply to Objection 9: The sufficient motive for martyrdom is not only confession of the faith, but any other virtue, not civic but infused, that has Christ for its end. For one becomes a witness of Christ by any virtuous act, inasmuch as the works which Christ perfects in us bear witness to His goodness. Hence some virgins were slain for virginity which they desired to keep, for instance blessed Agnes and others whose martyrdom is celebrated by the Church.

Reply to Objection 1:: The truth of faith has Christ for end and object; and therefore the confession thereof, if suffering be added thereto, merits an aureole, not only on the part of the end but also on the part of the matter. But the confession of any other truth is not a sufficient motive for martyrdom by reason of its matter, but only on the part of the end; for instance if a person were willing to be slain for Christ's sake rather than sin against Him by telling any lie whatever.

Reply to Objection 1:: The uncreated good surpasses all created good. Hence any created end, whether it be the common or a private good, cannot confer so great a goodness on an act as can the uncreated end, when, to wit, an act is done for God's sake. Hence when a person dies for the common good without referring it to Christ, he will not merit the aureole; but if he refer it to Christ he will merit the aureole and he will be a martyr; for instance, if he defend his country from the attack of an enemy who designs to corrupt the faith of Christ, and suffer death in that defense.

Reply to Objection 1:: Some say that the use of reason was by the Divine power accelerated in the Innocents slain for Christ's sake, even as in John the Baptist while yet in his mother's womb: and in that case they were truly martyrs in both act and will, and have the aureole. others say, however, that they were martyrs in act only and not in will: and this seems to be the opinion of Bernard, who distinguishes three kinds of martyrs, as stated above (OBJ 3). In this case the Innocents, even as they do not fulfill all the conditions of martyrdom, and yet are martyrs in a sense, in that they died for Christ, so too they have the aureole, not in all its perfection, but by a kind of participation, in so far as they rejoice in having. been slain in Christ's service; thus it was stated above (Article 5) in reference to baptized children, that they will have a certain joy in their innocence and carnal integrity [SS, Question 124, Article 1, ad 1, where St. Thomas declares that the Holy Innocents were truly martyrs.]

ARTICLE 7. Whether an aureole is due to doctors?

Objection 1: It would seem that an aureole is not due to doctors. For every reward to be had in the life to come will correspond to some act of virtue. But preaching or teaching is not the act of a virtue. Therefore an aureole is not due to teaching or preaching.

Objection 2: Further, teaching and preaching are the result of studying and being taught. Now the things that are rewarded in the future life are not acquired by a man's study, since we merit not by our natural and acquired gifts. Therefore no aureole will be merited in the future life for teaching and preaching.

Objection 3: Further, exaltation in the life to come corresponds to humiliation in the present life, because "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Mt. 23:12). But there is no humiliation in teaching and preaching, in fact they are occasions of pride; for a gloss on Mt. 4:5, "Then the devil took Him up," says that "the devil deceives many who are puffed up with the honor of the master's chair." Therefore it would seem that an aureole is not due to preaching and teaching.

On the contrary, A gloss on Eph. 1:18,19, "That you may know . . . what is the exceeding greatness," etc. says: "The holy doctors will have an increase of glory above that which all have in common." Therefore, etc.

Further, a gloss on Canticle of Canticles 8:12, "My vineyard is before me," says: "He describes the peculiar reward which He has prepared for His doctors." Therefore doctors will have a peculiar reward: and we call this an aureole.

I answer that, Just as by virginity and martyrdom a person wins a most perfect victory over the flesh and the world, so is a most perfect victory gained over the devil, when a person not only refuses to yield to the devil's assaults, but also drives him out, not from himself alone, but from others also. Now this is done by preaching and teaching: wherefore an aureole is due to preaching and teaching, even as to virginity and martyrdom. Nor can we admit, as some affirm, that it is due to prelates only, who are competent to preach and teach by virtue of their office. but it is due to all whosoever exercise this act lawfully. Nor is it due to prelates, although they have the office of preaching, unless they actually preach, since a crown is due not to the habit, but to the actual strife, according to 2 Tim. 2:5, "He . . . shall not be crowned, except he strive lawfully."

Reply to Objection 1: Preaching and teaching are acts of a virtue, namely mercy, wherefore they are reckoned among the spiritual alms deeds [SS, Question 32, Article 2].

Reply to Objection 2: Although ability to preach and teach is sometimes the outcome of study, the practice of teaching comes from the will, which is informed with charity infused by God: and thus its act can be meritorious.

Reply to Objection 3: Exaltation in this life does not lessen the reward of the other life, except for him who seeks his own glory from that exaltation: whereas he who turns that exaltation to the profit of others acquires thereby a reward for himself. Still, when it is stated that an aureole is due to teaching, this is to be understood of the teaching of things pertaining to salvation, by which teaching the devil is expelled from men's hearts, as by a kind of spiritual weapon, of which it is said (2 Cor. 10:4): "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal but spiritual".

ARTICLE 8. Whether an aureole is due to Christ?

Objection 1: It would seem that an aureole is due to Christ. For an aureole is due to virginity, martyrdom, and teaching. Now these three were pre-eminently in Christ. Therefore an aureole is especially due to Him.

Objection 2: Further, whatever is most perfect in human things must be especially ascribed to Christ. Now an aureole is due as the reward of most excellent merits. Therefore it is also due to Christ.

Objection 3: Further, Cyprian says (De Habit. Virg.) that "virginity bears a likeness to God." Therefore the exemplar of virginity is in God. Therefore it would seem that an aureole is due to Christ even as God.

On the contrary, An aureole is described as "joy in being conformed to Christ." Now no one is conformed or likened to himself, as the Philosopher says (Metaph., lib. ix, 3). Therefore an aureole is not due to Christ.

Further, Christ's reward was never increased. Now Christ had no aureole from the moment of His conception, since then He had never fought. Therefore He never had an aureole afterwards.

I answer that, There are two opinions on this point. For some say that Christ has an aureole in its strict sense, seeing that in Him there is both conflict and victory, and consequently a crown in its proper acceptance. But if we consider the question carefully, although the notion of aurea or crown is becoming to Christ, the notion of aureole is not. For from the very fact that aureole is a diminutive term it follows that it denotes something possessed by participation and not in its fulness. Wherefore an aureole is becoming to those who participate in the perfect victory by imitating Him in Whom the fulness of perfect victory is realized. And therefore, since in Christ the notion of victory is found chiefly and fully, for by His victory others are made victors---as shown by the words of Jn. 16:33, "Have confidence, I have overcome the world," and Apoc. 5:5, "Behold the lion of the tribe of Juda . . . hath prevailed"---it is not becoming for Christ to have an aureole, but to have something from which all aureoles are derived. Hence it is written (Apoc. 3:21): "To him that shall overcome, I will give to sit with Me in My throne, as I also have overcome, and am set down in My Father's throne." Therefore we must say with others that although there is nothing of the nature of an aureole in Christ, there is nevertheless something more excellent than any aureole.

Reply to Objection 1: Christ was most truly virgin, martyr, and doctor; yet the corresponding accidental reward in Christ is a negligible quantity in comparison with the greatness of His essential reward. Hence He has not an aureole in its proper sense.

Reply to Objection 2: Although the aureole is due to a most perfect work, yet with regard to us, so far as it is a diminutive term, it denotes the participation of a perfection derived from one in whom that perfection is found in its fulness. Accordingly it implies a certain inferiority, and thus it is not found in Christ in Whom is the fulness of every perfection.

Reply to Objection 3: Although in some way virginity has its exemplar in God, that exemplar is not homogeneous. For the incorruption of God, which virginity imitates is not in God in the same way as in a virgin.

ARTICLE 9. Whether an aureole is due to the angels?

Objection 1: It would seem that an aureole is due to the angels. For Jerome (Serm. de Assump. [Ep. ad Paul. et Eustoch. ix]) speaking of virginity says: "To live without the flesh while living in the flesh is to live as an angel rather than as a man": and a gloss on 1 Cor. 7:26, "For the present necessity," says that "virginity is the portion of the angels." Since then an aureole corresponds to virginity, it would seem due to the angels.

Objection 2: Further, incorruption of the spirit is more excellent than incorruption of the flesh. Now there is incorruption of spirit in the angels, since they never sinned. Therefore an aureole is due to them rather than to men incorrupt in the flesh and who have sinned at some time.

Objection 3: Further, an aureole is due to teaching. Now angels teach us by cleansing, enlightening, and perfecting [FP, Question 111, Article 1] us, as Dionysius says (Hier. Eccles. vi). Therefore at least the aureole of doctors is due to them.

On the contrary, It is written (2 Tim. 2:5): "He . . . shall not be crowned, except he strive lawfully." But there is no conflict in the angels. Therefore an aureole is not due to them.

Further, an aureole is not due to an act that is not performed through the body: wherefore it is not due to lovers of virginity, martyrdom or teaching, if they do not practice them outwardly. But angels are incorporeal spirits. Therefore they have no aureole.

I answer that, An aureole is not due to the angels. The reason of this is that an aureole, properly speaking, corresponds to some perfection of surpassing merit. Now those things which make for perfect merit in man are connatural to angels, or belong to their state in general, or to their essential reward. Wherefore the angels have not an aureole in the same sense as an aureole is due to men.

Reply to Objection 1: Virginity is said to be an angelic life, in so far as virgins imitate by grace what angels have by nature. For it is not owing to a virtue that angels abstain altogether from pleasures of the flesh, since they are incapable of such pleasures.

Reply to Objection 2: Perpetual incorruption of the spirit in the angels merits their essential reward: because it is necessary for their salvation, since in them recovery is impossible after they have fallen [FP, Question 64, Article 2].

Reply to Objection 3: The acts whereby the angels teach us belong to their glory and their common state: wherefore they do not merit an aureole thereby.

ARTICLE 10. Whether an aureole is also due to the body?

Objection 1: It would seem that an aureole is also due to the body. For the essential reward is greater than the accidental. But the dowries which belong to the essential reward are not only in the soul but also in the body. Therefore there is also an aureole which pertains to the accidental reward.

Objection 2: Further, punishment in soul and body corresponds to sin committed through the body. Therefore a reward both in soul and in body is due to merit gained through the body. But the aureole is merited through works of the body. Therefore an aureole is also due to the body.

Objection 3: Further, a certain fulness of virtue will shine forth in the bodies of martyrs, and will be seen in their bodily scars: wherefore Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxii): "We feel an undescribable love for the blessed martyrs so as to desire to see in that kingdom the scars of the wounds in their bodies, which they bore for Christ's name. Perchance indeed we shall see them, for this will not make them less comely, but more glorious. A certain beauty will shine in them, a beauty, though in the body, yet not of the body but of virtue." Therefore it would seem that the martyr's aureole is also in his body; and in like manner the aureoles of others.

On the contrary, The souls now in heaven have aureoles; and yet they have no body. Therefore the proper subject of an aureole is the soul and not the body.

Further, all merit is from the soul. Therefore the whole reward should be in the soul.

I answer that, Properly speaking the aureole is in the mind: since it is joy in the works to which an aureole is due. But even as from the joy in the essential reward, which is the aurea, there results a certain comeliness in the body, which is the glory of the body, so from the joy in the aureole there results a certain bodily comeliness: so that the aureole is chiefly in the mind, but by a kind of overflow it shines forth in the body.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections. It must be observed, however, that the beauty of the scars which will appear in the bodies of the martyrs cannot be called an aureole, since some of the martyrs will have an aureole in which such scars will not appear, for instance those who were put to death by drowning, starvation, or the squalor of prison.

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 11. Whether three aureoles are fittingly assigned, those of virgins, of martyrs, and of doctors?

Objection 1: It would seem that the three aureoles of virgins, martyrs, and doctors are unfittingly assigned. For the aureole of martyrs corresponds to their virtue of fortitude, the aureole of virgins to the virtue of temperance, and the aureole of doctors to the virtue of prudence. Therefore it seems that there should be a fourth aureole corresponding to the virtue of justice.

Objection 2: Further, a gloss on Ex. 25:25: "A polished crown, etc. says that a golden [aurea] crown is added, when the Gospel promises eternal life to those who keep the commandments: 'If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments' (Mt. 19:17). To this is added the little golden crown [aureola] when it is said: 'If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor'" (Mt. 19:21). Therefore an aureole is due to poverty.

Objection 3: Further, a man subjects himself wholly to God by the vow of obedience: wherefore the greatest perfection consists in the vow of obedience. Therefore it would seem that an aureole is due thereto.

Objection 4: Further, there are also many other works of supererogation in which one will rejoice in the life to come. Therefore there are many aureoles besides the aforesaid three.

Objection 5: Further, just as a man spreads the faith by preaching and teaching, so does he by publishing written works. Therefore a fourth aureole is due to those who do this.

I answer that, An aureole is an exceptional reward corresponding to an exceptional victory: wherefore the three aureoles are assigned in accordance with the exceptional victories in the three conflicts which beset every man. For in the conflict with the flesh, he above all wins the victory who abstains altogether from sexual pleasures which are the chief of this kind; and such is a virgin. Wherefore an aureole is due to virginity. In the conflict with the world, the chief victory is to suffer the world's persecution even until death: wherefore the second aureole is due to martyrs who win the victory in this battle. In the conflict with the devil, the chief victory is to expel the enemy not only from oneself but also from the hearts of others: this is done by teaching and preaching, and consequently the third aureole is due to doctors and preachers.

Some, however, distinguish the three aureoles in accordance with the three powers of the soul, by saying that the three aureoles correspond to the three chief acts of the soul's three highest powers. For the act of the rational power is to publish the truth of faith even to others, and to this act the aureole of doctors is due: the highest act of the irascible power is to overcome even death for Christ's sake, and to this act the aureole of martyrs is due: and the highest act of the concupiscible power is to abstain altogether from the greatest carnal pleasures, and to this act the aureole of virgins is due.

Others again, distinguish the three aureoles in accordance with those things whereby we are most signally conformed to Christ. For He was the mediator between the Father and the world. Hence He was a doctor, by manifesting to the world the truth which He had received from the Father; He was a martyr, by suffering the persecution of the world; and He was a virgin, by His personal purity. Wherefore doctors, martyrs and virgins are most perfectly conformed to Him: and for this reason an aureole is due to them.

Reply to Objection 1: There is no conflict to be observed in the act of justice as in the acts of the other virtues. Nor is it true that to teach is an act of prudence: in fact rather is it an act of charity or mercy---inasmuch as it is by such like habits that we are inclined to the practice of such an act---or again of wisdom, as directing it.

We may also reply, with others, that justice embraces all the virtues, wherefore a special aureole is not due to it.

Reply to Objection 2: Although poverty is a work of perfection, it does not take the highest place in a spiritual conflict, because the love of temporalities assails a man less than carnal concupiscence or persecution whereby his own body is broken. Hence an aureole is not due to poverty; but judicial power by reason of the humiliation consequent upon poverty. The gloss quoted takes aureole in the broad sense for any reward given for excellent merit.

We reply in the same way to the Third and Fourth Objections.

Reply to Objection 5: An aureole is due to those who commit the sacred doctrine to writing: but it is not distinct from the aureole of doctors, since the compiling of writing is a way of teaching.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 12. Whether the virgin's aureole is the greatest of all?

Objection 1: It would seem that the virgin's aureole is the greatest of all. For it is said of virgins (Apoc. 14:4) that they "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth," and (Apoc. 14:3) that "no" other "man could say the canticle" which the virgins sang. Therefore virgins have the most excellent aureole.

Objection 2: Further, Cyprian (De Habit. Virg.) says of virgins that they are "the more illustrious portion of Christ's flock." Therefore the greater aureole is due to them.

Objection 3: Again, it would seem that the martyr's aureole is the greatest. For Aymo, commenting on Apoc. 14:3, "No man could say the hymn," says that "virgins do not all take precedence of married folk; but only those who in addition to the observance of virginity are by the tortures of their passion on a par with married persons who have suffered martyrdom." Therefore martyrdom gives virginity its precedence over other states: and consequently a greater aureole is due to virginity.

Objection 4: Again, it would seem that the greatest aureole is due to doctors. Because the Church militant is modelled after the Church triumphant. Now in the Church militant the greatest honor is due to doctors (1 Tim. 5:17): "Let the priests that rule well be esteemed worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine." Therefore a greater aureole is due to them in the Church triumphant.

I answer that, Precedence of one aureole over another may be considered from two standpoints. First, from the point of view of the conflicts, that aureole being considered greater which is due to the more strenuous battle. Looking at it thus the martyr's aureole takes precedence of the others in one way, and the virgin's in another. For the martyr's battle is more strenuous in itself, and more intensely painful; while the conflict with the flesh is fraught with greater danger, inasmuch as it is more lasting and threatens us at closer quarters. Secondly, from the point of view of the things about which the battle is fought: and thus the doctor's aureole takes precedence of all others, since this conflict is about intelligible goods. while the other conflicts are about sensible passions. Nevertheless, the precedence that is considered in view of the conflict is more essential to the aureole; since the aureole, according to its proper character, regards the victory and the battle, and the difficulty of fighting which is viewed from the standpoint of the battle is of greater importance than that which is considered from our standpoint through the conflict being at closer quarters. Therefore the martyr's aureole is simply the greatest of all: for which reason a gloss on Mt. 5:10, says that "all the other beatitudes are perfected in the eighth, which refers to the martyrs," namely, "Blessed are they that suffer persecution." For this reason, too, the Church in enumerating the saints together places the martyrs before the doctors and virgins. Yet nothing hinders the other aureoles from being more excellent in some particular way. And this suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 13. Whether one person has an aureole more excellently than another person?

Objection 1: It would seem that one person has not the aureole either of virginity, or of martyrdom, or of doctrine more perfectly than another person. For things which have reached their term are not subject to intension or remission. Now the aureole is due to works which have reached their term of perfection. Therefore an aureole is not subject to intension or remission.

Objection 2: Further, virginity is not subject to being more or less, since it denotes a kind of privation; and privations are not subject to intension or remission. Therefore neither does the reward of virginity, the virgin's aureole to wit, receive intension or remission.

On the contrary, The aureole is added to the aurea. But the aurea is more intense in one than in another. Therefore the aureole is also.

I answer that, Since merit is somewhat the cause of reward, rewards must needs be diversified, according as merits are diversified: for the intension or remission of a thing follows from the intension or remission of its cause. Now the merit of the aureole may be greater or lesser: wherefore the aureole may also be greater or lesser.

We must observe, however, that the merit of an aureole may be intensified in two ways: first, on the part of its cause, secondly on the part of the work. For there may happen to be two persons, one of whom, out of lesser charity, suffers greater torments of martyrdom, or is more constant in preaching, or again withdraws himself more from carnal pleasures. Accordingly, intension not of the aureole but of the aurea corresponds to the intension of merit derived from its root; while intension of the aureole corresponds to intension of merit derived from the kind of act. Consequently it is possible for one who merits less in martyrdom as to his essential reward, to receive a greater aureole for his martyrdom.

Reply to Objection 1: The merits to which an aureole is due do not reach the term of their perfection simply, but according to their species: even as fire is specifically the most subtle of bodies. Hence nothing hinders one aureole being more excellent than another, even as one fire is more subtle than another.

Reply to Objection 2: The virginity of one may be greater than the virginity of another, by reason of a greater withdrawal from that which is contrary to virginity: so that virginity is stated to be greater in one who avoids more the occasions of corruption. For in this way privations may increase, as when a man is said to be more blind, if he be removed further from the possession of sight.

OF THE PUNISHMENT OF THE DAMNED

Prologue

In due sequence we must consider those things that concern the damned after the judgment: (1) The punishment of the damned, and the fire by which their bodies will be tormented; (2) matters relating to their will and intellect; (3) God's justice and mercy in regard to the damned.

Under the first head there are seven points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether in hell the damned are tormented with the sole punishment of fire?
- (2) Whether the worm by which they are tormented is corporeal?
- (3) Whether their weeping is corporeal?
- (4) Whether their darkness is material?
- (5) Whether the fire whereby they are tormented is corporeal?
- (6) Whether it is of the same species as our fire?
- (7) Whether this fire is beneath the earth?

▪ Back

▪ Index

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 1. Whether in hell the damned are tormented by the sole punishment of fire?

Objection 1: It would seem that in hell the damned are tormented by the sole punishment of fire; because Mt. 25:41, where their condemnation is declared, mention is made of fire only, in the words: "Depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire."

Objection 2: Further, even as the punishment of purgatory is due to venial sin, so is the punishment of hell due to mortal sin. Now no other punishment but that of fire is stated to be in purgatory, as appears from the words of 1 Cor. 3:13: "The fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is." Therefore neither in hell will there be a punishment other than of fire.

Objection 3: Further, variety of punishment affords a respite, as when one passes from heat to cold. But we can admit no respite in the damned. Therefore there will not be various punishments, but that of fire alone.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 10:7): "Fire and brimstone and storms of winds shall be the portion of their cup."

Further, it is written (Job 24:19): "Let him pass from the snow waters to excessive heat."

I answer that, According to Basil (Homilia vi in Hexaemeron and Hom. i in Ps. 38), at the final cleansing of the world, there will be a separation of the elements, whatever is pure and noble remaining above for the glory of the blessed, and whatever is ignoble and sordid being cast down for the punishment of the damned: so that just as every creature will be to the blessed a matter of joy, so will all the elements conduce to the torture of the damned, according to Wis. 5:21, "the whole world will fight with Him against the unwise." This is also becoming to Divine justice, that whereas they departed from one by sin, and placed their end in material things which are many and various, so should they be tormented in many ways and from many sources.

Reply to Objection 2: It is because fire is most painful, through its abundance of active force, that the name of fire is given to any torment if it be intense.

Reply to Objection 2: The punishment of purgatory is not intended chiefly to torment but to cleanse: wherefore it should be inflicted by fire alone which is above all possessed of cleansing power. But the punishment of the damned is not directed to their cleansing. Consequently the comparison fails.

Reply to Objection 3: The damned will pass from the most intense heat to the most intense cold without this giving them any respite: because they will suffer from external agencies, not by the transmutation of their body from its original natural disposition, and the contrary passion affording a respite by restoring an equable or moderate temperature, as happens now, but by a spiritual action, in the same way as sensible objects act on the senses being perceived by impressing the organ with their forms according to their spiritual and not their material being.

▪ Index

ARTICLE 2. Whether the worm of the damned is corporeal?

Objection 1: It would seem that the worm by which the damned are tormented is corporeal. Because flesh cannot be tormented by a spiritual worm. Now the flesh of the damned will be tormented by a worm: "He will give fire and worms into their flesh" (Judith 16:21), and: "The vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly is fire and worms" (Ecclus. 7:19). Therefore that worm will be corporeal.

Objection 2: Further, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxi, 9): . . . "Both, namely fire and worm, will be the punishment of the body." Therefore, etc.

On the contrary, Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 22): "The unquenchable fire and the restless worm in the punishment of the damned are explained in various ways by different persons. Some refer both to the body, some, both to the soul: others refer the fire, in the literal sense, to the body, the worm to the soul metaphorically: and this seems the more probable."

I answer that, After the day of judgment, no animal or mixed body will remain in the renewed world except only the body of man, because the former are not directed to incorruption [Question 91, Article 5], nor after that time will there be generation or corruption. Consequently the worm ascribed to the damned must be understood to be not of a corporeal but of a spiritual nature: and this is the remorse of conscience, which is called a worm because it originates from the corruption of sin, and torments the soul, as a corporeal worm born of corruption torments by gnawing.

Reply to Objection 1: The very souls of the damned are called their flesh for as much as they were subject to the flesh. Or we may reply that the flesh will be tormented by the spiritual worm, according as the afflictions of the soul overflow into the body, both here and hereafter.

Reply to Objection 2: Augustine speaks by way of comparison. For he does not wish to assert absolutely that this worm is material, but that it is better to say that both are to be understood materially, than that both should be understood only in a spiritual sense: for then the damned would suffer no bodily pain. This is clear to anyone that examines the context of his words in this passage.

▪ Index

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 3. Whether the weeping of the damned will be corporeal?

Objection 1: It would seem that the weeping of the damned will be corporeal. For a gloss on Lk. 13:28, "There will be weeping," says that "the weeping with which our Lord threatens the wicked is a proof of the resurrection of the body." But this would not be the case if that weeping were merely spiritual. Therefore, etc.

Objection 2: Further, the pain of the punishment corresponds to the pleasure of the sin, according to Apoc. 18:7: "As much as she hath glorified herself and lived in delicacies, so much torment and sorrow give ye to her." Now sinners had internal and external pleasure in their sin. Therefore they will also have external weeping.

On the contrary, Corporeal weeping results from dissolving into tears. Now there cannot be a continual dissolution from the bodies of the damned, since nothing is restored to them by food; for everything finite is consumed if something be continually taken from it. Therefore the weeping of the damned will not be corporeal.

I answer that, Two things are to be observed in corporeal weeping. One is the resolution of tears: and as to this corporeal weeping cannot be in the damned, since after the day of judgment, the movement of the first movable being being at an end, there will be neither generation, nor corruption, nor bodily alteration: and in the resolution of tears that humor needs to be generated which is shed forth in the shape of tears. Wherefore in this respect it will be impossible for corporeal weeping to be in the damned. The other thing to be observed in corporeal weeping is a certain commotion and disturbance of the head and eyes, and in this respect weeping will be possible in the damned after the resurrection: for the bodies of the damned will be tormented not only from without, but also from within, according as the body is affected at the instance of the soul's passion towards good or evil. In this sense weeping is a proof of the body's resurrection, and corresponds to the pleasure of sin, experienced by both soul and body.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the damned are in material darkness?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned are not in material darkness. For commenting on Job 10:22, "But everlasting horror dwelleth," Gregory says (Moral. ix): "Although that fire will give no light for comfort, yet, that it may torment the more it does give light for a purpose, for by the light of its flame the wicked will see their followers whom they have drawn thither from the world." Therefore the darkness there is not material.

Objection 2: Further, the damned see their own punishment, for this increases their punishment. But nothing is seen without light. Therefore there is no material darkness there.

Objection 3: Further, there the damned will have the power of sight after being reunited to their bodies. But this power would be useless to them unless they see something. Therefore, since nothing is seen unless it be in the light, it would seem that they are not in absolute darkness.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 22:13): "Bind his hands and his feet, and cast him into the exterior darkness." Commenting on these words Gregory says (Moral. ix): If this fire gave any light, "he would by no means be described as cast into exterior darkness."

Further, Basil says (Hom. i in Ps. 28:7, "The voice of the Lord divideth the flame of fire") that "by God's might the brightness of the fire will be separated from its power of burning, so that its brightness will conduce to the joy of the blessed, and the heat of the flame to the torment of the damned." Therefore the damned will be in material darkness.

Other points relating to the punishment of the damned have been decided above (Question 86).

I answer that, The disposition of hell will be such as to be adapted to the utmost unhappiness of the damned. Wherefore accordingly both light and darkness are there, in so far as they are most conducive to the unhappiness of the damned. Now seeing is in itself pleasant for, as stated in Metaph. i, "the sense of sight is most esteemed, because thereby many things are known."

Yet it happens accidentally that seeing is painful, when we see things that are hurtful to us, or displeasing to our will. Consequently in hell the place must be so disposed for seeing as regards light and darkness, that nothing be seen clearly, and that only such things be dimly seen as are able to bring anguish to the heart. Wherefore, simply speaking, the place is dark. Yet by Divine disposition, there is a certain amount of light, as much as suffices for seeing those things which are capable of tormenting the soul. The natural situation of the place is enough for this, since in the centre of the earth, where hell is said to be, fire cannot be otherwise than thick and cloudy, and reeky as it were.

Some hold that this darkness is caused by the massing together of the bodies of the damned, which will so fill the place of hell with their numbers, that no air will remain, so that there will be no translucent body that can be the subject of light and darkness, except the eyes of the damned, which will be darkened utterly.

This suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the fire of hell will be corporeal?

Objection 1: It would seem that the fire of hell whereby the bodies of the damned will be tormented will not be corporeal. For Damascene says (De Fide Orth. iv): The devil, and "demons, and his men" [2 Thess. 2:3], namely Antichrist, "together with the ungodly and sinners will be cast into everlasting fire, not material fire, such as that which we have, but such as God knoweth." Now everything corporeal is material. Therefore the fire of hell will not be corporeal.

Objection 2: Further, the souls of the damned when severed from their bodies are cast into hell fire. But Augustine says (Gen. ad lit. xii, 32): "In my opinion the place to which the soul is committed after death is spiritual and not corporeal." Therefore, etc.

Objection 3: Further, corporeal fire in the mode of its action does not follow the mode of guilt in the person who is burned at the stake, rather does it follow the mode of humid and dry: for in the same corporeal fire we see both good and wicked suffer. But the fire of hell, in its mode of torture or action, follows the mode of guilt in the person punished; wherefore Gregory says (Dial. iv, 63): "There is indeed but one hell fire, but it does not torture all sinners equally. For each one will suffer as much pain according as his guilt deserves." Therefore this fire will not be corporeal.

On the contrary, He says (Dial. iv, 29): "I doubt not that the fire of hell is corporeal, since it is certain that bodies are tortured there."

Further, it is written (Wis. 5:21): "The . . . world shall fight . . . against the unwise." But the whole world would not fight against the unwise if they were punished with a spiritual and not a corporeal punishment. Therefore they will be punished with a corporeal fire.

I answer that, There have been many opinions about the fire of hell. For some philosophers, as Avicenna, disbelieving in the resurrection, thought that the soul alone would be punished after death. And as they considered it impossible for the soul, being incorporeal, to be punished with a corporeal fire, they denied that the fire whereby the wicked are punished is corporeal, and pretended that all statements as to souls being punished in future after death by any corporeal means are to be taken metaphorically. For just as the joy and happiness of good souls will not be about any corporeal object, but about something spiritual, namely the attainment of their end, so will the torment of the wicked be merely spiritual, in that they will be grieved at being separated from their end, the desire whereof is in them by nature. Wherefore, just as all descriptions of the soul's delight after death that seem to denote bodily pleasure---for instance, that they are refreshed, that they smile, and so forth---must be taken metaphorically, so also are all such descriptions of the soul's suffering as seem to imply bodily punishment---for instance, that they burn in fire, or suffer from the stench, and so forth. For as spiritual pleasure and pain are unknown to the majority, these things need to be declared under the figure of corporeal pleasures and pains, in order that men may be moved the more to the desire or fear thereof. Since, however, in the punishment of the damned there will be not only pain of loss corresponding to the aversion that was in their sin, but also pain of sense corresponding to the conversion, it follows that it is not enough to hold the above manner of punishment. For this reason Avicenna himself (Met. ix) added another explanation, by saying that the souls of the wicked are punished after death, not by bodies but by images of bodies; just as in a dream it seems to a man that he is suffering various pains on account of such like images being in his imagination. Even Augustine seems to hold this kind of punishment (Gen. ad lit. xii, 32), as is clear from the text. But this would seem an unreasonable statement. For the imagination is a power that makes use of a bodily organ: so that it is impossible for such visions of the imagination to occur in the soul separated from the body, as in the soul of the dreamer. Wherefore Avicenna also that he might avoid this difficulty, said that the soul separated from the body uses as an organ some part of the heavenly body, to which the human body needs to be conformed, in order to be perfected by the rational soul, which is like the movers of the heavenly body---thus following somewhat the opinion of certain philosophers of old, who maintained that souls return to the stars that are their compeers. But this is absolutely absurd according to the Philosopher's teaching, since the soul uses a definite bodily organ, even as art uses definite instruments, so that it cannot pass from one body to another, as Pythagoras is stated (De Anima i, text. 53) to have maintained. As to the statement of Augustine we shall say below how it is to be answered (ad 2). However, whatever we may say of the fire that torments the separated souls, we must admit that the fire which will torment the bodies of the damned after the resurrection is corporeal, since one cannot fittingly apply a punishment to a body unless that punishment itself be bodily. Wherefore Gregory (Dial. iv) proves the fire of hell to be corporeal from the very fact that the wicked will be cast thither after the resurrection. Again Augustine, as quoted in the text of Sentent. iv, D, 44, clearly admits (De Civ. Dei xxi, 10) that the fire by which the bodies are tormented is corporeal. And this is the point at issue for the present. We have said elsewhere (Question 70, Article 3) how the souls of the damned are punished by this corporeal fire.

Reply to Objection 1: Damascene does not absolutely deny that this fire is material, but that it is material as our fire, since it differs from ours in some of its properties. We may also reply that since that fire does not alter bodies as to their matter, but acts on them for their punishment by a kind of spiritual action, it is for this reason that it is stated not to be material, not as regards its substance, but as to its punitive effect on bodies and, still more, on souls.

Reply to Objection 2: The assertion of Augustine may be taken in this way, that the place whither souls are conveyed after death be described as incorporeal, in so far as the soul is there, not corporeally, i.e. as bodies are in a place, but in some other spiritual way, as angels are in a place. Or we may reply that Augustine is expressing an opinion without deciding the point, as he often does in those books.

Reply to Objection 3: That fire will be the instrument of Divine justice inflicting punishment. Now an instrument acts not only by its own power and in its own way, but also by the power of the principal agent, and as directed thereby. Wherefore although fire is not able, of its own power, to torture certain persons more or less, according to the measure of sin, it is able to do so nevertheless in so far as its action is regulated by the ordering of Divine justice: even so the fire of the furnace is regulated by the forethought of the smith, according as the effect of his art requires.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the fire of hell is of the same species as ours?

Objection 1: It would seem that this fire is not of the same species as the corporeal fire which we see. For Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xx, 16): "In my opinion no man knows of what kind is the everlasting fire, unless the Spirit of God has revealed it to anyone." But all or nearly all know the nature of this fire of ours. Therefore that fire is not of the same species as this.

Objection 2: Further, Gregory commenting on Job 10:26, "A fire that is not kindled shall devour him," says (Moral. xv): "Bodily fire needs bodily fuel in order to become fire; neither can it be except by being kindled, nor live unless it be renewed. On the other hand the fire of hell, since it is a bodily fire, and burns in a bodily way the wicked cast therein, is neither kindled by human endeavor, nor kept alive with fuel, but once created endures unquenchably; at one and the same time it needs no kindling, and lacks not heat." Therefore it is not of the same nature as the fire that we see.

Objection 3: Further, the everlasting and the corruptible differ essentially, since they agree not even in genus, according to the Philosopher (Metaph. x). But this fire of ours is corruptible, whereas the other is everlasting: "Depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire" (Mt. 25:41). Therefore they are not of the same nature.

Objection 4: Further, it belongs to the nature of this fire of ours to give light. But the fire of hell gives no light, hence the saying of Job 18:5: "Shall not the light of the wicked be extinguished?" Therefore . . . as above.

On the contrary, According to the Philosopher (Topic. i, 6), "every water is of the same species as every other water." Therefore in like manner every fire is of the same species as every other fire.

Further, it is written (Wis. 11:17): "By what things a man sinneth by the same also he is tormented." Now men sin by the sensible things of this world. Therefore it is just that they should be punished by those same things.

I answer that, As stated in Meteor. iv, 1 fire has other bodies for its matter, for the reason that of all the elements it has the greatest power of action. Hence fire is found under two conditions: in its own matter, as existing in its own sphere, and in a strange matter, whether of earth, as in burning coal, or of air as in the flame. Under whatever conditions however fire be found, it is always of the same species, so far as the nature of fire is concerned, but there may be a difference of species as to the bodies which are the matter of fire. Wherefore flame and burning coal differ specifically, and likewise burning wood and red-hot iron; nor does it signify, as to this particular point, whether they be kindled by force, as in the case of iron, or by a natural intrinsic principle, as happens with sulphur. Accordingly it is clear that the fire of hell is of the same species as the fire we have, so far as the nature of fire is concerned. But whether that fire subsists in its proper matter, or if it subsists in a strange matter, what that matter may be, we know not. And in this way it may differ specifically from the fire we have, considered materially. It has, however, certain properties differing from our fire, for instance that it needs no kindling, nor is kept alive by fuel. But the differences do not argue a difference of species as regards the nature of the fire.

Reply to Objection 1: Augustine is speaking of that fire with regard to its matter, and not with regard to its nature.

Reply to Objection 2: This fire of ours is kept alive with fuel, and is kindled by man, because it is introduced into a foreign matter by art and force. But that other fire needs no fuel to keep it alive, because either it subsists in its own matter, or is in a foreign matter, not by force but by nature from an intrinsic principle. Wherefore it is kindled not by man but by God, Who fashioned its nature. This is the meaning of the words of Isaias (30:33): "The breath of the Lord is as a torrent of brimstone kindling it."

Reply to Objection 3: Even as the bodies of the damned will be of the same species as now, although now they are corruptible, whereas then they will be incorruptible, both by the ordering of Divine justice, and on account of the cessation of the heavenly movement, so is it with the fire of hell whereby those bodies will be punished.

Reply to Objection 4: To give light does not belong to fire according to any mode of existence, since in its own matter it gives no light; wherefore it does not shine in its own sphere according to the philosophers: and in like manner in certain foreign matters it does not shine, as when it is in an opaque earthly substance such as sulphur. The same happens also when its brightness is obscured by thick smoke. Wherefore that the fire of hell gives no light is not sufficient proof of its being of a different species.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the fire of hell is beneath the earth?

Objection 1: It would seem that this fire is not beneath the earth. For it is said of the damned (Job 18:18), "And God shall remove him out of the globe." Therefore the fire whereby the damned will be punished is not beneath the earth but outside the globe.

Objection 2: Further, nothing violent or accidental can be everlasting. But this fire will be in hell for ever. Therefore it will be there, not by force but naturally. Now fire cannot be under the earth save by violence. Therefore the fire of hell is not beneath the earth.

Objection 3: Further, after the day of judgment the bodies of all the damned will be tormented in hell. Now those bodies will fill a place. Consequently, since the multitude of the damned will be exceeding great, for "the number of fools is infinite" (Eccles. 1:15), the space containing that fire must also be exceeding great. But it would seem unreasonable to say that there is so great a hollow within the earth, since all the parts of the earth naturally tend to the center. Therefore that fire will not be beneath the earth.

Objection 4: Further, "By what things a man sinneth, by the same also he is tormented" (Wis. 11:17). But the wicked have sinned on the earth. Therefore the fire that punishes them should not be under the earth.

On the contrary, It is written (Is. 14:9): "Hell below was in an uproar to meet Thee at Thy coming." Therefore the fire of hell is beneath us.

Further, Gregory says (Dial. iv): "I see not what hinders us from believing that hell is beneath the earth."

Further, a gloss on Jonas 2:4, "Thou hast cast me forth . . . into the heart of the sea," says, "i.e. into hell," and in the Gospel (Mt. 12:40) the words "in the heart of the earth" have the same sense, for as the heart is in the middle of an animal, so is hell supposed to be in the middle of the earth.

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xv, 16), "I am of opinion that no one knows in what part of the world hell is situated, unless the Spirit of God has revealed this to some one." Wherefore

Gregory (Dial. iv) having been questioned on this point answers: "About this matter I dare not give a rash decision. For some have deemed hell to be in some part of the earth's surface; others think it to be beneath the earth." He shows the latter opinion to be the more probable for two reasons. First from the very meaning of the word. These are his words: "If we call it the nether regions, for the reason that it is beneath us [inferius], what earth is in relation to heaven, such should be hell in relation to earth." Secondly, from the words of Apoc. 5:3: "No man was able, neither in heaven, nor on earth, nor under the earth, to open the book": where the words "in heaven" refer to the angels, "on earth" to men living in the body, and "under the earth" to souls in hell. Augustine too (Gen. ad lit. xii, 34) seems to indicate two reasons for the congruity of hell being under the earth. One is that "whereas the souls of the departed sinned through love of the flesh, they should be treated as the dead flesh is wont to be treated, by being buried beneath the earth." The other is that heaviness is to the body what sorrow is to the spirit, and joy (of spirit) is as lightness (of body). Wherefore "just as in reference to the body, all the heavier things are beneath the others, if they be placed in order of gravity, so in reference to the spirit, the lower place is occupied by whatever is more sorrowful"; and thus even as the empyrean is a fitting place for the joy of the elect, so the lowest part of the earth is a fitting place for the sorrow of the damned. Nor does it signify that Augustine (De Civ. Dei xv, 16) says that "hell is stated or believed to be under the earth," because he withdraws this (Retract. ii, 29) where he says: "Methinks I should have said that hell is beneath the earth, rather than have given the reason why it is stated or believed to be under the earth." However, some philosophers have maintained that hell is situated beneath the terrestrial orb, but above the surface of the earth, on that part which is opposite to us. This seems to have been the meaning of Isidore when he asserted that "the sun and the moon will stop in the place wherein they were created, lest the wicked should enjoy this light in the midst of their torments." But this is no argument, if we assert that hell is under the earth. We have already stated how these words may be explained (Question 91, Article 2).

Pythagoras held the place of punishment to be in a fiery sphere situated, according to him, in the middle of the whole world: and he called it the prison-house of Jupiter as Aristotle relates (De Coelo et Mundo ii). It is, however, more in keeping with Scripture to say that it is beneath the earth.

Reply to Objection 1: The words of Job, "God shall remove him out of the globe," refer to the surface of the earth, i.e. from this world. This is how Gregory expounds it (Moral. xiv) where he says: "He is removed from the globe when, at the coming of the heavenly judge, he is taken away from this world wherein he now prides himself in his wickedness." Nor does globe here signify the universe, as though the place of punishment were outside the whole universe.

Reply to Objection 2: Fire continues in that place for all eternity by the ordering of Divine justice although according to its nature an element cannot last for ever outside its own place, especially if things were to remain in this state of generation and corruption. The fire there will be of the very greatest heat, because its heat will be all gathered together from all parts, through being surrounded on all sides by the cold of the earth.

Reply to Objection 3: Hell will never lack sufficient room to admit the bodies of the damned: since hell is accounted one of the three things that "never are satisfied" (Prov. 30:15,16). Nor is it unreasonable that God's power should maintain within the bowels of the earth a hollow great enough to contain all the bodies of the damned.

Reply to Objection 4: It does not follow of necessity that "by what things a man sinneth, by the same also he is tormented," except as regards the principal instruments of sin: for as much as man having sinned in soul and body will be punished in both. But it does not follow that a man will be punished in the very place where he sinned, because the place due to the damned is other from that due to wayfarers. We may also reply that these words refer to the punishments inflicted on man on the way: according as each sin has its corresponding punishment, since "inordinate love is its own punishment," as Augustine states (Confess. i, 12).

OF THE WILL AND INTELLECT OF THE DAMNED

Prologue

We must next consider matters pertaining to the will and intellect of the damned. Under this head there are nine points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether every act of will in the damned is evil?
- (2) Whether they ever repent of the evil they have done?
- (3) Whether they would rather not be than be?
- (4) Whether they would wish others to be damned?
- (5) Whether the wicked hate God?
- (6) Whether they can demerit?
- (7) Whether they can make use of the knowledge acquired in this life?
- (8) Whether they ever think of God?
- (9) Whether they see the glory of the blessed?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether every act of will in the damned is evil?

Objection 1: It would seem that not every act of will in the damned is evil. For according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv), "the demons desire the good and the best, namely to be, to live, to understand." Since, then, men who are damned are not worse off than the demons, it would seem that they also can have a good will.

Objection 2: Further, as Dionysius says (Div. Nom. iv), "evil is altogether involuntary." Therefore if the damned will anything, they will it as something good or apparently good. Now a will that is directly ordered to good is itself good. Therefore the damned can have a good will.

Objection 3: Further, some will be damned who, while in this world, acquired certain habits of virtue, for instance heathens who had civic virtues. Now a will elicits praiseworthy acts by reason of virtuous habits. Therefore there may be praiseworthy acts of the will in some of the damned.

On the contrary, An obstinate will can never be inclined except to evil. Now men who are damned will be obstinate even as the demons [FP, Question 64, Article 2]. Further, as the will of the damned is in relation to evil, so is the will of the blessed in regard to good. But the blessed never have an evil will. Neither therefore have the damned any good will.

I answer that, A twofold will may be considered in the damned, namely the deliberate will and the natural will. Their natural will is theirs not of themselves but of the Author of nature, Who gave nature this inclination which we call the natural will. Wherefore since nature remains in them, it follows that the natural will in them can be good. But their deliberate will is theirs of themselves, inasmuch as it is in their power to be inclined by their affections to this or that. This will is in them always evil: and this because they are completely turned away from the last end of a right will, nor can a will be good except it be directed to that same end. Hence even though they will some good, they do not will it well so that one be able to call their will good on that account.

Reply to Objection 1: The words of Dionysius must be understood of the natural will, which is nature's inclination to some particular good. And yet this natural inclination is corrupted by their wickedness, in so far as this good which they desire naturally is desired by them under certain evil circumstances [FP, Question 64, Article 2, ad 5].

Reply to Objection 2: Evil, as evil, does not move the will, but in so far as it is thought to be good. Yet it comes of their wickedness that they esteem that which is evil as though it were good. Hence their will is evil.

Reply to Objection 3: The habits of civic virtue do not remain in the separated soul, because those virtues perfect us only in the civic life which will not remain after this life. Even though they remained, they would never come into action, being enchained, as it were, by the obstinacy of the mind.

▪ Index

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 2. Whether the damned repent of the evil they have done?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned never repent of the evil they have done. For Bernard says on the Canticle [De Consideratione v, 12; De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio ix] that "the damned ever consent to the evil they have done." Therefore they never repent of the sins they have committed.

Objection 2: Further, to wish one had not sinned is a good will. But the damned will never have a good will. Therefore the damned will never wish they had not sinned: and thus the same conclusion follows as above.

Objection 3: Further, according to Damascene (De Fide Orth. ii), "death is to man what their fall was to the angels." But the angel's will is irrevocable after his fall, so that he cannot withdraw from the choice whereby he previously sinned [FP, Question 64, Article 2]. Therefore the damned also cannot repent of the sins committed by them.

Objection 4: Further, the wickedness of the damned in hell will be greater than that of sinners in the world. Now in this world some sinners repent not of the sins they have committed, either through blindness of mind, as heretics, or through obstinacy, as those "who are glad when they have done evil, and rejoice in most wicked things" (Prov. 2:14). Therefore, etc.

On the contrary, It is said of the damned (Wis. 5:3): "Repenting within themselves."

Further, the Philosopher says (Ethic. ix, 4) that "the wicked are full of repentance; for afterwards they are sorry for that in which previously they took pleasure." Therefore the damned, being most wicked, repent all the more.

I answer that, A person may repent of sin in two ways: in one way directly, in another way indirectly. He repents of a sin directly who hates sin as such: and he repents indirectly who hates it on account of something connected with it, for instance punishment or something of that kind. Accordingly the wicked will not repent of their sins directly, because consent in the malice of sin will remain in them; but they will repent indirectly, inasmuch as they will suffer from the punishment inflicted on them for sin.

Reply to Objection 1: The damned will wickedness, but shun punishment: and thus indirectly they repent of wickedness committed.

Reply to Objection 2: To wish one had not sinned on account of the shamefulness of vice is a good will: but this will not be in the wicked.

Reply to Objection 3: It will be possible for the damned to repent of their sins without turning their will away from sin, because in their sins they will shun, not what they heretofore desired, but something else, namely the punishment.

Reply to Objection 4: However obstinate men may be in this world, they repent of the sins indirectly, if they be punished for them. Thus Augustine says (Questions 83, qu. 36): "We see the most savage beasts are deterred from the greatest pleasures by fear of pain."

▪ Index

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 3. Whether the damned by right and deliberate reason would wish not to be?

Objection 1: It would seem impossible for the damned, by right and deliberate reason, to wish not to be. For Augustine says (De Lib. Arb. iii, 7): "Consider how great a good it is to be; since both the happy and the unhappy will it; for to be and yet to be unhappy is a greater thing than not to be at all."

Objection 2: Further, Augustine argues thus (De Lib. Arb. iii, 8): "Preference supposes election." But "not to be" is not eligible; since it has not the appearance of good, for it is nothing. Therefore not to be cannot be more desirable to the damned than "to be."

Objection 3: Further, the greater evil is the more to be shunned. Now "not to be" is the greatest evil, since it removes good altogether, so as to leave nothing. Therefore "not to be" is more to be shunned than to be unhappy: and thus the same conclusion follows as above.

On the contrary, It is written (Apoc. 9:6): "In those days men . . . shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them."

Further, the unhappiness of the damned surpasses all unhappiness of this world. Now in order to escape the unhappiness of this world, it is desirable to some to die, wherefore it is written (Ecclus. 41:3,4): "O death, thy sentence is welcome to the man that is in need and to him whose strength faileth; who is in a decrepit age, and that is in care about all things, and to the distrustful that loseth wisdom." Much more, therefore, is "not to be" desirable to the damned according to their deliberate reason.

I answer that, Not to be may be considered in two ways. First, in itself, and thus it can nowise be desirable, since it has no aspect of good, but is pure privation of good. Secondly, it may be considered as a relief from a painful life or from some unhappiness: and thus "not to be" takes on the aspect of good, since "to lack an evil is a kind of good" as the Philosopher says (Ethic. v, 1). In this way it is better for the damned not to be than to be unhappy. Hence it is said (Mt. 26:24): "It were better for him, if that man had not been born," and (Jer. 20:14): "Cursed be the day wherein I was born," where a gloss of Jerome observes: "It is better not to be than to be evilly." In this sense the damned can prefer "not to be" according to their deliberate reason [FP, Question 5, Article 2, ad 3].

Reply to Objection 1: The saying of Augustine is to be understood in the sense that "not to be" is eligible, not in itself but accidentally, as putting an end to unhappiness. For when it is stated that "to be" and "to live" are desired by all naturally, we are not to take this as referable to an evil and corrupt life, and a life of unhappiness, as the Philosopher says (Ethic. ix, 4), but absolutely.

Reply to Objection 2: Non-existence is eligible, not in itself, but only accidentally, as stated already.

Reply to Objection 3: Although "not to be" is very evil, in so far as it removes being, it is very good, in so far as it removes unhappiness, which is the greatest of evils, and thus it is preferred "not to be."

ARTICLE 4. Whether in hell the damned would wish others were damned who are not damned?

Objection 1: It would seem that in hell the damned would not wish others were damned who are not damned. For it is said (Lk. 16:27, 28) of the rich man that he prayed for his brethren, lest they should come "into the place of torments." Therefore in like manner the other damned would not wish, at least their friends in the flesh to be damned in hell.

Objection 2: Further, the damned are not deprived of their inordinate affections. Now some of the damned loved inordinately some who are not damned. Therefore they would not desire their evil, i.e. that they should be damned.

Objection 3: Further, the damned do not desire the increase of their punishment. Now if more were damned, their punishment would be greater, even as the joy of the blessed is increased by an increase in their number. Therefore the damned desire not the damnation of those who are saved.

On the contrary, A gloss on Is. 14:9, "are risen up from their thrones," says: "The wicked are comforted by having many companions in their punishment."

Further, envy reigns supreme in the damned. Therefore they grieve for the happiness of the blessed, and desire their damnation.

I answer that Even as in the blessed in heaven there will be most perfect charity, so in the damned there will be the most perfect hate. Wherefore as the saints will rejoice in all goods, so will the damned grieve for all goods. Consequently the sight of the happiness of the saints will give them very great pain; hence it is written (Is. 26:11): "Let the envious people see and be confounded, and let fire devour Thy enemies." Therefore they will wish all the good were damned.

Reply to Objection 1: So great will be the envy of the damned that they will envy the glory even of their kindred, since they themselves are supremely unhappy, for this happens even in this life, when envy increases. Nevertheless they will envy their kindred less than others, and their punishment would be greater if all their kindred were damned, and others saved, than if some of their kindred were saved. For this reason the rich man prayed that his brethren might be warded from damnation: for he knew that some are guarded therefrom. Yet he would rather that his brethren were damned as well as all the rest.

Reply to Objection 2: Love that is not based on virtue is easily voided, especially in evil men as the Philosopher says (Ethic. ix, 4). Hence the damned will not preserve their friendship for those whom they loved inordinately. Yet the will of them will remain perverse, because they will continue to love the cause of their inordinate loving.

Reply to Objection 3: Although an increase in the number of the damned results in an increase of each one's punishment, so much the more will their hatred and envy increase that they will prefer to be more tormented with many rather than less tormented alone.

ARTICLE 5. Whether the damned hate God?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned do not hate God. For, according to Dionysius (Div. Nom. iv), "the beautiful and good that is the cause of all goodness and beauty is beloved of all." But this is God. Therefore God cannot be the object of anyone's hate.

Objection 2: Further, no one can hate goodness itself, as neither can one will badness itself since "evil is altogether involuntary," as Dionysius asserts (Div. Nom. iv). Now God is goodness itself. Therefore no one can hate Him.

On the contrary, It is written (Ps. 73:23): "The pride of them that hate Thee ascendeth continually."

I answer that, The appetite is moved by good or evil apprehended. Now God is apprehended in two ways, namely in Himself, as by the blessed, who see Him in His essence; and in His effects, as by us and by the damned. Since, then, He is goodness by His essence, He cannot in Himself be displeasing to any will; wherefore whoever sees Him in His essence cannot hate Him. On the other hand, some of His effects are displeasing to the will in so far as they are opposed to any one: and accordingly a person may hate God not in Himself, but by reason of His effects. Therefore the damned, perceiving God in His punishment, which is the effect of His justice, hate Him, even as they hate the punishment inflicted on them [Question 90, Article 3, ad 2; SS, Question 34, Article 1].

Reply to Objection 1: The saying of Dionysius refers to the natural appetite. and even this is rendered perverse in the damned, by that which is added thereto by their deliberate will, as stated above (Article 1) [SS, Question 34, Article 1, ad 1 where St. Thomas gives another answer].

Reply to Objection 2: This argument would prove if the damned saw God in Himself, as being in His essence.

ARTICLE 6. Whether the damned demerit?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned demerit. For the damned have an evil will, as stated in the last Distinction of Sentent. iv. But they demerited by the evil will that they had here. Therefore if they demerit not there, their damnation is to their advantage.

Objection 2: Further, the damned are on the same footing as the demons. Now the demons demerit after their fall, wherefore God inflicted a punishment on the serpent, who induced man to sin (Gn. 3:14,15). Therefore the damned also demerit.

Objection 3: Further, an inordinate act that proceeds from a deliberate will is not excused from demerit, even though there be necessity of which one is oneself the cause: for the "drunken man deserves a double punishment" if he commit a crime through being drunk (Ethic. iii). Now the damned were themselves the cause of their own obstinacy, owing to which they are under a kind of necessity of sinning. Therefore since their act proceeds from their free will, they are not excused from demerit.

On the contrary, Punishment is contradistinguished from fault [FP, Question 48, Article 5]. Now the perverse will of the damned proceeds from their obstinacy which is their punishment. Therefore the perverse will of the damned is not a fault whereby they may demerit.

Further, after reaching the last term there is no further movement, or advancement in good or evil. Now the damned, especially after the judgment day, will have reached the last term of their damnation, since then there "will cease to be two cities," according to Augustine (Enchiridion cxi). Therefore after the judgment day the damned will not demerit by their perverse will, for if they did their damnation would be augmented.

I answer that, We must draw a distinction between the damned before the judgment day and after. For all are agreed that after the judgment day there will be neither merit nor demerit. The reason for this is because merit or demerit is directed to the attainment of some further good or evil: and after the day of judgment good and evil will have reached their ultimate consummation, so that there will be no further addition to good or evil. Consequently, good will in the blessed will not be a merit but a reward, and evil will in the damned will be not a demerit but a punishment only. For works of virtue belong especially to the state of happiness and their contraries to the state of unhappiness (Ethic. i, 9,10).

On the other hand, some say that, before the judgment day, both the good merit and the damned demerit. But this cannot apply to the essential reward or to the principal punishment, since in this respect both have reached the term. Possibly, however, this may apply to the accidental reward, or secondary punishment, which are subject to increase until the day of judgment. Especially may this apply to the demons, or to the good angels, by whose activities some are drawn to salvation, whereby the joy of the blessed angels is increased, and some to damnation, whereby the punishment of the demons is augmented [FP, Question 62, Article 9, ad 3; SS, Question 13, Article 4, ad 2; where St. Thomas tacitly retracts the opinion expressed here as to merit or demerit.].

Reply to Objection 1: It is in the highest degree unprofitable to have reached the highest degree of evil, the result being that the damned are incapable of demerit. Hence it is clear that they gain no advantage from their sin.

Reply to Objection 2: Men who are damned are not occupied in drawing others to damnation, as the demons are, for which reason the latter demerit as regards their secondary punishment [FP, Question 62, Article 9, ad 3; SS, Question 13, Article 4, ad 2; where St. Thomas tacitly retracts the opinion expressed here as to merit or demerit].

Reply to Objection 3: The reason why they are not excused from demerit is not because they are under the necessity of sinning, but because they have reached the highest of evils.

However, the necessity of sinning whereof we are ourselves the cause, in so far as it is a necessity, excuses from sin, because every sin needs to be voluntary: but it does not excuse, in so far as it proceeds from a previous act of the will: and consequently the whole demerit of the subsequent sin would seem to belong to the previous sin.

ARTICLE 7. Whether the damned can make use of the knowledge they had in this world?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned are unable to make use of the knowledge they had in this world. For there is very great pleasure in the consideration of knowledge. But we must not admit that they have any pleasure. Therefore they cannot make use of the knowledge they had heretofore, by applying their consideration thereto.

Objection 2: Further, the damned suffer greater pains than any pains of this world. Now in this world, when one is in very great pain, it is impossible to consider any intelligible conclusions, through being distracted by the pains that one suffers. Much less therefore can one do so in hell.

Objection 3: Further, the damned are subject to time. But "length of time is the cause of forgetfulness" (Phys. lib. iv, 13). Therefore the damned will forget what they knew here.

On the contrary, It is said to the rich man who was damned (Lk. 16:25): "Remember that thou didst receive good things in thy lifetime," etc. Therefore they will consider about the things they knew here.

Further, the intelligible species remain in the separated soul, as stated above (Question 70, Article 2, ad 3; FP, Question 89, Articles 5,6). Therefore, if they could not use them, these would remain in them to no purpose.

I answer that, Even as in the saints on account of the perfection of their glory, there will be nothing but what is a matter of joy so there will be nothing in the damned but what is a matter and cause of sorrow; nor will anything that can pertain to sorrow be lacking, so that their unhappiness is consummate. Now the consideration of certain things known brings us joy, in some respect, either on the part of the things known, because we love them, or on the part of the knowledge, because it is fitting and perfect. There may also be a reason for sorrow both on the part of the things known, because they are of a grievous nature, and on the part of the knowledge, if we consider its imperfection; for instance a person may consider his defective knowledge about a certain thing, which he would desire to know perfectly. Accordingly, in the damned there will be actual consideration of the things they knew heretofore as matters of sorrow, but not as a cause of pleasure. For they will consider both the evil they have done, and for which they were damned, and the delightful goods they have lost, and on both counts they will suffer torments. Likewise they will be tormented with the thought that the knowledge they had of speculative matters was imperfect, and that they missed its highest degree of perfection which they might have acquired.

Reply to Objection 1: Although the consideration of knowledge is delightful in itself, it may accidentally be the cause of sorrow, as explained above.

Reply to Objection 2: In this world the soul is united to a corruptible body, wherefore the soul's consideration is hindered by the suffering of the body. On the other hand, in the future life the soul will not be so drawn by the body, but however much the body may suffer, the soul will have a most clear view of those things that can be a cause of anguish to it.

Reply to Objection 3: Time causes forgetfulness accidentally, in so far as the movement whereof it is the measure is the cause of change. But after the judgment day there will be no movement of the heavens; wherefore neither will it be possible for forgetfulness to result from any lapse of time however long. Before the judgment day, however, the separated soul is not changed from its disposition by the heavenly movement.

ARTICLE 8. Whether the damned will ever think of God?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned will sometimes think of God. For one cannot hate a thing actually, except one think about it. Now the damned will hate God, as stated in the text of Sentent. iv, in the last Distinction. Therefore they will think of God sometimes.

Objection 2: Further, the damned will have remorse of conscience. But the conscience suffers remorse for deeds done against God. Therefore they will sometimes think of God.

On the contrary, Man's most perfect thoughts are those which are about God: whereas the damned will be in a state of the greatest imperfection. Therefore they will not think of God.

I answer that, one may think of God in two ways. First, in Himself and according to that which is proper to Him, namely that He is the fount of all goodness: and thus it is altogether impossible to think of Him without delight, so that the damned will by no means think of Him in this way. Secondly, according to something accidental as it were to Him in His effects, such as His punishments, and so forth, and in this respect the thought of God can bring sorrow, so that in this way the damned will think of God.

Reply to Objection 1: The damned do not hate God except because He punishes and forbids what is agreeable to their evil will: and consequently they will think of Him only as punishing and forbidding. This suffices for the Reply to the Second Objection, since conscience will not have remorse for sin except as forbidden by the Divine commandment.

ARTICLE 9. Whether the damned see the glory of the blessed?

Objection 1: It would seem that the damned do not see the glory of the blessed. For they are more distant from the glory of the blessed than from the happenings of this world. But they do not see what happens in regard to us: hence Gregory commenting on Job 14:21, "Whether his children come to honor," etc. says (Moral. xii): "Even as those who still live know not in what place are the souls of the dead; so the dead who have lived in the body know not the things which regard the life of those who are in the flesh." Much less, therefore, can they see the glory of the blessed.

Objection 2: Further, that which is granted as a great favor to the saints in this life is never granted to the damned. Now it was granted as a great favor to Paul to see the life in which the saints live for ever with God (2 Cor. 12). Therefore the damned will not see the glory of the saints.

On the contrary, It is stated (Lk. 16:23) that the rich man in the midst of his torments "saw Abraham . . . and Lazarus in his bosom."

I answer that, The damned, before the judgment day, will see the blessed in glory, in such a way as to know, not what that glory is like, but only that they are in a state of glory that surpasses all thought. This will trouble them, both because they will, through envy, grieve for their happiness, and because they have forfeited that glory. Hence it is written (Wis. 5:2) concerning the wicked: "Seeing it" they "shall be troubled with terrible fear." After the judgment day, however, they will be altogether deprived of seeing the blessed: nor will this lessen their punishment, but will increase it; because they will bear in remembrance the glory of the blessed which they saw at or before the judgment: and this will torment them. Moreover they will be tormented by finding themselves deemed unworthy even to see the glory which the saints merit to have.

Reply to Objection 1: The happenings of this life would not, if seen, torment the damned in hell as the sight of the glory of the saints; wherefore the things which happen here are not shown to the damned in the same way as the saints' glory; although also of the things that happen here those are shown to them which are capable of causing them sorrow.

Reply to Objection 2: Paul looked upon that life wherein the saints live with God [SS, Question 185, Article 3, ad 2], by actual experience thereof and by hoping to have it more perfectly in the life to come. Not so the damned; wherefore the comparison fails.

QUESTION 99

OF GOD'S MERCY AND JUSTICE TOWARDS THE DAMNED

Prologue

We must next consider God's justice and mercy towards the damned: under which head there are five points of inquiry:

- (1) Whether by Divine justice an eternal punishment is inflicted on sinners?
- (2) Whether by God's mercy all punishment both of men and of demons comes to an end?
- (3) Whether at least the punishment of men comes to an end?
- (4) Whether at least the punishment of Christians has an end?
- (5) Whether there is an end to the punishment of those who have performed works of mercy?

▪ Back

▪ Index

ARTICLE 1. Whether by Divine justice an eternal punishment is inflicted on sinners?

Objection 1: It would seem that an eternal punishment is not inflicted on sinners by Divine justice. For the punishment should not exceed the fault: "According to the measure of the sin shall the measure also of the stripes be" (Dt. 25:2). Now fault is temporal. Therefore the punishment should not be eternal.

Objection 2: Further, of two mortal sins one is greater than the other. and therefore one should receive a greater punishment than the other. But no punishment is greater than eternal punishment, since it is infinite. Therefore eternal punishment is not due to every sin; and if it is not due to one, it is due to none, since they are not infinitely distant from one another.

Objection 3: Further, a just judge does not punish except in order to correct, wherefore it is stated (Ethic. ii, 3) that "punishments are a kind of medicine." Now, to punish the wicked eternally does not lead to their correction, nor to that of others, since then there will be no one in future who can be corrected thereby. Therefore eternal punishment is not inflicted for sins according to Divine justice.

Objection 4: Further, no one wishes that which is not desirable for its own sake, except on account of some advantage. Now God does not wish punishment for its own sake, for He delights not in punishments. Since then no advantage can result from the perpetuity of punishment, it would seem that He ought not to inflict such a punishment for sin.

Objection 5: Further, "nothing accidental lasts for ever" (De Coelo et Mundo i). But punishment is one of those things that happen accidentally, since it is contrary to nature. Therefore it cannot be everlasting.

Objection 6: Further, the justice of God would seem to require that sinners should be brought to naught: because on account of ingratitude a person deserves to lose all benefits. and among other benefits of God there is "being" itself. Therefore it would seem just that the sinner who has been ungrateful to God should lose his being. But if sinners be brought to naught, their punishment cannot be everlasting. Therefore it would seem out of keeping with Divine justice that sinners should be punished for ever.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 25:46): "These," namely the wicked, "shall go into everlasting punishment."

Further, as reward is to merit, so is punishment to guilt. Now, according to Divine justice, an eternal reward is due to temporal merit: "Every one who seeth the Son and believeth in Him hath life everlasting." Therefore according to Divine justice an everlasting punishment is due to temporal guilt.

Further, according to the Philosopher (Ethic. v, 5), punishment is meted according to the dignity of the person sinned against, so that a person who strikes one in authority receives a greater punishment than one who strikes anyone else. Now whoever sins mortally sins against God, Whose commandments he breaks, and Whose honor he gives another, by placing his end in some one other than God. But God's majesty is infinite. Therefore whoever sins mortally deserves infinite punishment; and consequently it seems just that for a mortal sin a man should be punished for ever.

I answer that, Since punishment is measured in two ways, namely according to the degree of its severity, and according to its length of time, the measure of punishment corresponds to the measure of fault, as regards the degree of severity, so that the more grievously a person sins the more grievously is he punished: "As much as she hath glorified herself and lived in delicacies, so much torment and sorrow give ye to her" (Apoc. 18:7). The duration of the punishment does not, however, correspond with the duration of the fault, as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxi, 11), for adultery which is committed in a short space of time is not punished with a momentary penalty even according to human laws [FS, Question 87, Article 3, ad 1]. But the duration of punishment regards the disposition of the sinner: for sometimes a person who commits an offense in a city is rendered by his very offense worthy of being cut off entirely from the fellowship of the citizens, either by perpetual exile or even by death: whereas sometimes he is not rendered worthy of being cut off entirely from the fellowship of the citizens. wherefore in order that he may become a fitting member of the State, his punishment is prolonged or curtailed, according as is expedient for his amendment, so that he may live in the city in a becoming and peaceful manner. So too, according to Divine justice, sin renders a person worthy to be altogether cut off from the fellowship of God's city, and this is the effect of every sin committed against charity, which is the bond uniting this same city together. Consequently, for mortal sin which is contrary to charity a person is expelled for ever from the fellowship of the saints and condemned to everlasting punishment, because as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxi, 11), "as men are cut off from this perishable city by the penalty of the first death, so are they excluded from that imperishable city by the punishment of the second death." That the punishment inflicted by the earthly state is not deemed everlasting is accidental, either because man endures not for ever, or because the state itself comes to an end. Wherefore if man lived for ever, the punishment of exile or slavery, which is pronounced by human law, would remain in him for ever. On the other hand, as regards those who sin in such a way as not to deserve to be entirely cut off from the fellowship of the saints, such as those who sin venially, their punishment will be so much the shorter or longer according as they are more or less fit to be cleansed, through sin clinging to them more or less: this is observed in the punishments of this world and of purgatory according to Divine justice.

We find also other reasons given by the saints why some are justly condemned to everlasting punishment for a temporal sin. One is because they sinned against an eternal good by despising eternal life. This is mentioned by Augustine (De Civ. Dei. xii, 12): "He is become worthy of eternal evil, who destroyed in himself a good which could be eternal." Another reason is because man sinned in his own eternity [FS, Question 87, Article 3, ad 1]; wherefore Gregory says (Dial. iv), it belongs to the great justice of the judge that those should never cease to be punished, who in this life never ceased to desire sin. And if it be objected that some who sin mortally propose to amend their life at some time, and that these accordingly are seemingly not deserving of eternal punishment, it must be replied according to some that Gregory speaks of the will that is made manifest by the deed. For he who falls into mortal sin of his own will puts himself in a state whence he cannot be rescued, except God help him: wherefore from the very fact that he is willing to sin, he is willing to remain in sin for ever. For man is "a wind that goeth," namely to sin, "and returneth not by his own power" (Ps. 77:39). Thus if a man were to throw himself into a pit whence he could not get out without help, one might say that he wished to remain there for ever, whatever else he may have thought himself. Another and a better answer is that from the very fact that he commits a mortal sin, he places his end in a creature; and since the whole of life is directed to its end, it follows that for this very reason he directs the whole of his life to that sin, and is willing to remain in sin forever, if he could do so with impunity. This is what Gregory says on Job 41:23, "He shall esteem the deep as growing old" (Moral. xxxiv): "The wicked only put an end to sinning because their life came to an end: they would indeed have wished to live for ever, that they might continue in sin for ever for they desire rather to sin than to live." Still another reason may be given why the punishment of mortal sin is eternal: because thereby one offends God Who is infinite. Wherefore since punishment cannot be infinite in intensity, because the creature is incapable of an infinite quality, it must needs be infinite at least in duration. And again there is a fourth reason for the same: because guilt remains for ever, since it cannot be remitted without grace, and men cannot receive grace after death; nor should punishment cease so long as guilt remains.

Reply to Objection 1: Punishment has not to be equal to fault as to the amount of duration as is seen to be the case also with human laws. We may also reply with Gregory (Dial. xlv) that although sin is temporal in act, it is eternal in will.

Reply to Objection 2: The degree of intensity in the punishment corresponds to the degree of gravity in the sin; wherefore mortal sins unequal in gravity will receive a punishment unequal in intensity but equal in duration.

Reply to Objection 3: The punishments inflicted on those who are not altogether expelled from the society of their fellow-citizens are intended for their correction: whereas those punishments, whereby certain persons are wholly banished from the society of their fellow-citizens, are not intended for their correction; although they may be intended for the correction and tranquillity of the others who remain in the state. Accordingly the damnation of the wicked is for the correction of those who are now in the Church; for punishments are intended for correction, not only when they are being inflicted, but also when they are decreed.

Reply to Objection 4: The everlasting punishment of the wicked will not be altogether useless. For they are useful for two purposes. First, because thereby the Divine justice is safeguarded which is acceptable to God for its own sake. Hence Gregory says (Dial. iv): "Almighty God on account of His loving kindness delights not in the torments of the unhappy, but on account of His justice. He is for ever unappeased by the punishment of the wicked." Secondly, they are useful, because the elect rejoice therein, when they see God's justice in them, and realize that they have escaped them. Hence it is written (Ps. 57:12): "The just shall rejoice when he shall see the revenge," etc., and (Is. 66:24): "They," namely the wicked, "shall be a loathsome sight to all flesh," namely to the saints, as a gloss says. Gregory expresses himself in the same sense (Dial. iv): "The wicked are all condemned to eternal punishment, and are punished for their own wickedness. Yet they will burn to some purpose, namely that the just may all both see in God the joys they receive, and perceive in them the torments they have escaped: for which reason they will acknowledge themselves for ever the debtors of Divine grace the more that they will see how the evils which they overcame by its assistance are punished eternally."

Reply to Objection 5: Although the punishment relates to the soul accidentally, it relates essentially to the soul infected with guilt. And since guilt will remain in the soul for ever, its punishment also will be everlasting.

Reply to Objection 6: Punishment corresponds to fault, properly speaking, in respect of the inordinateness in the fault, and not of the dignity in the person offended: for if the latter were the case, a punishment of infinite intensity would correspond to every sin. Accordingly, although a man deserves to lose his being from the fact that he has sinned against God the author of his being, yet, in view of the inordinateness of the act itself, loss of being is not due to him, since being is presupposed to merit and demerit, nor is being lost or corrupted by the inordinateness of sin [FS, Question 85, Article 1]: and consequently privation of being cannot be the punishment due to any sin.

ARTICLE 2. Whether by God's mercy all punishment of the damned, both men and demons, comes to an end?

Objection 1: It would seem that by God's mercy all punishment of the damned, both men and demons, comes to an end. For it is written (Wis. 11:24): "Thou hast mercy upon all, O Lord, because Thou canst do all things." But among all things the demons also are included, since they are God's creatures. Therefore also their punishment will come to an end.

Objection 2: Further, "God hath concluded all in sin, that He may have mercy on all" (Rm. 11:32). Now God has concluded the demons under sin, that is to say, He permitted them to be concluded. Therefore it would seem that in time He has mercy even on the demons.

Objection 3: Further, as Anselm says (Cur Deus Homo ii), "it is not just that God should permit the utter loss of a creature which He made for happiness." Therefore, since every rational creature was created for happiness, it would seem unjust for it to be allowed to perish altogether.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 25:41): "Depart from Me, you cursed, into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels." Therefore they will be punished eternally.

Further, just as the good angels were made happy through turning to God, so the bad angels were made unhappy through turning away from God. Therefore if the unhappiness of the wicked angels comes at length to an end, the happiness of the good will also come to an end, which is inadmissible.

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxi) Origen [FP, Question 64, Article 2] "erred in maintaining that the demons will at length, through God's mercy, be delivered from their punishment." But this error has been condemned by the Church for two reasons. First because it is clearly contrary to the authority of Holy Writ (Apoc. 20:9,10): "The devil who seduced them was cast into the pool of fire and brimstone, where both the beasts and the false prophets shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever," which is the Scriptural expression for eternity. Secondly, because this opinion exaggerated God's mercy in one direction and depreciated it in another. For it would seem equally reasonable for the good angels to remain in eternal happiness, and for the wicked angels to be eternally punished. Wherefore just as he maintained that the demons and the souls of the damned are to be delivered at length from their sufferings, so he maintained that the angels and the souls of the blessed will at length pass from their happy state to the unhappiness of this life.

Reply to Objection 1: God, for His own part, has mercy on all. Since, however, His mercy is ruled by the order of His wisdom, the result is that it does not reach to certain people who render themselves unworthy of that mercy, as do the demons and the damned who are obstinate in wickedness. And yet we may say that even in them His mercy finds a place, in so far as they are punished less than they deserve condignly, but not that they are entirely delivered from punishment.

Reply to Objection 2: In the words quoted the distribution (of the predicate) regards the genera and not the individuals: so that the statement applies to men in the state of wayfarer, inasmuch as He had mercy both on Jews and on Gentiles, but not on every Gentile or every Jew.

Reply to Objection 3: Anselm means that it is not just in the sense of becoming God's goodness, and is speaking of the creature generically. For it becomes not the Divine goodness that a whole genus of creature fail of the end for which it was made: wherefore it is unbecoming for all men or all angels to be damned. But there is no reason why some men or some angels should perish for ever, because the intention of the Divine will is fulfilled in the others who are saved.

▪ Index

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 3. Whether God's mercy suffers at least men to be punished eternally?

Objection 1: It would seem that God's mercy does not suffer at least men to be punished eternally. For it is written (Gn. 6:3): "My spirit shall not remain in man for ever because he is flesh"; where "spirit" denotes indignation, as a gloss observes. Therefore, since God's indignation is not distinct from His punishment, man will not be punished eternally.

Objection 2: Further, the charity of the saints in this life makes them pray for their enemies. Now they will have more perfect charity in that life. Therefore they will pray then for their enemies who are damned. But the prayers of the saints cannot be in vain, since they are most acceptable to God. Therefore at the saints' prayers the Divine mercy will in time deliver the damned from their punishment.

Objection 3: Further, God's foretelling of the punishment of the damned belongs to the prophecy of commination. Now the prophecy of commination is not always fulfilled: as appears from what was said of the destruction of Nineve (Jonas 3); and yet it was not destroyed as foretold by the prophet, who also was troubled for that very reason (Jonas 4:1). Therefore it would seem that much more will the threat of eternal punishment be commuted by God's mercy for a more lenient punishment, when this will be able to give sorrow to none but joy to all.

Objection 4: Further, the words of Ps. 76:8 are to the point, where it is said: "Will God then be angry for ever? " But God's anger is His punishment. Therefore, etc.

Objection 5: Further, a gloss on Is. 14:19, "But thou art cast out," etc. says: "Even though all souls shall have rest at last, thou never shalt": and it refers to the devil. Therefore it would seem that all human souls shall at length have rest from their pains.

On the contrary, It is written (Mt. 25:46) of the elect conjointly with the damned: "These shall go into everlasting punishment: but the just, into life everlasting." But it is inadmissible that the life of the just will ever have an end. Therefore it is inadmissible that the punishment of the damned will ever come to an end.

Further, as Damascene says (De Fide Orth. ii) "death is to men what their fall was to the angels." Now after their fall the angels could not be restored [FP, Question 64, Article 2]. Therefore neither can man after death: and thus the punishment of the damned will have no end.

I answer that, As Augustine says (De Civ. Dei xxi, 17,18), some evaded the error of Origen by asserting that the demons are punished everlastingly, while holding that all men, even unbelievers, are at length set free from punishment. But this statement is altogether unreasonable. For just as the demons are obstinate in wickedness and therefore have to be punished for ever, so too are the souls of men who die without charity, since "death is to men what their fall was to the angels," as Damascene says.

Reply to Objection 1: This saying refers to man generically, because God's indignation was at length removed from the human race by the coming of Christ. But those who were unwilling to be included or to remain in this reconciliation effected by Christ, perpetuated the Divine anger in themselves, since no other way of reconciliation is given to us save that which is through Christ.

Reply to Objection 2: As Augustine (De Civ. Dei xxi, 24) and Gregory (Moral. xxxiv) say, the saints in this life pray for their enemies, that they may be converted to God, while it is yet possible for them to be converted. For if we knew that they were foreknown to death, we should no more pray for them than for the demons. And since for those who depart this life without grace there will be no further time for conversion, no prayer will be offered for them, neither by the Church militant, nor by the Church triumphant. For that which we have to pray for them is, as the Apostle says (2 Tim. 2:25,26), that "God may give them repentance to know the truth, and they may recover themselves from the snares of the devil."

Reply to Objection 3: A punishment threatened prophetically is only then commuted when there is a change in the merits of the person threatened. Hence: "I will suddenly speak against a nation and against a kingdom, to root out and to pull down and to destroy it. If that nation . . . shall repent of their evil, I also will repent of the evil that I have thought to do to them" (Jer. 18:7). Therefore, since the merits of the damned cannot be changed, the threatened punishment will ever be fulfilled in them. Nevertheless the prophecy of commination is always fulfilled in a certain sense, because as Augustine says (De Civ. Dei. xxi, 24): "Nineve has been overthrown, that was evil, and a good Nineve is built up, that was not: for while the walls and the houses remained standing, the city was overthrown in its wicked ways."

Reply to Objection 4: These words of the Psalm refer to the vessels of mercy, which have not made themselves unworthy of mercy, because in this life (which may be called God's anger on account of its unhappiness) He changes vessels of mercy into something better. Hence the Psalm continues (Ps. 76:11): "This is the change of the right hand of the most High." We may also reply that they refer to mercy as granting a relaxation but not setting free altogether if it be referred also to the damned. Hence the Psalm does not say: "Will He from His anger shut up His mercies?" but "in His anger," because the punishment will not be done away entirely; but His mercy will have effect by diminishing the punishment while it continues.

Reply to Objection 5: This gloss is speaking not absolutely but on an impossible supposition in order to throw into relief the greatness of the devil's sin, or of Nabuchodonosor's.

ARTICLE 4. Whether the punishment of Christians is brought to an end by the mercy of God?

Objection 1: It would seem that at least the punishment of Christians is brought to an end by the mercy of God. "For he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mk. 16:16). Now this applies to every Christian. Therefore all Christians will at length be saved.

Objection 2: Further, it is written (Jn. 6:55): "He that eateth My body and drinketh My blood hath eternal life." Now this is the meat and drink whereof Christians partake in common. Therefore all Christians will be saved at length.

Objection 3: Further, "If any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire" (1 Cor. 3:15), where it is a question of those who have the foundation of the Christian faith. Therefore all such persons will be saved in the end.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 6:9): "The unjust shall not possess the kingdom of God." Now some Christians are unjust. Therefore Christians will not all come to the kingdom of God, and consequently they will be punished for ever.

Further, it is written (2 Pt. 2:21): "It had been better for them not to have known the way of justice, than after they have known it, to turn back from that holy commandment which was delivered to them." Now those who know not the way of truth will be punished for ever. Therefore Christians who have turned back after knowing it will also be punished for ever.

I answer that, According to Augustine (De Civ. Dei xxi, 20,21), there have been some who predicted a delivery from eternal punishment not for all men, but only for Christians. although they stated the matter in different ways. For some said that whoever received the sacraments of faith would be immune from eternal punishment. But this is contrary to the truth, since some receive the sacraments of faith, and yet have not faith, without which "it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6). Wherefore others said that those alone will be exempt from eternal punishment who have received the sacraments of faith, and professed the Catholic faith. But against this it would seem to be that at one time some people profess the Catholic faith, and afterwards abandon it, and these are deserving not of a lesser but of a greater punishment, since according to 2 Pt. 2:21, "it had been better for them not to have known the way of justice than, after they have known it, to turn back." Moreover it is clear that heresiarchs who renounce the Catholic faith and invent new heresies sin more grievously than those who have conformed to some heresy from the first. And therefore some have maintained that those alone are exempt from eternal punishment, who persevere to the end in the Catholic faith, however guilty they may have been of other crimes. But this is clearly contrary to Holy Writ, for it is written (James 2:20): "Faith without works is dead," and (Mt. 7:21) "Not every one that saith to Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven: but he that doth the will of My Father Who is in heaven": and in many other passages Holy Scripture threatens sinners with eternal punishment. Consequently those who persevere in the faith unto the end will not all be exempt from eternal punishment, unless in the end they prove to be free from other crimes.

Reply to Objection 1: Our Lord speaks there of formed faith [SS, Question 4, Article 3] "that worketh by love ": wherein whosoever dieth shall be saved. But to this faith not only is the error of unbelief opposed, but also any mortal sin whatsoever.

Reply to Objection 2: The saying of our Lord refers not to those who partake only sacramentally, and who sometimes by receiving unworthily "eat and drink judgment" to themselves (1 Cor. 11:29), but to those who eat spiritually and are incorporated with Him by charity, which incorporation is the effect of the sacramental eating, in those who approach worthily [TP, Question 80, Articles 1,2,3]. Wherefore, so far as the power of the sacrament is concerned, it brings us to eternal life, although sin may deprive us of that fruit, even after we have received worthily.

Reply to Objection 3: In this passage of the Apostle the foundation denotes formed faith, upon which whosoever shall build venial sins [FS, Question 89, Article 2] "shall suffer loss," because he will be punished for them by God; yet "he himself shall be saved" in the end "by fire," either of temporal tribulation, or of the punishment of purgatory which will be after death.

▪ Forward

ARTICLE 5. Whether all those who perform works of mercy will be punished eternally?

Objection 1: It would seem that all who perform works of mercy will not be punished eternally, but only those who neglect those works. For it is written (James 2:13): "Judgment without mercy to him that hath not done mercy"; and (Mt. 5:7): "Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy."

Objection 2: Further, (Mt. 25:35-46) we find a description of our Lord's discussion with the damned and the elect. But this discussion is only about works of mercy. Therefore eternal punishment will be awarded only to such as have omitted to practice works of mercy: and consequently the same conclusion follows as before.

Objection 3: Further, it is written (Mt. 6:12): "Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors," and further on (Mt. 6:14): "For if you will forgive men their offenses, your heavenly Father will forgive you also your offenses." Therefore it would seem that the merciful, who forgive others their offenses, will themselves obtain the forgiveness of their sins, and consequently will not be punished eternally.

Objection 4: Further, a gloss of Ambrose on 1 Tim. 4:8, "Godliness is profitable to all things," says: "The sum total of a Christian's rule of life consists in mercy and godliness. Let a man follow this, and though he should suffer from the inconstancy of the flesh, without doubt he will be scourged, but he will not perish: whereas he who can boast of no other exercise but that of the body will suffer everlasting punishment." Therefore those who persevere in works of mercy, though they be shackled with fleshly sins, will not be punished eternally: and thus the same conclusion follows as before.

On the contrary, It is written (1 Cor. 6:9,10): "Neither fornicators . . . nor adulterers," etc. "shall possess the kingdom of God." Yet many are such who practice works of mercy. Therefore the merciful will not all come to the eternal kingdom: and consequently some of them will be punished eternally.

Further, it is written (James 2:10): "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, but offend in one point, is become guilty of all." Therefore whoever keeps the law as regards the works of mercy and omits other works, is guilty of transgressing the law, and consequently will be punished eternally.

I answer that, As Augustine says in the book quoted above (De Civ. Dei xxi, 22), some have maintained that not all who have professed the Catholic faith will be freed from eternal punishment, but only those who persevere in works of mercy, although they be guilty of other crimes. But this cannot stand, because without charity nothing can be acceptable to God, nor does anything profit unto eternal life in the absence of charity. Now it happens that certain persons persevere in works of mercy without having charity. Wherefore nothing profits them to the meriting of eternal life, or to exemption from eternal punishment, as may be gathered from 1 Cor. 13:3. Most evident is this in the case of those who lay hands on other people's property, for after seizing on many things, they nevertheless spend something in works of mercy. We must therefore conclude that all whosoever die in mortal sin, neither faith nor works of mercy will free them from eternal punishment, not even after any length of time whatever.

Reply to Objection 1: Those will obtain mercy who show mercy in an ordinate manner. But those who while merciful to others are neglectful of themselves do not show mercy ordinately, rather do they strike at themselves by their evil actions. Wherefore such persons will not obtain the mercy that sets free altogether, even if they obtain that mercy which rebates somewhat their due punishment.

Reply to Objection 2: The reason why the discussion refers only to the works of mercy is not because eternal punishment will be inflicted on none but those who omit those works, but because eternal punishment will be remitted to those who after sinning have obtained forgiveness by their works of mercy, making unto themselves "friends of the mammon of iniquity" (Lk. 16:9).

Reply to Objection 3: Our Lord said this to those who ask that their debt be forgiven, but not to those who persist in sin. Wherefore the repentant alone will obtain by their works of mercy the forgiveness that sets them free altogether.

Reply to Objection 4: The gloss of Ambrose speaks of the inconstancy that consists in venial sin, from which a man will be freed through the works of mercy after the punishment of purgatory, which he calls a scourging. Or, if he speaks of the inconstancy of mortal sin, the sense is that those who while yet in this life fall into sins of the flesh through frailty are disposed to repentance by works of mercy. Wherefore such a one will not perish, that is to say, he will be disposed by those works not to perish, through grace bestowed on him by our Lord, Who is blessed for evermore. Amen.

Four Homilies.⁴⁶⁶

The First Homily.

On the Annunciation to the Holy Virgin Mary.⁴⁶⁷

TO-DAY are strains of praise sung joyfully by the choir of angels, and the light of the advent of Christ shines brightly upon the faithful. Today is the glad spring-time to us, and Christ the Sun of righteousness has beamed with clear light around us, and has illumined the minds of the faithful. To-day is Adam made anew,⁴⁶⁸ and moves in the choir of angels, having winged his way to heaven. To-day is the whole circle of the earth filled with joy, since the sojourn of the Holy Spirit has been realized to men. To-day the grace of God and the hope of the unseen shine through all wonders transcending imagination, and make the mystery that was kept hid from eternity plainly discernible to us. To-day are woven the chaplets of never-fading virtue. To-day, God, willing to crown the sacred heads of those whose pleasure is to hearken to Him, and who delight in His festivals, invites the lovers of unswerving faith as His called and His heirs; and the heavenly kingdom is urgent to summon those who mind celestial things to join the divine service of the incorporeal choirs. To-day is fulfilled the word of David, “Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad. The fields shall be joyful, and all the trees of the wood before the Lord, because He cometh.”⁴⁶⁹ David thus made mention of the trees;⁴⁷⁰ and the Lord’s forerunner also spoke of them as trees⁴⁷¹ “that should bring forth fruits meet for repentance,”⁴⁷² or rather for the coming of the Lord. But our Lord Jesus Christ promises perpetual gladness to all those who believe on Him. For He says, “I will see you, and ye shall rejoice; and your joy no man taketh from you.”⁴⁷³ To-day is the illustrious and ineffable mystery of Christians, who have willingly⁴⁷⁴ set their hope like a seal upon Christ, plainly declared to us. To-day did Gabriel, who stands by God, come to the pure virgin, bearing to her the glad annunciation, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured!”⁴⁷⁵ And she cast in her mind what manner of salutation this might be. And the angel immediately proceeded to say, The Lord is with thee: fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favour with God. Behold,⁴⁷⁶ thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call⁴⁷⁷ His name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever: and of His kingdom there shall be no end. Then said Mary unto the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?”⁴⁷⁸ Shall I still remain a virgin? is the honour of virginity not then lost by me? And while she was yet in perplexity as to these things, the angel placed shortly before her the summary of his whole message, and said to the pure virgin, “The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.” For what it is, that also shall it be called by all means. Meekly, then, did grace make election of the pure Mary alone out of all generations. For she proved herself prudent truly in all things; neither has any woman been born like her in all generations. She was not like the primeval virgin Eve, who, keeping holiday⁴⁷⁹ alone in paradise, with thoughtless mind, unguardedly hearkened to the word of the serpent, the author of all evil, and thus became depraved in the thoughts of her mind;⁴⁸⁰ and through her that deceiver, discharging his poison and refusing death with it, brought it into the whole world; and in virtue of this has arisen all the trouble of the saints. But in the holy Virgin alone is the fall of that (first mother) repaired. Yet was not this holy one competent to receive the gift until she had first learned who it was that sent it, and what the gift was, and who it was that conveyed it. While the holy one pondered these things in perplexity with herself, she says to the angel, “Whence hast thou brought to us the blessing in such wise? Out of what treasure-stores is the pearl of the word despatched to us? Whence has the gift acquired its purpose⁴⁸¹ toward us? From heaven art thou come, yet thou walkest upon earth! Thou dost exhibit the form of man, and (yet) thou art glorious with dazzling light.”⁴⁸² These things the holy one considered with herself, and the archangel solved the difficulty expressed in such reasonings by saying to her: “The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee. Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God. And fear not, Mary; for I am not come to overpower thee with fear, but to repel the subject of fear. Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God. Question not grace by the standard of nature. For grace does not endure to pass under the laws of nature. Thou knowest, O Mary, things kept hid from the patriarchs and prophets. Thou hast learned, O virgin, things which were kept concealed till now from the angels. Thou hast heard, O purest one, things of which even the choir of inspired men⁴⁸³ was never deemed worthy. Moses, and David, and Isaiah, and Daniel, and all the prophets, prophesied of Him; but the manner they knew not. Yet thou alone, O purest virgin, art now made the recipient of things of which all these were kept in ignorance, and thou dost learn⁴⁸⁴ the origin of them. For where the Holy Spirit is, there are all things readily ordered. Where divine grace is present, all things are found possible with God. The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee. Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.” And if He is the Son of God, then is He also God, of one form with the Father, and co-eternal; in Him the Father possesses all manifestation;⁴⁸⁵ He is His image in the person, and through His reflection the (Father’s) glory shines forth. And as from the ever-flowing fountain the streams proceed, so also from this ever-flowing and ever-living fountain does the light of the world proceed, the perennial and the true, namely Christ our God. For it is of this that the prophets have preached: “The streams of the river make glad the city of God.”⁴⁸⁶ And not one city only, but all cities; for even as it makes glad one city, so does it also the whole world. Appropriately, therefore, did the angel⁴⁸⁷ say to Mary the holy virgin first of all, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee;” inasmuch as with her was laid up the full treasure of grace. For of all generations she alone has risen as a virgin pure in body and in spirit; and she alone bears Him who bears all things on His word. Nor is it only the beauty of this holy one in body that calls forth our admiration, but also the innate virtue of her soul. Wherefore also the angel⁴⁸⁸ addressed her first with the salutation, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured,⁴⁸⁹ the Lord is with thee, and no spouse of earth;” He Himself is with thee who is the Lord of sanctification, the Father of purity, the Author of incorruption, and the Bestower of liberty, the Curator of salvation, and the Steward and Provider of the true peace, who out of the virgin earth made man, and out of man’s side formed Eve in addition. Even this Lord is with thee, and on the other hand also is of thee. Come, therefore, beloved brethren, and let us take up the angelic strain, and to the utmost of our ability return the due meed of praise, saying, “Hail,⁴⁹⁰ thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee!” For it is thine truly to rejoice, seeing that the grace of God, as he knows, has chosen to dwell with thee—the Lord of glory dwelling with the handmaiden; “He that is fairer than the children of men”⁴⁹¹ with the fair virgin; He who sanctifies all things with the undefiled. God is with thee, and with thee also is the perfect man in whom dwells the whole fulness of the Godhead. Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the fountain of the light that lightens all who believe upon Him! Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the rising of the rational Sun,⁴⁹² and the undefiled flower of Life! Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the mead⁴⁹³ of sweet savour! Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the ever-blooming vine, that makes glad the souls of those who honour thee! Hail, thou that art highly favoured!—the soil that, all untilled, bears bounteous fruit: for thou hast brought forth in accordance with the law of nature indeed, as it goes with us, and by the set time of practice,⁴⁹⁴ and yet in a way beyond nature, or rather above nature, by reason that God the Word from above took His abode in thee, and formed the new Adam in thy holy womb, and inasmuch as the Holy Ghost gave the power of conception to the holy virgin; and the reality of His body was assumed from her body. And just as the pearl⁴⁹⁵ comes of the two natures, namely lightning and water, the occult signs of the sea; so also our Lord Jesus Christ proceeds, without fusion and without mutation, from the pure, and chaste, and undefiled, and holy Virgin Mary; perfect in divinity and perfect in humanity, in all things equal to the Father, and in all things consubstantial with us, apart from sin.

⁴⁶⁶ [This very homily has been cited to prove the antiquity of the festival of the Annunciation, observed, in the West, March 25. But even Pellicia objects that this is a spurious work. The feast of the Nativity was introduced into the East by Chrysostom after the records at Rome had been inspected, and the time of the taxing at Bethlehem had been found. See his Sermon (A.D. 386), beautifully translated by Dr. Jarvis in his Introduction, etc., p. 541. Compare Tertullian, vol. iii. p. 164, and Justin, vol. i. p. 174, this series. Now, as the selection of the 25th of March is clearly based on this, we may say no more of that day. Possibly some Sunday was associated with the Annunciation. The four Sundays preceding Christmas are all observed by the Nestorians in commemoration of the Annunciation.]

Most of the holy fathers, and patriarchs, and prophets desired to see Him, and to be eye-witnesses of Him, but did not attain hereto. And some of them by visions beheld Him in type, and darkly; others, again, were privileged to hear the divine voice through the medium of the cloud, and were favoured with sights of holy angels; but to Mary the pure virgin alone did the archangel Gabriel manifest himself luminously, bringing her the glad address, "Hail, thou that art highly favoured!" And thus she received the word, and in the due time of the fulfilment according to the body's course she brought forth the priceless pearl. Come, then, ye too, dearly beloved, and let us chant the melody which has been taught us by the inspired harp of David, and say, "Arise, O Lord, into Thy rest; Thou, and the ark of Thy sanctuary."⁴⁹⁶ For the holy Virgin is in truth an ark, wrought with gold both within and without, that has received the whole treasury of the sanctuary. "Arise, O Lord, into Thy rest." Arise, O Lord, out of the bosom of the Father, in order that Thou mayest raise up the fallen race of the first-formed man. Setting these things forth,⁴⁹⁷ David in prophecy said to the rod that was to spring from himself, and to sprout into the flower of that beauteous fruit, "Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thine ear, and forget thine own people and thy father's house; so shall the King greatly desire thy beauty: for He is the Lord thy God, and thou shalt worship Him."⁴⁹⁸ Hearken, O daughter, to the things which were prophesied beforetime of thee, in order that thou mayest also behold the things themselves with the eyes of understanding. Hearken to me while I announce things beforehand to thee, and hearken to the archangel who declares expressly to thee the perfect mysteries. Come then, dearly beloved, and let us fall back on the memory of what has gone before us; and let us glorify, and celebrate, and laud, and bless that rod that has sprung so marvellously from Jesse. For Luke, in the inspired Gospel narratives, delivers a testimony not to Joseph only, but also to Mary the mother of God, and gives this account with reference to the very family and house of David: "For Joseph went up," says he, "from Galilee, unto a city of Judea which is called Bethlehem, to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great with child, because they were of the house and family of David. And so it was, that while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered; and she brought forth her son, the first-born of the whole creation,⁴⁹⁹ and wrapped him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn."⁵⁰⁰ She wrapped in swaddling-clothes Him who is covered with light as with a garment.⁵⁰¹ She wrapped in swaddling-clothes Him who made every creature.

She laid in a manger Him who sits above the cherubim⁵⁰² and is praised by myriads of angels. In the manger set apart for dumb brutes did the Word of God repose, in order that He might impart to men, who are really irrational by free choice, the perceptions of true reason. In the board from which cattle eat was laid the heavenly Bread,⁵⁰³ in order that He might provide participation in spiritual sustenance for men who live like the beasts of the earth. Nor was there even room for Him in the inn. He found no place, who by His word established heaven and earth; “for though He was rich, for our sakes He became poor,”⁵⁰⁴ and chose extreme humiliation on behalf of the salvation of our nature, in His inherent goodness toward us. He who fulfilled the whole administration⁵⁰⁵ of unutterable mysteries of the economy⁵⁰⁶ in heaven in the bosom of the Father, and in the cave in the arms of the mother, reposed in the manger. Angelic choirs encircled Him, singing of glory in heaven and of peace upon earth. In heaven He was seated at the right hand of the Father; and in the manger He rested, as it were, upon the cherubim. Even there was in truth His cherubic throne; there was His royal seat. Holy of the holy, and alone glorious upon the earth, and holier than the holy, was that wherein Christ our God rested. To Him be glory, honour, and power, together with the Father undefiled, and the altogether holy and quickening Spirit, now and ever, and unto the ages of the ages. Amen.

The Second Homily.

On the Annunciation to the Holy Virgin Mary.⁵⁰⁷

Discourse Second.

It is our duty to present to God, like sacrifices, all the festivals and hymnal celebrations; and first of all, the annunciation to the holy mother of God, to wit, the salutation made to her by the angel, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured!” For first of all wisdom⁵⁰⁸ and saving doctrine in the New Testament was this salutation, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured!” conveyed to us from the Father of lights. And this address, “highly favoured,”⁵⁰⁹ embraced the whole nature of men. “Hail, thou that art highly favoured”⁵¹⁰ in the holy conception and in the glorious pregnancy, “I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.”⁵¹¹ And again the Lord, who came for the purpose of accomplishing a saving passion, said, “I will see you, and ye shall rejoice; and your joy no man taketh from you.”⁵¹² And after His resurrection again, by the hand of the holy women, He gave us first of all the salutation “Hail!”⁵¹³ And again, the apostle made the announcement in similar terms, saying, “Rejoice evermore: pray without ceasing: in everything give thanks.”⁵¹⁴ See, then, dearly beloved, how the Lord has conferred upon us everywhere, and indivisibly, the joy that is beyond conception, and perennial. For since the holy Virgin, in the life of the flesh, was in possession of the incorruptible citizenship, and walked as such in all manner of virtues, and lived a life more excellent than man’s common standard; therefore the Word that cometh from God the Father thought it meet to assume the flesh, and endue the perfect man from her, in order that in the same flesh in which sin entered into the world, and death by sin, sin might be condemned in the flesh, and that the tempter of sin might be overcome in the burying⁵¹⁵ of the holy body, and that therewith also the beginning of the resurrection might be exhibited, and life eternal instituted in the world, and fellowship established for men with God the Father. And what shall we state, or what shall we pass by here? or who shall explain what is incomprehensible in the mystery? But for the present let us fall back upon our subject. Gabriel was sent to the holy virgin; the incorporeal was despatched to her who in the body pursued the incorruptible conversation, and lived in purity and in virtues. And when he came to her, he first addressed her with the salutation, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured! the Lord is with thee.” Hail, thou that art highly favoured! for thou doest what is worthy of joy indeed, since thou hast put on the vesture of purity, and art girt with the cincture of prudence. Hail, thou that art highly favoured! for to thy lot it has fallen to be the vehicle of celestial joy. Hail, thou that art highly favoured! for through thee joy is decreed for the whole creation, and the human race receives again by thee its pristine dignity. Hail, thou that art highly favoured! for in thy arms the Creator of all things shall be carried. And she was perplexed by this word; for she was inexperienced in all the addresses of men, and welcomed quiet, as the mother of prudence and purity; (yet) being a pure, and immaculate, and stainless image⁵¹⁶ herself, she shrank not in terror from the angelic apparition, like most of the prophets, as indeed true virginity has a kind of affinity and equality with the angels. For the holy Virgin guarded carefully the torch of virginity, and gave diligent heed that it should not be extinguished or defiled. And as one who is clad in a brilliant robe deems it a matter of great moment that no impurity or filth be suffered to touch it anywhere, so did the holy Mary consider with herself, and said: Does this act of attention imply any deep design or seductive purpose? Shall this word "Hail" prove the cause of trouble to me, as of old the fair promise of being made like God, which was given her by the serpent-devil, proved to our first mother Eve? Has the devil, who is the author of all evil, become transformed again into an angel of light; and bearing a grudge against my espoused husband for his admirable temperance, and having assailed him with some fair-seeming address, and finding himself powerless to overcome a mind so firm, and to deceive the man, has he turned his attack upon me, as one endowed with a more susceptible mind; and is this word "Hail" (Grace be with thee) spoken as the sign of gracelessness hereafter? Is this benediction and salutation uttered in irony? Is there not some poison concealed in the honey? Is it not the address of one who brings good tidings, while the end of the same is to make me the designer's prey? And how is it that he can thus salute one whom he knows not? These things she pondered in perplexity with herself, and expressed in words. Then again the archangel addressed her with the announcement of a joy which all may believe in, and which shall not be taken away, and said to her, "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God." Shortly hast thou the proof of what has been said. For I not only give you to understand that there is nothing to fear, but I show you the very key to the absence of all cause for fear. For through me all the heavenly powers hail thee, the holy virgin: yea rather, He Himself, who is Lord of all the heavenly powers and of all creation, has selected thee as the holy one and the wholly fair; and through thy holy, and chaste, and pure, and undefiled womb the enlightening Pearl comes forth for the salvation of all the world: since of all the race of man thou art by birth the holy one, and the more honourable, and the purer, and the more pious than any other: and thou hast a mind whiter than the snow, and a body made purer than any gold, however fine, and a womb such as the object which Ezekiel saw, and which he has described in these terms: "And the likeness of the living creatures upon the head was as the firmament, and as the appearance of the terrible crystal, and the likeness of the throne above them was as the appearance of a sapphire-stone: and above the throne it was as the likeness of a man, and as the appearance of amber; and within it there was, as it were, the likeness of fire round about."⁵¹⁷

Clearly, then, did the prophet behold in type Him who was born of the holy virgin, whom thou, O holy virgin, wouldest have had no strength to bear, hadst thou not beamed forth for that time⁵¹⁸ with all that is glorious and virtuous. And with what words of laudation, then, shall we describe her virgin-dignity? With what indications and proclamations of praise shall we celebrate her stainless figure? With what spiritual song or word shall we honour her who is most glorious among the angels? She is planted in the house of God like a fruitful olive that the Holy Spirit overshadowed; and by her means are we called sons and heirs of the kingdom of Christ. She is the ever-blooming paradise of incorruptibility, wherein is planted the tree that giveth life, and that furnisheth to all the fruits of immortality. She is the boast and glory of virgins, and the exultation of mothers. She is the sure support of the believing, and the succourer⁵¹⁹ of the pious. She is the vesture of light, and the domicile of virtue.⁵²⁰ She is the ever-flowing fountain, wherein the water of life sprang and produced the Lord's incarnate manifestation. She is the monument of righteousness; and all who become lovers of her, and set their affections on virgin-like ingenuousness and purity, shall enjoy the grace of angels. All who keep themselves from wine and intoxication, and from the wanton enjoyments of strong drink, shall be made glad with the products of the life-bearing plant. All who have preserved the lamp of virginity unextinguished shall be privileged to receive the amaranthine crown of immortality. All who have possessed themselves of the stainless robe of temperance shall be received into the mystical bride-chamber of righteousness. All who have come nearer the angelic degree than others shall also enter into the more real enjoyment of their Lord's beatitude. All who have possessed the illuminating oil of understanding, and the pure incense of conscience, shall inherit the promise of spiritual favour and the spiritual adoption. All who worthily observe the festival of the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, the mother of God, acquire as their meet recompense the fuller interest in the message, "Hail, thou that art highly favoured!" It is our duty, therefore, to keep this feast, seeing that it has filled the whole world with joy and gladness. And let us keep it with psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs. Of old did Israel also keep their festival, but then it was with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, of which the prophet says: "I will turn their feasts into afflictions and lamentation, and their joy into shame."⁵²¹ But our afflictions our Lord has assured us He will turn into joy by the fruits of penitence.⁵²² And again, the first covenant maintained the righteous requirements⁵²³ of a divine service, as in the case of our forefather Abraham; but these stood in the inflictions of pain in the flesh by circumcision, until the time of the fulfilment. "The law was given to them through Moses" for their discipline; "but grace and truth" have been given to us by Jesus Christ.⁵²⁴ The beginning of all these blessings to us appeared in the annunciation to Mary, the highly-favoured, in the economy of the Saviour which is worthy of all praise, and in His divine and supra-mundane instruction. Thence rise the rays of the light of understanding upon us. Thence spring for us the fruits of wisdom and immortality, sending forth the clear pure streams of piety. Thence come to us the brilliant splendours of the treasures of divine knowledge. "For this is life eternal, that we may know the true God, and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent.”⁵²⁵ And again, “Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life.”⁵²⁶ For on this account the treasure of the knowledge of God is revealed to them who search the divine oracles. That treasure of the inspired Scriptures the Paraclete has unfolded to us this day. And let the tongue of prophecy and the doctrine of apostles be the treasure of wisdom to us; for without the law and the prophets, or the evangelists and the apostles, it is not possible to have the certain hope of salvation. For by the tongue of the holy prophets and apostles our Lord speaks, and God takes pleasure in the words of the saints; not that He requires the spoken address, but that He delights in the good disposition; not that He receives any profit from men, but that He finds a restful satisfaction in the rightly-affected soul of the righteous. For it is not that Christ is magnified by what we say; but as we receive benefits from Him, we proclaim with grateful mind His beneficence to us; not that we can attain to what is worthy therein, but that we give the meet return to the best of our ability. And when the Gospels or the Epistles, therefore, are read, let not your attention centre on the book or on the reader, but on the God who speaks to you from heaven. For the book is but that which is seen, while Christ is the divine subject spoken of. It brings us then the glad tidings of that economy of the Saviour, which is worthy of all praise, to wit, that, though He was God, He became man through kindness toward man, and did not lay aside, indeed, the dignity which was His from all eternity, but assumed the economy that should work salvation. It brings us the glad tidings of that economy of the Saviour worthy of all praise, to wit, that He sojourned with us as a physician for the sick, who did not heal them with potions, but restored them by the inclination of His philanthropy.

It brings us the glad tidings of this economy of the Saviour altogether to be praised, to wit, that to them who had wandered astray the way of salvation was shown, and that to the despairing the grace of salvation was made known, which blesses all in different modes; searching after the erring, enlightening the blinded, giving life to the dead, setting free the slaves, redeeming the captives, and becoming all things to all of us in order to be the true way of salvation to us: and all this He does, not by reason of our goodwill toward Him, but in virtue of a benignity that is proper to our Benefactor Himself. For the Saviour did all, not in order that He might acquire virtue Himself, but that He might put us in possession of eternal life. He made man, indeed, after the image of God, and appointed him to live in a paradise of pleasure. But the man being deceived by the devil, and having become a transgressor of the divine commandment, was made subject to the doom of death. Whence, also, those born of him were involved in their father’s liability in virtue of their succession, and had the reckoning of condemnation required of them. “For death reigned from Adam to Moses.”⁵²⁷ But the Lord, in His benignity toward man, when He saw the creature He Himself had formed now held by the power of death, did not turn away finally from him whom He had made in His own image, but visited him in each generation, and forsook him not; and manifesting Himself first of all among the patriarchs, and then proclaiming Himself in the law, and presenting the likeness of Himself⁵²⁸ in the prophets, He presignified the economy of salvation. When, moreover, the fulness of the times came for His glorious appearing, He sent beforehand the archangel Gabriel to bear the glad tidings to the Virgin Mary. And he came down from the ineffable powers above to the holy Virgin, and addressed her first of all with the salutation, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured.” And when this word, “Hail, thou that art highly favoured,” reached her, in the very moment of her hearing it, the Holy Spirit entered into the undefiled temple of the Virgin, and her mind and her members were sanctified together. And nature stood opposite, and natural intercourse at a distance, beholding with amazement the Lord of nature, in a manner contrary to nature, or rather above nature, doing a miraculous work in the body; and by the very weapons by which the devil strove against us, Christ also saved us, taking to Himself our passible body in order that He might impart the greater grace⁵²⁹ to the being who was deficient in it. And “where sin abounded, grace did much more abound.” And appropriately was grace sent to the holy Virgin. For this word also is contained in the oracle of the evangelic history: “And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house and lineage of David; and the virgin’s name was Mary;”⁵³⁰ and so forth. And this was the first month to the holy Virgin. Even as Scripture says in the book of the law: “This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month among the months of the year to you.”⁵³¹ “Keep ye the feast of the holy passover to the Lord in all your generations.” It was also the sixth month to Zacharias. And rightly, then, did the holy Virgin prove to be of the family of David, and she had her home in Bethlehem, and was betrothed rightfully to Joseph, in accordance with the laws of relationship. And her espoused husband was her guardian, and possessor also of the untarnished incorruption which was hers. And the name given to the holy Virgin was one that became her exceedingly. For she was called Mary, and that, by interpretation, means illumination. And what shines more brightly than the light of virginity? For this reason also the virtues are called virgins by those who strive rightly to get at their true nature. But if it is so great a blessing to have a virgin heart, how great a boon will it be to have the flesh that cherishes virginity along with the soul!

Thus the holy Virgin, while still in the flesh, maintained the incorruptible life, and received in faith the things which were announced by the archangel. And thereafter she journeyed diligently to her relation Elisabeth in the hill-country. “And she entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elisabeth,”⁵³² in imitation of the angel. “And it came to pass, that, when Elisabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leapt with joy in her womb; and Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost.”⁵³³ Thus the voice of Mary wrought with power, and filled Elisabeth with the Holy Ghost. And by her tongue, as from an ever-flowing fountain, she sent forth a stream of gracious gifts in the way of prophecy to her relation; and while the feet of her child were bound in the womb,⁵³⁴ she prepared to dance and leap. And that was the sign of a marvellous jubilation. For wherever she was who was highly favoured, there she filled all things with joy. “And Elisabeth spake out with a loud voice, and said, Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb. And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? Blessed art thou among women.”⁵³⁵ For thou hast become to women the beginning of the new creation.⁵³⁶ Thou hast given to us boldness of access into paradise, and thou hast put to flight our ancient woe. For after thee the race of woman shall no more be made the subject of reproach. No more do the successors of Eve fear the ancient curse, or the pangs of childbirth. For Christ, the Redeemer of our race, the Saviour of all nature, the spiritual Adam who has healed the hurt of the creature of earth, cometh forth from thy holy womb. “Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.” For He who bears all blessings for us is manifested as thy fruit. This we read in the clear words of her who was barren; but yet more clearly did the holy Virgin herself express this again when she presented to God the song replete with thanksgiving, and acceptance, and divine knowledge; announcing ancient things together with what was new; proclaiming along with things which were of old, things also which belong to the consummation of the ages; and summing up in a short discourse the mysteries of Christ. “And Mary said, My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour,” and so forth. “He hath holpen His servant Israel in remembrance of His mercy, and of the covenant which He established with Abraham and with his seed for ever.”⁵³⁷ Thou seest how the holy Virgin has surpassed even the perfection of the patriarchs, and how she confirms the covenant which was made with Abraham by God, when He said, “This is the covenant which I shall establish between me and thee.”⁵³⁸ Wherefore He has come and confirmed the covenant with Abraham, having received mystically in Himself the sign of circumcision, and having proved Himself the fulfilment of the law and the prophets. This song of prophecy, therefore, did the holy mother of God render to God, saying, “My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour: for He that is mighty hath done to me great things, and holy is His name.” For having made me the mother of God, He has also preserved me a virgin; and by my womb the fulness of all generations is headed up together for sanctification. For He hath blessed every age, both men and women, both young men and youths, and old men. “He hath made strength with His arm,”⁵³⁹ on our behalf, against death and against the devil, having torn the handwriting of our sins. “He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts;” yea, He hath scattered the devil himself, and all the demons that serve under him. For he was overweeningly haughty in his heart, seeing that he dared to say, “I will set my throne above the clouds, and I will be like the Most High.”⁵⁴⁰ And now, how He scattered him the prophet has indicated in what follows, where he says, “Yet now thou shalt be brought down to hell,”⁵⁴¹ and all thy hosts with thee. For He has overthrown everywhere his altars and the worship of vain gods, and He has prepared for Himself a peculiar people out of the heathen nations. “He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree.” In these terms is intimated in brief the extrusion of the Jews and the admission of the Gentiles. For the elders of the Jews and the scribes in the law, and those who were richly privileged with other prerogatives, because they used their riches ill and their power lawlessly, were cast down by Him from every seat, whether of prophecy or of priesthood, whether of legislature or of doctrine, and were stripped of all their ancestral wealth, and of their sacrifices and multitudinous festivals, and of all the honourable privileges of the kingdom. Spoiled of all these boons, as naked fugitives they were cast out into captivity. And in their stead the humble were exalted, namely, the Gentile peoples who hungered after righteousness. For, discovering their own lowliness, and the hunger that pressed upon them for the knowledge of God, they pleaded for the divine word, though it were but for crumbs of the same, like the woman of Canaan,⁵⁴² and for this reason they were filled with the riches of the divine mysteries. For the Christ who was born of the Virgin, and who is our God, has given over the whole inheritance of divine blessings to the Gentiles. “He hath holpen His servant Israel.”⁵⁴³ Not any Israel in general, indeed, but His servant, who in very deed maintains the true nobility of Israel. And on this account also did the mother of God call Him servant (Son) and heir. For when He had found the same labouring painfully in the letter and the law, He called him by grace. It is such an Israel, therefore, that He called and hath holpen in remembrance of His mercy. “As He spake to our fathers, to Abraham and to his seed for ever.” In these few words is comprehended the whole mystery of the economy. For, with the purpose of saving the race of men, and fulfilling the covenant that was made with our fathers, Christ has once “bowed the heavens and come down.”⁵⁴⁴ And thus He shows Himself to us as we are capable of receiving Him, in order that we might have power to see Him, and handle Him, and hear Him when the speaketh. And on this account did God the Word deem it meet to take to Himself the flesh and the perfect humanity by a woman, the holy Virgin; and He was born a man, in order that He might discharge our debt, and fulfil even in Himself⁵⁴⁵ the ordinances of the covenant made with Abraham, in its rite of circumcision, and all the other legal appointments connected with it. And after she had spoken these words the holy Virgin went to Nazareth; and from that a decree of Cæsar led her to come again to Bethlehem; and so, as proceeding herself from the royal house, she was brought to the royal house of David along with Joseph her espoused husband. And there ensued there the mystery which transcends all wonders,—the Virgin brought forth and bore in her hand Him who bears the whole creation by His word. “And there was no room for them in the inn.”⁵⁴⁶ He found no room who founded the whole earth by His word. She nourished with her milk Him who imparts sustenance and life to everything that hath breath. She wrapped Him in swaddling-clothes who binds the whole creation fast with His word. She laid Him in a manger who rides seated upon the cherubim.⁵⁴⁷ A light from heaven shone round about Him who lighteneth the whole creation. The hosts of heaven attended Him with their doxologies who is glorified in heaven from before all ages. A star with its torch guided them who had come from the distant parts of earth toward Him who is the true Orient. From the East came those who brought gifts to Him who for our sakes became poor. And the holy mother of God kept these words, and pondered them in her heart, like one who was the receptacle of all the mysteries. Thy praise, O most holy Virgin, surpasses all laudation, by reason of the God who received the flesh and was born man of thee. To thee every creature, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth, offers the meet offering of honour. For thou hast been indeed set forth as the true cherubic throne. Thou shinest as the very brightness of light in the high places of the kingdoms of intelligence;⁵⁴⁸ where the Father, who is without beginning, and whose power thou hadst overshadowing thee, is glorified; where also the Son is worshipped, whom thou didst bear according to the flesh; and where the Holy Spirit is praised, who effected in thy womb the generation of the mighty King. Through thee, O thou that art highly favoured, is the holy and consubstantial Trinity known in the world. Together with thyself, deem us also worthy to be made partakers of thy perfect grace in Jesus Christ our Lord: with whom, and with the Holy Spirit, be glory to the Father, now and ever, and unto the ages of the ages. On the Annunciation to the Holy Virgin Mary.⁵⁵⁰

Again have we the glad tidings of joy, again the announcements of liberty, again the restoration, again the return, again the promise of gladness, again the release from slavery. An angel talks with the Virgin, in order that the serpent may no more have converse with the woman. In the sixth month, it is said, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to a virgin espoused to a man.⁵⁵¹ Gabriel was sent to declare the world-wide salvation: Gabriel was sent to bear to Adam the signature of his restoration; Gabriel was sent to a virgin, in order to transform the dishonour of the female sex into honour; Gabriel was sent to prepare the worthy chamber for the pure spouse; Gabriel was sent to wed the creature with the Creator; Gabriel was sent to the animate palace of the King of the angels; Gabriel was sent to a virgin espoused to Joseph, but preserved for Jesus the Son of God. The incorporeal servant was sent to the virgin undefiled. One free from sin was sent to one that admitted no corruption. The light was sent that should announce the Sun of righteousness. The dawn was sent that should precede the light of the day. Gabriel was sent to proclaim Him who is in the bosom of the Father, and who yet was to be in the arms of the mother. Gabriel was sent to declare Him who is upon the throne, and yet also in the cavern. The subaltern was sent to utter aloud the mystery of the great King; the mystery, I mean, which is discerned by faith, and which cannot be searched out by officious curiosity; the mystery which is to be adored, not weighed; the mystery which is to be taken as a thing divine, and not measured. “In the sixth month Gabriel was sent to a virgin.” What is meant by this sixth month? What? It is the sixth month from the time when Elisabeth received the glad tidings, from the time that she conceived John. And how is this made plain? The archangel himself gives us the interpretation, when he says to the virgin: “Behold, thy relation Elisabeth, she hath also conceived a son in her old age: and this is now the sixth month with her, who was called barren.”⁵⁵² In the sixth month—that is evidently, therefore, the sixth month of the conception of John. For it was meet that the subaltern should go before; it was meet that the attendant should precede; it was meet that the herald of the Lord’s coming should prepare the way for Him. In the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent to a virgin espoused to a man; espoused, not united; espoused, yet kept intact. And for what purpose was she espoused? In order that the spoiler might not learn the mystery prematurely. For that the King was to come by a virgin, was a fact known to the wicked one. For he too heard these words of Isaiah: “Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son.”⁵⁵³ And on every occasion, consequently, he kept watch upon the virgin’s words, in order that, whenever this mystery should be fulfilled, he might prepare her dishonour. Wherefore the Lord came by an espoused virgin, in order to elude the notice of the wicked one; for one who was espoused was pledged in fine to be her husband's. "In the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph." Hear what the prophet says about this man and the virgin: "This book that is sealed shall be delivered to a man that is learned."⁵⁵⁴ What is meant by this sealed book, but just the virgin undefiled? From whom is this to be given? From the priests evidently. And to whom? To the artisan Joseph. As, then, the priests espoused Mary to Joseph as to a prudent husband, and committed her to his care in expectation of the time of marriage, and as it behoved him then on obtaining her to keep the virgin untouched, this was announced by the prophet long before, when he said: "This book that is sealed shall be delivered to a man that is learned." And that man will say, I cannot read it. But why canst thou not read it, O Joseph? I cannot read it, he says, because the book is sealed. For whom, then, is it preserved? It is preserved as a place of sojourn for the Maker of the universe. But let us return to our immediate subject. In the sixth month Gabriel was sent to a virgin—he who received, indeed, such injunctions as these: "Come hither now, archangel, and become the minister of a dread mystery which has been kept hid, and be thou the agent in the miracle. I am moved by my compassions to descend to earth in order to recover the lost Adam. Sin hath made him decay who was made in my image, and hath corrupted the work of my hands, and hath obscured the beauty which I formed. The wolf devours my nursling, the home of paradise is desolate, the tree of life is guarded by the flaming sword, the location of enjoyments is closed. My pity is evoked for the object of this enmity, and I desire to seize the enemy. Yet I wish to keep this mystery, which I confide to thee alone, still hid from all the powers of heaven. Go thou, therefore, to the Virgin Mary. Pass thou on to that animate city whereof the prophet spake in these words: 'Glorious things were spoken of thee, O city of God.'⁵⁵⁵ Proceed, then, to my rational paradise; proceed to the gate of the east; proceed to the place of sojourn that is worthy of my word; proceed to that second heaven on earth; proceed to the light cloud, and announce to it the shower of my coming; proceed to the sanctuary prepared for me; proceed to the hall of the incarnation; proceed to the pure chamber of my generation after the flesh. Speak in the ears of my rational ark, so as to prepare for me the accesses of hearing. But neither disturb nor vex the soul of the virgin. Manifest thyself in a manner befitting that sanctuary, and hail her first with the voice of gladness. And address Mary with the salutation, 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured,' that I may show compassion for Eve in her depravation." The archangel heard these things, and considered them within himself, as was reasonable, and said: "Strange is this matter; passing comprehension is this thing that is spoken. He who is the object of dread to the cherubim, He who cannot be looked upon by the seraphim, He who is incomprehensible to all the heavenly⁵⁵⁶ powers, does He give the assurance of His connection with a maiden? does He announce His own personal coming? yea more, does He hold out an access by hearing? and is He who condemned Eve, urgent to put such honour upon her daughter? For He says: ‘So as to prepare for me the accesses of hearing.’ But can the womb contain Him who cannot be contained in space? Truly this is a dread mystery.” While the angel is indulging such reflections, the Lord says to Him: “Why art thou troubled and perplexed, O Gabriel? Hast thou not already been sent by me to Zacharias the priest? Hast thou not conveyed to him the glad tidings of the nativity of John? Didst thou not inflict upon the incredulous priest the penalty of speechlessness? Didst thou not punish the aged man with dumbness? Didst thou not make thy declaration, and I confirmed it? And has not the actual fact followed upon thy announcement of good? Did not the barren woman conceive? Did not the womb obey the word? Did not the malady of sterility depart? Did not the inert disposition of nature take to flight? Is not she now one that shows fruitfulness, who before was never pregnant? Can anything be impossible with me, the Creator of all? Wherefore, then, art thou tossed with doubt?” What is the angel’s answer to this? “O Lord,” he says, “to remedy the defects of nature, to do away with the blast of evils, to recall the dead members to the power of life, to enjoin on nature the potency of generation, to remove barrenness in the case of members that have passed the common limit,⁵⁵⁷ to change the old and withered stalk into the appearance of verdant vigour, to set forth the fruitless soil suddenly as the producer of sheaves of corn,—to do all this is a work which, as it is ever the case, demands Thy power. And Sarah is a witness thereto, and along with her⁵⁵⁸ also Rebecca, and again Anna, who all, though bound by the dread ill of barrenness, were afterwards gifted by Thee with deliverance from that malady. But that a virgin should bring forth, without knowledge of a man, is something that goes beyond all the laws of nature; and dost Thou yet announce Thy coming to the maiden? The bounds of heaven and earth do not contain Thee, and how shall the womb of a virgin contain Thee?” And the Lord says: “How did the tent of Abraham contain me?”⁵⁵⁹ And the angel says: “As there were there the deeps of hospitality, O Lord, Thou didst show Thyself there to Abraham at the door of the tent, and didst pass quickly by it, as He who filleth all things. But how can Mary sustain the fire of the divinity? Thy throne blazes with the illumination of its splendour, and can the virgin receive Thee without being consumed?” Then the Lord says: “Yea surely, if the fire in the wilderness injured the bush, my coming will indeed also injure Mary; but if that fire which served as the adumbration of the advent of the fire of divinity from heaven fertilized the bush, and did not burn it, what wilt thou say of the Truth that descends not in a flame of fire, but in the form of rain?”⁵⁶⁰ Thereupon the angel set himself to carry out the commission given him, and repaired to the Virgin, and addressed her with a loud voice, saying: “Hail, thou that are highly favoured! the Lord is with thee. No longer shalt the devil be against thee; for where of old that adversary inflicted the wound, there now first of all does the Physician apply the salve of deliverance. Where death came forth, there has life now prepared its entrance. By a woman came the flood of our ills, and by a woman also our blessings have their spring. Hail, thou that are highly favoured! Be not thou ashamed, as if thou wert the cause of our condemnation. For thou art made the mother of Him who is at once Judge and Redeemer. Hail, thou stainless mother of the Bridegroom⁵⁶¹ of a world bereft! Hail, thou that hast sunk in thy womb the death (that came) of the mother (Eve)! Hail, thou animate temple of temple of God! Hail, thou equal⁵⁶² home of heaven and earth alike! Hail, thou amplest receptacle of the illimitable nature!” But as these things are so, through her has come for the sick the Physician; for them that sit in darkness, the Sun of righteousness; for all that are tossed and tempest-beaten, the Anchor and the Port undisturbed by storm. For the servants in irreconcilable enmity has been born the Lord; and One has sojourned with us to be the bond of peace and the Redeemer of those led captive, and to be the peace for those involved in hostility. For He is our peace;⁵⁶³ and of that peace may it be granted that all we may receive the enjoyment, by the grace and kindness of our Lord Jesus Christ; to whom be the glory, honour, and power, now and ever, and unto all the ages of the ages. Amen.

The Fourth Homily.

On the Holy Theophany, or on Christ’s Baptism.⁵⁶⁴

O ye who are the friends of Christ, and the friends of the stranger, and the friends of the brethren, receive in kindness my speech to-day, and open your ears like the doors of hearing, and admit within them my discourse, and accept from me this saving proclamation of the baptism⁵⁶⁵ of Christ, which took place in the river Jordan, in order that your loving desires may be quickened after the Lord, who has done so much for us in the way of condescension. For even though the festival of the Epiphany of the Saviour is past, the grace of the same yet abides with us through all. Let us therefore enjoy it with insatiable minds; for insatiate desire is a good thing in the case of what pertains to salvation—yea, it is a good thing. Come therefore, all of us, from Galilee to Judea, and let us go forth with Christ; for blessed is he who journeys in such company on the way of life.

Come, and with the feet of thought let us make for the Jordan, and see John the Baptist as he baptizes One who needs no baptism, and yet submits to the rite in order that He may bestow freely upon us the grace of baptism. Come, let us view the image of our regeneration, as it is emblematically presented in these waters. "Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him."⁵⁶⁶ O how vast is the humility of the Lord! O how vast His condescension! The King of the heavens hastened to John, His own forerunner, without setting in motion the camps⁵⁶⁷ of His angels, without despatching beforehand the incorporeal powers as His precursors; but presenting Himself in utmost simplicity, in soldier-like form,⁵⁶⁸ He comes up to His own subaltern. And He approached him as one of the multitude, and humbled Himself among the captives though He was the Redeemer, and ranged Himself with those under judgment though He was the Judge, and joined Himself with the lost sheep though He was the Good Shepherd who on account of the straying sheep came down from heaven, and yet did not forsake His heavens, and was mingled with the tares though He was that heavenly grain that springs unsown. And when the Baptist John then saw Him, recognising Him whom before in his mother's womb he had recognised and worshipped, and discerning clearly that this was He on whose account, in a manner surpassing the natural time, he had leaped in the womb of his mother, in violation of the limits of nature, he drew his right hand within his double cloak, and bowing his head like a servant full of love to his master, addressed Him in these words: I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comest Thou to me?⁵⁶⁹ What is this Thou doest, my Lord? Why dost Thou reverse the order of things? Why seekest Thou along with the servants, at the hand of Thy servant, the things that are proper to servants? Why dost Thou desire to receive what Thou requirest not? Why dost Thou burden me, Thy servitor, with Thy mighty condescension? I have need to be baptized of Thee, but Thou hast no need to be baptized of me. The less is blessed by the greater, and the greater is not blessed and sanctified by the less. The light is kindled by the sun, and the sun is not made to shine by the rush-lamp. The clay is wrought by the potter, and the potter is not moulded by the clay. The creature is made anew by the Creator, and the Creator is not restored by the creature. The infirm is healed by the physician, and the physician is not cured by the infirm. The poor man receives contributions from the rich, and the rich borrow not from the poor. I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comest Thou to me? Can I be ignorant who Thou art, and from what source Thou hast Thy light, and whence Thou art come? Or, because Thou hast been born even as I have been,⁵⁷⁰ am I, then, to deny the greatness of Thy divinity? Or, because Thou hast condescended so far to me as to have approached my body, and dost bear me wholly in Thyself in order to effect the salvation of the whole man, am I, on account of that body of Thine which is seen, to overlook that divinity of Thine which is only apprehended? Or, because on behalf of my salvation Thou hast taken to Thyself the offering of my first-fruits, am I to ignore the fact that Thou “coverest Thyself with light as with a garment?”⁵⁷¹ Or, because Thou wearest the flesh that is related to me, and dost show Thyself to men as they are able to see Thee, am I to forget the brightness of Thy glorious divinity? Or, because I see my own form in Thee, am I to reason against Thy divine substance, which is invisible and incomprehensible? I know Thee, O Lord; I know Thee clearly. I know Thee, since I have been taught by Thee; for no one can recognise Thee, unless He enjoys Thine illumination. I know Thee, O Lord, clearly; for I saw Thee spiritually before I beheld this light. When Thou wert altogether in the incorporeal bosom of the heavenly Father, Thou wert also altogether in the womb of Thy handmaid and mother; and though held in the womb of Elisabeth by nature as in a prison, and bound with the indissoluble bonds of the children unborn, leaped and celebrated Thy birth with anticipative rejoicings. Shall I then, who gave intimation of Thy sojourn on earth before Thy birth, fail to apprehend Thy coming after Thy birth? Shall I, who in the womb was a teacher of Thy coming, be now a child in understanding in view of perfect knowledge? But I cannot but worship Thee, who art adored by the whole creation; I cannot but proclaim Thee, of whom heaven gave the indication by the star, and for whom earth offered a kind reception by the wise men, while the choirs of angels also praised Thee in joy over Thy condescension to us, and the shepherds who kept watch by night hymned Thee as the Chief Shepherd of the rational sheep. I cannot keep silence while Thou art present, for I am a voice; yea, I am the voice, as it is said, of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord.⁵⁷² I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comest Thou to me? I was born, and thereby removed the barrenness of the mother that bore me; and while still a babe I became the healer of my father’s speechlessness, having received of Thee from my childhood the gift of the miraculous. But Thou, being born of the Virgin Mary, as Thou didst will, and as Thou alone dost know, didst not do away with her virginity; but Thou didst keep it, and didst simply gift her with the name of mother: and neither did her virginity preclude Thy birth, nor did Thy birth injure her virginity. But these two things, so utterly opposite—bearing and virginity—harmonized with one intent; for such a thing abides possible with Thee, the Framer of nature. I am but a man, and am a partaker of the divine grace; but Thou art God, and also man to the same effect: for Thou art by nature man’s friend. I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comest Thou to me? Thou who wast in the beginning, and wast with God, and wast God;⁵⁷³ Thou who art the brightness of the Father’s glory;⁵⁷⁴ Thou who art the perfect image of the perfect Father;⁵⁷⁵

575 Or, of the perfect Light; to wit, the Father.

Thou who art the true light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world;⁵⁷⁶ Thou who wast in the world, and didst come where Thou wast; Thou who wast made flesh, and yet wast not changed into the flesh; Thou who didst dwell among us, and didst manifest Thyself to Thy servants in the form of a servant; Thou who didst bridge earth and heaven together by Thy holy name,—comest Thou to me? One so great to such a one as I am? The King to the forerunner? The Lord to the servant? But though Thou wast not ashamed to be born in the lowly measures of humanity, yet I have no ability to pass the measures of nature. I know how great is the measure of difference between earth and the Creator. I know how great is the distinction between the clay and the potter. I know how vast is the superiority possessed by Thee, who art the Sun of righteousness, over me who am but the torch of Thy grace. Even though Thou art compassed with the pure cloud of the body, I can still recognise Thy lordship. I acknowledge my own servitude, I proclaim Thy glorious greatness, I recognise Thy perfect lordship, I recognise my own perfect insignificance, I am not worthy to unloose the latches of Thy shoes;⁵⁷⁷ and how shall I dare to touch Thy stainless head? How can I stretch out the right hand upon Thee, who didst stretch out the heavens like a curtain,⁵⁷⁸ and didst set the earth above the waters?⁵⁷⁹ How shall I spread those menial hands of mine upon Thy head? How shall I wash Thee, who art undefiled and sinless? How shall I enlighten the light? What manner of prayer shall I offer up over Thee, who dost receive the prayers even of those who are ignorant of Thee?

When I baptize others, I baptize into Thy name, in order that they may believe on Thee, who comest with glory; but when I baptize Thee, of whom shall I make mention? and into whose name shall I baptize Thee? Into that of the Father? But Thou hast the Father altogether in Thyself, and Thou art altogether in the Father. Or into that of the Son? But beside Thee there is no other Son of God by nature. Or into that of the Holy Spirit? But He is ever together with Thee, as being of one substance, and of one will, and of one judgment, and of one power, and of one honour with Thee; and He receives, along with Thee, the same adoration from all. Wherefore, O Lord, baptize Thou me, if Thou pleasest; baptize me, the Baptist. Regenerate one whom Thou didst cause to be generated. Extend Thy dread right hand, which Thou hast prepared for Thyself, and crown my head by Thy touch, in order that I may run the course before Thy kingdom, crowned like a forerunner, and diligently announce the good tidings to the sinners, addressing them with this earnest call: “Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!”⁵⁸⁰ O river Jordan, accompany me in the joyous choir, and leap with me, and stir thy waters rhythmically, as in the movements of the dance; for thy Maker stands by thee in the body. Once of old didst thou see Israel pass through thee, and thou didst divide thy floods, and didst wait in expectation of the passage of the people; but now divide thyself more decidedly, and flow more easily, and embrace the stainless limbs of Him who at that ancient time did convey the Jews⁵⁸¹ through thee. Ye mountains and hills, ye valleys and torrents, ye seas and rivers, bless the Lord, who has come upon the river Jordan; for through these streams He transmits sanctification to all streams. And Jesus answered and said to him: Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness.⁵⁸² Suffer it to be so now; grant the favour of silence, O Baptist, to the season of my economy. Learn to will whatever is my will. Learn to minister to me in those things on which I am bent, and do not pry curiously into all that I wish to do. Suffer it to be so now: do not yet proclaim my divinity; do not yet herald my kingdom with thy lips, in order that the tyrant may not learn the fact and give up the counsel he has formed with respect to me. Permit the devil to come upon me, and enter the conflict with me as though I were but a common man, and receive thus his mortal wound. Permit me to fulfil the object for which I have come to earth. It is a mystery that is being gone through this day in the Jordan. My mysteries are for myself and my own. There is a mystery here, not for the fulfilling of my own need, but for the designing of a remedy for those who have been wounded. There is a mystery, which gives in these waters the representation of the heavenly streams of the regeneration of men. Suffer it to be so now: when thou seest me doing what seemeth to me good among the works of my hands, in a manner befitting divinity, then attune thy praises to the acts accomplished. When thou seest me cleansing the lepers, then proclaim me as the framer of nature. When thou seest me make the lame ready runners, then with quickened pace do thou also prepare thy tongue to praise me. When thou seest me cast out demons, then hail my kingdom with adoration. When thou seest me raise the dead from their graves by my word, then, in concert with those thus raised, glorify me as the Prince of Life. When thou seest me on the Father's right hand, then acknowledge me to be divine, as the equal of the Father and the Holy Spirit, on the throne, and in eternity, and in honour. Suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. I am the Lawgiver, and the Son of the Lawgiver; and it becometh me first to pass through all that is established, and then to set forth everywhere the intimations of my free gift. It becometh me to fulfil the law, and then to bestow grace. It becometh me to adduce the shadow, and then the reality. It becometh me to finish the old covenant, and then to dictate the new, and to write it on the hearts of men, and to subscribe it with my blood,⁵⁸³ and to seal it with my Spirit. It becometh me to ascend the cross, and to be pierced with its nails, and to suffer after the manner of that nature which is capable of suffering, and to heal sufferings by my suffering, and by the tree to cure the wound that was inflicted upon men by the medium of a tree. It becometh me to descend even into the very depths of the grave, on behalf of the dead who are detained there. It becometh me, by my three days' dissolution in the flesh, to destroy the power of the ancient enemy, death. It becometh me to kindle the torch of my body for those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death. It becometh me to ascend in the flesh to that place where I am in my divinity. It becometh me to introduce to the Father the Adam reigning in me. It becometh me to accomplish these things, for on account of these things I have taken my position with the works of my hands. It becometh me to be baptized with this baptism for the present, and afterwards to bestow the baptism of the consubstantial Trinity upon all men. Lend me, therefore, O Baptist, thy right hand for the present economy, even as Mary lent her womb for my birth. Immerse me in the streams of Jordan, even as she who bore me wrapped me in children's swaddling-clothes. Grant me thy baptism even as the Virgin granted me her milk. Lay hold of this head of mine, which the seraphim revere. With thy right hand lay hold of this head, that is related to thyself in kinship. Lay hold of this head, which nature has made to be touched. Lay hold of this head, which for this very purpose has been formed by myself and my Father. Lay hold of this head of mine, which, if one does lay hold of it in piety, will save him from ever suffering shipwreck. Baptize me, who am destined to baptize those who believe on me with water, and with the Spirit, and with fire: with water, capable of washing away the defilement of sins; with the Spirit, capable of making the earthly spiritual; with fire, naturally fitted to consume the thorns of transgressions. On hearing these words, the Baptist directed his mind to the object of the salvation,⁵⁸⁴ and comprehended the mystery which he had received, and discharged the divine command; for he was at once pious and ready to obey. And stretching forth slowly his right hand, which seemed both to tremble and to rejoice, he baptized the Lord. Then the Jews who were present, with those in the vicinity and those from a distance, reasoned together, and spake thus with themselves and with each other: Was it, then, without cause that we imagined John to be superior to Jesus? Was it without cause that we considered the former to be greater than the latter? Does not this very baptism attest the Baptist's pre-eminence? Is not he who baptizeth presented as the superior, and he who is baptized as the inferior? But while they, in their ignorance of the mystery of the economy, babbled in such wise with each other, He who alone is Lord, and by nature the Father of the Only-begotten, He who alone knoweth perfectly Him whom He alone in passionless fashion begat, to correct the erroneous imaginations of the Jews, opened the gates of the heavens, and sent down the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove, lighting upon the head of Jesus, pointing out thereby the new Noah, yea the maker of Noah, and the good pilot of the nature which is in shipwreck. And He Himself calls with clear voice out of heaven, and says: "This is my beloved Son,"⁵⁸⁵ — the Jesus there, namely, and not the John; the one baptized, and not the one baptizing; He who was begotten of me before all periods of time and not he who was begotten of Zacharias; He who was born of Mary after the flesh, and not he who was brought forth by Elisabeth beyond all expectation; He who was the fruit of the virginity yet preserved intact, and not he who was the shoot from a sterility removed; He who has had His conversation with you, and not he who was brought up in the wilderness. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: my Son, of the same substance with myself, and not of a different; of one substance with me according to what is unseen, and of one substance with you according to what is seen, yet without sin. This is He who along with me made man. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. This Son of mine and this son of Mary are not two distinct persons; but this is my beloved Son,—this one who is both seen with the eye and apprehended with the mind. This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear Him. If He shall say, I and my Father are one,⁵⁸⁶ hear Him. If He shall say, He that hath seen me hath seen the Father,⁵⁸⁷ hear Him. If He shall say, He that hath sent me is greater than I,⁵⁸⁸ adapt the voice to the economy. If He shall say, Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?⁵⁸⁹ answer ye Him thus: Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.⁵⁹⁰ By these words, as they were sent from the Father out of heaven in thunder-form, the race of men was enlightened: they apprehended the difference between the Creator and the creature, between the King and the soldier (subject), between the Worker and the work; and being strengthened in faith, they drew near through the baptism of John to Christ, our true God, who baptizeth with the Spirit and with fire. To Him be glory, and to the Father, and to the most holy and quickening Spirit, now and ever, and unto the ages of the ages. Amen.

I CAN do no better than follow Dupin as to the authorship of these Homilies. He thinks the style of Proclus (of Constantinople) may be detected in them, though the fourth is beyond him for eloquence, and has even been thought worthy of St. Chrysostom. It was produced after Nicæa, and probably after Ephesus, its somewhat exaggerated praises of the θεοτόκος being unusual at an earlier period. The titles of these Homilies are the work of much later editors; and interpolations probably occur frequently, by the same hands.

PREFACE

ON the occasion of the thirteenth centenary of St. Gregory the Great, our Holy Father, Pius X., published an Encyclical letter,* in which he dwelt on the lessons to be learned from the life and writings of that great Pope. He directed, in a special manner, the attention of the clergy to the Regula Pastoralis of St. Gregory and to his Seventeenth Homily on the Gospels. Of the latter Pius X. speaks in the following terms :—

“We still seem to have before our eyes the image of Gregory, in the Pontifical Council of Lateran, surrounded by bishops from all quarters and by the entire clergy of Rome. How fruitful is the exhortation which falls from his lips on the subject of the duties of the clergy! What burning zeal! Like a thunderbolt his sermon smites the guilty. His words are so many scourges to rouse the slothful. They are, so to say, flames of divine love, which sweetly influence even the most fervent.

“Read, venerable brethren, that admirable homily of the holy Pontiff, and make your clergy read and ponder it, especially at the time of their annual retreat.”

These words of Pius X. will be a sufficient

St. Gregory the Great*

ST. GREGORY, surnamed the Great, was born in Rome of a wealthy patrician family about A.D. 540. In his youth he embraced a political career, and was appointed by the Emperor Justin II., in 571, to the influential office of Prætor of Rome. But disenchanted with the attractions of worldly honours, Gregory resigned his functions, and sold his paternal estates. With the proceeds he founded six monasteries in Sicily. His own house on Mount Scaurus, now the Cælian Hill, he converted into a monastery, where he took the religious habit, and observed the Benedictine rule in all its austerity. Knowing the virtues and capacity of Gregory, Pope Benedict I. withdrew him from his monastery, and made him one of the Regionaries or Cardinal Deacons of the city. In 578 Pelagius II. conferred on him a further mark of confidence by sending him as apocrisiarius, or nuncio, to the Court of the Emperor Tiberius at Constantinople. Here Gregory spent six years.

About 585 he returned to Rome, and was elected Abbot of his monastery. Not long after, as he passed through the forum, some Anglo-Saxon boys exposed for sale in the slave-market attracted his attention, and a conversation with them awakened in his heart a desire to go to evangelize the country from which they came. With the permission of the Pope he set out for England. But the news of his departure excited a tumult amongst the people by whom he was beloved, and the Pope was obliged to dispatch a messenger with an order commanding Gregory to return to Rome. In February, 590, Pelagius II. died, and Gregory was chosen by the unanimous vote of the clergy, the Senate and people to succeed him on the pontifical throne. According to the usage of the period the Emperor confirmed the election, and on 3 September, 590, Gregory received episcopal consecration in St. Peter's.

From that date until his death, in March, 604, in spite of continual infirmity, Gregory laboured with indefatigable energy for the welfare of the Church. In Italy he was a father to the people, then suffering from famine and pestilence and from the invasion of the Lombards. While subscribing himself Servus Servorum Dei, he steadfastly maintained the dignity of the Holy See, and resisted the ambitious pretensions of the patriarch of Constantinople, John the Faster, styled by his flatterers the Œcumenical Patriarch. Nor did he forget his former project of labouring for the conversion of England. By his orders Augustine and forty monks proceeded to that country, founded the See of Canterbury, and organized the Church throughout the island.

Gregory watched with zealous care over the decorum of public worship and the administration of the Sacraments; and a tradition, which modern criticism has not succeeded in demolishing, ascribes to him the regulation of ecclesiastical chant, and the correction of the ancient Sacramentary of the Roman Church.

Saint Gregory the Great

But the labours and cares of administration did not hinder Gregory from devoting much attention to literary work. From the first years of his pontificate dates a work which ranks as a classic on the duties of the pastoral office—viz., the Regula Pastoralis. In the preface to that work, addressed to John, Archbishop of Ravenna, Gregory defends his conduct in seeking to escape the supreme dignity of the pontificate. The work itself is divided into four books. The first treats of the qualities necessary for the pastoral office; the second deals with the life a pastor ought to lead; the third lays down the rules to be observed in the instruction and spiritual direction of various classes of men; the fourth book, consisting of a single chapter, admonishes the pastor to reflect, and examine whether he has been faithful to the obligations of his state and office. The Regula Pastoralis was published in 591. It was followed in 593 by a second work, entitled Dialogues,* in four books. The work takes the form of a dialogue between the saint and his intimate friend, the deacon Peter. The three first books treat of the holy men who flourished in Italy, the whole of the second book being devoted to the life and miracles of St. Benedict. The fourth book narrates visions of holy persons, and has for object to show the continuance of life after death.

The next great work of St. Gregory was his Morals on the Book of Job (Expositio in librum Job, seu Moralium libri XXXV.). In that work, the composition of which was commenced at Constantinople but completed after his elevation to the Papacy, the author proposes to himself to give a threefold interpretation of the text—viz., literal, mystical and moral. He is meagre, however, in the literal interpretation, and dwells by preference on the allegorical meaning, and the moral lessons which that meaning suggests. The moral lessons contained in St. Gregory's great work on the book of Job are so full and practical that it has served as a source from which theologians and spiritual writers since his time have largely drawn.

Though physical infirmity rendered preaching difficult to Gregory, he was not unmindful of that great duty of the pastoral office. Amongst his works are two valuable collections of homilies—viz., his homilies on Ezekiel, and forty homilies on the Gospels. The homilies on the Gospels were delivered probably in the years 590, 591. The first twenty were dictated by the saint, and read in his presence in the church by his secretary. The remaining twenty were delivered by himself, and taken down by stenographers as he spoke.

The style of St. Gregory's homilies is simple, paternal and earnest. Though he loves to dwell on the allegorical sense of the Gospel text, the lessons he inculcates are practical for all time.

A Homily of St. Gregory the Great

*Addressed to the Bishops and Clergy, assembled in Council at the Lateran Basilica, about

“And after these things the Lord appointed also other seventy-two; and He sent them two and two before His face into every city, whither He Himself was to come. And He said to them: ‘The harvest indeed is great, but the labourers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He send labourers into His harvest. Go: behold, I send you as lambs among wolves. Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes, and salute no man by the way. Into whatsoever house you enter, first say, Peace be to this house. And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him; but if not, it shall return to you. And in the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they have. For the labourer is worthy of his hire. Remove not from house to house. And into what city soever you enter, and they receive you, eat such things as are set before you, and heal the sick that are therein, and say to them, The Kingdom of God is come nigh unto you” (St. Luke x, 1-9).

DEARLY beloved Brethren, our Lord and Saviour instructs us at one time by His words, and at another by His works. For His works are lessons, because from His acts, though performed in silence, our duty becomes manifest. For instance, He sends His disciples two and two to preach, because there are two precepts of charity—the love, that is, of God and of our neighbour, and between less than two there cannot be charity. For no one is said to have charity for himself ; but love, to deserve the name of charity, must have for object another. Our Lord sent His disciples two and two to preach, to give us to understand that the man who has not charity for his neighbour ought on no account to undertake the office of preaching.

2. And with good reason it is said that He sent them two and two before His face into every city whither He Himself was to come. The Lord follows His preachers ; for preaching comes first, and when the words of exhortation have preceded, and the intellect has been enlightened by truth, our Lord comes to take up His abode in our minds. For this reason Isaiah says to preachers : " Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight His paths " (Isa. xl. 3). Hence the Psalmist also says, " Make a way for Him who ascendeth upon the west " (Ps. lxxvii. 5). For our Lord ascends upon the west, inasmuch as from the place where He set in His Passion He displayed in His resurrection His greater glory. He ascends in sooth upon the west, because by His resurrection He triumphed over death, to which He had submitted. For Him, therefore, who ascends upon the west we make a way, when we preach His glory to your minds, that He Himself, coming after, may enlighten them by the presence of His love.

3. Let us give ear, then, to what He says when sending His preachers: "The harvest indeed is great, but the labourers are few. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that He send labourers into His harvest."

It is with profound sorrow we have to admit that though the harvest is great, the labourers are few, because, though the people are ready to hear the Word of God, there are few to preach it. Lo, the world is full of priests, yet in the harvest of the Lord a labourer is very rare, for we undertake, it is true, the office of the priesthood, but its duties we do not fulfil. Yet weigh well, dearly beloved, weigh well the words of the text: "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He send labourers into His harvest." Pray then for us that we may have strength to labour for you as we ought, that our tongue may not be slack to exhort, and that, having undertaken the office of preaching, our silence may not prove our condemnation at the tribunal of the just Judge.

For oftentimes by reason of their own sins the tongue of preachers is tied, oftentimes on the other hand it is because of the sins of their people that the gift of eloquence is withheld from pastors. By reason of their own sins the tongue of preachers is tied, according to the words of the Psalmist, "But to the sinner God hath said, Why dost thou declare My justices?" (Ps. xlix. 16.) And again, the voice of preachers is hindered because of the sins of the people, according to the words of the Lord to Ezechiel: "I will make thy tongue stick fast to the roof of thy mouth, and thou shalt be dumb, and not as a man that reproveth, because they are a provoking house" (Ezec. iii. 26).

As though He said expressly: The gift of eloquence is withdrawn from thee, because while the people offend Me by their sins they are not worthy to have the truth preached to them. Through whose fault it is that speech is withdrawn from the preacher is no easy matter to decide. But that the silence of the pastor is hurtful to himself sometimes, and to his flock at all times, is beyond all doubt.

4. But if we cannot preach as efficiently as we ought, would that by innocence of life we held the rank that befits our office. For the Gospel adds, "Behold I send you as lambs among wolves." Now there are many who, when placed in authority, show themselves eager to rend their subjects; they use their power to terrify, and they injure those to whom it was their duty to do good. And not possessing the bowels of charity they seek to appear as masters, and forget that they are fathers; and, instead of governing in the spirit of humility, they domineer in the spirit of pride; and if at times their outward acts are gentle, their hearts within are full of passion. Of them Truth says in another place, "They come to you in the clothing of sheep, but inwardly they are ravening wolves" (Matth. vii. 15). We, on the contrary, should bear in mind that we are sent as lambs among wolves, and should therefore observe innocence of conduct, and abstain from manifestations of malice. For one who undertakes the office of preaching ought not to do but rather to suffer wrong, and so by his meekness calm the anger of his persecutors, and heal the wounds of sinners, though weighed down himself by affliction. And if zeal for virtue sometimes requires him to treat his subjects with rigour, his severity itself should spring from love, and not from passion, so as to maintain outwardly the rights of discipline, and inwardly cherish with a father's love those whom he publicly corrects with severity. And the pastor succeeds in acting thus who is free from self love, who covets not the things of the world, who in no wise submits his neck to the burden of earthly desires.

5. For this reason the text also adds, "Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes, and salute no man by the way." For a preacher should be so filled with confidence in God as to be firmly convinced that temporal sustenance will never be wanting to him, though he takes no thought of it, lest concern for temporal things should divert his mind from attending to the eternal interests of others. And the Gospel also permits him to salute no man by the way, to give him to understand with what speed he should proceed to preach.

And if we take the words of the text in an allegorical sense, as money is put in a purse, so money in a purse is a figure of wisdom which is hidden. He then who possesses the word of wisdom, but neglects to distribute it to his neighbour, so to speak, keeps his money in a purse. "For wisdom that is hid, and a treasure that is not seen, what profit is there in them both?" (Ecclus xli. 17).

What is meant by scrip but the cares of the world, and what by shoes but the example of the works of the dead. He, therefore, who undertakes the office of preaching ought not to carry the burden of secular business, lest, by submitting his neck to its yoke, he be unable to raise himself up to preach heavenly things. Nor ought he to take for his guidance the example of the conduct of the unwise, lest he be led to suppose that his own conduct is defended, so to say, by dead skins. For there are many who defend their own misdeeds by instancing the misdeeds of others. From the fact that others have so acted, they imagine that they may lawfully do likewise. Now, what is this but an effort to cover their feet with the skins of dead animals?

Again, every man who salutes by the way salutes as an incident in his journey and not from concern for the health of the person saluted. In like manner the man who preaches the Gospel not for love of heaven, but for sake of a recompense, salutes so to speak by the way, because he desires the salvation of his hearers incidentally, and not of set purpose.

6. The Gospel goes on to say: "Into whatsoever house you enter first say, Peace be to this house. And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him, but if not it shall return to you." Now the peace offered by the preacher either rests upon the house, if a son of peace reside therein, or it returns to the preacher. For if there be there anyone predestined unto life, he will hearken to the heavenly doctrine; or if no one gives ear to it, the preacher himself shall not go unrewarded, because his peace returns to him inasmuch as the Lord will recompense him in proportion to his labour.

7. But observe that he who forbids preachers to carry scrip, or purse, permits them to accept their support in return for their labour. For the text adds: "In the same house remain eating and drinking such things as they have. For the labourer is worthy of his hire." If our peace is received, it is but just that we remain in the same house eating and drinking such things as they have, and so obtain a stipend on earth from those to whom we offer the rewards of heaven. Hence St. Paul, esteeming those earthly rewards of little account, says, "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great matter if we reap your carnal things?" (1 Cor. ix. 11). And the words which follow deserve attention: "The labourer is worthy of his hire." For sustenance is already a portion of the hire, inasmuch as the hire of the preacher's labour commences in this life, and is completed in the next, in the vision of truth. And here observe that to our labour there is due a double reward, one in this life and the other in the next ; the former to be our sustenance in our toil, and the latter to be our recompense in the resurrection. The hire, therefore, which we receive in this life should serve to make us more earnest in labouring for the recompense to come.

The true preacher, therefore, ought not to preach in order to receive his hire in this life, but he should accept the hire that he may be able to continue to preach. For the man who preaches to receive, as a recompense, either praise or gifts in this life, beyond doubt deprives himself of the recompense which is eternal. But if he desires that his discourses please men, that by means of them God, and not the preacher, may be loved ; or, if he accepts an earthly stipend for his labour that he may not be compelled by indigence to desist from preaching, the fact that he has accepted his sustenance in this life is no obstacle to his receiving his recompense in the next.

8. But, O pastors, what, I ask with sorrow, what are we doing ? for we receive the hire, and we are far from being labourers. In our daily stipend we accept the fruits of holy Church, yet we do not labour in preaching for the everlasting Church. Let us weigh well what a subject of condemnation it is to receive without labour the hire of labour.

the Pastoral Office

Behold, we live by the offerings of the faithful, but what labour do we perform for the souls of the faithful? We receive as our stipend the offerings which the people make for their sins; yet, by diligence in prayer and in preaching, we do not labour as we ought for their correction. We hardly venture to reprove anyone publicly as his sins deserve. And what is worse still, if the sinner is powerful in this world, perhaps we praise him for his faults, lest he should be provoked by correction, and in his indignation withhold the offerings he was wont to make.

Now we should ever keep in mind that it is written of priests, "They shall eat the sins of My people" (Osee iv. 8). Why is it said that they eat the sins of the people, but because they foster the sins of the people in order not to lose their contributions? And if we ourselves who live by the offerings of the people for their sins, eat and are silent, without doubt we eat the sins of the people. Let us therefore lay to heart what a crime it is in the eyes of God to eat the price of sins, and yet to do nothing by preaching to oppose sin. Let us hearken to the words of holy Job: "If my land cry against me, and with it the furrows thereof mourn. If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money" (Job xxxi. 38-39).

For the land cries against its owner, when the Church has reason to murmur against its pastor. And the furrows thereof mourn, if the faithful whose hearts have been ploughed by the preaching and corrections of former pastors see anything to lament in the conduct of their present ruler.

And the worthy possessor does not eat the fruit of the land without money; for the wise pastor first lays out the talent of the Word of God, in order not to receive to his condemnation his maintenance from the Church. For we eat the fruits of our land with money if we labour in preaching while we receive the revenues of the Church. We are the heralds of the Judge who is to come. And who will announce His coming if the herald is silent?

9. Hence each of us, to the best of his ability, and according to the needs of his flock, ought to strive to make them understand the terrors of the Last Judgment, and the joys of the Kingdom to come. And if the pastor cannot reach all by a discourse addressed to all in common, he ought as far as in him lies to instruct them individually, to edify them by private discourses, and by familiar exhortation strive to produce fruit in the hearts of his people.

And we ought unceasingly to bear in mind the words addressed to the holy Apostles, and through them to us: "You are the salt of the earth." * If, therefore, we are the salt of the earth, it behoves us to season the hearts of the faithful. As you are pastors, then, bear in mind that you feed the animals of God. For of them the Psalmist saith to God, "In it shall Thy animals dwell" (Ps. lxxvii. 11). Now we often see that a block of salt is set before cattle that they may be improved by licking it. As is the block of salt amid the cattle, such should the priest be in the midst of his people. For the priest must needs take thought of what to say to each, how to admonish individuals, that all who approach him may, as it were, by the touch of salt, be seasoned with the savour of eternal life. For we do not deserve to be called the salt of the earth, unless we season the hearts of the people. And he truly imparts that seasoning to his flock, who does not withhold from them the word of exhortation.

* Matt. v. 13.

10. But to preach virtue as we ought our life should be an example of our preaching; and as we cannot pass through life without sin, we ought with tears springing from divine love to wash away the stains of our daily faults. And to have genuine compunction we should carefully consider the life of the pastors who went before us, that the glory of their example may make our own life appear to us despicable. To be truly contrite we must carefully examine the commandments of the Lord, and strive to make progress in them, like those whom we venerate, and who sanctified themselves by their observance. Hence it is written of Moses: "And he set up for Aaron and his sons to wash in, when they entered into the Holy of Holies, a laver of brass, which he made of the mirrors of the women that watched at the door of the tabernacle" (Exod. xxxviii. 8). Now Moses set up a laver of brass for the ablutions of the priests before they entered into the Holy of Holies, for the law of God commands us first to purify ourselves by compunction, that our uncleanness may not render us unworthy to penetrate the purity of the secrets of God. And it is stated that the laver was made of the mirrors of the women who kept watch, without ceasing, at the door of the tabernacle. Now the mirrors of the women are typical of the divine precepts, in which holy souls are wont to examine themselves to discover if there be in them any stain of uncleanness. And they correct their faults of thought, and, so to say, beautify their countenances according to the image they see reflected, for by careful consideration of the divine precepts they perceive what there is in them to please or displease their heavenly Spouse.

Yet while they remain in this life they cannot enter into the eternal tabernacles. But as the women kept watch at the door of the tabernacle, so holy souls, though weighed down by the infirmity of the flesh, ever keep watch by their constant love at the entrance of the eternal sanctuary.

As Moses, therefore, made the laver of brass from the mirrors of the women, so the law of God supplies us with a laver of compunction to wash away the stains of sin, by setting before us the heavenly precepts by the observance of which holy souls please their celestial Spouse. For if we diligently reflect on them we perceive the stains upon our inward countenance. The sight of those stains moves us to penance and compunction, and by our sorrow we are cleansed as it were in the laver made from the mirrors of the women.

11. But while filled with sorrow for our own faults, it is very necessary for us to have zeal for the progress of the people committed to our charge. Let us therefore be filled with compunction, but let not its bitterness turn us away from solicitude for the people. For what will it avail us to have love for ourselves if we abandon the care of our neighbour? or, again, what will it profit us to have love and zeal for our neighbour if we neglect ourselves? For in the decoration of the tabernacle it was commanded to offer scarlet twice dyed; so in the eyes of God our charity should be dyed with the love of God and of our neighbour. Now he truly loves himself who sincerely loves his Creator. The scarlet is therefore twice dyed when through love of truth the soul is inflamed with love of ourselves and of our neighbour.

12. But we should bear in mind, withal, that we must practise zeal for virtue by correcting our neighbours' faults, in such a way as, in the heat of correction, never to forget the virtue of meekness. For the anger of a priest ought not to be impetuous and violent, but should be controlled by deliberation and gravity. Our duty is to bear with those whom we correct, and to correct those whom we bear with, lest, if we fail either in severity or in meekness, our conduct be not such as becomes a priest.

Hence, in the service of the Temple, there were engraven on the bases of the Temple lions and oxen and cherubim. Now the cherubim signify the fullness of wisdom. And what is the reason that on the bases there were neither lions alone, nor oxen alone? What else do the bases typify but priests in the Church. For, bearing as they do the burden of government, like the bases they carry the weight laid upon them. As, then, there were cherubim engraven on the bases, so it is meet that the hearts of priests should be stored with the fullness of knowledge. Again, the lions are typical of terror and severity, and the oxen of patience and meekness. Hence, as on the bases the lions were not engraven without the oxen, nor the oxen without the lions, so at all times in the heart of a priest meekness should be blended with severity, and while meekness tempers anger, zeal and severity should hinder meekness from becoming lax.

13. But to what purpose is it to speak of these things, while we yet see many guilty of more grievous faults? For I am grieved to say to you, Prelates, that I have learned that some among you confer orders for money, sell the grace of the Holy Ghost, and at the cost of incurring the guilt of sin, lay up temporal lucre by favouring the iniquities of others.

On the Pastoral Office

Why then do you not recall to mind the words of our Lord laying down the precept, "Freely you have received, freely give"? (Matth. x. 8). Why do you not picture to yourselves how our Redeemer entered into the Temple, and overthrew the chairs of them that sold doves, and poured out the money of the changers? Who are those who nowadays sell doves in the Temple of God but the ministers of the Church who take money for the imposition of hands? By that imposition of hands the Holy Spirit from on high is imparted. Therefore the dove is sold, because the imposition of hands by which the Holy Spirit is received is conferred for a price.

Now our Lord overthrew the chairs of them that sold doves by taking away the priesthood of those dealers. Hence the holy canons condemn the heresy of simony, and command that those who seek gain by conferring orders shall be deprived of the priesthood. The chair, therefore, of them that sell doves is overthrown, when they who sell the grace of the Spirit are deprived of the priesthood before men or before God.

And, in truth, there are many other sins of pastors which are now hidden from the eyes of men. For oftentimes pastors act before the eyes of men as though they were holy, and in secret they are not ashamed to appear unclean before the eyes of Him who sees their hearts. Beyond doubt the day shall come, it shall come, and it is not far distant, when the Pastor of pastors shall appear and make public the deeds of every man, and He who at present corrects the faults of the people by means of their pastors will then in person condemn severely the sins of the pastors themselves. Hence it was that entering the Temple He made, as it were, a scourge of cords, and drove out the wicked dealers from the house of God, and overthrew the chairs of them that sold doves ; for He corrects the sins of the people by means of their pastors, but the sins of pastors He chastises in person. What is done in secret may now be denied before men. But the Judge shall surely come from whom no man can conceal his faults by silence, and whom none by denial can deceive.

14. There is another feature, dearly beloved brethren, in the life of pastors which causes me deep affliction ; and lest perchance my words may seem to reflect on anyone, I accuse myself also though I am so circumstanced, much against my will, and through the necessities of the present troubled times. For we have descended to secular business, and having received the dignity of one office we busy ourselves with the duties of another. We abandon the duty of preaching, and to our disgrace, as I perceive, we are bishops in name, and have the title but not the virtue that befits that dignity. For the people committed to our care abandon God, and we are silent. They live in sin, and we do not stretch out a hand to correct them. Every day they are being lost on account of the multitude of their sins ; while they go down to hell we look on with negligence.

But how can we reform the life of others while we neglect our own ? For through attention to secular affairs the more we are occupied with external things, the more insensible we become to what is internal. And by application to worldly cares our mind becomes callous to heavenly desires, and hardened by the business of the world it cannot be softened to take an interest in what relates to the love of God.

Hence holy Church, with reason, says of her weak members : “ They have made me a keeper in the vineyards, my vineyard I have not kept ” (Cant. i. 5). Now our vineyards are our actions, which we cultivate by the practices of our daily life. But though we are made keepers in the vineyards, our own vineyard we do not keep, because being involved in external business we neglect the duties of our own ministry.

Dearly beloved brethren, from none, in my opinion, does God receive such prejudice as from priests, when they who are set up for the reformation of others set an example of wickedness, and when we ourselves, who should correct the faults of others, are guilty of sin. And what is still worse, oftentimes priests, who ought to give what is their own in alms, take what belongs to others. Oftentimes they deride such as live in humility and continence. Consider, then, what is the fate of the flock when the pastors become wolves. For there are men who undertake the care of souls, and yet they are not afraid to lay snares for the flock of the Lord, which needs to be protected against them. We seek not the good of souls, we are intent on our own interests; we covet earthly things, we strive to obtain the praise of men. And since our rank above others gives us greater liberty to act as we please, we make the ministry of blessing a means to further our ambition.

We abandon the interests of God, and give ourselves up to worldly business; we occupy a position which is holy, and we entangle ourselves in the affairs of the world. Truly the words of Scripture are fulfilled in us, "There shall be like people, like priest" (Osee iv. 9). For the priest does not differ from the people when he does not surpass the people by the merits of his life.

15. Let us then make our own the lamentation of Jeremias; let us consider our state and say: "How is the gold become dim, the finest colour changed; the stones of the sanctuary are scattered in the top of every street?" (Lamen. iv. 1). The gold is become dim, because the life of priests which formerly shone with the splendour of virtue has now become vile through the baseness of their actions. The finest colour is changed because the habit of sanctity, through the abject occupations of the world, is degraded and despised. The stones of the sanctuary were carefully guarded, and were worn by the High Priest only when he went into the Holy of Holies to appear before God in secret. We, dearly beloved brethren, are the stones of the sanctuary, and we should always remain in God's sanctuary, and not be seen abroad, that is occupied with what does not concern our vocation. But the stones of the sanctuary are scattered at the top of every street, when those, who by their action and their prayer should ever abide within, live abroad by their vicious conduct.

For behold, at the present time there is hardly any kind of secular business in which priests do not take a part. Hence, as in spite of the sanctity of their state they are engaged in exterior things, it comes to pass that the stones of the sanctuary are scattered.

And as in Greek, the word, street, plateia, is derived from breadth; the stones of the sanctuary are in the streets when religious persons walk in the broad paths of the world. And they are scattered not merely in the streets, but at the top of the streets, because through covetousness they do the works of the world, and yet by their religious profession they seek to occupy the place of honour. They are scattered at the top of the streets, because while their occupations degrade them, they desire to be honoured for the sanctity of their profession.

16. You yourselves are witnesses of the wars

St. Gregory the Great

which afflict the world, and the scourges by which the people perish every day. To what is this to be ascribed but to our sins? Lo! cities are devastated, fortresses are overthrown, churches and monasteries are destroyed, the fields are laid desolate. And we who ought to lead the people to life are the cause of their destruction. For through our fault many of the people have perished, because through our negligence we did not instruct them unto life.

What appellation should we give to the souls of men but the food of God, for they were created to be incorporated in His body?—that is, to increase the Church which is eternal. Now we ought to be the seasoning of that food. For as I have already said, when He sent His preachers, He said to them, “You are the salt of the earth.” If, then, the people are God’s food, priests should be its seasoning. But as we have abandoned prayer and sacred learning, the salt has lost its savour, and cannot season God’s food, and therefore God does not partake of it; because, as we have lost our savour, it is not seasoned.

Let us ask ourselves, therefore, who has been converted by our preaching, who moved by our rebukes has done penance for his sins, who has been taught to abandon lust, who has turned away from avarice and pride?

Let us ask ourselves what profit we have earned for God, who gave us a talent and sent us to trade with it. For He has said, "Trade until I come" (Luke xix. 13). Behold He comes and demands the profit we have made. What gain of souls shall we be able to show as the fruit of our trade? What sheaves, so to say, of souls shall we present to Him from the harvest of our preaching?

17. Let us call to mind that dreadful day when the Judge shall come, and shall call to account His servants, to whom He gave talents. He shall appear in awful majesty, amid choirs of angels and archangels. At that great Judgment the multitude of the elect and the reprobate shall be brought to trial, and the deeds of each shall be made manifest. There Peter shall appear bringing with him his converts of Judea. There Paul shall appear, bringing with him, so to speak, the whole world which he converted. There Andrew shall present to his King his converts of Achaia; John, those of Asia; and Thomas, those of India. There all the rams of the flock of God, who by their holy preaching brought their people to God, shall appear with the profit they have earned in souls. When so many pastors shall present themselves with their flocks to the eternal Pastor of souls, what shall we poor wretches say, who return empty-handed from our toil; who have the name of pastors, but have no sheep fed by us to present? We have the name of pastors here, but there we have no sheep to bring.

18. But if we neglect God's flock, will the

St. Gregory the Great

Almighty abandon it? Assuredly not. For as He promised by the prophet (Ezec. xxxiv.), He feeds it in person, and whom He has fore-ordained unto life He instructs by the smart of scourges, and by the spirit of compunction. By our ministry, it is true, the faithful are brought to holy baptism, by our prayers they are blessed, by the imposition of our hands they receive from God the Holy Spirit, they obtain the kingdom of heaven; and lo, we, through our negligence, go down to hell. Purified by the hands of priests the elect enter their heavenly country, while priests themselves, by their sinful life, hasten to eternal torments.

To what then shall I compare bad priests, but to baptismal water, which washes away the sins of the baptized and sends them on to heaven, while it flows itself down into the sewers?

Brethren, let us stand in dread of such a fate. Let our ministry and our life be in harmony. Let us every day take thought about the forgiveness of our sins, nor let us, by whom Almighty God sets others free, spend our days in the bondage of sin. Let us unceasingly keep in mind what we are, and weigh well our office and the burden we have undertaken. Let us daily examine how stand our accounts with our Judge.

And while we make provision for ourselves we must not neglect our neighbour, that so every man who approaches us may be seasoned with the salt of our exhortation.

On the Pastoral Office

When we see an unmarried person leading an unchaste life, we should admonish him to bridle his passion by entering the married state, and to learn by what is lawful to overcome what is unlawful.

If we have to deal with a married person, we should admonish him to attend to the cares of the world in such a way as not to forget the love of God, and strive so to please his wife as not to displease his Creator.

When we have to treat with a cleric, we should warn him to live so as to be an example to seculars, lest if his conduct be reprehensible the honour of religion suffer through his fault.

When we deal with a monk we should admonish him to pay attention in his acts, in his words and in his thoughts, to the respect due to his habit, to abandon perfectly the things of the world, and to strive to be such in conduct before the eyes of God as he appears in habit before the eyes of men.

Let us exhort the holy to advance in holiness, and the wicked to correct his vices, so that every man who comes in contact with the priest may go away seasoned with the salt of his discourse.

Brethren, lay these things seriously to heart, speak of these things to your people, prepare to offer to Almighty God the fruit of the charge you have undertaken.

St. Gregory the Great

But all this, of which we have been speaking, we shall induce you to perform rather by prayer than by exhortation.

Let us pray.

O God, who hast been pleased to call us to be pastors of Thy people, grant, we beseech Thee, that what we are called by men, such we may have strength to be in Thy sight. Through our Lord, &c.

Origen's On First Principles is a foundational work in the development of Christian thought and doctrine: it is the first attempt in history at a systematic Christian theology. For more than a decade this masterwork has been out of print; now it is available in a more accessible format and at an affordable price.

"Vatican II taught that scripture is the soul of theology. Few so fully embraced that conviction as did Origen. In this he remains an inspiration for all who see the vital connection among proclamation, catechesis, and theology. FOREWORD

by John C. Cavadini

G.W. Butterworth's translation of Origen's On First Principles, originally published in 1936 and twice reprinted (1966, 1973), is the only complete English translation based on the critical edition of the text (Koetschau, 1913). Though the standard English translation, classic in its own right, Butterworth's has been unavailable for many years. For reasons unrelated to its quality, teachers and individual readers found it increasingly hard to use.

Butterworth translated the only complete attestation of the text remaining from antiquity, Rufinus's Latin translation. But, following Koetschau's edition, Butterworth supplemented it with translations of Greek fragments taken from various sources. Where there was a Greek fragment, he divided the page between "Latin" and "Greek" columns, or even alternated "Latin" and "Greek" sections, making for a presentation that was difficult for any but the most advanced readers to follow.

Further, Koetschau's presentation was predicated on a hermeneutic of thoroughgoing suspicion regarding Rufinus's translation, alleging a systematic purge of opinions of Origen that by the late fourth century were not considered orthodox. Butterworth fully adopted, and even extended, Koetschau's hermeneutic of suspicion, as anyone who reads his Introduction will easily discover. The average reader could miss the fact that the "Greek" columns and supplements were not taken from a continuous ancient source, but were, in effect, a running polemic against the translation of Rufinus, using texts from sources as hostile as the anathemata of Justinian as though they were unbiased, objective witnesses to the original Greek.

In the seventy-five years since initial publication, scholarly consensus regarding the reliability of Rufinus's translation has considerably shifted. Instructors who wanted to use Butterworth's On First Principles found the bias governing the original presentation of the text increasingly glaring. This, coupled with the desire for an easier-to-read, more free-flowing text, gave rise to other expedients, such as the use of partial translations, or the substitution of other texts by Origen, omitting On First Principles altogether. Many individual readers gave up too.

This new presentation retains Butterworth's division of the page into "Greek" and "Latin" columns only where there is a substantial, continuous attestation of the text preserved in the Philocalia, the anthology of Origen's texts assembled by Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nazianzus. Otherwise the text of Rufinus stands alone. All other instances where Butterworth included the translation of a Greek fragment are omitted from the text, but the place of omission is noted in the text, and a reference to the discussions of each fragment in Crouzel and Simonetti's Sources Chrétiennes version is provided.

We hope this reader-friendly and inexpensive edition inspires its renewed presence in classrooms. We also hope it will find its way more easily into the hands of individual readers, who can now read one free-flowing text rather than negotiating a thicket of columns, lines, and asterisks and daggers.

The rewards for those who read, not in the first instance to wade into controversy, but to allow this work to settle into their soul on its own terms, are great. The encounter with this text leaves the soul with a memory of greatness—of architectonic ambition tempered everywhere by declarations of tentative results; of the boldest possible speculation undertaken in a spirit of loving self-effacement that chose, like Moses, rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of worldly prestige (1.P.1); of the most specialized inquiry on behalf of the educated in which, nevertheless, the needs of the "simplest" among believers preserve the work from the impersonal coldness of elitism and fill it with warmth. Thus does this work display its configuration to the mystery of the Incarnation that forms its heart.

In Book II, Origen offers perhaps the most sublime evocation of the Incarnation in patristic literature, the mystery in the face of which, "the human understanding with its narrow limits is baffled, and struck with amazement at so mighty a wonder knows not which way to turn." Therefore, "we must pursue our contemplation with all fear and reverence" (II.vi.2). This "fear and reverence," diffused from contemplation of the Incarnation into every nook and cranny of the text, also passes into the soul of the reader, and, almost imperceptibly, elevates it. Such is the benefit of reading the most breathtaking work bequeathed to us by Christian antiquity.

INTRODUCTION

by Henri de Lubac¹

ORIGEN'S WORKS

When Origen died he left behind a massive body of writings numbering close to a thousand titles. This vast treasure, consisting chiefly of explications of holy Scripture, was widely used for more than a century without serious obstacles to its diffusion. There was of course no lack of criticism. It had appeared even during Origen's Alexandrian period, and it redoubled immediately after his death. In subsequent generations men like Methodius of Olympus, Peter of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch and Pacomius proved resolute and sometimes violent opponents. In any event it was inevitable that, as the labor of theological reflection proceeded and orthodoxy was progressively defined, the imprecisions and inadequacies in the exposition of the faith given by this greatest of ante-Nicene fathers should grow increasingly more noticeable. His very genius, which had made him play such an important part in the elaboration of the dogma, made him correspondingly more vulnerable afterwards. Nor, however, did Origen lack defenders from the very start. Apologies for him multiplied apace with the attacks against him. The admiration expressed by men as significant and as different as Athanasius and Eusebius of Caesarea could be taken for a definitive guarantee of his position. His works spread rapidly in the West as well as in the East, emerged unscathed from every skirmish and went on spreading. But from about 375 on everything changed. The massive offensive launched by St. Epiphanius's Panarion unleashed the first of the storms in which Origen's writings were to founder. In the sixth century, the onslaught was still worse. The doctrinal excesses of the Syrian monk Stephen Bar Sudaili, who had concocted a strange system, by mixing various traits borrowed from Gnosticism and the Cabbala with certain ideas taken from the Periarchon, provoked Justinian's thunderbolts. The list of fifteen anathemata, drawn up by the Council Fathers of 553 outside their official sessions, was not the worst by far; for their sources are in fact not Origen's works at all. There followed the physical destruction of his writings. It had begun at the end of the fourth century; but this time it was carried out systematically. The emperor-theologian was in earnest and so was the zealous faction which had alerted him. Nearly all of Origen's work perished. Only two letters and a few fragments remain of his vast correspondence which originally had had four or five sections. Of the exegetical works—although the principles of exegesis had not been involved in the controversy—barely twenty have come down to us in the original. Searches through the libraries of the Middle East could produce no more than "a few insignificant scraps." There is no way to measure such a loss. Epiphanius and Justinian have served the enemies of Christian civilization well.

Luckily there was a number of Latin translations. Some were made by St. Hilary, St. Jerome, and several others. The greater part came from the pen of Rufinus of Aquileia. Rufinus's translations have been unjustly maligned. Recent historians who studied them have rightly reacted against an unduly severe evaluation of their worth: the translations served their purpose well. They are fluent, clear and pleasant to read, which in itself is an advantage. Though their author claims to be "incapable of rendering the movement of Origen's sentences with the eloquence" of Jerome, he does in fact often seem to render the original with a genuine felicity. Of course, we would want them to be more faithful, more literal. Still, there is hardly a translation except that of the Periarchon which poses any really serious problems for the historian of dogma. The translation of the commentary on the Epistle to the Romans is an abridgment, and openly admits it. What is more, it was done from a corrupt text and Rufinus himself tells us that it caused him exceedingly painstaking labor. In other cases, the translator does not hesitate to make slight adaptations. Sometimes he paraphrases; less frequently he gives extracts. He does not hesitate to add to a passage what explanations he considers necessary for Latin readers. But since he honestly informs the reader of the kind of liberty he is taking, we may trust him when he writes on occasion "Simpliciter ut invenimus transtulimus." These words refer to the homilies on Joshua, on Judges, and on Psalms 36–38. With respect to the homilies on Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus the translation admits to some expansion of the original, but without giving us any reason to doubt its faithfulness to the substance. Together, the translations are of incalculable value to us. When Rufinus set to work at the urgent request of his friend Macarius, convinced though he was that his work could be of real value, he had no inkling of the unrivaled importance of his task. It is fortunate indeed that he did not let himself be discouraged by the quarrel that Jerome was trying to pick with him. He saved from final ruin some of the most precious monuments of Christian antiquity, works destined to mold Latin minds for a long time to come.

Even so, more than one historian has refused to make use of these translations. Such purism would be excessive even if the translations were ten times more suspect than they are: it is too much of an invitation to laziness and simple lack of inquiry. All kinds of precautions are necessary of course. One must not press a particular expression too far. One cannot rely upon a specific detail for fear that it may be a gloss. But when it is a question, not of a precise statement made in passing or of a specific point of doctrine, but of what constitutes so to speak the texture of thought and discourse, one stands on firmer ground. In this case more than elsewhere, the real cure does not lie in abstinence but on the contrary in massive utilization. In order to have a chance to reach the authentic Origen, one must pile citations on citations. In that way the parallel passages control, define, and comment on one another, especially when one examines, for example, a phrase in Rufinus's Latin, another in the Latin of Jerome, and finally a third preserved in the original Greek. Indeed such confrontations are not rare; and from them there emerges an impression of unity. Through all the variety of his works and through all the diversity of the versions in which they come to us, Origen looks most of the time surprisingly like himself.

By the same token, this consideration rules out another sort of suppression. Scholars at times have depreciated and even systematically brushed aside not only the homilies which we have only in translation but even those of which the Greek text still exists, and also such writings as the Exhortation to Martyrdom. These were considered simply as signs of a "popular Origenism"; they were "popularizations," written for public consumption, and unworthy to have a share in the reconstruction of the true Origen synthesis. Only the Periarchon, the Contra Celsum and up to a point the major commentaries could supply tried and true material. . . . Discrimination of this sort is willful. It stems from a mistaken idea of Origen's personality and of the very nature of his thought. It is as evident as can be that not everything which came from the lips or the pen of this great man bears the same features, and that we cannot attach equal importance to it all. But nothing entitles us to think that all does not have the same sincerity, the same conviction. One must not forget that the books on St. John's gospel and the Exhortation to Martyrdom are both dedicated to the same Ambrose. Origen was not one of those curious and detached minds who "enter into sacred science like a tourist goes into a city to look up its monuments." His Christianity was not a speculation removed from life, nor a dream in the margins of the concerns of the great Church. In his highest meditations as in his most practical exhortations, his Christianity was "committed," to use the language of our day. We shall see the proof below. Historians who have failed to recognize this fact imagine him an intellectual who put on a mask to speak to the common people, a man whose interior life had its place outside the Christian community; these historians have gone astray in both their method and their interpretation. In trying to pick the trump cards out of Origen's work, they have not merely deprived themselves of sources of the first order; they have also distorted the meaning of the very sources they retained.

HIS PIETY AND ORTHODOXY

We must rid ourselves of the view, still far too common, which presents Origen as almost entirely an intellectual, esoteric and rationalizing, and see him as the man of the spirit, the apostle, the man of the Church which he was above all else. The daring of his genius must not blind us to the drives of his piety. The shortcomings of his doctrine—inevitable in a thinker of the third century who was the very first to build a theology—must not make us mistake the pure quality of his faith.

His intellectual formation, we must not forget, was entirely Christian; we might even say entirely ecclesiastic. Many features of his homilies remind us of it, if need be. "We of the Church," he says; "I, a man of the Church, living in the faith of Christ and set in the midst of the Church. . . ." Justin, Tatian, Clement and others like them were converts; because of a turn of mind due to their early formation they remained philosophers. But when Origen affectionately proclaims himself "a man of the Church," he underlines something like an inborn quality that is the mark of his whole genius. When he speaks of the "world," the word is often used in the sense it has in the gospels—the world that passes away, especially the evil world from which Jesus Christ comes to set us free. Despite the testimony of Eusebius, one may well ask whether he ever figured among Clement's disciples—we are far too much accustomed to see him in Clement's tow. Clement after his conversion kept the vocabulary of the Greeks that had already imposed itself on Philo, and then on Tatian; he still called the doctrine of Moses and of Christianity itself by the name of "barbarian philosophy." But Origen contrasts the "barbarians" who were the Egyptians, with the "saints" who were the great men of Israel. He had been introduced to the Bible on his father's knees, and he always maintained that outside the Bible "there is nothing holy." Except in Contra Celsum he almost never quotes from profane authors. He is not a man who professes in private, a lecturer, but above all a catechist and preacher. He is one of those who ecclesiastice docent verbum. He is quite willing to include idolaters, heretics and "philosophers" in a single sweeping condemnation. He knows that "the knowledge which converts men to lead a holy life comes only from . . . Christ" and that Christ is found only "in the Church" which is filled with his splendor—the Church, pillar and firm support of the truth, where the Son of Man dwells in fullness. From the moment when he becomes a priest, he is aware that he "exercises the teaching office of the Church, of which he bears the authentic character"; he wishes to be "the faithful steward of the divine mysteries." He compares the writings of the apostles to the trumpets of Israel's army which reduced to rubble the walls of Jericho, the whole machinery of paganism, and the systems of its thinkers. These, to him, are real idolaters because "they worship the inventions of their own mind." He sees these Doctors of the world in league with the heretics against the Christian faith, an insult to its simplicity. This "simplicity of faith" is, in his view, altogether different from a simple adherence to "the bare letter"; it is a positive virtue, a form of perfection. It is this simplicity which renders the bride of Christ so glorious, which causes her to be without spot or wrinkle. Origen professes for it a real worship; it is, he says, "the virginity of the soul." A childlike and humble spirit follows in its wake.

In Origen's devotion to the Person of the Savior one discerns a note of tenderness that is all his own. It is not just that in his apology against Celsus he spoke of Christ with a nobility mindful of Pascal. It is not just that in the Periarchon he exalted in particularly solemn terms the mystery of the Incarnation, that mystery more wonderful and more disturbing than all the others, which "we must contemplate with fear and trembling." It is not only that in his commentary on the Song of Songs he adopted the voice of the Church which comes from the Gentiles, to cry out: "For because of thy word, O Christ, which I recognized as the true word, I came to thee. For all the words which were said to me, and which I heard while I was in my own country, from worldly teachers and philosophers, were not true words. That only is the true word, which is in thee." He speaks in more intimate tones as well. He greets with deep emotion the first appearance of Jesus' name in the Bible, and observes that nowhere in the Bible is the name ever borne by a sinner. We ought to imitate no one, he says, save only Jesus. Apart from Jesus, nothing to him is worthy of being loved. He would have us love Jesus with the same love that we owe to God; more, he would have us love God in him. He prays to him and would have us pray to him even as to the Father. The absence of Christ is for Origen a desert barren of righteousness. In his homilies vibrate some of the first notes of that human piety toward Jesus which to us seems to have become inseparable from our religion. Without cutting it off from its dogmatic roots he here brings to perfection an aspect of devotion which had not yet won its place in the great tradition and which was not to unfold fully until much later. A distant precursor of St. Bernard, Origen celebrates the power and the sweetness of Jesus' name. He knows that Jesus can be "found" only in the solitude and silence of the heart. He wants us to seek him with zeal, with perseverance, if need be in anguish and sorrow; to live with him ever present; to ask him questions and to listen to his replies: this, to Origen, is what the search for the meaning of Scripture really means; he wants us to humble ourselves deeply so that we may deserve to hear the sweetness of his voice. He declares that all the good things which man can expect and which God can give are summed up in Jesus. He praises those who contemplate Christ and who remain bound to him "by a bond of tender affection"—and those who prefer to put their trust in his words rather than in their own conscience. Even as Origen smiles at Jesus' childhood, so he suffers with him the suffering and humiliation of his Passion which he at times evokes with startling realism. He admires the majesty of his silence. He also meditates on the first pages of the gospel; and from Jesus' submission to Joseph he learns that, no matter how great one may be, there is no better thing than to live in humble submission. He announces that there is no true Christian life in separation from the man who was the Christ and from Mary his mother. He often speaks of "my Jesus," "my Lord," "my Savior." This personal touch had become so much a habit with him that he at times slipped into introducing it even into his quotations from Scripture. It is a Pauline trait; but Origen's insistent usage makes something new of it, a sort of conquest of Christian piety. No doubt Tertullian had already spoken of "my Christ," but this expression simply meant: Christ as I see him, as my faith shows him to me and as I claim him to be, in contrast to the Christ whom Marcion imagines, "Marcion's Christ." In an analogous way, he could say that the true Christ is the "Christ of the Creator," the "Christ of Isaiah," the "Christ of the Prophets," and so on; or again, in a discussion of Moses or of Paul, he said just as easily: "my Moses," "my Apostle." In these polemical chapters from the Adversus Marcionem, the point at issue was "two Christs," that is, two conceptions of Christ opposing one another. If Tertullian made use of the first person singular—meus, mihi—it was because of the personal character which he gave to the battle with his adversary. It was two men who fought a duel: "your Christ," says Tertullian in addressing Marcion. Two men, but in the name of two Churches: the heretical Church of Marcion and the great Church Catholic. Tertullian's "my Christ" was thus simply the equivalent of "the Christ of the Church, of the Catholic tradition, of the orthodox faith"; and the possessive pronoun simply expresses the personal attachment that this forceful fighter felt for that faith. But Origen is a man of another cast. Like John the Evangelist, he "reclined at the breast of Jesus." The one for whom he as a boy would have wished to meet martyrdom had forever enraptured the depths of his soul.

His piety was redoubled by a very strong concern with orthodoxy. For example, in one of his homilies on St. Luke he says: "As for myself, my wish is to be truly a man of the Church, to be called by the name of Christ and not that of any heresiarch, to have this name which is blessed all over the earth; I desire to be, and to be called, a Christian, in my works as in my thoughts." Love and faith are fused in this outcry; it is the force of love which exacts tightness of faith. He often alerts us to the danger of false doctrines from which, he observes, "human nature finds it difficult to purify itself." Such doctrines are for him in the true sense, so to speak, "the abomination of desolation." He insists that one must protect oneself against them by vigilance and by prayer. Not content to invoke "the rule of the Scriptures" or "the evangelical and apostolic rule," he constantly appeals to "the rule of the Church," "the faith of the Church," "the word of the Church," "the preaching of the Church," "the tradition of the Church," "the doctrine of the Church," "the thought and teaching of the Church." In the bones of the paschal Lamb he sees a symbol of the "holy dogmas of the Church" of which not one shall be broken. He does not want "that there be any disagreement on doctrine among Churches." He is Adamantius, "the man of iron"; "doctrinal firmness" is one of the virtues closest to his heart. He exalts constancy in the faith and stability of dogma. Even before St. Augustine, he speaks of "chastity of the heart," that is, of the understanding, and doctrines that stray from the rule of faith seem to him worse than evil ways of life. Again, he says that "one must guard oneself against committing an offense of the head" and against eating the sacred foods outside the temple, that is, "against harboring thoughts different from the faith of the Church on divine dogmas." One must receive the faith of God in the spirit which the Church teaches us, and must not do like the heretics who search the Scriptures only in order to find some confirmation of their own doctrines. Their pride raises them "higher than the cedars of Lebanon" and their sophistries are full of deceit. But it is no use for them to pretend that they have a tradition which comes down from the apostles; they are professors of error. While the faithful Christian in no way strays from the great tradition, they appeal to secret Scriptures or to secret traditions in order to confirm their lies. Thus they want to make us worship a Christ whom they have invented "in solitude," while the only authentic Christ reveals himself "within the house." They disfigure those vessels of gold and silver which are the sacred texts, in order to fashion them into objects according to their own fancy. They are thieves and adulterers who seize the divine words only to deform them by their perverse interpretations. They are counterfeiters for they have coined their doctrine outside the Church. False teachers, false prophets, spinning out of their own minds what they propound, they are the liars of whom Ezekiel speaks. By a perverse trickery they often cover their idols, that is, their empty dogmas, with sweetness and chastity so that their propositions may be smuggled more easily into the ears of their listeners and lead them astray more surely. They all call Jesus their master and embrace him; but their kiss is the kiss of Judas.

Is this truly the same man as the "allegorist" of whom we have been told? And if the two representations are incompatible, which are we to choose? Tillemont was clear-eyed when he wrote that Origen "seems to have had a very humble spirit, very submissive to the Church, very respectful of her doctrines and decisions, very devoted to her unity." His feeling for the Church did in fact run as deep as his feeling for Christ. He was in the habit of calling her "Mother," and saw the Christians as her "children." The voice of her teaching was pleasing to him, and he was convinced that the more spiritual one grows, the more one recognizes the beauty of her face. He thought that the greatest misfortune is to be "cut off from the Mystery of the Church" like that plant from Jerusalem which, when transplanted into Canaan, withered at once because it was no longer cared for by the hand of God. All this surely is out of keeping with the sort of allegorism that many have attributed to Origen. But in turn it all is very much in keeping with the allegorism he actually practiced. And we must go further. Concern for orthodoxy and devotion to the faith, love for the "dogmas of the truth" are precisely among the reasons for Origen's allegorism. One of his goals is "to shut Pharaoh's mouth" with an explication of Scripture that "conforms to sound doctrine." For example, when he runs up against anthropomorphic passages in the Bible, he feels the need to interpret them, not primarily in the name of reason, but in the name of the faith of the Church: Alienum hoc est ab Ecclesiae fide. Similarly, he supposes, "who will dare say that the Word of God is of no use and contributes in no way to salvation, but does no more than tell of events that happened in the past and have no relation to us?" Impia haec, et aliena a catholica fide sententia est. To maintain such an opinion, one must deny the unity of the Law and the gospel, the unity of the God of Moses and God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. On the contrary, to seek the "spiritual meaning" of Scripture in order to draw nourishment from it is to use Scripture in catholic fashion, verbum Dei catholice tractari. It is to receive the Word from Jesus' hands and to have him read it to you. It is to act as "a son of the Church." If there is one fundamental obligation for the Christian, it is that of keeping "to the rule of the heavenly Church of Jesus Christ, through the succession from the apostles." In concrete terms then, what is this rule? St. Irenaeus had already given the answer: it is the interpretation of Scripture by the spirit.

WISDOM AND THE CROSS

How colorless the human wisdom of the philosophers looks to Origen beside these treasures of divine knowledge in which he thus steeps himself! His writings yield nothing comparable to those elaborations which Clement, in the first book of his Stromateis, devoted to the praise of philosophy. Not that Origen allows no place for the profane disciplines within ecclesiastical doctrine: for him, the spoils of Egypt are fair game! Origen did not invent this metaphor which was destined to become famous, but he did make it his own. When one thinks that it was to reappear from the pen not only of such men as Alcuin or John Duns Scotus, but also of Peter Damian and even Gregory IX, one is less inclined to view it as evidence of unbounded intellectualism. We note, besides, that these "spoils" are of value only if they are brought back to the holy land for the building of the Temple. By contrast, he who goes down into Egypt to devote himself there to the profane sciences runs great risks. If he lingers there as did Ader the Idumean, if he lets himself be seduced by philosophy, he will return only to corrupt the faith and to break up the unity of his brothers. Those who escape this ruin are rare indeed.

Yet these disciplines also have a propaedeutic role. For a person capable of acquiring genuine education it is desirable that he "draw from Greek philosophy the system of knowledge that is fit to serve as an introduction to Christianity." Certain "ideas of geometry and astronomy," for example, will be useful to him also "to explain the sacred writings." By the same token, the apologist will imitate the patriarchs who did not hesitate to enter into unions with concubines or an alien woman, even in old age, with a mind to having descendants conceived in chastity. Thus he will bring together for his instruction "literature, grammar, geometry, arithmetic, dialectic"; "and if such marriages enable us to present our ideas, to discuss them, and to refute those who oppose them, and if in this way we should be able to convert a few men to the faith; if, by using their own methods more skillfully than they do themselves, we persuade them to accept the true philosophy of Christ and the true piety of God, then we can say that we have had children by dialectic or rhetoric, as by an alien woman or a concubine." And again, just as Moses accepted the counsel of his father-in-law Jethro, priest of an alien God, just so "if we happen to find a word of wisdom on the lips of a pagan, we should not immediately disdain the word itself because of the speaker; because it is not right for us to swell with pride and scorn the words of wise men on the pretext that we possess a law given to us by God. Rather, as the Apostle says, we must test everything and retain what is good." In any case, one must never make use of secular doctrines without first cleansing them and cutting out whatever in them is barren or dead. For, while every science comes from above, that is from God, there is not one that has not been more or less corrupted by the malice of men or of demons. No doubt, side by side with its falsehoods, "hellenic philosophy" contains elements of truth which are not to be despised; St. Paul "saw a manifest greatness in the words of worldly wisdom"—only to judge them in the end all the more captious and vain. If one reviews everything that philosophy, Greek or barbarian, teaches, one will recognize that every time it fails to agree with Christ's teaching it is sheer folly. These "alien doctrines" must always be "controlled and held in subjection." Origen knows that this is not easy: "I, too, may tell what I have learned from experience, that rare is the man who succeeded in taking from Egypt only its useful things, and then going away to employ them for the service of God." Lest one be taken by surprise, one will always recall that philosophy and the faith, like Isaac and Abimelech, are now at peace and now at war, and that nothing must be accepted from the first until we have verified its agreement with the second.

Still more often Origen warns us against the dangers of philosophy. He condemns the "wisdom of the rulers of this world" without making distinctions. It is not just false knowledge, it is perverse to the core. It consists above all of magic and divination, "the secrets of the Egyptians, occult philosophy, the astrology of the Chaldeans and Indians, the countless opinions of the Greeks concerning divinity." With this wisdom no compromise is possible. It is the wisdom of those who conspired against the Lord and crucified him. As for the "wisdom of this world," which consists of the profane arts and sciences, "poetry, grammar, geometry, rhetoric, music, and perhaps medicine," it too is dangerous in the form in which it is offered. Without being radically evil, it has become a tool of the demons; and its spirit is now contrary to Jesus Christ. It is an alien wisdom which God scatters to the winds, "the wealth of sinners." It is opposed to divine wisdom as the spirit of the world is opposed to the spirit of God. Its adepts seek to overthrow the gospel with the deceits of their dialectic. Origen compares it to the food consecrated to idols which the Apostle condemned, to "the leaven of the Pharisees" which Jesus denounced before his disciples, to the bar of gold that Achan stole at Jericho in spite of Joshua's order: a cursed object which seduces us with its brilliant beauty and contaminates the whole people. He accuses it of corrupting the faith with its sophistries as Eve was seduced by the guile of the serpent, of deceiving the wise man with the variety of its theses as Solomon was deceived by his wives. He points out that it invariably leaves those who follow it in uncertainty and doubt; like Abimelech's wife and maidservants, it remains barren so long as God has not come to heal it. "Do not touch," he says, "the furtive loaves of perverse doctrine. Do not long for the deceitful foods of philosophy which entice you away from the truth. This is the fast which is pleasing to God." True, Origen does not refuse the use of such nourishment "to those who have received full knowledge of the truth"; his language and method with a small group of fervent and cultivated disciples will be different from those he uses with the mass of the Christian people. But this is only normal, as any experienced educator will agree. The risks and the needs are not in fact the same in both cases; what is profitable in one could become fatal in the other. Thus one must always be alert "not to wound those who still have little training in Christ" and who might get caught in the trap. In the last analysis, then, it is hardly an exaggeration to speak, with one of Origen's recent interpreters, of "the surprising aversion" that he feels toward this philosophy "which he knows very well nonetheless." No doubt one must make allowances for Origen's rhetoric. But there is in his faith in Christ a seriousness and sincerity, a power of conviction at once firm and measured and, all in all, a strength of faith that bears the signs of the Christian victory beforehand. Who could believe henceforth that for the use of those whom he called the "perfect" Origen transformed Christianity into a sort of philosophical wisdom, that he made it into a "platonic gnosis" and abandoned the cross of Christ to the "beginners"? This manner of presenting his thought is unfaithful. And it is even more of a grievous mistake to propose that according to him salvation consists only in the work of the cross "for the ordinary Christian," while "for the Christian gnostic" it will be no more than "a higher teaching"; and that to the former, the redeemer and healer is present in the Christ of history, to the latter, the eternal Logos simply as a teacher. At the root of such interpretations we find the same misunderstanding which we have already noted in several of its forms. It is quite true that Origen throws into relief the role of the incarnate Logos as educator and illuminator of souls; but this trait, far from making him akin to the "gnostic" theologians, puts him in opposition to them. It is quite true also that he, once again following St. Paul, means to preach a wisdom that surpasses "the simple faith" and that his "perfect believer" must go beyond the letter which the narrative of the Savior's Passion and death traces for him. But let us not forget that for him this wisdom is a grace of God, altogether different from that prideful and miserable knowledge which "the simplest of the Christians put to shame." It is this "true wisdom" which was given of old to such men as Isaiah and Jeremiah and which today is shared by those who are born in the Spirit. "When we understand, we understand by faith"; and to be "set free by the truth" we must "abide in the faith." Let us not ascribe to Origen's views some sort of disdainful arrogance. "Simple faith" or faith in the "simple letter" do not mean to him the faith of the simple or the lowly, of "those who are inferior according to human judgment." One of the characteristics of Jesus' preaching, Origen notes repeatedly, is that it is addressed to all, to the barbarians as to the Greeks, to the uneducated as to the learned. By the same token, he thinks, a true apostle of Jesus is recognizable by the fact that he "does not despise simple people." He who counts himself a believer and wise is, on the contrary, quite close to being an unbeliever if he disdains what the world takes for folly but what God has chosen: such are the Pharisees who, thinking themselves superior, keep themselves apart from the multitude.

Nor does Origen confuse wisdom with wisdom. We cite once again his clear declaration against Celsus's haughty reflections: "Human wisdom is what we call 'the wisdom of the world,' which is 'foolishness with God.' But the divine wisdom, which is different from the human if it really is divine, comes by the grace of God who gives it to those who prove themselves to be suitable persons to receive it. . . . Celsus describes as very uneducated and as slaves and as quite ignorant those who . . . have not been educated in the learning of the Greeks. But the people whom we call very uneducated are those who are not ashamed to address lifeless objects." However, there is some excuse here for the error. It stems above all from the exegesis which Origen habitually gives to a text from the first Epistle to the Corinthians: "For I decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ and him crucified." In the knowledge of which the Apostle here speaks, Origen sees no more than a knowledge that is still inferior, in other words a knowledge that is ignorant of Christ's person and work. Where Paul intended to speak of the "mystery of the cross" which he had "preached in all its starkness," Origen believes that it is simply a question of preaching the external fact of the crucifixion without revealing its mystery. Those who know only Jesus crucified, he thinks, are those who "suppose that the Word made flesh is the whole Word," who know nothing of his "glory" or his divinity. For this reason they are incapable of comprehending the meaning of the cross, which is to say that they do not know the mystery of our redemption. They have not as yet crossed the Jordan with the armies of the true Jesus and pushed on to the interior of the promised land to wage the final battles there. Origen sees in Paul's text an intention more restrictive than it really is. To him, the Christians who keep to this first sermon do not actually have "an elementary catechism"; they are at most still in the stage of a preparatory catechism. Such people are not necessarily weak in spirit; they may be wise according to the world. But they are still carnal men. As yet they know Christ only "according to the flesh," and if they wish to remain so, they would deserve the Apostle's blame. The Apostle decided at first to know nothing else while he was among them because they could then bear no more. Their soul had not been made ready. But when he wrote to them later, he made it clear that he possessed a wisdom nonetheless: a wisdom not of this world but of God, "a secret and hidden wisdom" which he "proclaims among the perfect." This wisdom does not annul the first knowledge but completes and transforms it. It is a more profound teaching which constitutes the understanding of the initial datum. It is the solid food which takes the place of the milk of infants, that is, once again, the milk not of the "weak," of those who are simple according to the world, but of the νήπιοι in the Pauline sense, of those who "had not yet been purified in their habits." There are not, then, two categories of Christians separated by the power of their intelligence. There is not a popular preaching and a different, more refined, teaching for the intellectuals. Our religion "is at once spiritual and corporeal." And if in certain cases it is necessary to begin by preaching "the corporeal gospel," this must always be with the desire to come to the point of showing forth the "glory of the only-begotten Son" underneath "the form of a servant." Once one has aroused in the souls the taste for "the heavenly wisdom," one will be able "to communicate to it the knowledge which will lead it from the Incarnation even to the one who was with God in the beginning."

But the proclamation of Jesus crucified remains no less essential. For "the economy of the Passion" is central. It is "the Economy" par excellence. Origen knows that without the wood of the cross the leprosy of sin cannot be healed. He knows that it is the whole Church, without any distinction of categories, that was saved by the blood of Christ. He knows that the death of Christ is the Tree of Life for all of us, that all fruitfulness comes from this death as from the grain of wheat which must fall into the earth and seem to perish. He declares that all the glory and all the riches of the Church lie in Christ's Passion. For him, to be converted is "to come to the cross of Christ"; and the wisdom of the perfect consists not in some other knowledge, but in the contemplation of "the profound mysteries which Paul uncovers there for us" and then in rejecting all the more strongly the wisdom of the world. It is to be crucified to this world's wisdom. For there is total opposition between the narrow way of salvation shown to us in the cross of Christ, and the wide and easy way on which the philosophy of the wise men of the world seeks to engage us. The "vision of the Logos" can be attained only at the price of death to the world and at the cost of great tribulation; and no matter how sublime this vision may be, it will never make us lose sight of the crucified Jesus, at once priest and victim. There is no wisdom that excuses from taking up his cross and following him. Even supposing that, like Paul, one has been caught up to the third heaven, there is only one way not to fall back; and it is precisely this, to "take up the cross and follow Jesus in whom 'we have a great high priest who has passed through the heavens.'"

Origen delights in commenting on the Prophet's oracles concerning the suffering Servant of Yahweh. He admires the profound "philosophy" which the Apostle discerns in the Passion. He binds himself to Paul's statement: Jesus "humbled himself even unto death and became obedient even to the cross." Sadly he confirms the fact that many do not understand this text and "imagine a Jesus inaccessible to suffering" and altogether superior, so they think, to all such abasement. "Under the guise of religious respect for Jesus," when they come to the rending cry Quare me dereliquisti? they wish to see no more than a token of humility. Origen himself, on the other hand, most certainly had a vivid sense of the scandal of the mysterium crucis. To say that the Lord of Majesty was crucified, he who had come down from heaven, how "tortuous" such an affirmation appears; how hard to believe! Nonetheless, he will not blush at his Savior's cross. It is just this supreme humiliation of the Son of Man, which is ridiculed by the philosophers, from which the believer draws the power to scorn their laughter and their sarcasm. "The Christian faith has no fear of scandal." This scandal becomes a triumph of faith, and that which seemed "folly" is transformed into wisdom, "into a wisdom so great that it swallows all the wisdom of the Egyptians, that is, of this world." When the light of the cross penetrates the Christian's intelligence, it dispels all the dark shadows which the mistakes of the philosophers had accumulated there. It is this light of the cross which illumines the lives of the saints and makes them all martyrs, that is, witnesses of the Savior. It is the power of the cross that annihilates all evil desires; by it, "the whole army of sin and the flesh is put to rout." So great is this power that it procures healing and salvation not only for present and future generations, but even for those of past centuries. Even more, it is sufficient to save not only all mankind but also the celestial orders and powers. It is through union with the cross that our mutual union in the Father and the Son is realized. And no man was ever better placed to hear such a promise than he who hung with Jesus on the cross: "For he was a plant worthy of paradise, who was joined to the Tree of Life in this way." "The death of Christ reduced to impotence those powers which war against the human race." If the demons fear and tremble, the cause is again nothing else but the cross: the blood that flows down from it does not appease their thirst but destroys their power. It is the cross which has vanquished them and by which we shall vanquish them in our turn. "The power of the cross" is irresistible. And so we must faithfully bear its sign, take up "the standard of the cross" to meet its struggles and persecutions, so that we too may be able to say with Paul: "Far be it from me to glory except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." In summing up, we may say that there is, as it were, a twofold advent of the Logos in the soul. At the first advent, Christ barely begins to be known; the soul, still "untaught" [rudis] does not see his beauty; it discerns only the birth and the crucifixion in the flesh. But the second advent corresponds in some way, within the soul, to that advent which will be the consummation of the world; to him who reaches perfection, or simply Christian maturity, Christ appears transfigured in his beauty and his glory. Then, far from rejecting the mystery of the Incarnation or of the cross, the soul understands at last. Its faith becomes luminous. It finds its own glory in this mystery "by which the world has been crucified to me and I to the world." It sees in all clarity that this death to the world in Christ is a "blessed death." Such is, not the public and provisional teaching adapted to those who are "weak" or to the first stage of the beginners, but rather the final state of the perfect, itself a sign and anticipation within the soul of the final consummation. For to him for whom the world has been crucified and who no longer glories except in the cross, the end of the world has come, so to speak. With Romano Guardini, Origen could have said: "The cross is the absolute symbol."

TRANSLATOR'S INTRODUCTION

by G. W. Butterworth

I. LIFE AND WRITINGS OF ORIGEN

"The greatest teacher of the Church after the apostles"—such was the description of Origen which Jerome adopted from Didymus, the blind theologian of Alexandria, and inserted in the preface to his translation of the great master's Homilies on Ezekiel.¹ In the preface to his own work, On the Meaning of Hebrew Names, Jerome repeated the tribute, remarking that "all but the ignorant" recognized it to be true.² Later on, when his enthusiasm for Origen had cooled, Jerome found it embarrassing to be reminded of these early laudations. Yet his first judgment was certainly sound, and few who study the works of Origen today will be disposed to contest it.

The story of Origen's life is easily accessible to the student,³ and need not be retold here except in outline. He was born AD 185–186, probably at Alexandria, of Christian parents. At the age of seventeen he narrowly escaped death in the persecution of Severus, when his father Leonides was martyred and Origen was with great difficulty prevented from voluntarily sharing his fate. Owing to the departure of Clement from Alexandria in the same persecution the headship of the Catechetical School became vacant, and such was the ability and industry of Origen that he was appointed to fill this post at the age of eighteen. He labored with increasing success as a teacher, working almost day and night with the crowds, including heretics and non-Christians as well as members of the Church, who attended his lectures or came to consult him privately. About AD 215 he visited Caesarea in Palestine, where his friends Alexander bishop of Jerusalem and Theoctistus bishop of Caesarea asked him to lecture in church on the Scriptures. Demetrius, patriarch of Alexandria, objected to this, for Origen had not been ordained. In spite of the protests of Origen's friends Demetrius demanded his return to Alexandria, and he obeyed.

During the next period of his life, lasting from twelve to fifteen years, Origen began the literary work which established his fame throughout the whole Church. A wealthy layman named Ambrose, whom he had restored from heresy to the orthodox faith, became his life-long friend, and supplied him with the means to write and publish his books. The first parts of the Commentary on St. John were composed then, and following them came the treatise on First Principles, a comprehensive investigation of Christian doctrine on a scale never before attempted. It is probable that this work aroused opposition. Origen's mind was such that he could leave no question unprobed; and in the effort to reduce the Church's faith to a single, logical system, based on the Scriptures as they were then understood, he was led into speculations which to simpler folk appeared fantastic and dangerous. Owing either to this, or else to jealousy on the part of Demetrius, or perhaps to a combination of both, the relations between Origen and his bishop became strained and he took advantage of an invitation to visit Greece. Calling at Caesarea on the way, he was there ordained presbyter by Theoctistus and Alexander.

This act caused a final break with Demetrius, who strongly disapproved of it; and when Origen returned to Alexandria at the conclusion of his visit to Greece it became evident that he must seek another home.

Demetrius called a synod of Egyptian bishops, who decided that Origen should no longer be allowed to teach at Alexandria. Soon afterwards he was excommunicated, on what grounds we do not know, except that Jerome tells us they were not doctrinal.⁴ But the sentence, though accepted at Rome and throughout a considerable part of the Christian world, had little practical effect outside Egypt; and Origen was gladly received by Theoctistus at Caesarea, where he became at once an honored teacher of the Church. Here he worked from AD 231 for the rest of his life. In addition to his writing, he expounded the Scriptures to the ordinary church congregations and lectured on deeper theological subjects to educated students. One of these, Gregory, afterwards called Thaumaturgus, or the Wonderworker, has left us, in his Panegyric,⁵ a striking description of Origen. No higher tribute has ever been paid by a pupil to a revered master. Gregory was a young man, on his way to study law at Berytus, when he met with Origen. At the time it seemed a chance meeting, but afterwards Gregory could only attribute it to divine providence. Origen's charm of manner, his generous friendship, his wide sympathy and consummate wisdom captivated him. For five years he remained at Caesarea, and when at last he left to return to his native land he felt, to use his own simile, like the prodigal son going from his father's house into the far country. A letter of Origen's reached him shortly after, urging him to dedicate his great gifts to God's service in the ministry of the Church; and in spite of much genuine hesitation Gregory became bishop of Neo-Caesarea, where he achieved marvelous success.⁶

The literary work of Origen was enormous in extent. Before he left Alexandria he had already written, besides the First Principles and five books of the Commentary on St. John, two volumes on The Resurrection, ten volumes of Stromata or Miscellanies, a Commentary on Psalms i–xxv, eight volumes on Genesis and five on Lamentations. This activity was continued at Caesarea. He produced Commentaries on almost every book of the Bible, both Old and New Testaments. A treatise on Prayer was addressed to Ambrose and Tatiana; and when, during the persecution of Maximin (235–237) Ambrose and Protoctetus, a presbyter of Caesarea, were imprisoned, Origen wrote the Exhortation to Martyrdom for their encouragement. Of a different character are the eight books Against Celsus, which contain a detailed answer to a clever attack on Christianity made by an educated Greek about half a century before. Until he was sixty Origen would not allow his homilies delivered extemporaneously in church to be taken down and published. But he then withdrew his prohibition, and more than two hundred have been preserved, for the most part in Latin translations by Rufinus.

A further proof of his untiring industry, and also of his deep reverence for the Scriptures, can be found in the Hexapla. This was a text of the Old Testament, in which six, and sometimes even more, different versions were placed side by side in columns for purposes of comparison. The six versions were the Hebrew, a transliteration of it in Greek characters, and the Greek versions of Aquila, of Symmachus, of the Septuagint and of Theodotion. It took Origen twenty-eight years to accomplish this task, the object of which was to ascertain the true text of the Septuagint. The work extended to fifty volumes, and being too large to be copied it did not survive for long. Today nothing remains of it but some fragments, not inconsiderable in their total bulk, of the Septuagint.

Origen wrote many letters, and Eusebius was able to collect a hundred of them. Unfortunately all but three have perished. No loss of his writings is so regrettable as the loss of these letters. They would have given us a picture of the man, in his extraordinary attractiveness as a teacher and friend, which his theological compositions cannot be expected to supply. Those that remain are the letter to Gregory Thaumaturgus already referred to,⁷ one to Africanus,⁸ and portions of a third quoted in Latin by Jerome and Rufinus. The authenticity of this latter is not, however, absolutely beyond doubt. The letter to Africanus was in answer to one which Africanus had written on the subject of the History of Susanna, attached to the book of Daniel in the Septuagint. Africanus urged that it was a late addition and not part of the original Daniel. In quite modern critical fashion he argued that the story was not contained in the Hebrew; that it was different in style from the rest of Daniel; and above all that it contained plays on Greek words which in Hebrew would have been pointless. Origen's reply was to defend the passage. He was unwilling to reject a story which had great value for purposes of instruction and which had always been accepted in the Church. He had consulted Jewish scholars about the puns, but found that they would not commit themselves; there might possibly be Hebrew equivalents or analogies, although they could not produce them. This was Origen's own conclusion. In regard to the alleged difference in style, he replies simply that he cannot see it. Origen was no higher critic. This letter is of prime importance for all who would understand Origen's character, for it shows that he was, essentially and before all else a Christian pastor, whose main concern was for the spiritual needs of Christians and the traditional faith of the Church. This remains true in spite of the undoubted fact that he was chiefly a teacher of the educated, and that he felt the simpliciores needed correction on many points.

Origen's later life at Caesarea was varied by visits to different parts of Palestine, to Athens and to Arabia. The first Arabian visit was made in order to convince Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, of the falsity of his views on the subject of the Incarnation, and the second to deal with errors concerning the Resurrection. In both cases he was successful. All through his life Origen appears as a defender of orthodox doctrine against heresy; and what is more, as one who could win men to his own viewpoint by persuasion and sympathy. Finally, in AD 250, when the persecution of Decius broke out, Origen was imprisoned, probably at Tyre. His friend Alexander of Jerusalem died in prison. Origen himself was cruelly tortured, but bore his suffering with the same undaunted spirit that he had displayed since boyhood. The death of Decius in 251 gave him release from prison. But his health was broken by all that he had undergone, and he died at Tyre in 253, in the seventieth year of his age. His tomb was still to be seen there at the close of the twelfth century.

Origen is one of those figures, none too common even in Church history, of whose character we can say that we know nothing but what is good. He was humble and free from envy, caring neither for power nor wealth. He bore unmerited suffering, from friends and foes alike, without complaint. His life, from beginning to end, was hard and strenuous. His courage never failed, and he died in reality a martyr's death. He loved truth with a sincerity and devotion rarely equaled, and never excelled. Intellectually he stands pre-eminent and alone, towering above the Greek fathers as Augustine towers above the Latins. The wide sweep of his thought is amazing. He contemplates a universe, not small and narrow as was that of many of his contemporaries, but of immense magnitude, world following world in almost infinite sequence, from the dim primeval epoch when God created all souls equal and free, to the far-off event when after countless vicissitudes of degradation and suffering they shall return to their original unity and perfection, and "God shall be all in all." It may be that the Church of those days was right in warning her children off these speculations, and keeping them to the path of a simpler and more definite faith; lest perhaps, through overmuch thinking on problems insoluble to man, weaker souls should find themselves, like Milton's angels, "in wandering mazes lost." We of these days, however, cannot help regretting, not without a sense of shame, that this salutary warning should have been accompanied, as it was, by fierce denunciations which are neither Christian nor rational. And yet the fact that Origen stands outside the formal calendar of Christian saints gives him a certain solitariness which is not altogether inappropriate. For it can be said with truth that there is no father of the Church whose works are more profitable for study and whose temper and character are more worthy of our imitation.

II. THE FIRST PRINCIPLES: DATE AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF ITS COMPOSITION

The treatise on First Principles was written before Origen left Alexandria for good in AD 231, that is, before he was forty-six years of age. When we seek for a more precise date we encounter difficulties. Our sources of information are the treatise itself and Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. VI. 14–24. From the first we obtain the following facts.

In Bk. II., Ch. iii. 6 (see p. 110 below) Origen refers to his Commentary on Genesis 1:1, as a work already written. On the contrary, in Bk. I., Ch. ii. 6 (see p. 25 below), when mentioning Genesis 1:26, he promises to explain the verse more carefully when he reaches it in his Commentary. The verse was in fact expounded in the fourth book of the Commentary and Genesis 1:16–18 in the third. As there were eight books of this Commentary written before the year 231, it seems probable that the work was begun quite early, especially when we remember that Origen was engaged in several different compositions at the same time.

In Bk. II., Ch. iv. 4 (see p. 123 below) Origen refers the reader to his Commentary on the Second Psalm. Evidently this work also was being written contemporaneously with the First Principles.

In Bk. II., Ch. x. 1 (see p. 173 below) mention is made of the books on the Resurrection which were an early work, being themselves quoted, according to Eusebius, in the Commentary on Lamentations.

From these passages all the knowledge we obtain is that the books on First Principles were written at a time when Origen was also at work on the commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms and Lamentations. These were not, however, his earliest compositions, for the books on the Resurrection preceded them, as did also the beginning of the Commentary on St. John, which he calls "the firstfruits of my labors in Alexandria."¹

The question is, therefore, when were the commentaries begun? This turns on our view of the chronology of Eusebius in the Sixth Book of his Ecclesiastical History. In Ch. 23 of this Book Eusebius implies that Origen began his commentaries immediately after his return from the interview with Mammaea, the aunt of the Emperor Elagabalus (218–222), and the mother of his successor, Alexander Severus (222–235). Mammaea would have been at Antioch in the year 218, when her nephew visited the city after his victory over Macrinus. But the text of Eusebius appears to date this visit in the time of Alexander. If this were so, it would either be a visit at the beginning of Alexander's reign, of which otherwise we know nothing, or else one that occurred after 231. The latter is very improbable, since Eusebius does not mention Origen's departure from Alexandria until Ch. 26, after giving a long account of his exegetical work in that city in Chs. 24 and 25. While we need not suppose that every detail of Eusebius's chronology is correct, it is evident that he is taking pains to place events in what he regards as their proper order. We may therefore conclude that, although the mention of Alexander in Ch. 21 brings to his mind the invitation sent by this Emperor's mother to Origen, the incident belongs in reality to the reign of Elagabalus, whom Eusebius has mentioned under his true name Antoninus only a few lines previously. It was after 218, then, that Origen began his commentaries, "at the urgent desire of Ambrose, who not only employed innumerable incentives in the form of requests and exhortations, but also furnished abundant means for the work."²

The First Principles may have been written, therefore, at any date between, let us say, 219 and 230. But in view of the fact that the references contained in it to the commentaries on Genesis and the Psalms are to quite early parts of these works, we can with reasonable certainty fix the date not later than AD 225. Origen would then have been between thirty-five and forty years old when the work was complete.

It is true that some scholars favor an earlier date than this. Schnitzer gives 213 and Preuschen 212–215. These dates can only be maintained on the assumption that the chronology of Eusebius is altogether unreliable. But there is good reason on general grounds for holding to 218 as the time when Origen began his work of writing commentaries. The first years of his adult life, after the departure of Clement in 202, were so fully occupied with teaching at Alexandria that, as we are distinctly told, he had no time to study the Scriptures properly. Then he called Heracles to take a share in the work of the school, and immediately began his researches on the Biblical text which culminated in the Hexapla. This was doubtless a preliminary to the production of the commentaries. The need for these was only slowly becoming apparent in the Church; although Heracleon the Gnostic had written a Commentary on St. John some forty or fifty years previously, and it was this which in all probability inspired Origen to attempt his own work on the same Gospel. Then, after the first visit to Caesarea, came the definite request of Ambrose that he should produce commentaries systematically and on a large scale. With the request was joined, as we have seen, the offer of ample financial help which enabled Origen to accede to it.

The First Principles was a work of an entirely different character from the commentaries. For if these latter were, at least in the form and scope which Origen gave them, new to the Church, the First Principles was a fresh departure altogether. Not that it was without precursors. Its originality consisted in its vastness of plan, in the unity of its purpose, and in the genius with which it was executed. Origen would certainly not have regarded himself as a pioneer, still less as a teacher of doubtful orthodoxy. He was the exponent of the Christian tradition to thoughtful and cultivated men; but he would subject that tradition to a far keener examination than his predecessors had ventured upon. De Faye, in his recent work on Origen,³ has suggested that the First Principles was designed to take the place of the Didaskalos, or Teacher, which Clement had planned to follow on his Protreptikos and Paidagogos, but which he was never able to write.⁴ It is more natural to suppose that the Stromata and the Hypotyposes were intended to be the continuation of the two works just mentioned. But it would appear that Clement himself composed a work on

First Principles and Theology.⁵ It is no longer extant; in fact we have no certain mention of it except in his own works. Perhaps it was never published at all in the strict sense of the word, but used solely for the students to whom Clement lectured in the Catechetical School. This treatise probably dealt with the origin of the world, among other subjects, and it is not unreasonable to regard it as having laid down the lines which Origen afterwards followed. In both works the substance was simply the lectures delivered to students in the School. Zahn has conjectured that a fragment found in John Malalas may refer to this lost work of Clement's. It runs as follows: "The Syrian, the son of Agenor, was a man of wisdom, who composed his Arithmetical Philosophy in the Phoenician language. He suggested that First Principles were incorporeal, that bodies underwent changes, and that souls entered into different kinds of animals. He first expounded these doctrines, as the most wise Clement wrote of them."⁶ The likeness between this and some of the contents of Origen's First Principles is at once evident. Even if Zahn's identification is not correct, we can yet see that Origen was dealing with questions which had been raised and discussed in the School before his time, and which were then admitted to be legitimate subjects for inquiry.

III. THE TRANSLATION OF RUFINUS: CIRCUMSTANCES OF ITS COMPOSITION

As I have already remarked, the grounds on which Origen was condemned by the Synod of bishops called by Demetrius in Alexandria were not doctrinal.¹ That is to say, the First Principles was not then and there held to be heretical; if it had been, the fact would certainly have come into prominence. Nonetheless, the work could scarcely fail to cause offense, in so far as it came to the knowledge of the simpliciores, who even in Clement's day were disposed to fear all thinking and to raise the cry, "Only believe."² As time went on the offense would be likely to increase. For Origen was not a lonely figure in the Church. He had many followers, who admired him not only for his interpretations of the Scriptures but also for his theological doctrines.

The first serious attack was made by Methodius, bishop of Patara in Lycia, in the early years of the fourth century. He wrote vigorously against Origen and his followers in regard to doctrines characteristic of the First Principles, viz: the eternity of creation, the pre-existence of souls and the spiritual nature of the resurrection body. At the Council of Nicaea Origen's name and authority do not appear to have been invoked by either side, but in the controversies which followed it was not long before the Arians discovered that some support for their distinctive teaching might be drawn from the considerable degree of subordination which he had predicated of the Son. Others, however, including such great names as Athanasius and the Cappadocian fathers, Basil and the two Gregories, while admitting that his works were not wholly free from error, yet regarded him as orthodox in the main and defended him.

Towards the end of the fourth century Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, renewed the attack. In two works, the Anchoratus and the Adv. Heresies, he includes Origen among the heretics, on the grounds previously set forth by Methodius and on others dealing with the nature of the Son and his relation to the Father. Origen was charged with teaching that the Son, though generated from the essence of the Father, was nevertheless a creature, bearing the title Son by courtesy and not by right; that the Holy Spirit was also a creature; and that one day the Kingdom of Christ would come to an end and all beings, including the devil himself, would be reconciled and restored to God.

Epiphanius felt it to be not enough to write against Origen; in his old age he traveled to Palestine in order to extirpate, if possible, from the minds of all who were well-disposed towards the great theologian every trace of what he considered to be pestilent heresies. Origen had now been dead nearly one hundred and forty years, and the Church had changed from being a body of persecuted believers into a victorious institution, honored and privileged by the State. The zeal for repression of which she had once been the victim was now directed against all who would not conform to the type of thought now in favor, a type more rigid than that which was held to be permissible for educated men in the days of Origen. Epiphanius was a true representative of his age in this respect. There were living near Jerusalem at this time Rufinus, who had established a monastery on the Mount of Olives in AD 377, and Jerome, who had dwelt similarly at Bethlehem since 386. Both were admirers of Origen; and so, too, was John, bishop of Jerusalem. Not one of these would have consented to be bound by every fragment of Origen's teaching, but they respected his genius and revered his memory. Jerome, in particular, had begun to translate Origen's Homilies even before he left Rome. He used Origen's Commentary on Ephesians freely in writing his own Commentary on that epistle, borrowing then without question much of Origen's speculation on the angelic beings which he afterwards repudiated. His prefaces, too, as we have seen, speak of Origen in the highest possible terms.

The first act of Epiphanius was to preach, at the invitation of the bishop, in the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem. The sermon was a fierce attack upon Origenism directed, as it seemed to those who heard it, against the bishop himself. He followed this up by urging the monks to dissociate themselves from their bishop until he had cleared himself from the suspicion of heresy. Jerome took alarm at this, for he was sensitive to the least imputation of heresy, and adopted the attitude recommended by Epiphanius. Rufinus, however, was the leading member of a group of clergy who supported the bishop. This caused the first breach between Jerome and Rufinus; but it did not last long, for after Epiphanius had returned to Cyprus the two friends were reconciled, and Jerome returned to communion with his bishop.

It is clear, however, that there still remained a diversity of feeling and outlook upon the subject of Origen which was likely to cause trouble if ever the dispute should arise again. To us Jerome appears to have shown extreme timidity in the face of an accusation which was not directed against him personally and which he could easily have rebutted. We must remember, on the other hand, that a charge of heresy, if substantiated, was then becoming a serious matter for any man of prominence in the Church, involving perhaps loss of liberty, or even of life itself. Jerome, too, was a Latin, and had little sympathy with the Greek habit of thinking out problems. Anyway it is certain that, in spite of all he had previously written in Origen's praise, he determined that for the future he would say or do nothing to compromise himself.

There the matter might have ended, had not Rufinus returned to Italy in 397. He had read and lectured in Greek for many years, and was familiar with the writings of the early Greek fathers, including Origen. He brought back with him many manuscripts of these works. They were then unknown in Italy. Even Pope Anastasius, when asked a little later on to condemn Origen, while readily agreeing to do so on the basis of a few extracts from the First Principles, yet admitted that he did not know either the author or his writings. But there was a certain friend of Rufinus, named Macarius, who had heard of the First Principles and was anxious to read it, hoping to find in it some arguments to help him in a controversy in which he was then engaged with the mathematici, or pagan astrologers. He had dreamed of a ship coming to Italy laden with the spoils of the East; and when Rufinus appeared he interpreted the dream as an indication of his return and begged him to translate the work, for he was unable himself to read it in Greek. Rufinus hesitated, knowing well the odium which would gather round any man who seemed to be friendly towards Origen. Finally, however, he consented, and produced the version which is now before us.

Rufinus did not believe that the Greek text which had come down to him was in every detail authentic. He could not imagine a time when Christian thought had been more fluid than it was in his own day; and although he was well aware that Origen was a bold thinker, he felt it to be quite impossible that he should have differed on any material point from the theology of the fourth century. That the text of the First Principles did so differ was plain. It was daily being quoted as evidence of its author's heresy. Rufinus maintained, without any doubt in all honesty, that the text had been tampered with by heretics. To prove this he translated and published with his version of the First Principles the first book of the Defense of Origen, a work composed by Pamphilus the martyr in collaboration with Eusebius of Caesarea, the Church historian.³ The object of this work was to refute the attacks made on Origen by Methodius and others.

Jerome asserted afterwards that this book was written by Eusebius and not by Pamphilus; but this is contradicted by the statement of Eusebius himself and by the later testimony of Photius, who tells us that Eusebius and Pamphilus wrote the first five books together and that the sixth was composed by Eusebius alone after the martyr's death.⁴ Rufinus attributes the first book to Pamphilus alone; and in this he was probably correct, since in it the name of Pamphilus is prefixed, in dialogue fashion, to all the paragraphs which state the objections made to Origen's teaching or introduce his replies, the latter being presented largely in Origen's own words. Moreover at the beginning of the book the first person singular is used. The authority of Pamphilus the martyr was very great, and it was a natural method of protection for Rufinus to make the Defense of Origen known to the Latin world as a preliminary to the publication of the First Principles.

The Defense, so far as we have it in Rufinus's translation, opens with five chapters wherein Origen's faith in regard to the Church tradition, the nature of heresy, and the doctrines of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, together with the Incarnation is defined by quotations made from his own writings. These chapters are wholly orthodox; for, as we have already said, Origen counted it his business to defend the Church tradition and to explain its meaning to intelligent men. Pamphilus sums up this section by exclaiming: "What can be so correct as this, what so true, what so catholic, what more useful for general instruction even among those who rage against him with bitter enmity, what so entirely free from blame?"

We are, however, almost completely dependent upon Rufinus for our knowledge of what actually it was that Origen said and Pamphilus praised. Only in a few cases do we possess the Greek which enables us to check him, and when we can do this the result is not satisfactory. For instance, in Ch. IV., on the Holy Spirit, Rufinus writes as follows: "But for us there is one God the Father, from whom are all things. There is therefore one true God who, as I said, is the fount of deity, and one Christ the maker of christs, and one Holy Spirit who makes the Holy Spirit in soul of every saint." Now Origen's own statement, as Pamphilus quoted it in Greek, was to the effect that the Father's work embraces the whole universe, the work of the Son extends to rational creatures only, and the work of the Spirit is confined to the saints. The Son is therefore "less" than the Father, and the Spirit "still less" than the Son. It could not have been by accident or by a mere habit of loose translation that these offensive phrases were avoided; the omission was deliberate. When Pamphilus quoted this passage of Origen, clearly he did not realize that it might be called heretical. This point weakens considerably the contention of Rufinus that the text of Origen had been corrupted by heretics; if anything had changed it was the authorized theology of the Church.

The Defense goes on to enumerate nine charges made against Origen's teaching and to give answers to them in his own words supplemented by the explanations of Pamphilus. Most of the charges are easily disposed of; for they relate to questions which are satisfactorily dealt with in the First Principles, even though Origen's statements may sometimes lend themselves to perversion by hostile critics. For instance, some affirmed that he denied the literal truth of Scripture and the events of our Lord's earthly life. But Origen's teaching is quite clear: he only denied the literal truth in such stories as the Garden of Eden and the Fall, or others containing similar anthropomorphisms, where it seemed to him to be incredible. Ordinary historical facts he accepted readily enough, although often he did not consider them important or even edifying. The charge, therefore, while not wholly unintelligible, admits of a reasonable answer.

A more serious charge is that Origen denied the reality of punishment in the next life, because men would then have no bodies. Again, Origen's doctrine on these questions, though it ran counter to the gross materialism of many in his time, is both rational and scriptural. He found the term "spiritual body" in the Scriptures and held fast to it. The body, he contended, must be suitable to the sphere in which it has to live, and in a spiritual world we shall need spiritual bodies. These would be the same bodies which we have now, because they would be garments of the same personality; but they would not resemble the earthly body in appearance or structure or function. Punishment too, must be disciplinary and remedial in character and not a mere infliction of pain, which would be unworthy of God. All this is clearly and intelligently argued in the First Principles; in fact, it proceeds directly from Origen's idea of God and forms the basis of his whole system of theology. But it lay open to attack by men whose ideas of heaven were framed after the pattern of things on earth. Pamphilus spends much space in answering this charge on Origen's lines. Once again, however, we have to complain of a serious mistranslation by Rufinus. He deliberately omits the phrase "spiritual bodies," found both in Origen and in Pamphilus. He could not possibly have claimed that heretics had inserted this in the text, when its source was so obvious. It was omitted in the hope of conciliating his Latin readers.

A further charge is that Origen held false opinions about the soul. Here, too, Pamphilus feels the need of defending him at some length. The Church, he says, had not spoken decisively on this question. If it had, then Origen might have been deserving of blame; but in fact many different opinions were held by Christians about the origin and nature of the soul. Moreover, here as elsewhere, Origen put forward his views for discussion, and not as settled dogmas. The last charge of all, and perhaps the most difficult one to counter, is that Origen taught the doctrine of transmigration of souls. Now any reader of the First Principles, if he takes into consideration, as he must do, the irrefutable evidence of Jerome and the Emperor Justinian, will be forced to admit that Origen at least allowed the possibility of transmigration. That is putting the case at its lowest. Pamphilus does not quote the evidence of the First Principles. He relies on passages from the Commentary on St. Matthew, in which Origen argues against the doctrine. We possess the Greek text of this passage, so that there can be no doubt of its genuineness. The argument runs as follows: if such transmigration should occur, it would happen, by hypothesis, as a punishment for sin. What then could prevent the process from going on infinitely, and destroying the possibility of a time when "heaven and earth shall pass away"? If, on the other hand, men should at last, one by one and through infinite ages, become purified so as no longer to need bodies, what then becomes of the statement of Scripture, "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" This reasoning is very different from that in the First Principles. It is possible that Origen's opinion had changed in the intervening years. Or he may have felt that more caution was needed in a commentary which would circulate widely among all classes of Christians, than in a treatise which reflected for the most part the discussions between himself and his students in the Catechetical School.

One result of this examination of Pamphilus's Defense is to put us on our guard when reading Rufinus. Pamphilus, enthusiastic though he was, had felt it needful to exercise caution and to make certain admissions when defending Origen. Rufinus did not dare to let even Pamphilus speak for himself. What then would he do with Origen? He is perfectly candid with his readers, at least in a general way. He would alter Origen where he thought him wrong; not arbitrarily, of course, but in accordance with statements of an orthodox character to be found elsewhere in his writings. But to justify himself still further, Rufinus wrote a small pamphlet on "The Corruption of the Works of Origen” and attached it to the translation of the First Principles.⁵ Here he gives more fully his reasons for altering the text. They are as follows:

(i) It was impossible to suppose that so intelligent and learned a man as Origen should have contradicted himself. A difference between works written in youth and old age might be natural, due either to forgetfulness or to change of opinion in the interval. But Origen exhibits contradictions in the same passage, almost in successive sentences.

This argument is answered by Jerome in his Apology, Bk. II., Ch. 16. Rufinus brings forward but one instance, namely, that in the same passage Origen says that the Holy Spirit is of the divine essence and also numbers him among created beings. This is from the First Principles. Jerome points out that Eusebius and Didymus had both accepted the offensive passage as orthodox. Neither Didymus, who was himself a commentator on the First Principles, nor Eusebius, had ever complained that the text had been interpolated by heretics. What Didymus said was that, to use Jerome’s words, “simple men like us” did not understand Origen’s real meaning, which was quite orthodox. Of course it was, we must agree. For Origen accepted the Church tradition that Father, Son and Holy Spirit were consubstantial. What he had to account for was the order of the Persons, and in particular the priority of the Father. If Origen’s solution of the problem was wrong, the proper course was to propose a better one. Jerome and Rufinus both preferred to leave this problem unsolved and to be content with the acceptance of a formula. But they dealt with Origen in different ways, the one calling him a heretic, the other defending him by imputing his reasonings to heretics.

(ii) Other writers of unquestioned orthodoxy had had their works corrupted by heretics; as for instance Clement of Rome, Clement of Alexandria and Dionysius of Alexandria.

In regard to Clement of Rome Rufinus was misled by the universal opinion of his day that the Recognitions were his work. As for the others, the natural inference is, as Jerome clearly sees, that (supposing the incriminated passages to be heretical) the authors may have made mistakes; or that incautious statements may have been allowed before the time of Arius but carefully scrutinized after; or that unskillful copyists may have changed the text inadvertently. We need not spend longer on this.

(iii) Origen himself had complained, in a letter still extant, that his works had been corrupted by heretics.

The letter of Origen, which Rufinus here professes to translate, is of great interest. It deals only with one specific point, the possibility of the devil’s salvation. Origen denies that he ever asserted this; only a madman could have done so. A discussion had taken place between himself and a heretic, of which notes had been made and afterwards published. Origen declares that he had never given the matter a second thought until it was brought to his notice that an incorrect version was being circulated. He discovered on inquiry that the notes had been revised for publication with the object, as the author calmly admitted, of “improving” them. The letter, as given by Rufinus, goes on to speak of a forged work which had been published under Origen’s name and which contained heretical statements. The author of this was discovered and his work condemned as a forgery in his own presence by a group of Origen’s friends.

The only point we need consider here is that relating to the devil’s salvation. According to the First Principles Origen did assert that the devil would at last be saved. It is indeed an essential part of his system of thought. Again and again he returns to his favorite text, “that God may be all in all.” Why then should he have denied it? We should be tempted to suppose that the letter is not authentic, but for the fact that it was available to Jerome also and must therefore have been one of the collection of Origen's letters known then to all the Greek world. But again Jerome gives us at any rate a partial answer to the argument of Rufinus. He proves that the latter has not presented the letter fairly. He has omitted the first part, which explains the second. Jerome translates this first part for us.⁶ It is a bold and outspoken defense of himself by Origen against Demetrius of Alexandria and others who had condemned him. The contents are quite in Origen's manner. The Scripture itself declares, he says, that leaders and princes may go wrong; this is now being fulfilled. Yet we must not hate them, but rather pity and pray for them. We must not speak evil of any man. Michael would not even rail at the devil, but left it to God to rebuke him. Now, Origen continues, not only gross sinners, such as adulterers and thieves, shall be shut out of the kingdom of God, but evil speakers too. So careful is he, therefore, in view of this warning, that he will not even rail at the devil. But as a result of this care, some have charged him with asserting the salvation of the devil, which only a madman would assert.

By suppressing the first part of the letter with its inconvenient criticism of bishops, and also the definite statement of Origen that he will not rail even at the devil, Rufinus has given a false impression of the letter, in spite of the superficial accuracy of such portions as he quotes.

Jerome goes on to relate another fact which bears upon this question. There was current a dialogue between Origen and Candidus, a Valentinian. Candidus asserted that the devil was of a wholly evil nature and could not be saved. Origen maintained that it was by his own fault and not by his evil nature that the devil fell, and that he might have been saved if he had so willed. Candidus turns this into an admission that the devil will be saved, which Origen denies.

It is clear from all this that what Origen was forced by the logic of his thought to assert was the theoretical possibility of the devil's salvation. In no way could he avoid this. When he is dealing with ultimate problems, as in the First Principles, he is certainly carried beyond this theoretical possibility. In the last resort, when God is "all in all," there is no room for a devil as such. Must we then agree with Denis, that this letter, if genuine, would prove "that Origen was weak enough to retract . . . not only what he had thought, but what he continued to think"?⁷ We need not go so far as this. When working out a speculative theology, as in the First Principles, an author must be allowed freedom to indicate, not dogmatically but suggestively for discussion, where his principles appear to lead. Practical teaching to an uneducated multitude is another thing. More care would be needed then, and a bold teacher ought not to be pressed to reduce all his speculative conclusions to categorical dogmas. Origen may quite justly have claimed this protection, especially if it be the case, as he is said to have asserted in his letter to Fabian of Rome, that the First Principles was published in the beginning by Ambrose without his knowledge.⁸

We need not deal with the other examples given by Rufinus of the corruption of writings by heretics. They add nothing to the force of his argument. He has certainly not established any right to give the world a garbled version of Origen's work. On the contrary, he has laid himself under the suspicion that fear of heresy is with him a stronger motive than love of truth. Both when translating Pamphilus and when quoting Origen's letter he has shown himself willing to alter the text, or to omit portions of it, on no evidence whatever, and for no purpose except to conciliate the prejudices of his readers and to give greater authority to his translation. But if he uses so much freedom in framing this preliminary defense of his work, we must clearly examine the translation itself with critical eyes. For our desire is simply to discover what Origen taught. Only by adhering strictly to the truth can we rightly estimate his services to the Church and his position in the development of Christian doctrine.

IV. THE CONTROVERSY BETWEEN JEROME AND RUFINUS

Besides fortifying himself by the publication of the two abovementioned introductory essays Rufinus used another weapon of defense. In his own preface he referred in glowing terms to the previous translations of Origen's works made by Jerome. Now when we recall the disturbance at Jerusalem only a few years before, when Jerome had openly taken his stand against Origen, we can hardly acquit Rufinus of guile in making these allusions. Jerome, according to him, "had inspired every one with a deep longing to read Origen and study him earnestly." He had promised to continue his own translations, but the desire to be a "father of the word" and not a mere translator had conquered him, and he was now much too busy with his own compositions. Consequently Rufinus had consented to "take up the work which was begun and approved by him," although he confesses that he cannot bring to it an ability comparable with that of Jerome. He goes on to describe the method of his translation, and to declare that it was the same method as that followed by Jerome himself, who had so "smoothed over and emended" any passages likely to cause offense, that "a Latin reader would find in them nothing out of harmony with our faith."

All this was strictly true, but seeing that Jerome had by this time changed his opinion about Origen we cannot be surprised that he took exception to Rufinus's statements when he heard of them. For their effect was at the very least to represent him as acquiescing in every doctrine of Origen which Rufinus had thought fit not to remove from his translation. In the quarrel at Jerusalem Rufinus had taken an opposite side to Jerome, as we have seen. That is to say, he was more liberal-minded than Jerome in regard to what was or was not permissible as speculation for purposes of discussion. If, knowing Jerome as he did, Rufinus really thought that he would take his eulogy as a sincere compliment, he must have been singularly dull. We must admit, however, that in his subsequent Defense he does protest most strongly that his praise was sincerely meant.

The translation of the First Principles soon came into the hands of Jerome's friends in Italy, of whom Pammachius, Oceanus and Marcella were the chief. They were horrified by some of the doctrines still remaining in it and by the implied suggestion that Jerome would raise no objection to them. They sent him, therefore, a copy of the work with a request for information. Jerome replied by making a faithful Latin translation of the whole of the First Principles and sending it to Pammachius with a covering letter.¹ He admits that he had once praised Origen for his good work; he would still do so if others would not praise his errors. Origen's doctrines on the nature of the Son and the Holy Spirit, on the pre-existence of souls, on the resurrection, and on the ultimate restitution of all things, when it will be "the same for Gabriel as for the devil, for Paul as for Caiaphas, for virgins as for prostitutes," were poisonous heresies. No Latin writer had ever yet ventured to translate his works on the Resurrection and on First Principles, or the Stromata and the Commentaries, but only the Homilies, or popular addresses, which were harmless. The assertion that Origen's works had been corrupted by heretics Jerome denies; both Eusebius and Didymus had taken for granted that Origen held the incriminated views. Moreover, Jerome cannot believe that Pamphilus wrote the first book of the Defense; it must be by Eusebius. If, however, Pamphilus did write it, his martyrdom would wash away the fault.

Jerome's defense was in the main a reasonable one. He had a right to change his opinion of Origen if he so wished. But he was not candid enough to confess that in his previous writings he had adopted as his own without question some at least of the doctrines which he was now condemning, namely, the fall of souls from a heavenly state into human bodies and the subjection of Lucifer and the other opposing powers to the rule of Christ in his future kingdom. Moreover, he cannot restrain his pen from making remarks about Rufinus which are both spiteful and untrue. The letter, however, was not addressed to Rufinus and presumably need never have come to his knowledge. Jerome had enclosed with it a short letter for Rufinus, which Pammachius was asked to deliver. This was written in a different strain. It expostulated with him for the language he had used in the preface to the First Principles, but it also contained expressions of esteem and friendship which should have been sufficient to avert a quarrel between the two. Unfortunately Pammachius, by what we can only regard as a gross breach of faith, did not deliver this letter. Instead, he and his friends published Jerome's letter to him, and when this came to the knowledge of Rufinus, he felt it necessary to record his own case in the form of a lengthy Defense.

The Defense enumerates, as was inevitable, the instances in which Jerome in his early days had freely accepted Origen's opinions. If Jerome had frankly admitted a change of views all this would have been irrelevant; but, as we have seen, he shrank from doing this. Little exception can be taken to the tone of Rufinus's statements; he writes warmly, but in a Christian spirit. The facts were proved beyond dispute from Jerome's own writings; he had actually used many passages of Origen which he now objected to. But over and above this there emerge from the discussion three points which reveal the different tempers of the two men. A consideration of these will help us to view the controversy in a true light.

First, Rufinus comments on Jerome's lack of charity. He is aware of his opponent's literary skill, that he can so handle words as "to make one whom he wishes to injure and to wound appear to have received neither wounds nor injuries. . . . Any idle gossip stirs him up to fault-finding and vituperation."² "I will pardon him then, though he never pardons others, but condemns them for their words without any thought of charity."³ As for himself, he adds at the close: "I ask for pardon, if I have handled the matter too roughly."⁴ Jerome's great services to the Church are sadly marred by his dogmatic and overbearing manner and by the use of his brilliant gifts for attacking those whom personally he disliked.

Again, Rufinus upholds the position that Christians are free to discuss questions even though they may not be able to reach the complete truth about them. Jerome and the world to which he belonged appear to have ruled out all discussion whatever. They are aware of no difficulties; they are troubled by no problems. It is important to remember that Rufinus, whose own belief was severely orthodox, should have been ready to defend Origen on this point, as Pamphilus had done before him. When questions are raised which the Apostle does not plainly answer, then, he says, "we either say that we do not know, or that we stand in doubt; and that since we do not get a full understanding but only a hint of his meaning, we do not declare but suggest the explanation."⁵ It is evidence of a genuine feeling for truth that Rufinus should have left as much as he did of the inquiries of Origen, whereas Jerome regarded them as wholly illegitimate and productive of harm.

The third point is but a particular instance of the second. Origen's only motive in ascribing a pre-existence to souls was to defend the justice of God. The different surroundings into which men were born was to him a real difficulty. There is probably no other Christian father who has a heart so tender, so sensitive to human suffering, as Origen had. Jerome had once followed Origen in his explanation of the problem, but afterwards, terrified by the possibility of being thought a heretic, he contemptuously rejected all such speculations. They were, he said, of pagan origin. Rufinus answered him in words that are dignified and memorable:

Neither you (i.e., Jerome), nor Origen are forthwith to be reckoned among pagans if, as you yourself have said, it was with the desire of vindicating God's justice and of answering those who assert that all things are governed by chance or fate, with the desire, I say, of showing that the providence of God which controls the universe is just, that you declared that each soul has acquired the causes of its inequality from its movements and feelings in that previous existence which it had in the heavenly places; or even if you said that it was in harmony with the good and unchangeable and simple nature of the Trinity that every creature should at the end of all things be restored to the original condition in which it was created at the first, and that this would happen after long punishments continuing through ages of time, which God inflicts on each soul not in the spirit of one who is angry but of a healer, whose admonitions are without fault, and who because his object is to restore and to heal will at last bring his punishments to an end. How far these words are true God must judge; but they seem to me to contain little impiety against God, nor any paganism, especially when they are spoken with the desire and intention of finding some argument by which the justice of God might be vindicated.⁶

The man who could write thus, at considerable risk to his reputation, deserves our respect and gratitude.

Jerome's friends in Italy sent him notes of the chief points of Rufinus's attack. His brother Paulinian saw a copy of the work and, committing some portions to memory, communicated them to Jerome in Palestine, whither he was returning after some years' absence. From these two sources Jerome obtained sufficient information to write two books of a counter Defense. His one anxiety is to clear himself from any suspicion of heresy. But he will not see that the only satisfactory way of doing this is to admit that, on his own principles, he had formerly made a mistake in including Origen's opinions in his works. He says that these opinions were given side by side with others, for the reader to choose from, and that sometimes he had indicated his dissent from them. "What is my fault?" he naively asks. The fault was that, if the opinions in question were poisonous heresies, he should not have inserted them in his Commentary on Ephesians without the slightest warning to the reader that they were such. If on the other hand they were permissible speculations he had no ground of complaint against Rufinus for translating them into Latin.

A copy of these two books was brought to Rufinus by the captain of a trading ship which was carrying goods to Aquileia. Rufinus was disposed to reply still further, but the Christian world was now becoming scandalized at this unedifying controversy, and Chromatius the bishop of Aquileia prevailed upon him to desist. Yet he sent back a letter to Jerome which was far from friendly in tone. He intimated, apparently, that he could have published if he had so desired other facts which would have destroyed his adversary's reputation forever.

Jerome answered with a third book of his Defense. It adds little to the others. One characteristic sentence may be quoted: "We were once zealous in our praise of Origen; let us be equally zealous in condemning him now that he is condemned by the whole world."⁷ With this may be compared the utterance of Gelasius, in regard to authors whose works were prohibited to Latin readers after the Roman Council of AD 494.

Rufinus, a highly religious man, wrote many books on ecclesiastical matters and certain commentaries on the Scriptures; but since the blessed Jerome controverted him on certain points concerning free will, we must hold the same belief as the aforementioned Jerome; and this not only in the case of Rufinus, but of all persons whatever whom that man of faith and piety has censured.⁸

Whatever the mistakes of Rufinus may have been, he could have stood little chance of obtaining a just hearing in the face of such a spirit as this.

V. CHARACTER OF RUFINUS'S TRANSLATION

The foregoing chapters have made it clear that we must look back upon Rufinus with two minds. First, we owe him deep gratitude that he undertook the translation of the First Principles at all. He saw what a magnificent work it was, when most of his contemporaries were content to throw it aside as worthless. Apart from Rufinus we might have remained almost in the dark about its contents, and a whole world of Christian speculation characteristic of one of the most vigorous and brilliant periods of Church history would have been lost to us. And we must admire his courage; for with all his care to cut out or soften down the worst audacities of Origen he yet left enough to bring him into deep suspicion with the narrower minds who then controlled the Church in the west. On the other hand, the fact must be faced that we cannot trust him. We have already seen how he will alter anything that appears to him to need alteration, on no other evidence than his own subjective impression. His most recent defender, M. Gustave Bardy, says that "the gaps and alterations which we discover here and there do not astonish us, for they were announced and foreseen."¹ But the truth is that no one who had nothing to go upon except the innocent-looking prefaces of Rufinus would have the least conception of the scope of the changes which he made. There are not only long additions and omissions, but mistranslations, some deliberate, some perhaps unconscious, paraphrases in which the point and force of the original is completely lost, and countless minor alterations which must be studied in detail before their cumulative effect can be appreciated. After gathering every Greek fragment that can be found there is less than one-sixth of the original work available by which to check Rufinus. Included in this proportion are the most controverted, and therefore the more seriously altered, parts of the work. But even in the other parts, where fewer disputed points of doctrine occur, we can never be quite sure that we have Origen's thought as he himself expressed it. The sharp edges of the Greek have been rubbed smooth by the rhetorical prose of Rufinus, and even with a full knowledge of such other works of Origen as have come down to us in the Greek it is often impossible to reconstruct the original with any certainty.

All the fragments, whether in Greek or in Latin, that are available for checking Rufinus have been known to scholars for long past. But they have not been fully utilized. The publication of Dr. Paul Koetschau's text of the First Principles in 1913 marked a new era. He placed in the body of the text all the material we possess which can justly claim to belong to Origen; and not only that, but he also quoted in footnotes many passages from Jerome and other writers which are indispensable for reference. This work renders all previous texts of Origen out of date, and consequently makes it imperative to read with caution all previous descriptions of his theology. "It is not too much to say," comments M. de Faye, "that the confidence which has always been placed in these Latin versions renders obsolete every exposition of Origen's theology which saw the light before M. Koetschau's edition of the De Principiis."² In the following translation I have followed Koetschau's reconstruction throughout; not simply because it is the only one we possess, but also because in the course of many years' reading of the text I have seen no reason to differ materially from his conclusions. I acknowledge with much gratitude all the help I have received from this admirable work.³

Koetschau's Introduction, contains a complete examination of Rufinus's translation and a list of the passages available for correcting it. The reader who wishes to study the matter in detail will do well to read this. Here, however, I will make a brief summary of the material referred to.

i. The Philocalia,⁴ a collection of extracts from Origen's works made by Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus, contains Bk. III. Ch. i and Bk. IV. Chs. iv–iii of the First Principles. These form by far the greater part of the Greek fragments now extant.

ii. The treatise or letter sent by Justinian to Mennas, Patriarch of Constantinople, before the 2nd Council of Constantinople, AD 553.⁵ This letter contains numerous extracts from the First Principles, which formed the basis on which Origen was condemned at the Council. Whether this condemnation took place at the Council itself, or previously at the local synod of AD 543, makes no difference for our purpose.

iii. The fifteen Anathemas against Origen decreed at the above-mentioned Council or synod.⁶ Koetschau gives a place in his text to numbers two to six of these Anathemas, on the ground that they record, though not perhaps always word for word, the teaching of Origen in the First Principles.

iv. Various fragments taken from Antipater of Bostra, Leontius of Byzantium, Theophilus of Alexandria, Epiphanius, Gregory of Nyssa and others.

Koetschau admits in all forty-three Greek fragments, varying in length from a few words to the extensive passages taken from the Philocalia. Of these some fourteen are entirely missing from the text of Rufinus; nine are shortened, altered or incomplete; five are inaccurately translated; and the remaining fifteen are given with reasonable, though not always strict, accuracy.

As I have stated above, M. Gustave Bardy disputes the conclusions reached by Koetschau in regard to the passages taken from Justinian's letter to Mennas and the Anathemas. He contends that the former are divorced from their context and that in some cases they may be deformed or interpolated. This is not likely. The fact that there were many followers of Origen even in the sixth century—it was their existence and influence which made Justinian so eager to secure Origen's condemnation—would have rendered it necessary to be careful. There was also plenty of material for condemnation, according to Justinian's ideas, without the need of perversion or exaggeration. Bardy does not in fact deny that Justinian's letter gives us our best information about Origen's true teaching, though he would use it with caution. But he makes a strong objection to the inclusion of the Anathemas in the text. These have in view, according to him, not so much Origen himself as the "so-called Origenists who were contemporaries of Justinian."⁷ An examination will show, however, that they differ but little from the letter of Justinian. In regard to Bardy's further objection to Koetschau's reconstruction of Bk. I. Ch.

viii.,⁸ on the ground that it is too hazardous, we must admit that the piecing together of the different fragments is ingeniously done and that too much reliance must not be placed on the precise order and connection of the passages. But there can be no doubt whatever that they belong to this chapter, for every fragment of testimony we possess speaks with the same voice about Origen's doctrine of the fall of the angels and their ultimate restoration. "Who gave you leave," cries Jerome to Rufinus, "to omit so much from your translation?"⁹ Unless we fill the gaps left by Rufinus with the material which every other writer who deals with the First Principles declares to have been there, we can have no hope of ascertaining what Origen really wrote.

The Latin translation sent by Jerome to his friends in Italy has unfortunately been lost. Jerome's usual method of translation was no different from that of Rufinus, but on this occasion he adhered strictly to the original. "In my translation of the First Principles," he says, "I expressed in a simple way what was contained in the Greek text."¹⁰ And Rufinus corroborates this when he complains of Jerome that "he re-interpreted these very books which I had translated, and inserted all those passages which had been omitted by me as being of doubtful authenticity."¹¹ Some years after, this translation, though carefully kept back from publication by Pammachius, was circulated in a garbled form by a friend to whom he had lent it for a short time. A copy of this came into the hands of one Avitus, who wrote to Jerome for an explanation. In reply Jerome sent him a true copy, accompanied by a letter containing long quotations, many of them literal, of the alleged heretical teachings of the work. This letter is extant and provides an authority of first-class character for supplementing the gaps in Rufinus's translation and correcting him elsewhere. Koetschau gives a list of more than fifty quotations obtained from it. All are printed in his edition, either as part of the text or in footnotes, and all are included in the present translation.¹²

M. Bardy, however, seeks to discredit Jerome's translation. Jerome, he says, changed the delicate nuances of Origen into categorical statements, presenting in an absolute manner theories capable of a generous interpretation; he may have translated Origen better, but he understood him less, lacking what Rufinus possessed, the sympathy which gives intelligence.¹³ If Bardy means that Origen's theories were always subject to revision, put forward, as he so often reminds us, for discussion rather than as unalterable dogmas, and that while Rufinus partly understood this temper of mind Jerome had no sympathy with it at all, then his contention is true. It is true also that Jerome means throughout to make the worst of Origen and Rufinus the best, each from his own viewpoint. The modern reader can and must allow for this. But no arguments will alter the fact that Rufinus has left many gaps which without Jerome's help we could not fill at all, and that time after time he deliberately transforms, abbreviates or renders inaccurately his original. Nor must we suppose that Origen's teaching, though offered in humility and with a readiness to be convinced by better knowledge, lacked definiteness. It was this definiteness which Rufinus feared, and which he endeavored to obscure in his translation. On the other hand, Jerome's presentation of Origen, though blunt, is full and fair. The passages quoted in the Letter to Avitus have a genuine Origenistic ring about them and there is no evidence whatever of hardening or exaggeration.

Of Rufinus's ordinary method of translation we may gain the truest idea by studying the two long passages of which the originals are preserved in the Philocalia. Generally speaking, the subject matter is here unobjectionable and Rufinus, even when abiding by his own cautious rules, had no need to alter, omit or interpolate. The reader of the present translation can form his own judgment; for in it Origen and Rufinus are set side by side and the two translations are made to agree in wording so far as is possible, that is, wherever it seemed clear that Rufinus was endeavoring to adhere closely to his original. He does not often do this, it is true. His method, like that of Jerome himself, is what we should call paraphrasing rather than translating. But he gives the general sense, for the most part, of what Origen wrote; and where he does this we must be satisfied.

The two passages are Bk. III. Ch. i, on the subject of Free Will, and Bk. IV. Chs. i–iii on the Inspiration and Interpretation of the Scriptures.¹⁴ Koetschau has examined these carefully and obtained the following results: Rufinus has omitted twenty-eight passages, the great majority of which, however, are very short, consisting of only a few words or a line or two. He has made twenty-two additions, again mostly not more than a few words in length. And there are forty-five cases of inaccurate translation, some being due to a misunderstanding of the Greek and others to the desire of altering it for dogmatic reasons. It must be sufficient here to make a few general observations on these irregularities.

Of the additions made by Rufinus many are for the sake of clearness. He is fond, too, of rhetorical embellishment and will often put in a didactic or pietistic touch that is wanting in Origen. Sometimes, when texts are quoted, he will add an extra one that occurs to him or insert a fresh illustration. In other cases a dogmatic motive is apparent. Origen's dry, scientific statements and candid admission of difficulties are scarcely ever left as they stand. The assertion that the intelligence of some animals comes near to human reason is carefully toned down.¹⁵ The desire of Origen to prove the goodness of God is transformed by Rufinus into a desire to keep close to the faith of the Church and to test all things by "the rule of piety."¹⁶

Some of the smaller omissions may be accidental. Others are not highly significant. But Rufinus has evidently hesitated to reproduce Origen's statement that certain of Moses's laws were irrational or impossible.¹⁷ Similarly, he does not care to translate Origen's criticism on a literal interpretation of Mt 5:28, 29—what good would it do to cut out the right eye?¹⁸ He fears the lengths to which allegorical interpretation may go and omits the advice to discover in Scripture the "depths of the wisdom of God."¹⁹ In the longest of his two omissions it has generally been supposed that the same distrust is to be observed; but I have given reasons in the notes for thinking that Rufinus did not fully understand this passage.²⁰

The inaccurate renderings are often pure mistakes. Not seldom Rufinus altogether misses the point of the Greek. On the whole, however, we can gather from him fairly well the main drift of the arguments. But in the case of a keen thinker like Origen the construction of every sentence, the balance of phrases and often the very order of the words are important; and it would be folly to deny that, for all the good intentions of Rufinus, we lose much when we turn to his version from the Greek.

VI. THE DOCTRINE OF THE FIRST PRINCIPLES

It is not clear what was the exact meaning attached by Origen to the title Περὶ Ἀρχῶν. The phrase may indicate that the work is an inquiry into the elementary principles of the Christian religion; or, interpreted in a wider sense, it may signify that Origen intended to present his readers with a complete philosophy of religion. This is suggested by his own assertion, made at the beginning of the book, that he was framing a "single body of doctrine."¹ There may be in addition some thought of the "principalities," with whose history and destiny parts of the book are concerned, and also of the "beginnings" of the universe, and consequently of the end which, in Origen's oft-repeated phrase, must be like the beginning. The word Ἀρχαί will cover all these meanings and probably Origen meant it to be understood in a comprehensive way. As we have seen, the title was not a new one, since Clement of Alexandria had already used it.

The thoughts to which Origen's speculations led him proved strange and disturbing to Christians of later ages. But we need not doubt that they were natural enough to the age and intellectual environment in which they arose. It never occurred to Origen that he was anything but an orthodox defender of the faith. All he tried to do was to work out its implications for the educated world of his time. Problems which do not arise in simple minds were continually being raised by his pupils and by the heretics in their rival theological schools. What is the explanation of apparently undeserved suffering? Has man free will, or is this an illusion? What happened before this world was created, and what will happen after it has come to an end? What is the origin and nature of the human soul? Are the stars alive? Are there worlds in the sky, where spirits live? Origen believed that it was right to investigate such problems. Not all of them could be solved. But some might be, and the Christian thinker must do his best.

Other problems were of even greater importance. It was universally acknowledged in the Church that Father, Son, and Spirit constituted the Trinity, that each was divine, and that a vast gulf separated them from the universe of created beings. But no authority had as yet laid down precisely how they were related to one another, or had attempted to answer a whole series of questions on the subject of the divine nature which present themselves at once to the mind of a thoughtful believer. This was the task which Origen, as a comparatively young man, took in hand. He was not altogether a pioneer, for Pantaenus and Clement had prepared the way. Origen's achievement was to focus all previous speculation, after passing it through his own brilliant intellect, into a coherent system. Though subject to every limitation of his age, he yet had the scientific spirit and used a scientific method. He follows where reason leads him. He is sensitive to difficulties and often acknowledges ignorance. It is indeed his spirit and method rather than his conclusions which are of permanent value. For the Church, no doubt wisely in the main, set aside his chief doctrines, branding them as heretical. But she would not have reached so sure a conviction about the safe path of theological progress had it not been for the stimulus provided by this bold and clear thinker, who brought every question fearlessly into the light of day.

M. de Faye has rightly observed that Origen's system is in the same class with the Gnostic speculations of his time.² The Father is the fount and origin of all being, and is pure spirit. The problem is to connect him with the existent material world. The Gnostics bridged the gulf by a series of descents from spirit into matter, to be followed at last by a restoration of the spiritual seeds or sparks imprisoned in matter to their original home. On this theme they played with all manner of fantastic variations. The Christian theology, as expounded by Origen, severely avoids these extravagances; yet the process of descent and ascent runs through it all. The Son is begotten of the Father by an eternal act of will. Gnostic theories of emanation are rejected on the ground that they involve a division of the divine nature. The eternal generation of the Son is as it were an expansion rather than a division of the divine nature.

But Origen, in his keen desire to represent this eternal act as proceeding from will and intelligence and not as a fatalistic process, sometimes describes the begetting as a creating, and the Son as a created being. It was this that puzzled Rufinus, how Origen could be both orthodox and unorthodox at the same time. But there is really neither any doubt about Origen's words, nor difficulty about his thought. He relied on such scriptural passages as "the first-born of all creation" (Col 1:15) and he emphasizes over and over again the secondary position of the Son. The Holy Spirit is still less in degree, but all three are consubstantial, partaking of the fullness of the divine essence. Both Son and Spirit are genuine Beings, not simply divine attributes, and Origen had been taught that an indication of them was to be seen in the two cherubim who, in Isaiah's vision, cover the face of God.³

A fresh departure is made by the creation of rational beings, called either minds or souls. These are definitely outside the Godhead, as the Son and Spirit are definitely within. Nevertheless they are spiritual creatures, made in God's own image. Origen inquires whether they were made infinite in number and decides that they were not. By a curious limitation of the divine power, which is characteristic of his thought, he tells us that God made exactly as many as he could control. They were all equal, and apparently identical. But they had free will, and this faculty caused movements to arise within them. Some remained in their original condition, but others fell away from God. Thus was variety and diversity introduced into the world, not by God's ordering, but by the free action of created souls. The fall necessitated the use of bodies; at first bright and transparent bodies such as stars have, and afterwards darker and heavier ones. In this way the various orders of angelic beings arose and below them the daemons; for all are of one original nature and ascend or descend in accordance with the movements of their own wills. From one class of these spirits the human race was constituted, and the qualities of each human soul and the environment into which it is born are due to its merits or demerits in previous existences. God is entirely just and has no favorites; souls are the masters of their own destinies and each obtains what he deserves.

The matter which was necessary to serve as bodies for the fallen spirits was created by God and is not eternal. Other matter had to be created to provide them with a dwelling-place. Matter is such that it can be adapted to an infinite variety of forms and purposes. The sojourn of man in this present world is designed to discipline and educate him, so that he may rise in the scale of being. He may, however, fall; and just as the most heights lie open to him, so do the lowest depths. Punishment is always remedial, never purely retributive. However low a spirit may fall, he may rise again; and however high he may soar, a fresh fall is still possible. It was this condition of things which gave rise to Jerome's caustic criticism that according to Origen angels might become devils and the devil an archangel. That is indeed what Origen meant to assert; that as no limit could be placed to human willfulness and sin, so no limit could be placed to the power of God's love, when once the human soul had responded to its healing and uplifting influence.

Logically speaking, such a process might continue indefinitely. But clear as was Origen's head, his heart insisted on having the last word here. Did not the Scriptures speak of a time when "God shall be all in all"? Thus Origen was led to the belief that one day the love of God would prove stronger even than the freedom of man and that all created spirits would return to that unity and perfection which was theirs at the beginning. Then bodies, which had grown progressively finer as their wearers ascended, would either be discarded forever, or would be etherealized into garments of the lightest and most tenuous nature conceivable. And this event, Origen knew well, must be far distant. He felt how intractable was the human spirit, how dull and impervious to enlightenment it could be. To meet this difficulty: he assumed a succession of worlds, not identical in form, but each framed out of the materials of its predecessor and each, we may suppose, advancing a step further on the road to the ultimate perfection.

The pre-existence and the future re-incarnation of the human soul was a doctrine that met with much opposition in the Church on account of its obvious connection with Greek and oriental speculation. But it led even Origen himself into a difficulty when he came to discuss the Incarnation. Jesus, as man, possessed a soul. Had this soul a pre-existence, like all others? Origen answered that it had. In the beginning, when other souls were declining from God, the soul of Jesus retained its innocence and continued by its own free choice in such close association with the Word of God that finally habit became changed into nature and an indissoluble union was created. It was this soul, already united with the Word of God, which took flesh of the Virgin Mary and appeared among men. And since there were multitudes of spiritual beings who had never come to earth, Origen supposed that Christ would visit them, too, in their celestial abodes, would assume their nature and would even suffer for them.

The system thus outlined was based upon a belief in man's free will. Origen is fully conscious of the importance of free will and he devotes a long chapter to examining it and meeting objections. All the Gnostic systems, and most other speculations of this period, ran in a fatalistic direction. If Origen appears to us to spend unnecessary trouble in his effort to establish the fact of human freedom, we must remember that it is largely this which gives the Christian tone and color to all his thought.

It is obvious that, however sincerely Origen started from the simple Christian faith, he ended in speculations which were only remotely connected with it. The real source of these speculations is to be found in the intellectual atmosphere of the time, in which the ideas of Platonists, Stoics, and orientals were mingled. But Origen claimed to find it all in the Scriptures. Philo the Jew had discovered, or more probably perfected, a method of using the Old Testament by which its varied contents, words, phrases and stories, were made to suggest philosophical ideas. Christian teachers at Alexandria continued to use this method, chiefly, though not solely, for the Old Testament, the difficulties of which, moral, theological and historical, challenged the inquiring mind to discover hidden meanings. The Church had rested its faith too largely on the Old Testament, with arguments from miracle and prophecy, to be able to look at it boldly and confess that it recorded a gradually developing revelation of God. This never seems to enter Origen's mind as a possibility. For him the Scriptures are everywhere perfect and complete, when rightly understood, to the minutest detail. He feels that the marvelous success of Christianity in the face of a hostile world guarantees the New Testament story, and that this in its turn guarantees the Old which predicts it. The Scriptures being thus established as divine writings may be made the basis of any thoughts which the intelligent reader can put into them or extract from them. Origen has three chapters on the Scriptures and the true method of their interpretation. It would be an exaggeration to say that the method is wholly arbitrary, for it has its rules. But it despises the history, ignores the poetry, and turns all that is warm and human into frigid intellectual reasonings. Its greatest value was that, in the hands of Origen at any rate, it kept the idea of God on a high moral and spiritual level and free from the distortions that are bound to creep in when the Old Testament is accepted in its literal sense as a perfect revelation. Beyond that, it preserved the treasure of these writings against possible rationalistic attack until the advent of happier days when the Church could with more certainty distinguish the temporary from the permanent and discern beneath superficial imperfections the abiding truth and divine inspiration.

The weakness of Origen's system, considered as a whole, lies in its assumption that the entire cosmic process is a mistake, due to the misuse of free will. He regards it as axiomatic that the end must be like the beginning. Is there nothing, then, to be accomplished in these vast stretches of time? Can God do no more than restore things to the position they were in before the primeval fall? If we are to take Origen literally, it would appear that God cannot. History, however long drawn out, is but the mending of an original fault. We have it on good authority that in one passage he even said that perfected souls would be swallowed up in the divine essence from which they sprang.⁴ Such a system of thought is at heart pessimistic, and it was perhaps some instinctive apprehension of this fact which caused the Church to turn away from it. But we must not be blind to the nobility of Origen's achievement. It is the work of a good and a brave man whose supreme desire was to know the truth. As such it is still worthy of our respectful attention, and wherever the love of truth is found, there will Origen never fail to receive his meed of gratitude and reverence.

PREFACE OF RUFINUS

1. I know that many of the brethren, impelled by their earnest desire to understand the scriptures, have made requests to a number of scholars well versed in Greek literature to put Origen into Roman dress and present him to Latin ears. And when, in furtherance of this object, our brother and colleague, at the entreaty of bishop Damasus, translated two of the Homilies on the Song of Songs from Greek into Latin, he composed so fine and noble a preface to that work, as to inspire everyone with a deep longing to read Origen and study him seriously. For he said that the text, "The king hath brought me into his chamber," might well be applied to the soul of Origen; and added that while in the rest of his works Origen had surpassed all other writers, in the Song of Songs he had even surpassed himself. He promises, indeed, in that very preface, that he himself will give us not only these books on the Song of Songs but also many other works of Origen in a translation for Roman ears. I can see, however, that he derives most pleasure from the works of his own pen. He pursues a task that promises greater fame, that of being a "father of the word"¹ and not a mere translator. For this reason I take up the work which was begun and approved by him. Nevertheless I cannot adorn the writings of this great man with a degree of eloquence comparable to his. Consequently I fear it may happen through my fault that the man whom he has deservedly praised as being the next teacher of wisdom and knowledge in the Church after the apostles may, owing to my poor style, appear far inferior to what he really is.

2. It was this oft-recurring thought which kept me silent and prevented me from yielding to the continual entreaties of the brethren to attempt this work. But so powerful is your influence, most faithful brother Macarius, that not even my want of skill could any longer provide grounds for resistance. Accordingly, not to suffer you to make too heavy a claim upon me, I gave way, even against my previous determination; but on the condition and understanding that in my translation I would follow as far as possible the rule observed by my predecessors and especially by the distinguished man whom I mentioned above. For he, when translating into Latin more than seventy treatises of Origen, called Homilies, and also a number of his commentaries on St. Paul's epistles, both of which are known to contain in the original a good many statements likely to cause offence, so smoothed over and emended these in his translation, that a Latin reader would find in them nothing out of harmony with our faith. His example, therefore, I am following to the best of my ability; if not with an equal degree of eloquence, yet at least observing the same rules, and taking care not to reproduce such passages from the books of Origen as are found to be inconsistent with and contrary to his true teaching.

3. The cause of these variations I have explained to you more fully in the Apologeticus, a work written by Pamphilus in defense of Origen's books, to which I added a very brief tract, showing, as I think, by clear proofs that these have been corrupted in many places by heretics and evilly disposed persons.² This is especially the case with the books which you are now pressing me to translate, namely those entitled Peri Archon, which may be rendered either Concerning First Principles or Concerning Principalities. These books are indeed most obscure and difficult for other reasons. For in them Origen discusses questions on which philosophers, after spending their whole lives in the task, have succeeded in discovering nothing. But our author made it his aim, so far as he possibly could, to turn into a religious direction man's belief in a Creator and his reasonings about the created world, which philosophers have used to advocate irreligion. Wherever, therefore, I have found in his books anything contrary to the reverent statements made by him about the Trinity in other places, I have either omitted it as a corrupt and interpolated passage, or reproduced it in a form that agrees with the doctrine; which I have often found him affirming elsewhere. If, however, speaking as he does to men of knowledge and discernment, he has occasionally expressed himself obscurely in the effort to be brief, I have, to make the passage clearer, padded: such remarks on the same subject as I have read in a fuller form in his other books, bearing in mind the need of explanation. But I have said nothing of my own, simply giving back to him his own statements found in other places.

4. I have written thus in my preface by way of precaution, to prevent slanderers from supposing that they have once again discovered some matter for accusation against me. For you have seen what perverse and contentious men will do. The fact is, I have undertaken this heavy labor, God and your prayers helping me, not to shut the mouths of slanderers (for this is impossible, unless indeed God should do it), but to provide material for those who desire to advance towards the knowledge of things. One request, however, I solemnly make of everyone who shall either transcribe or read these books, in the sight of God the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, by his faith in the kingdom to come, by the mystery of the resurrection from the dead, by the "everlasting fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels" (Mt 25:41), that, as he would not possess for an eternal inheritance that place where there is “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Mt 8:12; Lk 13:28), and where “their fire is not quenched and their worm dieth not” (Is 66:24; Mk 9:48), he shall neither add anything to this writing, nor take anything away, nor interpolate anything, nor change anything, but shall compare his copy with the originals from which it was made, and shall emend it and make it distinct to the very letter, and shall not allow a manuscript to remain incorrect or indistinct, lest the difficulty of ascertaining the meaning, if the manuscript is not distinct, should increase the obscurities of the work for those that read it.

28 p., 149, 362, 4/4

1. All who believe and are convinced that grace and truth came by Jesus Christ (cf. Jn 1:17), and who know Christ to be the truth (in accordance with his own saying, "I am the truth" [Jn 14:6]), derive the knowledge which calls men to lead a good and blessed life from no other source but the very words and teaching of Christ. By the words of Christ we do not mean only those which formed his teaching when he was made man and dwelt in the flesh, since even before that Christ the Word of God was in Moses and the prophets. For without the Word of God how could they have prophesied about Christ? In proof of which we should not find it difficult to show from the divine scriptures how that Moses or the prophets were filled with the spirit of Christ in all their words and deeds, were we not anxious to confine the present work within the briefest possible limits. I count it sufficient, therefore, to quote this one testimony of Paul, taken from the epistle which he writes to the Hebrews, where he speaks as follows: "By faith Moses, when he was grown up, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, accounting the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt" (Heb 11:24ff.). And as for the fact that Christ spoke in his apostles after his ascension into heaven, this is shown by Paul in the following passage: "Or do ye seek a proof of him that speaketh in me, that is, Christ?" (2 Cor 13:3).

2. Many of those, however, who profess to believe in Christ, hold conflicting opinions not only on small and trivial questions but also on some that are great and important; on the nature, for instance, of God or of the Lord Jesus Christ or of the Holy Spirit, and in addition on the natures of those created beings, the dominions and the holy powers. In view of this it seems necessary first to lay down a definite line and unmistakable rule in regard to each of these, and to postpone the inquiry into other matters until afterwards. For just as there are many among Greeks and barbarians alike who promise us the truth, and yet we gave up seeking for it from all who claimed it for false opinions after we had come to believe that Christ was the Son of God and had become convinced that we must learn the truth from him; in the same way when we find many who think they hold the doctrine of Christ, some of them differing in their beliefs from the Christians of earlier times, and yet the teaching of the church, handed down in unbroken succession from the apostles, is still preserved and continues to exist in the churches up to the present day, we maintain that that only is to be believed as the truth which in no way conflicts with the tradition of the church and the apostles.

3. But the following fact should be understood. The holy apostles, when preaching the faith of Christ, took certain doctrines, those namely which they believed to be necessary ones, and delivered them in the plainest terms to all believers, even to such as appeared to be somewhat dull in the investigation of divine knowledge. The grounds of their statements they left to be investigated by such as should merit the higher gifts of the Spirit and in particular by such as should afterwards receive through the Holy Spirit himself the graces of language, wisdom and knowledge. There were other doctrines, however, about which the apostles simply said that things were so, keeping silence as to the how or why; their intention undoubtedly being to supply the more diligent of those who came after them, such as should prove to be lovers of wisdom, with an exercise on which to display the fruit of their ability. The men I refer to are those who train themselves to become worthy and capable of receiving wisdom.

4. The kind of doctrines which are believed in plain terms through the apostolic teaching are the following:

First, that God is one, who created and set in order all things, and who, when nothing existed, caused the universe to be.¹ He is God from the first creation and foundation of the world, the God of all righteous men, of Adam, Abel, Seth, Enos, Enoch, Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, of the twelve patriarchs, of Moses and the prophets. This God, in these last days (cf. Heb 1:1), according to the previous announcements made through his prophets, sent the Lord Jesus Christ, first for the purpose of calling Israel, and secondly, after the unbelief of the people of Israel, of calling the Gentiles also. This just and good God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, himself gave the law, the prophets and the gospels, and he is God both of the apostles and also of the Old and New Testaments.

Then again: Christ Jesus, he who came to earth, was begotten of the Father before every created thing.² And after he had ministered to the Father in the foundation of all things, for "all things were made through him" (Jn 1:3) in these last times he emptied himself and was made man, was made flesh, although he was God (cf. Heb 1:1; Phil 2:7; Jn 1:14); and being made man, he still remained what he was, namely, God. He took to himself a body like our body, differing in this alone, that it was born of a virgin and of the Holy Spirit. And this Jesus Christ was born and suffered in truth and not merely in appearance, and truly died our common death. Moreover he truly rose from the dead, and after the resurrection companied with his disciples and was then taken up into heaven.

Then again, the apostles delivered this doctrine, that the Holy Spirit is united in honor and dignity with the Father and the Son. In regard to him it is not yet clearly known whether he is to be thought of as begotten or unbegotten, or as being himself also a Son of God or not; but these are matters which we must investigate to the best of our power from holy scripture, inquiring with wisdom and diligence. It is, however, certainly taught with the utmost clearness in the Church, that this Spirit inspired each one of the saints, both the prophets and the apostles, and that there was not one Spirit in the men of old and another in those who were inspired at the coming of Christ.

5. Next after this the apostles taught that the soul, having a substance and life of its own, will be rewarded according to its deserts after its departure from this world; for it will either obtain an inheritance of eternal life and blessedness, if its deeds shall warrant this, or it must be given over to eternal fire and torments, if the guilt of its crimes shall so determine. Further, there will be a time for the resurrection of the dead, when this body, which is now "sown in corruption," shall "rise in incorruption," and that which is "sown in dishonor" shall "rise in glory" (1 Cor 15:42f.).

This also is laid down in the Church's teaching, that every rational soul is possessed of free will and choice; and also, that it is engaged in a struggle against the devil and his angels and the opposing powers; for these strive to weigh the soul down with sins, whereas we, if we lead a wise and upright life, endeavor to free ourselves from such a burden. There follows from this the conviction that we are not subject to necessity, so as to be compelled by every means, even against our will, to do either good or evil. For if we are possessed of free will, some spiritual powers may very likely be able to urge us on to sin and others to assist us to salvation; we are not, however, compelled by necessity to act either rightly or wrongly, as is thought to be the case by those who say that human events are due to the course and motion of the stars, not only those events which fall outside the sphere of our freedom of will but even those that lie within our own power.

In regard to the soul, whether it takes its rise from thy transference of the seed, in such a way that the principle or substance of the soul may be regarded as inherent in the seminal particles of the body itself; or whether it has some others beginning, and whether this beginning is begotten or unbegotten, or at any rate whether it is imparted to the body from without or no; all this is not very clearly defined in the teaching.

6. Further, in regard to the devil and his angels and the opposing spiritual powers, the Church teaching lays it down that these beings exist, but what they are or how they exist it has not explained very clearly. Among most Christians, however, the following opinion is held, that this devil was formerly an angel, but became an apostate and persuaded as many angels as he could to fall away with him; and these are even now called his angels.

7. The Church teaching also includes the doctrine that this world was made and began to exist at a definite time and that by reason of its corruptible nature it must suffer dissolution. But what existed before this world, or what will exist after it, has not yet been made known openly to the many, for no clear statement on the point is set forth in the Church teaching.

Scriptures

8. Then there is the doctrine that the scriptures were composed through the Spirit of God and that they have not only that meaning which is obvious, but also another which is hidden from the majority of readers. For the contents of scripture are the outward forms of certain mysteries and the images of divine things. On this point the entire Church is unanimous, that while the whole law is spiritual, the inspired meaning is not recognized by all, but only by those who are gifted with the grace of the Holy Spirit in the word of wisdom and knowledge.

The term asomaton, that is, incorporeal, is unused and unknown, not only in many other writings but also in our scriptures. If, however, any one is inclined to produce it for us out of that little book called The Teaching of Peter, where the Savior is represented as saying to his disciples, "I am not an incorporeal daemon,"⁴ I must answer in the first place that the book itself is not included among the books of the Church and I can show that it is not a writing of Peter nor of anyone else who was inspired by the Spirit of God. But even supposing this point is waived, the sense conveyed by the word "incorporeal" in that passage is not the same as is expressed by Greek and non-Christian writers when they record a discussion by philosophers on incorporeal nature. For in the book in question the Savior used the words "incorporeal daemon" in order to denote that the fashion and outline, whatever it may be, of the daemoniac body is not like this dense and visible body of ours. And the words must be understood in the sense intended by the author of that writing, namely, that the Savior did not have such a body as the daemons have. Now this body is by nature a fine substance and thin like air, and on this account most people think and speak of it as incorporeal; but the Savior had a body which was solid and capable of being handled. It is customary for everything which is not like this to be termed incorporeal by the more simple and uneducated of men, just as the air we breathe may be called incorporeal because it is not a body that can be grasped or held or that can resist pressure.

9. Nevertheless we shall inquire whether the actual thing which Greek philosophers call asomaton or incorporeal is found in the holy scriptures under another name. We must also seek to discover how God himself is to be conceived, whether as corporeal and fashioned in some shape, or as being of a different nature from bodies, a point which is not clearly set forth in the teaching. The same inquiry must be made in regard to Christ and the Holy Spirit, and indeed in regard to every soul and every rational nature also.

10. This also is contained in the church teaching, that there exist certain angels of God and good powers, who minister to him in bringing about the salvation of men; but when these were created, and what they are like, or how they exist, is not very clearly defined. And as for the sun, moon and stars, the tradition does not clearly say whether they are living beings or without life.

Everyone therefore who is desirous of constructing out of the foregoing a connected body of doctrine must use points like these as elementary and foundation principles, in accordance with the commandment which says, "Enlighten yourselves with the light of knowledge" (Hos 10:12 [LXX]). Thus by clear and cogent arguments he will discover the truth about each particular point and so will produce, as we have said, a single body of doctrine, with the aid of such illustrations and declarations as he shall find in the holy scriptures and of such conclusions as he shall ascertain to follow logically from them when rightly understood.

God creation

1. I am aware that there are some who will try to maintain that even according to our scriptures God is a body, since they find it written in the books of Moses, "Our God is a consuming-fire" (Dt 4:24) and in the Gospel according to John, "God is spirit, and they who worship him must worship in spirit and in truth" (Jn 4:24). Now these men will have it that fire and spirit are body and nothing else. But I would ask them what they have to say about this passage of scripture, "God is light," as John says in his epistle, "God is light, and in him is no darkness" (1 Jn 1:5). He is that light, surely, which lightens the whole understanding of those who are capable of receiving truth, as it is written in the thirty-fifth psalm, "In thy light shall we see light" (Ps 35:10 [LXX]). For what other light of God can we speak of, in which a man sees light, except God's spiritual power, which when it lightens a man causes him either to see clearly the truth of all things or to know God himself who is called the truth? Such then is the meaning of the saying, "In thy light shall we see light"; that is, in thy word and thy wisdom, which is thy Son, in him shall we see thee, the Father. For can we possibly think that, because it is termed light, it is like the light of our sun? And how can there be the slightest reason for supposing that from that material light truth

the grounds of knowledge could be derived and the meaning of truth discovered?

2. If then they accept this argument of ours, proved by reason itself, about the nature of light, and will admit that the use of the word light cannot possibly mean that God is to be thought of as being a body, they will allow a similar reasoning in regard to the phrase "a consuming fire." For what does God "consume" by virtue of this fact of being a "fire"? Are we to suppose that he consumes bodily matter, "wood or hay or stubble"? (cf. 1 Cor 3:12). What is there in this statement consistent with the praises due to God, if he is a fire that consumes material substances like these? Let us rather consider that God does indeed consume and destroy, but that what he consumes are evil thoughts of the mind, shameful deeds and longings after sin, when these implant themselves in the minds of believers; and that he takes those souls which render themselves capable of receiving his word and wisdom and dwells in them according to the saying, "I and the Father will come and make our abode with him" (cf. Jn 14:23)¹ having first consumed all their vices and passions and made them into a temple pure and worthy of himself.

To those, however, who think that God is a body in consequence of the saying, "God is spirit" (Jn 4:24) we must reply as follows. It is a custom of holy scripture, when it wishes to point to something of an opposite nature to this dense and solid body, to call it spirit, as in the saying, "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life" (2 Cor 3:6). Here undoubtedly the letter means that which is bodily, and the spirit that which is intellectual, or as we also call it, spiritual. The apostle also says, "Even until this day, whenever Moses is read, a veil lieth upon their hearts; but when a man shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away; and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (2 Cor 3:15-17). For so long as a man does not attend to the spiritual meaning "a veil lies upon his heart," in consequence of which veil, in other words his duller understanding, the scripture itself is said or thought to be veiled; and this is the explanation of the veil which is said to have covered the face of Moses when he was speaking to the people (cf. Ex 34:33, 35), that is, when the law is read in public. But if we turn to the Lord, where also the Word of God is, and where the Holy Spirit reveals spiritual knowledge, the veil will be taken away, and we shall then with unveiled face behold in the holy scriptures the glory of the Lord.

3. Further, although many saints partake of the Holy Spirit, he is not on that account to be regarded as a kind of body, which is divided into material parts and distributed to each of the saints; but rather as a sanctifying power, a share of which is said to be possessed by all who have shown themselves worthy of being sanctified through his grace. And to make this statement more easily understood let us take an illustration from things admittedly of lesser importance. There are many who share in the teaching and art of medicine; yet are we to suppose that all who share in medicine have some material substance called medicine placed before them from which they take away little particles and so obtain a share of it? Must we not rather understand that all who with ready and prepared minds gain a comprehension of the art and its teaching may be said to share in medicine? These illustrations from medicine must not be supposed to apply in every detail when compared with the Holy Spirit; they establish this point only, that a thing in which many have a share is not necessarily to be regarded as a body. The Holy Spirit is far different from the system or science of medicine, for the Holy Spirit is an intellectual existence, with a subsistence and being of its own, whereas medicine is nothing of the sort.

4. We must now turn to the Gospel passage itself, where it is written that "God is spirit" (Jn 4:24), and must show that this is to be understood in a sense agreeing with what we have just said. Let us ask when our Savior spoke these words, and to whom, and in what connection. We find undoubtedly that he uttered them when speaking to the woman of Samaria, who thought that men ought to worship God in Mount Gerizim according to the belief of the Samaritans. "God," he told her, "is spirit." The woman of Samaria, supposing him to be an ordinary Jew, was asking him whether men ought to worship God "in Jerusalem" or "in this mountain." These were her words: "All our fathers worshipped in this mountain, but ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship" (Jn 4:20). It was this belief of the woman, who thought that God would be worshipped rightly or wrongly by Jews in Jerusalem or by Samaritans in Mount Gerizim because of some special privilege attaching to the material places, that the Savior contradicts by saying that the man who desires to seek for God must abandon all idea of material places. These are his words: "The hour cometh, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father neither in Jerusalem nor in this mountain. God is spirit, and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth" (cf. Jn 4:21, 23, 24). See, too, how appropriately he associated truth with spirit, calling God spirit to distinguish him from bodies, and truth to distinguish him from a shadow or an image. For those who worshipped in Jerusalem, "serving a shadow and image of heavenly things" (Heb 8:5), worshipped neither in truth nor in spirit, and the same is true of those who worshipped in Mount Gerizim.

5. Having then refuted, to the best of our ability, every interpretation which suggests that we should attribute to God any material characteristics, we assert that in truth he is in-comprehensible and immeasurable. For whatever may be the knowledge which we have been able to obtain about God, whether by perception or by reflection, we must of necessity believe that he is far and away better than our thoughts about him. For if we see a man who can scarcely look at a glimmer or the light of the smallest lamp, and if we wish to teach such a one, whose eyesight is not strong enough to receive more light than we have said, about the brightness and splendor of the sun, shall we not have to tell him that the splendor of the sun is unspeakably and immeasurably better and more glorious than all this light he can see? In the same way our mind is shut up within bars of flesh and blood and rendered duller and feebler by reason of its association with such material substances; and although it is regarded as far more excellent when compared with the natural body, yet when it strains after incorporeal things and seeks to gain a sight of them it has scarcely the power of a glimmer of light or a tiny lamp. And among all intellectual, that is, incorporeal things, what is there so universally surpassing, so unspeakably and immeasurably excelling, as God, whose nature certainly the vision of the human mind, however pure or clear to the very utmost that mind may be, cannot gaze at or behold?

6. But it will not appear out of place if to make the matter clearer still we use yet another illustration. Sometimes our eyes cannot look upon the light itself, that is, the actual sun, but when we see the brightness and rays of the sun as they pour into our windows, it may be, or into any small openings for light, we are able to infer from these how great is the source and fountain of physical light. So, too, the works of divine providence and the plan of this universe are as it were rays of God's nature in contrast to his real substance and being, and because our mind is of itself unable to behold God as he is, it understands the parent of the universe from the beauty of his works and the comeliness of his creatures.

God therefore must not be thought to be any kind of body, nor to exist in a body, but to be a simple intellectual existence, admitting in himself of no addition whatever, so that he cannot be believed to have in himself a more or a less, but is Unity, or if I may so say, Oneness² throughout, and the mind and fount from which originates all intellectual existence or mind. Now mind does not need physical space in which to move and operate, nor does it need a magnitude discernible by the senses, nor bodily shape or color, nor anything else whatever like these, which are suitable to bodies and matter. Accordingly that simple and wholly mental existence can admit no delay or hesitation in any of its movements or operations; for if it did so, the simplicity of its divine nature would appear to be in some degree limited and impeded by such an addition, and that which is the first principle of all things would be found to be composite and diverse, and would be many and not one; since only the species of deity, if I may so call it, has the privilege of existing apart from all material intermixture.

That mind needs no space in which to move according to its own nature is certain even from the evidence of our own mind. For if this abides in its own proper sphere and nothing occurs from any cause to enfeeble it, it will never be at all retarded by reason of differences of place from acting in conformity with its own movements; nor on the other hand will it gain any increase or accession of speed from the peculiar nature of any place. And if it be objected, for example, that when men are travelling by sea and tossed by the waves, their mind is somewhat less vigorous than it is wont to be on land, we must believe this experience to be due not to the difference of place but to the movement and disturbance of the body with which the mind is joined or intermingled. For it seems almost against nature for the human body to live on the sea, and on this account the body, as if unequal to its task, appears to sustain the mind's movements in irregular and disordered manner, giving feeble assistance to its keen flashes, precisely as happens even with men on land when they are in the grip of a fever; in whose case it is certain that, if the mind fulfills its functions less effectively through the strength of the fever, the cause is to be found not in any defect of locality but in the disease of the body, which renders it disturbed and confused and altogether unable to bestow its customary services on the mind under the well-known and natural conditions. For we men are animals, formed by a union of body and soul, and thus alone did it become possible for us to live on the earth. But God, who is the beginning of all things, must not be regarded as a composite being, lest perchance we find that the elements, out of which everything that is called composite has been composed, are prior to the first principle himself.

Nor does the mind need physical magnitude in order to perform any act or movement, as an eye does when in looking at large bodies it expands and at small ones narrows and contracts for the purpose of seeing. Mind certainly needs intellectual magnitude, because it grows in an intellectual and not in a physical sense. For mind does not increase by physical additions at the same time as the body does until the twentieth or thirtieth year of its age, but by the employment of instructions and exercises a sharpening of the natural faculties is effected and the powers implanted within are roused to intelligence. Thus the capacity of the intellect is enlarged not by being increased with physical additions, but by being cultivated through exercises in learning. These it cannot receive immediately from birth or boyhood because the structure of the bodily parts which the mind uses as instruments for its own exercise is as yet weak and feeble, being neither able to endure the force of the mind's working nor sufficiently developed to display a capacity for receiving instruction.

7. But if there are any who consider the mind itself and the soul to be a body, I should like them to tell me how it can take in reasons and arguments relating to questions of great importance, full of difficulty and subtlety. Whence comes it that the power of memory, the contemplation of invisible things, yes, and the perception of incorporeal things reside in a body? How does a bodily nature investigate the teachings of the arts and the meanings and reasons of things? And divine doctrines, which are obviously incorporeal, how can it discern and understand them? One might perhaps think that, just as the bodily form and shape of the ears or eyes contributes something to hearing or to seeing, and as the various parts of our body, which have been formed by God, each possess some special capacity, due to their particular form, for doing the work for which they were by nature designed, so too, the soul or mind must be supposed to have an outward shape fitly and suitably formed, as it were, for the purpose of perceiving and understanding individual things and of being set in motion by vital movements. But what sort of appearance the mind could have, seeing that it is a mind and moves in an intellectual way, I do not know who could describe or tell us.

In further confirmation and explanation of what we have said about the mind or soul, as being superior to all bodily nature, the following remarks may be added. Each of the bodily senses is appropriately connected with a material substance towards which the particular sense is directed. For instance, sight is connected with color, shape and size; hearing with the voice and sound; smelling with vapors pleasant and unpleasant; taste with flavors; touch with things hot or cold, hard or soft, rough or smooth. But it is clear to all that the sense of mind is far superior to the senses above mentioned. Does it not then appear absurd that these inferior senses should have substances connected with them, as objects towards which their activities are directed, whereas this faculty, the sense of mind, which is superior to them, should have no substance whatever connected with it, and that this faculty of an intellectual nature should be a mere accident arising out of bodies?³ Those who assert this are undoubtedly speaking in disparaging terms of that substance which is the better part of their own nature; nay more, they do wrong even to God himself in supposing that he can be understood through a bodily nature, since according to them that which can be understood or perceived through a body is itself a body; and they are unwilling to have it understood that there is a certain affinity between the mind and God, of whom the mind is an intellectual image, and that by reason of this fact the mind, especially if it is purified and separated from bodily matter, is able to have some perception of the divine nature.

8. But these assertions may perhaps seem to be less authoritative to those who desire to be instructed in divine things from the holy scriptures and who seek to have it proved to them from that source how God's nature surpasses the nature of bodies. See then, whether the apostle, too, does not say the same thing when he speaks as follows about Christ: "Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1:15). It is not, as some suppose, that God's nature is visible to one and invisible to others; for the apostle did not say "the image of God who is invisible" to men or "invisible" to sinners, but he makes an absolutely unvarying declaration about God's very nature in these words, "image of the invisible God." And John, too, when he says in the gospel, "No one hath seen God at any time" (Jn 1:18), plainly declares to all who are capable of understanding, that there is no existence to which God is visible; not as if he were one who is visible by nature and yet eludes and escapes the gaze of his creatures because of their frailty, but that he is in his nature impossible to be seen.

And if you should ask me what is my belief about the Only-begotten himself, whether I would say that God's nature, which is naturally invisible, is not even visible to him, do not immediately think this question to be impious or absurd, because we shall give it a logical answer. (For as it is incongruous to say that the Son can see the Father, so it is unfitting to believe that the Holy Spirit can see the Son).⁴ It is one thing to see, another to know. To see and to be seen is a property of bodies; to know and to be known is an attribute of intellectual existence. Whatever therefore is proper to bodies must not be believed either of the Father or of the Son, the relations between whom are such as pertain to the nature of deity. And finally, Christ in the gospel did not say, "No one seeth the Father except the Son, nor the Son except the Father," but "no one knoweth the Son except the Father, nor doth anyone know the Father except the Son" (Mt 11:27). This clearly shows that what is called "seeing" and "being seen" in the case of bodily existences is with the Father and the Son called "knowing" and "being known," through the faculty of knowledge and not through our frail sense of sight. It is, therefore, because the expressions "to see" and "to be seen" cannot suitably be applied to incorporeal and invisible existence that in the gospel the Father is not said to be seen by the Son nor the Son by the Father, but to be known.

9. But if the question is put to us why it was said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Mt 5:8), I answer that in my opinion our argument will be much more firmly established by this passage. For what else is "to see God in the heart" but to understand and know him with the mind, just as we have explained above? For the names of the organs of mind = heart ← Com Jn. 1.206, 2.22, 2.29

sense are often applied to the soul, so that we speak of seeing with the eyes of the heart, that is, of drawing some intellectual conclusion by means of the faculty of intelligence. So too we speak of hearing with the ears when we discern the deeper meaning of some statement. So too we speak of the soul as being able to use teeth, when it eats and consumes the bread of life who comes down from heaven. In a similar way we speak of it as using all the other bodily organs, which are transferred from their corporeal significance and applied to the faculties of the soul; as Solomon says, "You will find a divine sense" (Prov 2:5).⁵ For he knew that there were in us two kinds of senses, the one being mortal, corruptible and human, and the other immortal and intellectual, which here he calls "divine." By this divine sense, therefore, not of the eyes but of a pure heart, that is, the mind, God can be seen by those who are worthy. That heart is used for mind, that is for the intellectual faculty, you will certainly find over and over again in all the scriptures, both the New and the Old.

Having thus investigated the nature of God, though in a manner far from worthy by reason of the weakness of our human understanding, let us now see what meaning is to be given to the name Christ.

1. First we must know this, that in Christ there is one nature, his deity, because he is the only-begotten Son of the Father, and another human nature, which in very recent times he took upon him to fulfill the divine purpose. Our first task therefore is to see what the only-begotten Son of God is, seeing he is called by many different names according to the circumstances and beliefs of the different writers. He is called Wisdom, as Solomon said, speaking in the person of Wisdom: "The Lord created me the beginning of his ways for his works. Before he made anything, before the ages he established me. In the beginning before he made the earth, before the springs of waters came forth, before the mountains were settled, before all the hills he begets me" (Prv 8:22-25).¹ He is also called Firstborn, as the apostle Paul says: "who is the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1:15). The Firstborn is not, however, by nature a different being from Wisdom, but is one and the same. Finally, the apostle Paul says, "Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor 1:24).

2. Let no one think, however, that when we give him the name "wisdom of God" we mean anything without hypostatic existence,² that is, to take an illustration, that we understand him to be not as it were some wise living being, but a certain thing which makes men wise by revealing and imparting itself to the minds of such as are able to receive its influence and intelligence. If then it is once rightly accepted that the only-begotten Son of God is God's wisdom hypostatically existing, I do not think that our mind ought to stray beyond this to the suspicion that this hypostasis or substance could possibly possess bodily characteristics, since everything that is corporeal is distinguished by shape or color or size. And who in his sober senses ever looked for shape or color or measurable size in wisdom, considered solely as wisdom? And can anyone who has learned to regard God with feelings of reverence suppose or believe that God the Father ever existed, even for a single moment, without begetting this wisdom? For he would either say that God could not have begotten wisdom before he did beget her, so that he brought wisdom into being when she had not existed before, or else that he could have begotten her and—what it is profanity even to say about God—that he was unwilling to do so; each of which alternatives, as everyone can see, is absurd and impious, that is, either that God should advance from being unable to being able, or that, while being able, he should act as if he were not and should delay to beget wisdom.

Wherefore we recognize that God was always the Father of his only-begotten Son, who was born indeed of him and draws his being from him, but is yet without any beginning, not only of that kind which can be distinguished by periods of time, but even of that other kind which the mind alone is wont to contemplate in itself and to perceive, if I may so say, with the bare intellect and reason. Wisdom, therefore, must be believed to have been begotten beyond the limits of any beginning that we can speak of or understand. And because in this very subsistence of wisdom there was implicit every capacity and form of the creation that was to be, both of those things that exist in a primary sense and of those which happen in consequence of them, the whole being fashioned and arranged beforehand by the power of foreknowledge, wisdom, speaking through Solomon in regard to these very created things that had been as it were outlined and prefigured in herself, says that she was created as a "beginning of the ways" of God, which means that she contains within herself both the beginnings and causes and species of the whole creation.

3. Now just as we have learned in what sense wisdom is the "beginning of the ways" of God and is said to have been created, in the sense, namely, that she fashions beforehand and contains within herself the species and causes of the entire creation, in the same manner also must wisdom be understood to be the Word of God. For wisdom opens to all other beings, that is, to the whole creation, the meaning of the mysteries and secrets which are contained within the wisdom of God, and so she is called the Word, because she is as it were an interpreter of the mind's secrets. Hence I consider that to be a true saying which is written in the Acts of Paul, "He is the Word, a living being."³ John, however, uses yet more exalted and wonderful language in the beginning of his gospel, when by an appropriate declaration he defines the Word to be God; "And the Word was God, and he was in the beginning with God" (Jn 1:1, 2). Let him who assigns a beginning to the Word of God or the wisdom of God beware lest he utters impiety against the unbegotten Father himself, in denying that he was always a Father and that he begat the Word and possessed wisdom in all previous times or ages or whatever else they may be called.

4. This Son, then, is also the truth and the life (cf. Jn 14:6) of all things that exist; and rightly so. For the things that were made, how could they live, except by the gift of life? Or the things that exist, how could they really and truly exist, unless they were derived from the truth? Or how could rational beings exist, unless the Word or reason had existed before them? Or how could they be wise, unless wisdom existed? But since it was to happen that some should fall away from life and bring death upon themselves by the very fact of their falling (for death is nothing else but a departure from life), and yet it would certainly not have been logical that beings once created by God for the enjoyment of life should utterly perish, it was needful that before the existence of death there should exist a power capable of destroying the death that was to come, and that there should exist a resurrection (cf. Jn 11:25), the figure of which was shown in our Lord and Savior, which resurrection should have its ground in the very wisdom and word and life of God. Or again, since it was to happen that some of those who were created would prove unable, in consequence of the good being within them as an accident and not by nature, that is, not essentially, to remain firm and steadfast and to abide forever in the just and temperate use of their original blessings, but would turn and change and fall away from their first state, the word and wisdom of God became the way (cf. Jn 14:6). And it is called the way for this reason, that it leads to the Father those who walk along it.

Whatever then we have said of the wisdom of God will also fitly apply to and be understood of him in his other titles as the Son of God, the life, the word, the truth, the way and the resurrection. For all these titles are derived from his works and powers, and in none of them is there the least reason to understand anything corporeal, which might seem to denote either size or shape or color. But whereas the offspring of men or of the other animals whom we see around us correspond to the seed of those by whom they were begotten, or of the mothers in whose womb they are formed and nourished, drawing from these parents whatever it is that they take and bring into the light of day when they are born, it is impious and shocking to regard God the Father in the begetting of his only-begotten Son and in the Son's subsistence as being similar to any human being or other animal in the act of begetting; but there must needs be some exceptional process, worthy of God, to which we can find no comparison whatever, not merely in things, but even in thought and imagination, such that by its aid human thought could apprehend how the unbegotten God becomes Father of the only-begotten Son. This is an eternal and everlasting begetting, as brightness is begotten from light (cf. Wis 7:26; Heb 1:3). For he does not become Son in an external way through the adoption of the Spirit (Rom 8:15), but is Son by nature.

5. Let us now see how our statements are also supported by the authority of divine scripture. The apostle Paul says that the only-begotten Son is "the image of the invisible God," and that he is the "firstborn of all creation" (Col 1:15) and when writing to the Hebrews he says of the Son that he is the "brightness of God's glory and the express image of his substance" (Heb 1:3). But we also find, in the book of Wisdom which is said to be Solomon's, a certain description of the wisdom of God in the following terms: "For she is a breath of the power of God, and a pure effluence (that is, emanation⁴) of the glory of the Almighty." Therefore, "nothing that is defiled can enter into her. For she is the brightness of the eternal light and an unspotted mirror of the working of God and an image of his goodness (Wis 7:25ff.). Now, as we said above, the wisdom of God has her subsistence nowhere else but in him who is the beginning of all things, from whom also she took her birth. And because he himself, who alone is a Son by nature, is this wisdom, he is on this account also called the "only-begotten."

6. Let us now see what we ought to understand by the expression "image of the invisible God," in order that we may learn therefrom how God can rightly be called the Father of his Son; and let us first of all consider what things are called images in ordinary human speech. Sometimes the term "image" is applied to an object painted or carved on some material, such as wood or stone. Sometimes a child is said to be the image of its parent, when the likeness of the parent's features is in every respect faithfully reproduced in the child. Now I think that the first of these illustrations may be fitly applied to him who was made "in the image and likeness of God" (Gn 1:26), that is, man. Of man, however, we shall inquire more carefully, with God's help, when we come to the exposition of this passage in Genesis.⁵

But in regard to the Son of God, of whom we are now speaking, the image may be compared to our second illustration; for this reason, that he is the invisible image of the invisible God, just as according to the scripture narrative we say that the image of Adam was his son Seth. It is written thus: "And Adam begat Seth after his own image and after his own kind (Gn 5:3). This image preserves the unity of nature and substance common to a father and a son. For if "all things that the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise" (Jn 5:19), then in this very fact that the Son does all things just as the Father does, the Father's image is reproduced in the Son, whose birth from the Father is as it were an act of his will proceeding from the mind. And on this account my own opinion is that an act of the Father's will ought to be sufficient to ensure the existence of what he wills; for in willing he uses no other means than that which is produced by the deliberations of his will. It is in this way, then, that the existence of the Son also is begotten by him.

This point must above all be upheld by those who allow nothing to be unbegotten, that is, unborn, except God the Father only.⁶ Moreover, we must take care not to fall into the absurd fables of those who imagine for themselves certain emanations, splitting the divine nature into parts and, so far as they can, dividing God the Father.⁷ For it is not only the utmost impiety, but also the depth of folly, to entertain the slightest suspicion that such a thing could happen to an incorporeal being; nor is it at all consistent with our intelligence to think that a physical division of an incorporeal being is possible. Rather must we suppose that as an act of will proceeds from the mind without either cutting off any part of the mind or being separated or divided from it, in some similar fashion has the Father begotten the Son, who is indeed his image; so that as the Father is invisible by nature, he has begotten an image that is also invisible.

For the Son is the Word, and therefore we must understand that nothing in him is perceptible to the senses. He is wisdom, and in wisdom we must not suspect the presence of anything corporeal. "He is the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (Jn 1:9), but he has nothing in common with the light of our sun. Our Savior is therefore the image of the invisible God, the Father, being the truth, when considered in relation to the Father himself,⁸ and the image, when considered in relation to us, to whom he reveals the Father (cf. Jn 14:6);⁹ through which image we know the Father, whom "no one" else "knoweth save the Son and he to whom the Son hath willed to reveal him" (Mt 11:27). And he reveals the Father by being himself understood; for whoever has understood him understands as a consequence the Father also", according to his own saying, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father also" (Jn 14:9).¹⁰

7. But we quoted the saying of Paul in which he speaks of Christ as being "the brightness of God's glory, and the express image of his substance" (Heb 1:3); let us see, therefore, what we are to learn from this. "God is light," according to John

(1 Jn 1:5). The only-begotten Son, therefore, is the brightness of this light, proceeding from God without separation, as brightness from light, and lightening the whole creation. For by the same method of exposition which we have used above,¹¹ to show how he is the way and leads to the Father, and how he is the Word who interprets and presents to the rational creation the secrets of wisdom and the mysteries of knowledge, and how he is also the truth and the life and the resurrection, must we arrive at the meaning of his being the brightness; for it is through its brightness that the nature of the light itself is known and experienced. This brightness falls softly and gently on the tender and weak eyes of mortal man and little by little trains and accustoms them, as it were, to bear the light in its clearness; and when it has removed from them all that darkens and obstructs their vision, in accordance with the Lord's saying, "Cast out the beam out of thine eye" (Mt 7:5; Lk 6:42) it renders them capable of enduring the glory of the light, becoming in this respect even a kind of mediator between men and the light (cf. 1 Tm 2:5).

8. Christ is said, however, by the apostle to be not only "the brightness of God's glory" but also "the express image of his substance" (Heb 1:3) or subsistence. I do not think it superfluous, therefore, to turn our attention to this point, namely, how there can be said to exist, besides the actual substance or subsistence of God (whatever that substance or subsistence means), something else which is an image of his substance. See, then, whether the Son of God, who is called God's word and wisdom, and who alone knows the Father and reveals him to whom he will (cf. Mt 11:27), to those, namely, who become capable of receiving his word and wisdom, may not perhaps be said to express the image of God's substance or subsistence for this reason, that he makes God understood and known; that is, when wisdom outlines first in herself the things which she wishes to reveal to others, by means of which they are to know and understand God, then she herself may be called the express image of God's substance (Heb 1:3).

In order, however, to understand still more completely how the Savior is "the image of God's substance" or subsistence, let us use an illustration which, although it does not fully or properly represent the subject under discussion, we may yet be allowed to employ for the sole purpose of showing that when the Son, "who was in the form of God, emptied himself" (Phil 2:6, 7). his desire was by means of this very emptying to display to us the fullness of the godhead. Let us suppose, for example, that there existed a statue of so great a size as to fill the whole world, but which on account of its immensity was imperceptible to anyone, and that another statue was made similar to it in every detail, in shape of limbs and outline of features, in form and material, but not in its immense size, so that those who were unable to perceive and behold the immense one could yet be confident that they had seen it when they saw the small one, because this preserved every line of limbs and features and the very form and material with an absolutely indistinguishable similarity.¹²

It is by some such likeness as this that the Son, in emptying himself of his equality with the Father (cf. Phil 2:7) and showing to us a way by which we may know him, becomes an "express image" of God's substance (cf. Heb 1:3); so that, through this fact of his becoming to us the brightness, we who were not able to look at the glory of pure light while it remained in the greatness of his godhead, may find a way of beholding the divine light through looking at the brightness. Needless to say, a comparison with statues, taken from the region of material things, is to be allowed for no other purpose but to show that the Son of God, though brought within the very narrow compass of a human body, yet gave indications, in the likeness of his power and works to those of God the Father, of the immense and invisible greatness that was in him; witness the words which he said to his disciples, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father also" (Jn 14:9), and, "I and the Father are one" (Jn 10:30); along with which we must also interpret that similar saying of his, "the Father in me, and I in the Father" (Jn 10:38).

9. Let us now see what is the meaning of that passage which we find written in the Wisdom of Solomon, who speaks of wisdom as follows: "She is a breath of the power of God and a pure effluence (that is, emanation) of the glory of the Almighty and the brightness of the eternal light and an unspotted mirror of the working or power of God and an image of his goodness" (Wis 7:25, 26). He gives here five definitions of God and from each of them in turn he indicates a certain characteristic belonging to God's wisdom; for he speaks of God's "power" and "glory" and "eternal light" and "working" and "goodness." He says, however, that wisdom is a breath not of the glory of the Almighty, nor of the eternal light, nor of the working of the Father, nor of his goodness, since it was not suitable to apply the term breath to any one of these; but in all appropriateness he says that wisdom is a breath of the "power" of God. Now the power of God must mean that by which he is strong, that by which he both established and also preserves and controls all things visible and invisible, and that by which he is sufficient for all things which are the objects of his providence and with all of which he is present as if they were joined in one. The breath, then, or if I may so call it, the strength of all this power, so great and so immense, comes to have a subsistence its own; and although it proceeds from the power itself as will proceeding from mind,¹³ yet nevertheless the will of God comes itself to be a power of God. There comes into existence, therefore, another power, subsisting in its own proper nature, a kind breath, as the passage of Scripture calls it, of the first and unbegotten power of God, drawing from this source whatever existence it has; and there is no time when it did not exist.

For if anyone is inclined to describe it as being non-existent at first but coming into existence afterwards, let him tell us why the Father who caused it to exist did not do so before. And if he lays it down that there was one definite beginning when this "breath" first proceeded from the power of God, we shall ask again why it did not so proceed before this beginning of which he has spoken. Thus by ever inquiring what happened before and going further back with our questions, we shall reach the conclusion that, since God always had both the power and the will, there was never the slightest reason or possibility that he should not always have had this good thing that he desired. This proves that there always has existed that breath of the power of God, having no beginning but God himself. Nor indeed could it have fitly had any other beginning except him from whom it takes its existence and birth, that is, God. And in regard to the apostle's saying that "Christ is the power of God" (1 Cor 1:24) this power must be called not merely a breath of the power of God but a power proceeding from the power.

10. Let us now look into the saying that wisdom is "an effluence," that is, an emanation, "of the clear glory of the Almighty," and if we first consider what "the glory of the Almighty" is, we shall then understand what its "effluence" is. Now as one cannot be a father apart from having a son, nor a lord apart from holding a possession or a slave, so we cannot even call God almighty if there are none over whom he can exercise his power. Accordingly, to prove that God is almighty we must assume the existence of the universe. For if anyone would have it that certain ages, or periods of time, or whatever he cares to call them, elapsed during which the present creation did not exist, he would undoubtedly prove that in those ages or periods God was not almighty, but that he afterwards became almighty from the time when he began to have creatures over whom he could exercise power. Thus God will apparently have experienced a kind of progress, for there can be no doubt that it is better for him to be almighty than not to be so.

Now how does it seem anything but absurd that God should at first not possess something that is appropriate to him, and afterwards by a kind of progress should come to possess it? But if there was no time when he was not almighty, then of necessity those things must always have existed, in virtue of which he is called almighty; and he must always have had creatures over which he exercised his power and which were controlled by him as king and ruler.

Of these we shall treat more fully in the proper place, when we come to discuss the subject of God's creatures.¹⁴ Yet even now, since we are dealing with the question how wisdom is a pure effluence, or emanation, of the glory of the Almighty, I deem it necessary to give warning, however briefly, to prevent anyone from thinking that the title of Almighty belonged to God before the birth of wisdom, through which he is called Father; for wisdom, which is the Son of God, is said to be a "pure effluence of the glory of the Almighty." Let him who is inclined to believe this hear what the scriptures plainly proclaim; for it says that "thou hast made all things in wisdom" (Ps 104:24 [LXX 103:24]), and the Gospel teaches that "all things were made by him and without him was not anything made" (Jn 1:3); and let him understand from this that the title of Almighty cannot be older in God than that of Father, for it is through the Son that the Father is almighty.

But the passage speaks of a glory belonging to the Almighty, of which glory wisdom is the effluence. From this we learn that wisdom, through which God is called Almighty, has a share even in the glory of omnipotence. For it is through wisdom, which is Christ, that God holds power over all things, not only by his own authority as Master, but also by the voluntary service of his subjects. And to prove to you that the omnipotence of the Father and the Son is one and the same, just as God and the Lord are one and the same as the Father, listen to the manner in which John speaks in the Apocalypse: "These things saith the Lord God, which is and which was and which is to come, the Almighty" (Rv 1:8). For he who "is to come," who else is it but Christ? And just as no one ought to be offended because, while the Father is God, the Savior also is God; so too ought no one to be offended because, while the Father is called Almighty, the Son also is called Almighty.

Moreover we shall in this way see the truth of that saying which Christ utters to the Father: "All things that are mine are thine, and thine are mine, and I am glorified in them" (Jn 17:10). Now if all things which are the Father's are Christ's, and among all that the Father is, he is Almighty, then undoubtedly the only-begotten Son must also be Almighty, that the Son may have all that the Father has. "And I am glorified," he says, "in them." For "in the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth; and every tongue shall confess that Jesus is Lord in the glory of God the Father" (Phil 2:10, 11).¹⁵ He is therefore the "effluence of the glory of God" in this respect, that he is Almighty, God's pure and clear wisdom itself, glorified as being the effluence of omnipotence or glory.

We add the following, however, to make it more clearly understood what the glory of omnipotence is. God the Father is almighty because he holds dominion over all things, that is, over heaven and earth, sun, moon and stars and everything contained in them. This dominion he exercises through his Word, for "in the name of Jesus every knee bows, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth." Now if every knee bows to Jesus, then undoubtedly it is Jesus to whom all things have been subjected, and it is he who wields dominion over all things, and all things have been subjected to the Father through him; for it is through wisdom, that is, by word and reason and not by force and necessity, that they are subject. His glory, therefore, lies in the very fact that he possesses all things; and this is the purest and brightest glory of omnipotence, that the universe is held in subjection by reason and wisdom, and not by force and necessity. It is called the "purest and brightest" glory of wisdom as the most suitable way of distinguishing it from that glory which is not pure or sincere.

For every nature which is alterable and changeable, even though it may be glorified in works of righteousness or wisdom, cannot be said to possess a glory that is sincere and bright, by reason of the fact that its righteousness and wisdom are accidents, and whatever is accidental may also be separated and lost. But since the wisdom of God, which is his only-begotten Son, is in all respects unalterable and unchangeable, and since every good quality in him is essential and can never be changed or altered, his glory is on that account described as pure and sincere.

11. In the third place, wisdom is said to be the brightness of the eternal light. The force of this expression we have explained in a previous passage, where we introduced the illustration of the sun and the brightness of its rays¹⁶ and showed to the best of our ability how the expression should be understood. We will add, however, this one point. The term everlasting or eternal properly denotes that which had no beginning of existence and can never cease to be what it is. This is the idea underlying the passage in John, where he says that "God is light" (1 Jn 1:5). Now God's wisdom is the brightness of that light, not only in so far as it is light, but in so far as it is everlasting light. His wisdom is therefore an everlasting brightness, enduring eternally. If this point is fully understood, it is a clear proof that the Son's existence springs from the Father himself, yet not in time, nor from any other beginning except, as we have said, from God himself. Springs

12. Wisdom is also called an "unspotted mirror of the energy or working of God" (cf. Wis 7:25).¹⁷ We must first understand, therefore, what the "working" of God's power is. It is a kind of strength, so to speak, by means of which the Father works, whether in his acts of creation, or of providence, or of judgment, or in the ordering and superintendence of every detail of the universe at his own appointed time. And when wisdom is called the "unspotted mirror" of the Father's power and working, she would have us understand her nature to be like the image reflected in a mirror, which moves and acts in correspondence with the movements and actions of him who looks into the mirror, not deviating from them in any way whatever. So too the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the wisdom of God, speaks of himself when he says, "the works which the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son in like manner" (Jn 5:19); and again, "the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he hath seen the Father doing" (ibid.). meditation 53

As regards the power of his works, then, the Son is in no way whatever separate or different from the Father, nor is his work anything other than the Father's work, but there is one and the same movement, so to speak, in all they do; consequently the Father has called him an "unspotted mirror," in order to make it understood that there is absolutely no dissimilarity between the Son and the Father. Some indeed have said that the Son's acts are to be compared with a pupil's Same Father Son work in likeness to or imitation of his master, or that such things as the Father has first formed in their spiritual essence are made by the Son in bodily material;¹⁸ yet how can these opinions be reconciled with the Gospel, which says, not that the Son does like things, but that he does the same things "in like manner" (Jn 5:19)?

13. There remains the inquiry, what is the "image of his goodness"? Here, I think, we do well to adopt the same line of reasoning which we used above in regard to the image formed in a mirror. The original goodness is undoubtedly the Father; and from this is born the Son, who is in every respect an image of the Father, and who may also without any doubt be properly called an "image of his goodness."¹⁹

For there is no other second goodness existing in the Son, besides that which is in the Father. So the Savior himself rightly says in the Gospel that "none is good save one, God the Father" (Mk 10:18), the purpose of this statement being to make it understood that the Son is not of some other "goodness," but of that alone which is in the Father; whose image he is rightly called, because he neither springs from any other source than from original goodness itself,—for if that were so, there would seem to be a different goodness in the Son from that which is in the Father—nor has the goodness that is in him any dissimilarity or divergence from that of the Father. Accordingly we ought not to imagine that there is some kind of blasphemy, as it were, in the saying that "none is good save one, God the Father" (Mk 10:18) as if these words were to be taken as a denial that either Christ or the Holy Spirit is good; but, as we said before,²⁰ the original goodness must be believed to reside in God the Father, and from him both the Son and Holy Spirit undoubtedly draw into themselves the nature of that goodness existing in the fount²¹ from which the one is born and the other proceeds.

If then there are any other things called good in the scriptures, such as an angel, or a man, or a slave, or a treasure, or a good heart, or a good tree,²² all these are so called by an inexact use of the word, since the goodness contained in them is accidental and not essential. And it would be a long business, demanding another time and another work, to collect all the titles of the Son of God, such for example as the true light, or the door, or righteousness, or sanctification, or redemption, and countless others,²³ and to explain for what reasons either in regard to his powers or his moral qualities each of these names is given to him. Let us rest content with those we have already discussed, and go on to inquire into the remaining parts of our subject in their proper order.

Chapter III

THE HOLY SPIRIT

1. We come, therefore, to the investigation, in as brief a manner as possible, of the subject of the Holy Spirit. Now all who in any way believe in the existence of Providence admit that God, who created and set in order the entire creation, is un-begotten,¹ and they recognize him to be the parent of the universe. And we are not alone in declaring that he has a Son. For although this may seem marvelous and incredible to those who are considered to be philosophers, whether of Greek or barbarian race, yet there are some even of them who appear to have held a belief in his existence, for they admit that all things were created by the word or reason of God.² We, however, in conformity with our faith in that doctrine which we hold for certain to be divinely inspired, believe that there is no possible way of explaining and bringing to man's knowledge the higher and diviner teaching about the Son of God, except by means of those scriptures which were inspired by the Holy Spirit, namely, the gospels and the writings of the apostles, to which we add, according to the declaration of Christ himself (cf. Lk 24:25-27; Jn 5:39, 46), the law and the prophets. But no one except those who are familiar with the law and the prophets, or those who profess their belief in Christ, could have even a suspicion of the personal existence of the Holy Spirit. For although no one is able to speak worthily of God the Father, still it is possible to gain some notion of him from our experience of the visible creation and from the instinctive thoughts of the human mind; and, moreover, it is possible for such knowledge to be confirmed from the holy scriptures. And in regard to the Son of God, although "no one knoweth the Son save the Father" (Mt 11:27) yet again from the divine scriptures the mind of man is directed how to think of him too; and this not only from the New, but also from the Old Testament, through those deeds done by holy men which allude figuratively to Christ, and from which we can learn both his divine nature and the human nature which he assumed.

2. Of the existence of the Holy Spirit, however, we are taught in many passages of scripture. For instance, David says in the fiftieth psalm, "And take not thy Holy Spirit from me" (Ps 51:13 [LXX 50:13]); and in Daniel it is said, "The Holy Spirit, who is in thee" (Dn 4:6 [Theodotian]; See 4:9 of English version). But in the New Testament we have proofs in abundance, as when the Holy Spirit is related to have descended upon Christ (cf. Mt 3:16 and par.), and when the Lord breathed on his apostles after the resurrection and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit" (Jn 20:22); and the angel says to Mary, "The Holy Spirit shall come upon thee" (Lk 1:35) and Paul teaches us that "no one can say that Jesus is the Lord except in the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 12:3) and in the Acts of the Apostles "through the laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Spirit was given" (Acts 8:18) in baptism. From all of which we learn that the person of the Holy Spirit is of so great authority and dignity that saving baptism is not complete except when performed with the authority of the whole most excellent Trinity, that is, by the naming of Father, Son and Holy Spirit (cf. Mt 28:19); and that the name of the Holy Spirit must be joined to that of the unbegotten God the Father and his only-begotten Son. Who, then, is not amazed at the tremendous majesty of the Holy Spirit, when he hears that "he who shall speak a word against the Son of man" may hope for forgiveness, but "he who shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost has no forgiveness, either in this present world or in the world to come" (Mt 12:32)?

3. It is proved by many declarations throughout the whole of scripture that the universe was created by God and that there is no substance which has not received its existence from him; which refutes and dismisses the doctrines falsely taught by some, that there is a matter which is co-eternal with God,³ or that there are unbegotten souls, in whom they would have it that God implanted not so much the principle of existence as the quality and rank of their life.⁴ Moreover in that little book composed by Hermas, called "The Shepherd, or the Angel of Repentance,"⁵ it is thus written: "First of all, believe that God is one, who created and set in order all things; who, when nothing existed before, caused all things to be; who contains all things, but himself is contained by none."⁶ Similar statements are also made in the book of Enoch.⁷ But up to the present we have been able to find no passage in the holy scriptures which would warrant us in saying that the Holy Spirit was a being made or created, not even in that manner in which we have shown above that Solomon speaks of wisdom, nor in the manner in which the expressions we have dealt with, such as life, or word, or other titles of the Son of God, are to be understood. The "Spirit of God," therefore,⁸ who "moved upon the waters," as it is written, in the beginning of the creation of the world (cf. Gn 1:2, 1), I reckon to be none other than the Holy Spirit, so far as I can understand; which indeed I have demonstrated in my exposition of these passages,⁹ not, however, according to their literal but according to their spiritual meaning.

4. Now some of our predecessors have observed that in the New Testament, whenever the Spirit is mentioned without its qualifying adjective, the expression should be understood to refer to the Holy Spirit; as for instance, "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace" (Gal 5:22) and the rest. And here again: "seeing ye began in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh?" (Gal 3:3). We, however, think that this peculiar use may be observed in the Old Testament also, as when it says, "he that giveth spirit to the people who are upon the earth, and spirit to them that walk thereon" (Is 42:5). For undoubtedly everyone who walks upon the earth, that is to say, every earthly and corporeal being, is a partaker of the Holy Spirit, which he receives from God. And my Hebrew master used to say that the two seraphim, which are described in Isaiah (Is 6:2f.) as having six wings each and as crying one to another and saying, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, were to be understood to mean the only-begotten Son of God and the Holy Spirit. And we ourselves think that the expression in the song of Habakkuk, "In the midst of the two animals" (or the two living creatures) "thou shalt be known" (Hb 3:2 [LXX]) should be understood to refer to Christ and the Holy Spirit.

For all knowledge of the Father, when the Son reveals him, is made known to us through the Holy Spirit. So that both of these, who in the words of the prophet are called "animals" or "living beings," are the cause of our knowledge of God the Father. For as it is said of the Son that "no one knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son willeth to reveal him" (Mt 11:27), so in the same way does the apostle speak of the Holy Spirit; "God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, even the deep things of God" (1 Cor 2:10). Again, when in the gospel the Savior is referring to the divine and deeper doctrines which his disciples could not yet receive, he speaks to the apostles as follows: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot receive them now; howbeit when the comforter is come, even the Holy Spirit, who proceedeth from the Father, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I have said unto you" (Jn 16:12f., 14:26). So then we must understand that as the Son, who alone knows the Father, reveals him to whom he will, in the same way also the Holy Spirit, who alone "searcheth even the deep things of God" (1 Cor 2:10), reveals God to whom he will. For "the Spirit breathes where he willeth" (Jn 3:8).¹⁰

We must not suppose, however, that the Spirit knows God as we do, through the revelation of the Son. For if the Holy Spirit knows the Father by this means, he passes from ignorance to knowledge; and it is certainly as impious as it is foolish to confess that he is the Holy Spirit and then to ascribe ignorance to him. For even if we grant that something else existed before the Holy Spirit, yet it was not by a process of development that he came to be the Holy Spirit; as if one should dare to say that at the time when he was not yet the Holy Spirit he did not know the Father, but that after he had gained this knowledge he became the Holy Spirit. That could not be, for the Holy Spirit would never have been included in the unity of the Trinity, that is, along with God the unchangeable Father and with his Son, unless he had always been the Holy Spirit.¹¹ Of course, these terms that we use, such as "always" or "has been," or any similar ones that bear a temporal significance, must be interpreted with reservations and not pressed; for they relate to time, but the matters of which we are now speaking, though described in temporal language for the purposes of discussion, in their essential nature transcend all idea of time.

5. Nevertheless it seems right to inquire into the reason why he who is "born again through God" (1 Pt 1:3) to

Trinity
activity
salvation has need of both Father and Son and Holy Spirit and will not obtain salvation art from the entire Trinity, and why it is impossible to become partaker of the Father or the Son without the Holy Spirit. In discussing these points it will undoubtedly be necessary to describe the activity which is peculiar to the Holy Spirit and that which is peculiar to the Father and Son.¹²

Holy Sp.
I am of opinion, then, that the activity of the Father and the Son is to be seen both in saints and in sinners, in rational men¹³ and in dumb animals, yes, and even in lifeless things and in absolutely everything that exists; but the activity of the Holy Spirit does not extend at all either to lifeless things, or to things that have life but yet are dumb, nor is it to be found in those who, though rational, still lie in wickedness (1 Jn 5:19) and are not wholly converted to better things. Only in those who are already turning to better things and walking in the ways of Jesus Christ, that is, who are engaged in good deeds and who abide in God (cf. 1 Cor 4:17; Eph 2:10; 1 Jn 4:13), is the work of the Holy Spirit, I think, to be found.

6. That the activity of the Father and the Son is to be found both in saints and in sinners is clear from the fact that all rational beings are partakers of the word of God, that is, of reason, and so have implanted within them some seeds, as it were, of wisdom and righteousness, which is Christ. And all things that exist derive their share of being from him who truly exists, who said through Moses, "I am that I am" (Ex 3:14); which participation in God the Father extends to all, both righteous and sinners, rational and irrational creatures and absolutely everything that exists. Certainly the apostle Paul shows that all have a share in Christ, when he says, "Say not in thy heart, who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down; or who shall descend into the abyss? that is, to bring Christ back again from the dead. But what saith the scripture? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart" (Rom 10:6-8). By this he indicates that Christ is "in the heart" of all men, in virtue of his being the word or reason, by sharing in which men are rational.

Moreover that passage in the Gospel which says, "If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin, but now they have no excuse for their sin" (Jn 15:22), clearly refers to those who have come to the age of reason, up to which time a man does not "have sin," but from whence onward he becomes responsible for sin; and it reveals how men are said to "have sin" when they share in the word or reason, that is to say, from the time when they become capable of knowledge and understanding, as soon as the reason implanted within them has taught them the distinction between good and evil; and when once they have begun to know what is evil then, if they do it, they render themselves responsible for sin. This is the meaning of the saying that men "have no excuse for their sin" from the time that the divine word or reason has begun to reveal within their heart the distinction between good and evil, to warn them that they must avoid and beware of evil; and it is also the meaning of that other saying, "To him that knoweth good and doeth it not, to him it is sin" (Jas 4:17).

Again, the gospel teaches that no men are without communion with God, when the Savior speaks as follows, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall they say, Lo here! or, there! but the kingdom of God is within you" (Lk 17:20, 21). Further, we must see whether perhaps the same meaning does riot attach to what is written in Genesis, "And he breathed into his face the breath of life, and man became a living soul" (Gn 2:7). If this breath of life is understood to have been given to men in general, then all men have a share in God. But if we are to understand the expression as referring to the Spirit of God, in view of the fact that Adam is found to have uttered certain prophecies,¹⁴ then the breath of life may be regarded as given not universally but only to the saints.

7. Finally, at the time of the flood, when "all flesh had corrupted God's way" (Gn 6:12) it is written that God said, as if speaking of unworthy men and sinners, "My spirit shall not remain in those men forever, because they are flesh" (Gn 6:3). Here it is clearly shown that God's spirit is taken away from all the unworthy. It is also written in the Psalms; "Thou wilt take away their spirit and they will die, and return to their earth; thou wilt send forth thy spirit and they shall be created, and thou wilt renew the face of the earth" (Ps 104: 29, 30 [Eng. 104]). which passage clearly points to the Holy Spirit who, after sinners and the unworthy have been taken away and destroyed, creates for himself a new people and "renews the face of the earth," when through the grace of the Spirit men "put off the old man with his doings" (Col 3:9) and begin "to walk in newness of life" (Rom 6:4). And this is why the passage fitly applies to the Holy Spirit, because he will dwell not in all men, nor in those who are flesh, but in those whose "earth has been renewed." Finally, it was for this reason that the Holy Spirit was bestowed through the laying on of the apostles' hands after the grace and renewal of baptism (cf. Acts 8:18; Ti 3:5). Moreover our Savior after the resurrection, when "old things had now passed away and all things had become new" (2 Cor 5:17), being himself "the new man" (Eph 2:15) and the "firstborn from the dead" (Col 1:18), says to the apostles, who were also renewed by faith in his resurrection, "Receive the Holy Spirit" (Jn 20:22). This is doubtless what our Savior Lord himself was pointing out in the gospel, when he said that "new wine could not be put into old wineskins" (Mt 9:17 and par.) and commanded that new wineskins be made, that is, that men should walk "in newness of life" (Rom 6:4) in order to receive the new wine, the newness of the Holy Spirit's grace.

Thus, therefore, the working of the power of God the Father and God the Son is spread indiscriminately over all created beings, but a share in the Holy Spirit is possessed, we find, by the saints alone. Accordingly it is said, "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord except in the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 12:3). Even the apostles themselves are scarcely at the last counted worthy of hearing the words, "Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upon you" (Acts 1:8). It follows logically from this, I think, that "he who has sinned against the Son of Man is worthy of forgiveness" (cf. Mt 12:32), because he who is a sharer in the word or reason seems, if he ceases to live according to reason, to have fallen into ignorance or folly and so to deserve forgiveness; whereas he who has once been counted worthy to share in the Holy Spirit and then turns back again is by this very act and deed said to have blasphemed against the Holy Spirit (cf. Mt 12:31, 32; Mk 3:29).

Let no one indeed imagine from what we have said about the Holy Spirit being bestowed on the saints alone, while the blessings and activities of the Father and the Son extend to both good and evil, just and unjust (cf. Mt 5:45), that we are hereby exalting the Holy Spirit above the Father and the Son or claiming that his dignity is greater than theirs; for this by no means follows. What we have been describing is the peculiar grace and work of the Holy Spirit. But more, nothing in the Trinity can be called greater or less,¹⁵ for there is but one fount of deity, who upholds the universe by his word and reason, and sanctifies "by the spirit of his mouth" all that is worthy of sanctification, as it is written in the Psalm, "By the word of the Lord were the heavens established, and all their power by the spirit of his mouth" (Ps 33:6).

There is, however, a special activity of God the Father, beyond that which he exercised on all things in giving them natural life. There is also a special ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ towards those on whom he confers the natural gift of reason, by means of which well-being is bestowed upon them in addition to mere existence. There is yet another grace of the Holy Spirit bestowed upon such as are worthy, a grace ministered indeed through Christ, but put into operation by the Father in proportion to the merits of those who become capable of receiving it. This is most clearly pointed out by the apostle Paul, when he is explaining that the power of the Trinity is one and the same, in the passage where he says, "There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit; and there are diversities of ministrations, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of workings, but the same God, who worketh all things in all. But to each one is given the manifestation of the spirit as is profitable" (1 Cor 12:4-7). Here we are most clearly shown that there is no separation in the Trinity,¹⁶ but that this which is called the "gift of the spirit" is ministered through the Son and worked by God the Father. And yet "all these worketh that one and the selfsame spirit, dividing to each man as he will" (1 Cor 12:11).

8. This then, is the testimony we bear to the unity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Let us now return to the original plan of our discussion. God the Father bestows on all the gift of existence; and a participation in Christ, in virtue of his being the word or reason, makes them rational. From this it follows that they are worthy of praise or blame, because they are capable alike of virtue and of wickedness. Accordingly there is also available the grace of the Holy Spirit, that those beings who are not holy in essence may be made holy by participating in this grace. When therefore they obtain first of all their existence from God the Father, and secondly their rational nature from the Word, and thirdly their holiness from the Holy Spirit, they become capable of receiving Christ afresh in his character of the righteousness of God (cf. 1 Cor 1:30), those, that is, who have been previously sanctified through the Holy Spirit; and such as have been deemed worthy of advancing to this degree through the sanctification of the Holy Spirit obtain in addition the gift of wisdom by the power of the working of God's Spirit. This is what I think Paul means when he says that "to some is given the word of wisdom, to others the word of knowledge, by them same spirit" (1 Cor 12:8). And while pointing out the distinction of each separate gift he refers them all to the fount of the universe when he says, "There are diversities of workings, but one God, who worketh all things in all" (1 Cor 12:6).

Thus the working of the Father, which endows all with existence, is found to be more glorious and splendid, when each one, through participation in Christ in his character of wisdom and knowledge and sanctification, advances and comes to higher degrees of perfection; and when a man, by being sanctified through participation in the Holy Spirit, is made purer and holier, he becomes more worthy to receive the grace of wisdom and knowledge, in order that all stains of pollution and ignorance may be purged and removed and that he may make so great an advance in holiness and purity that the life which he received from God shall be such as is worthy of God, who gave it to be pure and perfect, and that that which exists shall be as worthy as he who caused it to exist. Thus, too, the man who is such as God who made him wished him to be, shall receive from God the power to exist forever and to endure for eternity. That this may come to pass, and that those who were made by God may be unceasingly and inseparably present with him who really exists, it is the work of wisdom to instruct and train them, and lead them on to modest perfection, by the strengthening and unceasing sanctification of the Holy Spirit, through which alone they can receive God.

In this way, then, through the ceaseless work on our behalf of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, renewed at every stage of our progress, we may perchance just succeed at last in beholding the holy and blessed life; and when after many struggles we have been able to attain to it we ought so to continue that no satiety of that blessing may ever possess us; but the more we partake of its blessedness, the more may the loving desire for it deepen and increase within us, as ever our hearts grow in fervor and eagerness to receive and hold fast the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. But if at any time satiety should possess the heart of one of those who have come to occupy the perfect and highest stage, I do not think that such a one will be removed and fall from his place all of a sudden. Rather must he decline by slow degrees, so that it may sometimes happen, when a slight fall has occurred, that the man quickly recovers and returns to himself. A fall does not therefore involve utter ruin, but a man may retrace his steps and return to his former state and once more set his mind on that which through negligence had slipped from his grasp.

Chapter IV

LOSS, OR FALLING AWAY

1. To show what is this loss, or fall, of those who live negligently, it seems not unreasonable to make use of an illustration. Suppose a man has gradually become skilled in the science or art, let us say, of geometry or medicine, up to the point of reaching perfection, having trained himself for a long time by instructions and exercises so as to acquire completely the knowledge of the aforesaid art. It could surely never happen that such a man should lie down to sleep with all this skill and wake up without it. It is not to the point to bring forward or take account here of accidents which happen through some injury or weakness, for these do not apply in the case we have proposed as an illustration. According to that, so long as the geometrician or doctor in question occupies himself in the studies and rational instructions relating to his art, a knowledge of the subject will remain with him. If, however, he loses interest in these exercises and neglects to work, then through this negligence his knowledge is gradually lost, a few details at first, then more, and so on until after a long time the whole vanishes into oblivion and is utterly erased from his memory. Yet if, in the first stages of his fall, when the negligence which threatens to ruin him has not gone far, he is aroused and without delay returns to himself, it is certainly possible to recover that which had but recently been lost and to renew the knowledge which by that time had been only slightly erased from his mind. Let us now apply this to those who have devoted themselves to the knowledge and wisdom of God, to learn and labor about whom surpasses all other studies in ways beyond comparison; and let us consider, in the light of our illustration, what is involved in the acquisition of this knowledge and what in its loss, especially bearing in mind what the apostle says of those who are perfect, that they shall behold the glory of the Lord "face to face" "by revelations of mysteries", . . .¹ (All² rational creatures who are incorporeal and invisible, if they become negligent, gradually sink to a lower level and take to themselves bodies suitable to the regions into which they descend; that is to say, first, ethereal bodies, and then aerial. And when they reach the neighborhood of the earth they are enclosed in grosser bodies, and last of all are tied to human flesh.³ "It is⁴ a mark of extreme negligence and sloth for any soul to descend and to lose its own nature so completely as to be bound, in consequence of its vices, to the gross body of one of the irrational animals.")

2. But⁵ in our desire to explain the divine blessings which are bestowed upon us by the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, that Trinity which is the fount of all holiness, we have somewhat digressed from our subject in these last remarks; for when the question of the soul had arisen, we felt we ought to deal with it here, seeing that we were discussing the cognate topic of our rational nature. But the subject of rational nature as a whole, with its divisions into three genera and species, will be more conveniently considered in its proper place.⁶ And with God's permission, through Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit, we shall so consider it.

3. This blessed⁷ and ruling power, therefore, that is, the power that exercises control of all things, we call the Trinity.

This is the good God and kindly Father of all, at once beneficent power and creative power, that is, the power that does good and creates and providentially sustains. And it is absurd and impious to suppose that these powers of God have been at any time in abeyance for a single moment. Indeed, it is unlawful even to entertain the least suspicion that these powers, through which chiefly we gain a worthy notion of God, should at any time have ceased from performing works worthy of themselves and have become inactive. For we can neither suppose that these powers which are in God, nay, which are God, could have been thwarted from without, nor on the other hand, when nothing stood in their way, can we believe that they were reluctant to act and perform works worthy of themselves or that they feigned impotence. We can therefore imagine no moment whatever when that power was not engaged in acts of well-doing. Whence it follows that there always existed objects for this well-doing, namely, God's works or creatures, and that God, in the power of his providence, was always dispensing his blessings among them by doing them good in accordance with their condition and deserts. It follows plainly from this, that at no time whatever was God not Creator, nor Benefactor, nor Providence.

4. Yet in this matter human intelligence is feeble and limited, when it tries to understand how during the whole of God's existence his creatures have existed also, and how those things, which we must undoubtedly believe to have been created and made by God have subsisted, if we may say so, without a beginning. Since then there is this conflict in our human thoughts and reasonings, and the soundest arguments on either side oppose and rebut one another, each bending the mind of the thinker into its own direction, this truth, which can be confessed without any risk to piety, presents itself as appropriate to the small and narrow capacity of our wisdom

mind, namely, that God the Father always existed, and that he always had an only-begotten Son, who at the same time, according to the explanation we have given above, is called Wisdom. This is that Wisdom in whom God delighted when the world was finished (cf. Prv 8:30),⁸ in order that we might understand from this that God ever rejoices. In this Wisdom, therefore, who ever existed with the Father, the Creation was always present in form and outline, and there was never a time when the pre-figuration of those things which hereafter were to be did not exist in Wisdom.

5. It is probably in this way that, so far as our weakness allows, we shall maintain a reverent belief about God, neither asserting that his creatures were unbegotten and coeternal with him nor on the other hand that he turned to the work of creation to do good when he had done nothing good before. For the saying that is written, "In wisdom hast thou made all things" (Ps 104:24 [LXX 103:24]), is a true one. And certainly if "all things have been made in wisdom," then since wisdom has always existed, there have always existed in wisdom, by a pre-figuration and pre-formation, those things which afterwards have received substantial existence. This is, I believe, the thought and meaning of Solomon when he says in Ecclesiastes: "What is it that hath been made? The same that is to be. And what is it that hath been created? The same that is destined to be created. And there is nothing fresh under the sun. If one should speak of anything and say, Behold, this is new: it already hath been, in the ages that were before us" (Eccl 1:9, 10). If then particular things which are "under the sun" have already existed in the ages which were before us—since "there is nothing fresh under the sun"—then undoubtedly all genera and species have forever existed, and possibly even individual things; but either way, the fact is made clear that God did not begin at a certain time to be Creator, when he had not been such before.

RATIONAL NATURES

1. After this brief discussion which we have conducted to the best of our ability on the subject of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, our next task is to say a few words about rational natures, their species, orders and functions. We shall include not only the holy and the wicked powers, but also those who occupy a middle position between the good and the bad and are still involved in struggle and conflict. We find in the holy scriptures very many names of certain orders and functions both of the holy powers and of the opposite kind. First we shall mention these names themselves, and then we shall attempt, so far as we are able, to investigate their meaning.

77

There are certain holy angels of God whom Paul calls "ministering spirits, appointed to minister on behalf of those who shall receive the inheritance of salvation" (Heb 1:14). Also, in the writings of the same St. Paul we find him giving the names, from what source I know not, of certain "thrones, dominions, principalities and powers" (Col 1:16); and after enumerating these, as if he thought there were yet other rational functions and orders beyond those already mentioned, he says of the Savior, "Who is above every principality and authority and power and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but also in the world to come"

(Eph 1:21). Here he plainly shows that besides those beings he has mentioned there are certain others, which may be named indeed in this world, but yet have not on the present occasion been enumerated by him, and which perhaps were not known to any other person; and there are others still, which cannot be named in this world, but will be named in the world to come.

2. Then in the next place we must know that every being which is endowed with reason and yet fails to adhere to the ends and ordinances laid down by reason, is undoubtedly involved in sin by this departure from what is just and right. Every rational creature is therefore susceptible of praise and of blame, of praise, if in accordance with the reason which he has in him he advances to better things; of blame, if he departs from the rule and course of what is right, in which case he is also rightly subject to pains and penalties. We must believe this to be true even of the devil himself and of those who are with him and are called his angels. But the titles of these beings must now be explained, in order that we may know who they are with whom our discussion has to deal.

The name Devil, and Satan, and Wicked one, is mentioned in many places of scripture, and he who bears it is also described as being the enemy of God. Certain "angels of the devil" (Mt 25:41; Rv 12:7) are also named, and in addition a "prince of this world" (Jn 12:31, 14:30, 16:11); but whether this latter is the devil himself or some other has not yet been clearly proclaimed. There are also certain "princes of this world" mentioned, who have a wisdom which is to be destroyed (cf. 1 Cor 2:6); but whether these princes are the same as those principalities "against whom our wrestling is" (cf. Eph 6:12), or whether they are different, no one, it seems to me, can easily decide. After the principalities there is also a mention of certain powers, against whom we wrestle and maintain a struggle, as we do also against the "princes of this world" and the "rulers of this darkness"; and certain "spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (cf. Eph 6:12) are also mentioned by Paul. And what are we to say of the "evil spirits" and "impure daemons" (cf. Lk 7:21, 4:33) who are mentioned in the gospels? Then again, there are some who are included under the common title of "heavenly beings," but who are said to bend the knee, or to be destined to bend the knee, at the name of Jesus; and others again who are "earthly" or from "under the earth" (Phil 2:10), all of whom Paul enumerates in order.

And in a place where we have been discussing the subject or rational natures it would certainly not be right to keep silence about ourselves, the race of men, who as you know are called "rational animals." Nor must we pass over this point, as if it were unimportant, that even in regard to us men there are references to certain different classes, as when it is said that "the Lord's portion is his people Jacob, Israel is the cord of his inheritance" (Dt 32:9), whereas other nations are said to be the portion of the angels, as, "when the Most High divided the nations and dispersed the sons of Adam, he fixed the bounds of the nations according to, the number of the angels of God" (Dt 32:8). Therefore, along with all the other rational natures, the constitution of the human soul must also be examined.

3. Such, then, are the many important names of orders and functions that are given us, and behind them it is certain that there are real existences. We must now inquire whether God, the Founder and Creator of all things, made some of these beings so holy and blessed that they could admit nothing at all that was contrary to this nature, and others in such a way that they could become capable both of virtue and of wickedness; or whether we are to suppose that he made some to be altogether incapable of virtue, and others who can admit no wickedness whatever but can only remain in a state of blessedness, and others still who can admit either of these conditions. To begin our inquiry from the names themselves, let us consider whether the "holy angels," from the time they first existed, always were holy, and are holy, and will be holy, and neither have ever admitted nor could ever admit an occasion of sin.

Then in the next place, let us also consider whether those who are called holy "principalities" began from the first moment of their creation by God to exercise their "principality" over others who had been made subject to them, and whether the latter were created in this condition and made for the very purpose of being subject and subordinate. Similarly, in regard to those who are called "powers," let us consider whether they were created in this condition and for this very purpose, that they might exercise power, or whether it is some prize or reward of virtue that they have come to this power and dignity. Moreover, in regard to those who are called "thrones" or "seats," let us consider whether they were counted worthy of their seat and secure possession of blessedness from the time their personality first emerged, so that they enjoy it solely by the will of the Creator, and whether those who are called "dominions" have had this dominion not conferred upon them as a reward for their progress but freely bestowed as a privilege of their creation, so that it is in some way a part of their nature and inseparable from them.

Now if we accept the view that the holy angels and holy powers and blessed seats and glorious virtues and splendid dominions possess their powers and dignities and glories as part of their essence, it will seem to follow undoubtedly that those beings which have been mentioned in connection with the opposite functions must be regarded in the same way. Thus those principalities against whom our wrestling is must be held not to have departed from good of their own free will and after that to have adopted the determination to resist and oppose everything good, but to have possessed this determination as part of their essence from the beginning. Similarly in regard to the powers and virtues, the evil that is in them will not be later than or subsequent to their first existence. Those, too, whom scripture has termed "rulers and princes of the darkness of the world," inherit this realm of darkness which they rule over and possess, not as a result of perversity of will but from the necessity of their creation. Similar reasoning will force us to the same conclusion in regard to the "spiritual hosts of wickedness" and the "evil spirits" and "impure daemons."

But if this is an absurd belief to hold of the bad and opposing powers—and it certainly is absurd that the cause of their wickedness should be separated from the determination of their own will and ascribed, as something unavoidable, to their Creator—how can we fail to come to a similar conclusion in regard to the good and holy powers, namely, that goodness is not in them as part of their essence. Essential goodness is found, as we have plainly shown,¹ solely in Christ and the Holy Spirit, and of course in the Father also. For the nature of the Trinity has been shown to contain nothing that is compound, which might appear to allow these good qualities to belong to it as accidental consequences. We conclude, then, that the position of every created being is the result of his own work and his own motives, and that the powers above mentioned, which appear as holding sway or exercising authority or dominion over others, have gained this superiority and eminence over those whom they are said to govern or on whom they exercise their authority, not by some privilege of creation but as the reward of merit.²

4. Yet in questions of such importance and difficulty we do not wish to base our assertions merely on a correct train of reasoning and to compel the assent of our hearers by conjectural

Scriptures inferences alone. Let us see, therefore, whether we can obtain any statements from the holy scriptures, by the authority of which these conclusions may be more credibly upheld. First we shall bring forward what holy scripture contains on the subject of the evil powers; and after that, with the help of such light as the Lord shall be pleased to bestow upon us, we shall make inquiry about the rest of the powers, our object being, in matters of so great difficulty, to get as near to the truth as possible and to shape our belief according to the rule of piety.

our belief Now we find in the prophet Ezekiel two prophecies addressed to the prince of Tyre, the first of which might appear, before one had heard the second, to be spoken of some man who was prince of the Tyrians. For the present, therefore, we shall take nothing from the first one. But since the second is most evidently of such a kind that it cannot possibly refer to a man, but must be understood of some higher power, which had fallen from higher places and been cast down to lower and worse ones, we shall adduce that as an illustration which most clearly proves that these opposing and wicked powers were not so formed and created by nature, but came from better conditions and changed for the worse; and that the blessed powers also are not of such a nature as to be unable to admit qualities the opposite of their own, supposing one of them should desire to do so and should become negligent and fail to guard with the utmost caution the blessedness of his condition. For when he who is called the "prince of Tyre" (cf. Ez 28:2-19) is related to have been "among the holy ones" and "without stain" and set "in the paradise of God," "adorned with a crown of honor and beauty," how, I ask, can we suppose such a being to have been inferior to any of the holy ones? He is described as having been "a crown of 'honor and beauty'" and as having walked "in the paradise of God" "without stain." How then can anyone possibly suppose that such a being was not one of those holy and blessed powers which, dwelling as they do in a state of blessedness, we must believe are endowed with no other honor than this?

But let us now see what the actual words of the prophecy teach us. "The word of the Lord," it says, "came unto me, saying, Son of man, take up a lamentation for the prince of Tyre, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God: Thou wert a signet of likeness and a crown of honor in the delights of the paradise of God. Thou wast adorned with every fine stone and gem, and wast clothed with sardius and topaz and emerald and carbuncle and sapphire and jasper, set in gold and silver, and with agate and amethyst and chrysolite and beryl and onyx; with gold also didst thou fill thy treasures and thy store-houses in thy midst. From the day thou wast created with the cherubim, I placed thee in the holy mount of God. Thou wast in the midst of the fiery stones, thou wast stainless in thy days, from the day thou wast created until the time that iniquities were found in thee; from the multitude of thy commerce thou didst fill thy storehouses with iniquity, and thou didst sin and wast cast wounded out of the mount of God. A cherub drove thee forth from the midst of the fiery stones. Thy heart was lifted up at thine honor; thy knowledge was corrupted with thy beauty; for the multitude of thy sins I have cast thee down to the earth in the presence of kings. I have given thee for a show and a laughingstock because of the multitude of thy sins and thine iniquities. By thy commerce thou hast polluted thy holy places. And I will bring forth fire from the midst of thee and it shall devour thee, and I will give thee for ashes and cinders on the earth in the sight of all that see thee; and all who knew thee among the nations shall mourn over thee. Thou hast been made a destruction, and thou shalt exist no more forever." (Ez 28:2-19).

Who is there that, hearing such sayings as this, "Thou wast a signet of likeness and a crown of honor in the delights of the paradise of God," or this, "from the time thou wast created with the cherubim, I placed thee in the holy mount of God," could possibly weaken their meaning to such an extent as to suppose them spoken of a human being, even of a saint, not to mention the prince of Tyre? Or what "fiery stones" can he think of, "in the midst" of which any man could have lived? Or who could be regarded as "stainless" from the very "day he was created," and yet at some later time could have acts of unrighteousness found in him and be said to be "cast forth into the earth"? This certainly indicates that the prophecy is spoken of one who, not being in the earth, was "cast forth into the earth," whose "holy places" also are said to be "polluted."

These statements, therefore, from the prophet Ezekiel concerning the prince of Tyre, must relate, as we have shown, to an adverse power, and they prove in the clearest manner that this power was formerly holy and blessed, and that he fell from this state of blessedness and was cast down into the earth "from the time that iniquity was found in him," and that his fallen condition was not due to his nature or creation. We consider, therefore, that these statements refer to some angel, to whom had been allotted the duty of supervising the Tyrian people, whose souls also were apparently committed to his care. But what Tyre, or what souls of Tyrians we ought to understand—whether it be the city which is situated in the territory of the province of Phoenicia, or some other city of which the one we know on earth is a figure, and whether the souls are those of the actual Tyrians, or of the inhabitants of that Tyre which we understand spiritually,—there seems no need to inquire in this place. For we should appear to be investigating, in a casual manner, matters whose importance and obscurity certainly demand a work and treatment of their own.

5. Again, we are taught by the prophet Isaiah the following facts about another opposing power. He says: "How has Lucifer, who arose in the morning, fallen from heaven. He who assailed all the nations is broken and dashed to the earth. Thou saidst indeed in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven; above the stars of heaven I will place my throne; I will sit upon a lofty mountain above the lofty mountains which are toward the north; I will ascend above the clouds; I will be like the Most High. But now shalt thou be cast down to the lower world, and to the foundations of the earth. All who see thee shall be amazed over thee and say: This is the man that afflicted the whole earth, that moved kings, that made the whole round world a desert, that destroyed cities and did not loose those who were in chains. All the kings of the nations sleep in honor, each one in his own house; but thou shalt be cast forth upon the mountains, as an accursed dead man, with the many dead that have been pierced through with swords and have descended to the lower world. As a garment clotted and stained with blood will not be clean, so too shalt thou not be clean, because thou hast ruined my land and killed my people. Thou shalt not abide henceforth forever, thou most wicked seed. Make ready thy sons for slaughter for the sins of their father, that they rise not up and possess the earth by inheritance and fill it with wars. And I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Sabaoth, and I will cause their name to perish and their remnant and their seed." (Is 14:12-22).

It is most clearly proved by these words that he who formerly was Lucifer and who "arose in the morning" has fallen from heaven. For if, as some suppose, he was a being of darkness, why is he said to have formerly been Lucifer or light-bearer? Or how could he "rise in the morning," who had in him no light at all? Moreover the Savior teaches us about the devil as follows: "Lo, I see Satan fallen as lightning from heaven" (Lk 10:18). So he was light once. Further, our Lord, who is the truth, compared even the power of his own glorious advent to lightning, in the words: "For as the lightning shineth from one end of heaven even to the other, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be" (Mt 24:27). Yet he also compares Satan to lightning, and says that he fell from heaven, in order to show thereby that he was in heaven once, and had a place among the holy ones, and a share in that light in which all the holy ones share, in virtue of which the angels become "angels of light" (2 Cor 11:14) and the apostles are called "the light of the world" (Mt 5:14) by the Lord.

In this way, then, even Satan was once light, before he went astray and fell to this place, when "his glory was turned into dust" (Is 14:11, 12) which is the peculiar mark of the wicked, as the prophet also says. And so he is called the "prince of this world" (Jn 12:31, 16:11), for he exercises his princely power over those who are obedient to his wickedness, since "this whole world" (and here I take "world" to mean this earthly place) "lieth in the evil one" (Jn 5:19), that is, in this apostate. That he is an apostate, or fugitive,² the Lord also says in Job, in the following words, "Thou wilt take with a hook the apostate dragon" (Jb 40:20), that is, the fugitive dragon. And it is certain that the dragon means the devil himself.

The opposing powers, then, are called by the name of "fugitives" and are said to have been at one time "stainless." But to be stainless is a quality which belongs essentially to none except the Father, Son and Holy Spirit; for holiness is in every created being an accidental quality, and what is accidental may also be lost. These opposing powers, however, were once stainless and dwelt indeed among those that have continued stainless until now. All this shows that no one is stainless by essence or by nature, nor is any one polluted essentially. Consequently it lies with us and with our own actions whether we are to be blessed and holy, or whether through sloth and negligence we are to turn away from blessedness into wickedness and loss; the final result of which is, that when too much progress, if I may use the word, has been made in wickedness, a man may descend to such a state (if any shall come to so great a pitch of negligence) as to be changed into what is called an opposing power.³

Chapter VI

THE END OR CONSUMMATION

1. An end or consummation is clearly an indication that things are perfected and consummated. This fact is a timely reminder to us, that if a man is seized with a desire to read and learn about these matters that are so hard and difficult to understand, he must bring with him a perfect and instructed mind. Otherwise, if he has had no experience in inquiries of this kind, they may perhaps appear to him to be vain and superfluous; or else, if he has a mind full of prejudice and preoccupations in other directions, he may think these inquiries are heretical and contrary to the faith of the Church, not so much because he is convinced by reason as because he decides according to his own prejudices. Now we ourselves speak on these subjects with great fear and caution, discussing and investigating rather than laying down fixed and certain conclusions. For we have previously pointed out what are the subjects on which clear doctrinal statements must be made, and such statements we made, I think, to the best of our ability, when speaking of the Trinity.¹ Now, however, we are dealing, as well as we can, with subjects that call for discussion rather than for definition.

The end of the world and the consummation will come when every soul shall be visited with the penalties due for its sins. This time, when everyone shall pay what he owes, is known to God alone. We believe, however, that the goodness of God through Christ will restore his entire creation to one end, even his enemies being conquered and subdued. For so says the holy scripture: "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet" (Ps 110:1 [LXX 109:1]). And if it is not very evident what the prophetic language here means, let us learn from Paul the Apostle, who says more openly, "Christ must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet" (1 Cor 15:25). But if even this clear declaration of the Apostle is not sufficient to inform us what is the meaning of "putting enemies under his feet," hear further what he says in the words that follow: "For all things must be made subject to him" (1 Cor 15:27, 28). What then is this "subjection," by which "all things must be made subject" to Christ? In my opinion it is the same subjection by which we too desire to be subjected to him, and by which the apostles and all the saints who have followed Christ were subject to him. For the word subjection, when used of our subjection to Christ, implies the salvation, proceeding from Christ, of those who are subject; as David also said, "Shall not my soul be subject to God? For of him cometh my salvation" (Ps 62:1 [LXX 61:1]).

2. Seeing, then, that such is the end, when "all enemies shall have been subjected to Christ," when "the last enemy shall be destroyed, that is, death," and when "the kingdom shall be destroyed, up to God and the Father by Christ, to whom all things have been subjected" (cf. 1 Cor 15:24-27), let us, I say, from such an end as this, contemplate the beginning of things. For the end is always like the beginning; as therefore there is one end of all things, so we must understand that there is one beginning of all things, and there is one end of many things, so from one beginning arise many differences and varieties, which in their turn are restored, through God's goodness, through their subjection to Christ and their unity with the Holy Spirit, to one end, which is like the beginning.² I refer to all those who, by "bending the knee in the name of Jesus" (Phil 2:10) have through this very fact displayed the sign of their subjection. These are they who dwell "in heaven and on earth and under the earth," (ibid.) the three terms indicating the entire universe, that is, all those beings who started from one beginning but were drawn in various directions by their own individual impulses and were distributed throughout the different ranks of existence in accordance with their merit; for in them goodness does not reside essentially, as it does in God and his Christ and in the Holy Spirit. For only in this Trinity, which is the source of all things, does goodness reside essentially. Others possess it as an accident, liable to be lost, and only then do they live in blessedness, when they participate in holiness and wisdom and in the divine nature itself.

But³ if they are careless and indifferent about this participation, then each becomes the cause of his own lapse or fall, one more quickly and another more slowly, one to a greater and another to a lesser extent, by the fault of his own personal slothfulness. Now, as we have said, the particular fall or lapse by which each one departs from its original state is capable of exhibiting the greatest diversity, corresponding to the movements of the mind and will, so that one recedes but slightly, another more seriously, to lower things. Here then we see the just judgment of God's providence, that diversity of conduct is taken into account and each is treated according to the deserts of his departure and defection from goodness. Certain of those, indeed, who have continued in that beginning which we have described as being like the end that is to come, have allotted to them in the ordering and arrangement of the world, the rank of angel, others that of powers, others that of principalities, others that of authorities (clearly in order to exercise authority over those who "need to have authority above their head" [cf. 1 Cor 11:10]); while others have the rank of thrones, the duty of judging and ruling those who need this, and others have lordship, doubtless over slaves. All these privileges the divine providence, by a fair and just judgment, has conferred upon them as a reward for their merit and for the progress they have made in imitating and participating in God.

Those, however,⁴ who have moved from their state of primal blessedness, yet not beyond the possibility of return, have been made subject to the rule and governance of those holy and blessed orders whom we have just described; and if they make use of the help of these and become reformed by their precepts and salutary discipline, they may return and be restored to their state of blessedness. It is probably from among these, so far as I am able to judge, that the order of our human race was constituted, in the hope of restoring it in the age to come, or in the ages beyond that, when there shall be the "new heaven and new earth" (Is 65:17), of which Isaiah speaks, to that unity which the Lord Jesus promises when he prays to God the Father for his disciples, "I pray not for these alone, but also for all who shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one; as I, Father, am in thee, and thou art in me, that so they may be one in us" (Jn 17:20, 21); and again when he says, "That they may be one, as we are one, I in them, and thou in me, that they also may be perfected in one" (Jn 17:22, 23). The Apostle Paul also confirms this when he says, "Till we all come to the unity of the faith, to a perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph 4:13); and the same apostle also exhorts us, who even now in the present life have been placed in the Church, in which we see an imitation of the future kingdom, to strive after the same pattern of unity, when he says, "That ye all say the same things, and that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be perfected in one and the same mind and in one and the same judgment" (1 Cor 1:10).

3. We must know, however, that some of those⁵ who fell from that beginning of which we have spoken above, have given themselves over so completely to a life of unworthiness and wickedness, that they are not only regarded as unworthy of this instruction and training whereby through the flesh the human race, aided by the heavenly powers, is being instructed and trained, but on the contrary become adversaries and opponents of those who are being so trained and disciplined. The result is that all our mortal life is full of struggles and conflicts, since we are resisted and thwarted by those who can see no way back to the better state from which they fell, those, namely, who are called "the devil and his angels,"⁶ and other orders of wicked beings whom the apostle enumerates among the opposing powers.

But⁷ whether among those orders that live under the chieftainship of the devil and conform to his wickedness there are some who will one day in the ages to come succeed in turning to goodness by reason of the power of free will which is in them, or whether it be true that long-continued and deep-rooted wickedness turns at last from a habit into a kind of nature, you, reader, must judge; whether, that is, this portion of the creation shall be utterly and entirely out of harmony even with that final unity and concord, both in the ages that are "seen" and "temporal" and in those that are "not seen" and eternal.⁸ But in the meantime, alike in these ages that are "seen" and "temporal" and in those that are "not seen" and "eternal" (cf. 2 Cor 4:18) all those beings are arranged in a definite order proportionate to the degree and excellence of their merits. And so it happens that some in the first, others in the second, and others even in the last times, through their endurance of greater and more severe punishments of long duration, extending, if I may say so, over many ages, are by these very stern methods of correction renewed and restored, first by the instruction of angels and afterwards by that of powers yet higher in rank, so that they advance through each grade to a higher one, until at length they reach the things that are "invisible" and "eternal," having traversed in turn, by some form of instruction, every single office of the heavenly powers. It appears to follow from this, in my opinion, that every rational nature can, in the process of passing from one order to another, travel through each order to all the rest, and from all to each, while undergoing the various movements of progress or the reverse in accordance with its own actions and endeavors and with the use of its power of free will.

4. Now Paul says that there are some things that are "seen" and "temporal," while besides these there are others that are "not seen" and "eternal." We ask therefore in what sense those that are "seen" are "temporal"? Does it mean that in all those periods and ages to come, in which the dispersion and division of the one beginning is to be restored to one and the same end and likeness, there will exist nothing whatever corresponding to this present world? Or is it rather that while the form of the things that are "seen" passes away, their substance is by no means destroyed? Now Paul seems to confirm the latter explanation when he says; "the form of this world shall pass away" (1 Cor 7:31). Moreover David seems to indicate the same truth when he says; "The heavens shall perish, but thou shalt remain; and they all shall grow old as a garment, and as a cloak thou shalt change them, as a garment they shall be changed" (Ps 102:26). For if the heavens shall be "changed," certainly that which is "changed" does not perish; and if "the form of this world passes away," it is not by any means an annihilation or destruction of the material substance that is indicated, but the occurrence of a certain change of quality and an alteration of the outward form.

Isaiah too, when he says in prophecy that "there shall be a new heaven and a new earth" (Is 65:17), undoubtedly suggests a similar thought. For the renewal of "heaven and earth" and the transmutation of the "form of this world" and the alteration of the "heavens" will undoubtedly be accomplished in readiness for those who are journeying along the way which we have indicated above,⁹ making for that end, namely, blessedness, to which we are told that even God's enemies themselves are to be subjected, the end in which God is said to be "all" and "in all" (cf. 1 Cor 15:24, 25, 28). And if anyone thinks that in this "end" material or bodily nature will utterly perish, he can provide no answer whatever to my difficulty, how beings so numerous and mighty can exist and live their life without bodies; since we believe that to exist without material substance and apart from any association with a bodily element is a thing that belongs only to the nature of God, that is, of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Perhaps somebody else will say that in the end every bodily substance will be so pure and refined that we must think of it as being like the ether, as it were of a heavenly purity and clearness.¹⁰ But exactly how it will be is known to God alone, and to those who through Christ and the Holy Spirit are the "friends" of God (Jn 15:15; Jas 2:23).

Chapter VII

THINGS CORPOREAL

1. In the preceding chapters, after the place in which we set forth to the best of our ability the doctrine of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, we have dealt with and discussed the subject of rational natures.¹ We have treated this subject in a general way, rather by logical inference than by precise dogmatic statement. Let us now see what are the matters which we ought to discuss in the following pages according to our doctrine, that is, according to the faith of the Church.

All souls and all rational natures, whether holy or wicked, were made or created. All these are incorporeal in respect of their proper nature, but though incorporeal they were nevertheless made. For all things were made by God through Christ, as John teaches in general terms in the Gospel when he says: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made" (Jn 1:1-3). Further, the apostle Paul enumerates created things by their kinds and numbers and ranks with the object of proving that all things were made through Christ. For he says: "All things were created in him, things in the heaven and things on earth, things visible and invisible, whether thrones, dominions, principalities or powers, all were created through him and in him, and he is before all creatures, and he is the head" (Col 1:16-18). Plainly, then, he declares that all things were made and created "in Christ" and "through Christ," whether they are "visible," that is, corporeal, of "invisible" which I take to be none other than the incorporeal and spiritual powers. Now it is these creatures, whom, he has spoken of in general terms as being either corporeal or incorporeal, that he enumerates, as it seems to me, under their various kinds in the words that follow, namely, "thrones, dominions, principalities, authorities and powers."

2. Let these remarks serve as an introduction to our present purpose, which is to come in due order to an inquiry about the sun, moon and stars by the method of inference. We ask whether these bodies ought to be reckoned among the "principalities" by reason of the fact that they are said to have been made to exercise rulership, that is principality, over day and night (cf. Gn 1:16); or whether we must suppose that they possess only that "rule over day and night" which is involved in their office of giving light and are not princes belonging to the order and office of the "principalities." Now when it is said that "all things were made through him" (Jn 1:3) and "in him were created all things, whether, things in the heaven or things on earth" (Col 1:16), we cannot doubt that those bodies which are "in the firmament" (this being another name for heaven), in which those luminaries are said to have been "set" (cf. Gn 1:17), are to be numbered among the heavenly things. Then again, since the course of our discussion has clearly revealed that all things were made or created, and that among the things that were made there is nothing which does not admit of good and evil and have a capacity for either, how shall we regard as reasonable the opinion held by some even of our own people about the sun, moon and stars, that these are unchangeable and incapable of becoming the opposite of what they are? Some too have entertained this belief about the holy angels, and there are heretics who even apply it to certain souls, which are called by them "spiritual natures."²

First, then, let us see what reason itself can discover about the sun, moon and stars, namely, whether it is correct to suppose, as some do, that they are exempt from the possibility of change;³ and so far as we can let us first employ statements from the holy scriptures. Now Job appears to show that not only is it possible for the stars to be subject to sins, but that they are in fact "not clean" from the pollution of sin. For he writes as follows: "The stars also are not clean in his sight" (Jb 25:5).⁴ This is certainly not meant to refer to the brightness of their body, as if, for example, one were to say that a certain garment was not clean. Were it to be understood thus, an injurious reflection would undoubtedly be cast upon the Creator by the charge that there was something unclean in the brightness of their body. For if the stars are unable either by their own diligent efforts to assume for themselves a clearer body or by their slackness a less pure one, why are they blamed for being "not clean," since they would receive no praise even if they were clean?

3. To make this point more clearly understood we must inquire, first, whether it is right to think of the sun, moon and stars as living and rational beings; next, whether their souls came into existence along with their bodies or at some previous time; and further, whether we are to understand that after the consummation of this age their souls will be released from their bodies and, just as we cease from this life, so will they cease from the work of giving light to the world. It is true that to inquire into these matters seems somewhat daring, yet impelled as we are by a keen desire to ascertain the truth, we see nothing unreasonable in examining and testing, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, all that lies within our power.

We think, therefore, that they may be called living beings from the fact that they are said to receive commands from God;⁵ for commands are not usually given to any but living and rational creatures. Now the scripture says . . . commandment:⁶ "I have given precepts to all the stars" (Is 45:12). What then are these precepts? Surely that each of the stars in its own order and its own courses should supply the world with brightness to the extent of what has been bestowed upon it. Now those which are called planets move in one kind of course, those called fixed stars in another. Here we have a most evident reminder of the fact that no movement can take place in any body which does not possess life, nor can living beings exist at any time without movement. And since the stars move with such majestic order and plan that never have we seen their course deflected in the slightest degree, is it not the height of stupidity to say that such order, such exact observance of rule and plan, is accomplished by things without reason? In Jeremiah indeed the moon is even called by the title "queen of heaven" (Jer 44:17-19, 25). But if the heavenly bodies are living and rational beings we shall doubtless observe among them instances of progress and relapse; for the statement of Job, "the stars are not clean in his sight" (Jb 25:5), appears to me to suggest some such idea as this.

4. We must now consider whether these beings, whom the course of our discussion has shown to be living and rational, would appear to have been endowed with life and bodies simultaneously, at the time when, as the scripture says, "God made two great lights, the greater light to rule the day and the lesser light to rule the night; he made the stars also" (Gn 1:16), or whether it was not so, but that God put the spirit into them from without after their bodies were made.⁷ My own opinion is that the spirit was put into them from without; nevertheless it will be worthwhile to prove this from the scriptures. We shall see that it is easy to prove this assertion by inference, but more difficult if we appeal to the witness of the scriptures. Now by inferences it may be shown to be true in the following way. If the soul of a man, which while it remains the soul of a man is certainly inferior, can be proved not to have been formed with the body but separately, and placed in the body from without, much more will this be the case with the souls of those who are called "heavenly beings."

Now with regard to man, how could it be possible that the soul of him who "supplanted his brother in the womb" (Gn 25:22-26), that is, Jacob, was formed at the same time as his body? Or how could the soul or formative principle of him who, while still lying in his mother's womb, was filled with the Holy Spirit, have been formed at the same time as his body? I mean John, who "leaped in his mother's womb" and tossed himself about with great joy because the voice of Mary's salutation had sounded in the ears of his mother Elizabeth (cf. Lk 1:41, 44). How could the soul and formative principle of him who "before he was fashioned in the womb" is said to have been "known by God" and "before he came to the birth was sanctified by him" (cf. Jer 1:5), have been formed at the same time as his body? Otherwise it would appear that God fills some men with the Holy Spirit regardless of justice and their merits and sanctifies them when they have done nothing to deserve it. And if that were so, how should we avoid the difficulty expressed in that passage in which it is said, "Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid" (Rom 9:14). Or this, "Is there respect of persons with God?" (Rom 2:11). For this is the consequence of that line of argument which maintains that souls come into existence at the same time as their bodies.

(The sun⁸ also, and the moon and the rest of the heavenly bodies are living beings; and moreover, just as we men for certain sins have been enveloped in these bodies of ours, which are gross and heavy, so the lights of heaven have been given bodies of one sort or another to enable them to provide more or less light, while the daemons, for greater offences, have been clothed with aerial bodies.)

So far, then, as we can draw inferences from a comparison with the conditions of human life, it follows, I think, that whatever is shown by reason and scriptural authority to be true for men ought much more to be regarded as true in the case of the heavenly beings.⁹

→ 5. But let us see whether we can find in holy scripture any passages that refer strictly to the heavenly beings themselves. Paul the apostle speaks as follows: "the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it in hope, because the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God" (Rom 8:20, 21) To what "vanity," pray, was the creation subjected, and what "creation" is meant, and how "not of its own will," and with what "hope"; how, too, shall "the creation itself be delivered from the bondage of corruption"? Moreover the same apostle says elsewhere: "the expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God" (Rom 8:19). And again elsewhere: "not only so . . . but the creation itself groaneth and travaileth together in pain until now" (Rom 8:23, 22). The question arises, "What is its groaning, and what its pains?" But first let us see what is the "vanity" to which the creation was subjected. My own opinion is, that this is nothing else than the possession of bodies, for even though the bodies of the stars are composed of ether, they are nevertheless material. This, it seems to me, is the reason why Solomon arraigns the whole bodily universe as being in a way burdensome and as impeding the activity of spirits, thus: "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity, said the Preacher; all is vanity" (Eccl 1:2). "For," he adds, "I looked and I saw all things that are under the sun, and behold, all is vanity" (Eccl 1:14).

This then is the "vanity" to which the creation was subjected, and above all that creation which is certainly the greatest thing in this world and which holds a distinguished pre-eminence by reason of its function. That is, the sun, moon and stars are said to have been subjected to vanity, because they were clothed with bodies and set to perform the task of giving light to the human race. And this creation, scripture says, was subjected to vanity "not of its own will" (Rom 8:20). For it did not undertake a service to vanity by the exercise of free will, but in obedience to the wish of him who was subjecting it, because he who subjected it promised those who were being given over unwillingly to vanity that on the fulfillment of their splendid work of service they should be delivered from this bondage of corruption and vanity, when the time of redemption "of the glory of the sons of God" should have come. Having received this hope, and looking for the fulfillment of this promise, the entire creation now in the meantime "groans together" with us (for it even has sympathy with those whom it serves) and "is in pain together," while in patience it hopes for what has been promised (cf. Rom 8:21, 22).

Consider also the following passage, and see whether this other saying of Paul may not perhaps apply to these beings who not willingly, but in obedience to the will of him who subjected them and with the hope of promises to come were subjected to vanity. "I could desire," he says, "to be dissolved (or "to depart") and be with Christ; for it is far better" (Phil 1:23). For I think that the sun too might say, "I could desire to be dissolved (or "to depart") and be with Christ; for it is far better." And whereas Paul adds: "But to abide in the flesh is more needful for your sakes" (Phil 1:24), the sun might say: "To abide in this heavenly and shining body is more needful for the sake of the revealing of the sons of God." The same may well be believed and said of the moon and stars.

Let us now see what is meant by the "freedom of the creation" and its "deliverance from bondage" (cf. Rom 8:21). (When¹⁰ at the end and consummation of the world souls and rational creatures have been released as it were from their bars and prisons by the Lord, some of them by reason of indolence will move but slowly, while others by earnest effort will speed along in brisk flight. And since all have free will and of their own accord can acquire either virtues or vices, the former will be in a much worse condition than they are now, while the latter will arrive at a better state. For differences of movement and will in either direction will lead to different states; that is, angels may become men or daemons, and on the other hand daemons may become men or angels.) When Christ "shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father" (1 Cor 15:24) then those living beings, because they have before this been made part of Christ's kingdom, shall also be delivered up along with the whole of that kingdom to the rule of the Father; so that, when "God shall be in all" (1 Cor 15:28), they also, since they are a part of all, may have God even in themselves, as he is in all things.

Chapter VIII

57 THE ANGELS

1. A similar course of reasoning must be applied to the angels. We must not suppose that it is the result of chance that a particular duty is assigned to a particular angel; the work of curing and healing, for instance, to Raphael; the supervising of wars to Gabriel; the task of attending to the prayers and supplications of mortals to Michael.¹ We must believe that they have obtained these duties for no other reason except their own individual merits and that they entered upon them as a reward for the zeal and virtue they displayed before the construction of this world; after which event this or that kind of duty was assigned to each member of the order of archangels, while others were counted worthy of being enrolled in the order of angels and to act under this or that archangel, or under this or that leader or chief of his order. All this, as we have said, was arranged not by chance or at random, but by the most appropriate and righteous judgment of God, being settled in accordance with merit, God himself deciding and approving. Thus to one angel would be entrusted the Church of Ephesus, to another the Church of Smyrna (cf. Rv 2:1, 8); this angel would be Peter's, that Paul's (cf. Acts 12:7-15, 27:23-24); and so on through the entire number of those "least ones" who are in the Church it would be decided which of the angels, who daily "see the face of God" (cf. Mt 18:10) must be attached to each, and also which angel it must be who was to encamp "around them that fear God" (cf. Ps 34:7). Certainly we must suppose that all these duties are not performed by accident or chance, nor because the angels were naturally created for them, lest in so doing we should charge the Creator with partiality. Rather must we believe that they were conferred in accordance with merit and virtue and with the activity and ability of each individual spirit, by God the most righteous and impartial governor of all things. . . .²

Concerning those who maintain that spiritual natures are of different kinds³

2. (We must take care)⁴ not to fall into the silly and impious fables of those who pretend that spiritual natures, both those belonging to the heavenly orders and those that form the human race, are of different kinds and were therefore originated by different creators. For while it seems absurd, and indeed is absurd, that the differing natures of rational beings should be attributed to one and the same creator, nevertheless the objectors are ignorant of the cause of these differences. They say that it seems illogical for one and the same creator, quite apart from any reason of merit, to confer on some the authority to rule, while others are subjected to rulers, or to assign principalities to some, while others are made subject to princes. All such opinions, however, are met and refuted by the line of reasoning we have set forth above,⁵ in which the cause of the diversity and variety among these beings is shown to be derived not from any unfairness on the part of the Disposer but from their own actions, which exhibit varying degrees of earnestness or laxity according to the goodness or badness of each.

But to help us perceive more readily that this is the truth about the heavenly beings, let us take examples from human life, both past and present, in order that by logical inference from things visible we may behold even the invisible (cf. Rom 1:20). Our opponents will admit that Paul and Peter were undoubtedly men of "spiritual nature" (1 Cor 2:13-16). When therefore we find that Paul did much that was contrary to religion, in having "persecuted the church of God" (1 Cor 15:9; Gal 1:13), and that Peter committed so grave a sin as to affirm with an oath, when questioned by the maid that kept the door, that he did not know who Christ was (cf. Mt 26:69-74; Jn 18:17), how comes it that such men, who according to our opponents are spiritual, should have fallen into sins like these? I ask the more insistently because they are in the habit of quoting over and over again the saying, "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit" (Mt 7:18; Lk 6:43). Well, if we grant that "a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit," and yet by their own admission Paul and Peter were certainly sprung from the root of a good tree, how can they be imagined to have brought forth fruit so evil as this? And if they return the answer which they generally contrive, that it was not Paul who persecuted but some unknown person who was in Paul, and not Peter who denied but sometimes else who denied in Peter, then why did Paul say, if he had done no sin, that "I am not worthy to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God" (1 Cor 15:9)? And why does Peter himself "weep bitterly" (Mt 26:75; Lk 22:62) for the sin of another? This shows how foolish are all their reasonings.

3. Our contention is, however, that among all rational creatures, there is none which is not capable of both good and evil. But it does not necessarily follow that, because we say there is no nature which cannot admit evil, we therefore affirm that every nature has admitted evil, that is, has become evil. Just as we may say that every human nature possesses the capacity to become a sailor, and yet this will not result in every man becoming a sailor; or again that it is possible for every man to learn the art of grammar or medicine, and yet this does not prove that every man is either a doctor or a school-master: so when we say that there is no nature which cannot admit evil, we do not necessarily indicate that every nature has actually done so; nor on the other hand will the statement that there is no nature which may not admit good prove that every nature has admitted what is good. Our opinion is that not even the devil himself was incapable of good, but the fact that he could admit good did not lead him to desire it or to take pains to acquire virtue. For, as we learn from the passages we quoted out of the prophets, he was at one time good, when he dwelt "in the paradise of God," "in the midst of the cherubim" (Ez 28:13ff.). Just as, therefore, he had⁶ in himself the power of admitting either good or evil, and falling away from good he turned with his whole mind to evil, so also there are other created beings who, while possessing the power to choose either, by the exercise of free will flee from evil and cleave to the good.

There is therefore no nature which may not admit good or evil, except the nature of God, which is the source of all good, and that of Christ; for Christ is wisdom, and wisdom certainly cannot admit folly; and he is righteousness, and assuredly righteousness will never receive unrighteousness; and he is word or reason, which certainly cannot become irrational; further, he is light, and we are sure that "darkness does not comprehend" the light (Jn 1:5). In like manner also the nature of the Holy Spirit, which is holy, does not admit pollution, for it is holy by nature or essence.

But if any other nature is holy, it is so because it is made holy by the reception or inspiration of the Holy Spirit; the possession of this quality does not arise from its own nature, but is an accidental addition to it, and being an addition it can also become separated and lost. So too righteousness may be possessed as an accident, and accordingly this also may be lost. And even the wisdom which we possess is still accidental, in spite of the fact that it lies within our own power to become wise through personal effort and merit, when we pay due attention to wisdom; and that while we continue to display the requisite zeal we shall always have a share in wisdom, which share will be greater or less in proportion to the merit of our conduct and the degree of our zeal. For the kindness of God, as is worthy of him, incites and attracts all things to that blessed end, when "all sorrow and sadness and sighing shall flee away" (Is 35:10) and disappear.

4. So far then as I can see, the foregoing discussion has sufficiently proved that it is not from any random or chance circumstances that the principalities hold their principedoms or the other orders are assigned their respective offices, but that each has obtained his degree of dignity in proportion to his own merits, though it is not our business to know or to inquire what the actual deeds were through which they earned their entrance into a particular order. It is enough for us, to enable us to establish the impartiality and justice of God, to be certain of this, that in accordance with the statement of the apostle Paul "there is no respect of persons with God" (Rom 2:11), who on the contrary dispenses all his gifts in proportion to the merits and progress of each recipient. No angelic office, therefore, exists except as a reward of merit, nor do authorities wield their authority except as a result of their progress, nor do those who are called thrones, that is, authorities for judging and ruling, administer their functions except as a reward of merit, nor do the dominions exercise dominion but by merit; for this supreme and most excellent order of rational creatures in the heavenly places is thus arranged in a glorious variety of offices.

We must think of the opposing powers in precisely the same way. These have become attached to their particular place or office, so as to be "principalities," or "powers," or "rulers of the darkness of the world," or "spiritual hosts of wickedness" (cf. Eph 6:12), or "malignant spirits," or "impure daemons" (cf. Lk 7:21, 4:33), not because they hold it essentially nor because they were so created; on the contrary, these ranks in wickedness have been assigned to them in proportion to their bad conduct and the progress they have made in wrong-doing. Thus there exists that other order of rational creatures, who have so utterly abandoned themselves to wickedness that they lack the desire, rather than the power, to return, so long as the frenzy of their evil deeds is a passion and a delight.

The third order of rational creatures is composed of those spirits who are judged fit by God to replenish the human race. These are the souls of men, some of whom, in consequence of their progress, we see taken up into the order of angels, those, namely, who have been made "sons of God" or "sons of the resurrection" (Lk 20:36; Rom 8:14); or those who forsaking the darkness have loved the light and have been made "sons of the light" (Lk 16:8); or those who, after winning every fight and being changed into "men of peace," become "sons of peace" (Mt 5:9; Lk 10:6) and "sons of God"; or those who, by mortifying their members which are upon the earth (Col 3:5) and rising superior not only to their bodily nature but even to the wavering and fragile movements of the soul itself, have "joined themselves to the Lord" (1 Cor 6:17), being made wholly spiritual, so as to be always "one spirit" (ibid.), with him, judging each individual thing in company with him, until they reach the point when they become perfect "spiritual men" and "judge all things," because their mind is illuminated in all holiness through the word and wisdom of God, while they themselves are utterly incapable of being judged by any man (cf. 1 Cor 2:15).⁷

We think⁸ that those opinions, which some are accustomed unnecessarily to inquire into and uphold, to the effect that souls depart so far from their true selves as to forget their rational nature and dignity and to sink down into the condition of irrational animals, like beasts or cattle, ought certainly not to be accepted. In support of these opinions they are accustomed to quote certain alleged proof passages out of the scriptures; the fact, for instance, that a beast to which a woman has unnaturally prostituted herself is deemed equally guilty with the woman and is ordered to be stoned with her (cf. Lv 20:16); or that a "bull that gores" is commanded to be stoned (cf. Ex 21:29); or further, that Balaam's ass spoke, when "God opened its mouth" and the "dumb beast of burden, answering with human voice, reproved the madness of the prophet" (cf. Nm 22:28-30; 2 Pt 2:16). For our part we beg leave to mention these things not as fixed doctrines, but as opinions to be discussed and then rejected. This is our sole reason for mentioning them, namely, that we should not appear to have refused to discuss any question that has been raised. But at the proper place and time we will refute and drive away this perverse doctrine, and then show how the passages which they quote out of the holy scriptures ought to be understood.

BOOK II

Chapter I

origin of evil again & m

THE WORLD

1. Although the whole discussion in the preceding book has been concerned with the world and its arrangement, I think that we ought now to follow this up by dealing with a few particular questions about the world itself; for instance, about its beginning and its end; and about the events which occur between the beginning and the end by the ordering of divine providence; and about those which are supposed to occur before or after that period.

In this inquiry one fact appears clear at the outset. The entire constitution of the world is various and diverse; for it consists of rational beings, and others more divine, and of bodies of different kinds; and besides these, of dumb animals, that is, wild beasts, cattle, birds and all creatures that live in water; then secondly, of places, such as heaven or the heavens, earth, water, and also the air which is between these two, or that which men call the aether; and finally of all things which spring or grow out of the earth.

Seeing then that the world contains this great variety, and that even among rational beings there is great

beginning end

diversity,—which indeed we must suppose to be the object for which all the other variety and diversity exists—what cause can be given to account for the existence of the world, especially when we bear in mind that end in which, as we argued in the preceding book¹ all things shall be restored to their original state? If our argument there is admitted to be sound, what other cause can we imagine to account for the great diversity of this world except the variety and diversity of the motions and declensions of those who fell away from that original unity and harmony in which they were at the first created by God?

These beings, disturbed and drawn away from that state of goodness, and then tossed about by the diverse motions and desires of their souls, have exchanged the one undivided goodness of their original nature for minds that vary in quality according to their different tendencies.

2. But God who, by the unspeakable skill of his wisdom, transforms and restores all things, whatever their condition, to some useful purpose and the common advantage of all, recalls these very creatures, so different from each other in mental quality, to one harmony of work and endeavor; so that, diverse though the motions of their souls may be, they nevertheless combine to make up the fullness and perfection of a single world, the very variety of minds tending to one end, perfection. For there is one power which binds and holds together all the diversity of the world and guides the various motions to the accomplishment of one task, lest so immense a work as the world should be dissolved by the conflicts of souls. It is for this reason, we think, that God, the parent of all things, in providing for the salvation of his entire creation through the unspeakable plan of his word and wisdom, has so ordered everything that each spirit or soul, or whatever else rational existences ought to be called, should not be compelled by force against its free choice to any action except that to which the motions of its own mind lead it,—for in that case the power of free choice would seem to be taken from them, which would certainly alter the quality of their nature itself—and at the same time that the motions of their wills should work suitably and usefully together to produce the harmony of a single world, some being in need of help, others able to give help, others again to provide struggles and conflicts for those who are making progress, whose diligence will be accounted the more praiseworthy and whose rank and position recovered after their victory will be held the more securely, as it has been won through difficulty and toil.

3. Although therefore the whole world is arranged in diverse parts and functions, we must not suppose that its condition is one of discord and self-contradiction; but as our “one body” is composed of “many members” (cf. 1 Cor 12:12) and is held together by one soul, so we should, I think, accept the opinion that the universe is as it were an immense, monstrous animal, held together by the power and reason of God as by one soul.² This truth is, I believe, referred to by holy scripture in the following passage spoken through the prophet, “Do not I fill heaven and earth?” saith the Lord” (Jer 23:24). And again, “Heaven is my throne, and earth is the footstool of my feet” (Is 66:1); and in what the Savior said, when he tells us not to swear, “neither by heaven, for it is the throne of God, neither by the earth, for it is the footstool of his feet” (Mt 5:34ff.); and further, in what St. Paul says in his oration to the Athenians, “in him we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28). For how do we “live and move and have our being in God” except through the fact that he binds and holds together the universe by his power? And how is heaven the “throne of God” and earth the “footstool of his feet,” as the Savior himself declares, except through the fact that alike in heaven and in earth God’s power fills all things, as he says,

“Do not I fill heaven and earth?” saith the Lord” (Jer 23:24). I do not think, therefore, that anyone will find it difficult to admit, from the passages we have quoted, that God, the parent of all things, fills and holds together the entire universe with the fullness of his power.

And now, since the argument of the preceding discussion has shown that the diverse motions of rational creatures and their varying opinions have given rise to the diversity of this world, we must see whether it may not be appropriate that the world should have a conclusion similar to its beginning.³ Now there is no doubt that its end must be looked for in much diversity and variety, and this variety, when found to exist at the end of this world, will in its turn provide causes and occasions of diversity in that other world which is to come after this; for clearly the end of this world is the beginning of the world to come.

4. If the course of our discussion has revealed this to be the case, it seems to follow that, as the diversity of the world cannot exist apart from bodies, we should discuss the question of bodily nature. It is evident from the observation of ordinary things that bodily nature admits of diverse and various changes; to such an extent that it can undergo every kind of transformation; for example, wood turns into fire, fire into smoke and smoke into air; and even oil, a liquid, changes into fire.⁴ Do not also articles of food whether used by men or by animals, exhibit the same fact of change? For whatever it is that we take as food, it turns into the substance of our body. Moreover it would not be difficult to explain the way in which water changes into earth or air, and air again into fire, or fire into air or air into water; in the present place, however, it is enough simply to mention these facts, as our purpose is to discuss the question of bodily matter. Now by matter we mean that which underlies bodies, namely, that from which they take their existence when qualities have been applied to or mingled with them.⁵ We speak of four qualities, heat, cold, dryness, wetness. These qualities, when mingled with the hyle or matter (which matter is clearly seen to have an existence in its own right apart from these qualities we have mentioned), produce the different kinds of bodies. But although, as we have said, this matter has an existence by its own right without qualities, yet it is never found actually existing apart from them.

In regard then to this matter, which is so great and wonderful as to be sufficient for all the bodies in the world, which God willed to exist, and to be at the call and service of the Creator in all things for the fashioning of whatever forms and species he wished, receiving into itself the qualities which he had willed to bestow upon it, I cannot understand how so many distinguished men have supposed it to be uncreated, that is, not made by God himself the Creator of all things, but in its nature and power the result of chance.⁶ I wonder, too, how such men can find fault with those who deny that God is the Maker of this universe or that he providentially cares for it, and can charge them with impiety for believing that so great a work as the world exists without a Maker or Sustainer, when they themselves are guilty of a like impiety in saying that matter is uncreated and co-eternal with the uncreated God. Their theory is as follows: if we suppose for the sake of argument that matter did not exist, then, they say, since God could not make anything when nothing existed, he would undoubtedly have been idle, having no matter on which to work; but they believe that this matter was at his hand by chance, and not by his own provision, and they think that this thing which was discovered by chance was able to suffice him for so immense a work and for the exercise of his mighty power, so as to subserve the plan of all his wisdom and be separated and formed into a world. This seems to me to be very absurd and characteristic of men who are utterly ignorant of the power and intelligence of an uncreated being.

But in order to look more carefully into the plan of things, let it be granted that for a little while matter did not exist, and that God, when nothing existed before, caused to exist the things which he desired. What shall we think? Would God have created a matter that should be better or greater or of a kind other than that which he did produce from his own power and wisdom, in order that things which before were not might exist? Or would he have created it worse and inferior? Or would he have created it like to and the same as that matter which these men call uncreated? I think anyone can easily discern that neither a better nor an inferior matter could have assumed the forms and species of the world, but only such a matter as that which did assume them. How then will it seem anything but impious to call that uncreated which, if we believe it to be made by God, is found beyond a doubt to be exactly the same as that which is said to be uncreated?

5. To obtain scriptural authority for believing that this is so, hear how the doctrine is confirmed in the book of Macca-bees, where the mother of the seven martyrs is exhorting one of her sons to endure the tortures. She says: "I pray you, my son, look at heaven and earth and all that is in them, and when you see all this, remember that God made it when it did not exist" (2 Mc 7:28). Further, in the book of The Shepherd, in the first commandment, it says as follows: "First of all believe that God is one, who created and set in order all things and caused the universe to exist out of nothing."⁷ Perhaps also that passage which occurs in the Psalms refers to this doctrine: "He spake and they were made; he commanded and they were created" (Ps 148:5). For the statement "he spake and they were made" seems to point to the substance of things that exist, whereas "he commanded and they were created" seems to be spoken of the qualities by which the substance itself was molded into form.

Chapter II

THE PERPETUITY OF BODILY NATURE

1. At this point some are wont to inquire whether, as the Father begets an only begotten Son and brings forth a Holy Spirit, not as beings who did not exist before, but in the sense that the Father is the origin and source of the Son or the Holy Spirit and no thought of before or after can be entertained in respect of them, some similar kinship or close connection may not be understood to exist also between rational natures and bodily matter. In order to examine this question with due care and completeness they are wont to direct the beginning of their discussion to the inquiry whether this bodily nature, which supports the lives and upholds the movements of spiritual and rational minds, will last eternally like them or whether in fact it will be destroyed and utterly perish. And that "this may be determined more precisely a previous inquiry seems necessary, namely, whether it is possible for rational beings to endure altogether without bodies when they have reached the height of holiness and blessedness,—a thing which to me indeed seems very difficult and well-nigh impossible—or whether it is necessary that they should always be joined to bodies. If then anyone could show a reason whereby it was possible for them to do without bodies of any kind, the creation

body

consequence would seem to be that just as bodily nature was created out of nothing after a space of time and brought into being from non-existence, so too it might cease to exist when the need it had served had passed away.

2. But if it is impossible by any means to maintain this proposition, namely, that any being, with the exception of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, can live apart from a body, then logical reasoning compels us to believe that, while the original creation was of rational beings, it is only in idea and thought that a material substance is separable from them, and that though this substance seems to have been produced for them or after them, yet never have they lived or do they live without it; for we shall be right in believing that life without a body is found in the Trinity alone.¹ Now as we have said above, material substance possesses such a nature that it can undergo every kind of transformation. When therefore it is drawn down to lower beings it is formed into the grosser and more solid condition of body and serves to distinguish the visible species of this world in all their variety. But when it ministers to more perfect and blessed beings, it shines in the splendor of "celestial bodies" (1 Cor 15:40) and adorns either the "angels of God" or the "sons of the resurrection" (cf. Lk 20:36; Mt 22:30) with the garments of a "spiritual body" (1 Cor 15:44). All these beings go to make up the diverse and varied condition of the one world.

If you wish to discuss these questions more fully, it will be necessary to examine the divine scriptures very intently and diligently, with all reverence and fear of God, to see whether there can perchance be found in them any secret and hidden meaning, anything spoken in deep or veiled language (the Holy Spirit making the meaning clear [cf. Heb 9:8] to those who are worthy) about matters such as these, after more testimonies have been collected that bear on this particular point.

Chapter III

THE BEGINNING OF THE WORLD AND ITS CAUSES

1. It remains to inquire next, whether there was another world before the one which now exists;¹ and if there was, whether it was of the same kind as the present world, or slightly different or inferior; or whether there was no world at all, but something like that "end" which we understand will exist at the conclusion of all things, "when the kingdom is delivered up to God, even the Father" (1 Cor 15:24); and whether this "end" was in its turn the end of another world, obviously of that which preceded the beginning of the present one, and whether it was the varying falls of intellectual beings which provoked God to form a world of such variety and diversity as this.

Further, I think that the following point also calls for similar inquiry, whether after this world there will be a course of healing and improvement, very severe no doubt and full of pain to those who have refused to obey the word of God, yet a process of instruction and rational training through which those who in this present life have devoted themselves to these pursuits and, being made purer in mind, have attained here and now to a capacity for divine wisdom, may advance to a richer understanding of truth; and whether after this the end of all things follows immediately. Or again, whether for the correction and improvement of those who need it there will be yet another world, either similar to the one that now exists, or better than it, or possibly much worse; and how long will the world that comes after this exist, of whatever sort it be, or whether it will exist at all; and if there will ever be a time when there will be no world anywhere, or if there ever was a time when there was no world at all; or if there have been, or shall be, many worlds; or if it will ever happen that one world will turn out to be equal to another and similar in all respects and indistinguishable from it.²

2. To make it the more clear, then, whether bodily matter exists but for a space of time and whether, just as it did not exist before it was made, so it will be again resolved into non-existence, let us first see if it can possibly happen for any being to live without a body. For if any being can live without a body, then it is possible for all things to exist without bodies, since our previous chapter has shown that all things work towards one end.³ But if all things can exist without bodies, doubtless bodily substance will cease to exist when there is no use for it.⁴ Yet how are we to understand the words spoken by the apostle in the passage where he discusses the resurrection of the dead? For he says, "This corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality. But when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall come to pass the saying that is written: Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law" (1 Cor 15:53-56). Some such meaning as the following seems to be suggested by the apostle. When he speaks of "this corruptible" and "this mortal," with the air of one who is as it were touching and displaying something, to what else can it apply except bodily matter? This matter of the body, then, which now is corruptible, shall put on incorruption when a perfect soul, instructed in the doctrines of incorruption, has begun to use it. body

And I would not have you be surprised that we should use the metaphor of bodily clothing to describe a perfect soul, which on account of the word of God and his wisdom is here called "incorruption." For indeed Jesus Christ himself, who is the Lord and Creator of the soul, is said to be the "clothing" of the saints, as the apostle says, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom 13:14). As therefore Christ is the clothing of the soul, so by an intelligible kind of reasoning the soul is said to be the clothing of the body; for it is an ornament of the body, covering and concealing its mortal nature. When therefore the apostle says, "This corruptible must put on incorruption," it is as if he said, "This body, with its corruptible nature, must receive the clothing of incorruption, that is, a soul that possesses in itself incorruption, by virtue of the fact that it has put on Christ, who is the wisdom and the word of God." And when this body, which one day we shall possess in a more glorious form, shall have become a partaker of life, it will then, in addition to being immortal, become also incorruptible. For whatever is mortal is on that very account also corruptible, but we cannot say that what is corruptible is also mortal. For instance, we call a stone or a log corruptible, but it will not follow that we also call them mortal, for they have never lived. But since the body partakes of life, we call it mortal because the life can be and is separated from it, while in another sense we also call it corruptible. soul

A wonderful insight is therefore revealed in the following words of the holy apostle. Referring in the first place to bodily matter in general, that matter which, in whatever form it is found, whether carnal as now or as hereafter in the subtler and purser form which is called spiritual, the soul always makes use of, he says, "This corruptible must put on incorruption." In the second place, referring to the body in particular he says, "This mortal must put on immortality." Now what else can this "incorruption" and "immortality" be except the wisdom and word and righteousness of God, which mould and clothe and adorn the soul? This is the meaning of the saying that the corruptible puts on incorruption and the mortal puts on immortality. For now, although we may make great progress, still since "we know in part and we prophesy in part" and even those things which we seem to understand are seen "through a glass darkly," (cf. 1 Cor 13:9, 12) "this corruptible" does not yet "put on incorruption," nor is "this mortal" encompassed with "immortality"; and since undoubtedly this training of ours in the body extends over a very long period, namely, up till the time the bodies themselves with which we are encompassed are found worthy of incorruption and immortality by reason of the word and wisdom and perfect righteousness of God, on this account it is said that "this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality."

3. Nevertheless, those who believe⁵ that rational creatures can ever lead a life apart from the body may at this point raise such questions as the following. If it is true that "this corruptible shall put on incorruption" and this mortal shall put on immortality" and that in the end "death shall be swallowed up," this is nothing else but a declaration that material nature is to be destroyed; for it is on material nature that death can have its effect,⁶ during the time that those who are in the body have their powers of mind blunted, as it appears, by the nature of bodily matter. If, however, they exist apart from the body, they will then escape all the trouble that comes from this kind of disturbance. But since they could not of a sudden escape from all bodily clothing, they must first be supposed to abide in bodies more pure and subtle, which have in addition the property of not being conquered by death or pierced by "death's sting" (1 Cor 15:55, 56), so that finally when material nature has gradually ceased to be, death may be "swallowed up" and destroyed "in the end," and all its sting entirely blunted through the divine grace, which the soul has become capable of receiving and has thereby proved itself worthy of obtaining "incorruption" and "immortality." And then all will indeed be able to say, "O death, where is thy victory? O death where is thy sting. The sting of death is sin" (1 Cor 15:55, 56). If therefore these conclusions appear logical,⁷ it follows that we must believe that our condition will at some future time be incorporeal; and if this is admitted, and it is said that all must be subjected to Christ, it is necessary that this incorporeal condition shall be the privilege of all who come within the scope of this subjection to Christ, since all⁸ who have been subjected to Christ will in the end be subjected also to God the Father,⁹ to whom it is said that Christ will deliver up the kingdom. Thus it appears that then even the use of bodies will cease; and if this happens, bodily nature returns to non-existence, just as formerly it did not exist.

But let us see what those who make these assertions have to face. It will be seen to be a necessity that, if bodily nature were to be destroyed, it must be restored and created a second time. For it is apparently possible that rational creatures, who are never deprived of the power of free will, may once again become subject to certain movements. This power is granted them by God lest, if they held their position forever irremovably, they might forget that they had been placed in that final state of blessedness by the grace of God and not by their own goodness. These movements would again undoubtedly be followed by a variety and diversity of bodies, out of which a world is always composed; for it could never exist except as a result of variety and diversity, and this can in no way be produced apart from bodily matter.

4. Moreover, as for those who maintain that worlds similar to each other and in all respects alike sometimes come into existence, I do not know what proofs they can bring in support of this theory. For if it is said that there is to be a world similar in all respects to the present world, then it will happen that Adam and Eve will again do what they did before, there will be another flood, the same Moses will once more lead a people numbering six hundred thousand out of Egypt, Judas also will "twice betray his Lord, Saul will a second time keep the clothes of those who are stoning Stephen, and we shall say that every deed which has been done in this life must be done again."¹⁰ I do not think that this can be established by any reasoning, if souls are actuated by freedom of choice and maintain their progress or the reverse in accordance with the power of their own will. For souls are not driven on some revolving course which brings them into the same cycle again after many ages, with the result that they do or desire this or that, but they direct the course of their deeds towards whatever end the freedom of their individual minds may aim at.

What these men say, however, is the same as if one were to maintain that if a bushel of corn were poured out on the ground it could happen that on two occasions the grains would fall in exactly the same positions, so that each single grain would lie the second time next to that grain besides which it was thrown at the first, and the bushel would be scattered in the same order and with the same marks as formerly. Certainly this is an utterly impossible thing to happen with the innumerable grains of a bushel, even if they were to be poured out again and again without ceasing for countless ages. It seems to me, then, impossible that the world could be restored again a second time with the same order and the same number of births, deaths and actions; but worlds may exist that are diverse, having variations by no means slight, so that for certain clear causes the condition of one may be better, while another for different causes may be worse, and another intermediate. What may be the number or measure of these worlds I confess I do not know; but I would willingly learn, if any man can show me.

5. This world, however, which is itself called an "age" (Wis 13:9 [LXX and RV marg.]), is said to be the end of many ages. Now the holy apostle teaches that Christ did not suffer in the age that was before this, nor yet in the age before that; and I do not know whether it is in my power to enumerate all the previous ages in which he did not suffer. I will, however, quote the statements of Paul from which I have arrived at this point of knowledge. He says: "But now once at the consummation of the ages he has been manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb 9:26). He says that Christ has become a "sacrifice" once, and that "at the consummation of the ages he has been manifested to put away, sin."¹¹ But after the present age, which is said to have been made for the consummation of other ages, there will yet be further "ages to come"; for we learn this plainly from Paul himself when he says, "that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in kindness towards us" (Eph 2:7). He did not say, "in the age to come"; nor, "in two ages"; but, "in the ages to come." I think, therefore, that the indications of this statement point to many ages.

If, however, there is something greater than the ages,—so that among created beings we think of ages, but among those who exceed and surpass visible created beings, something still greater—which will perhaps exist at the "restitution of all things" (Acts 3:21), when the universe reaches its perfect end, then possibly that period in which the consummation of all things will happen is to be understood as something more than an age. In regard to this I am influenced by the authority of holy scripture, which says, "For an age, and still more."¹² Now when it says "still more," undoubtedly it wishes something more than an age to be understood. And see whether that saying of the Savior, "I will that, where I am, these also may be there with me" and, "as I and thou are one, that they also may be one in us" (Jn 17:24, 21), does not seem to point to something more than an age or ages, perhaps even more than the "ages of the ages" (Gal 1:5; 1 Tm 1:17), to that period, namely, when all things are no longer in an age, but "God is all and in all" (1 Cor 15:28).

6. Now that we have discussed to the best of our ability these questions about the system of the world, it seems not inappropriate to inquire into the meaning of the actual term "world"; for it is a term which is frequently shown in the holy scriptures to possess different significations. That which in Latin we speak of as mundus, in Greek is called kosmos; and kosmos signifies not only the world, but also an ornament. For instance in Isaiah, where a reproving speech is addressed to the "chief daughters of Sion" (cf. Is 3:17) and the prophet says, "Instead of an ornament of gold for thy head thou shalt have baldness on account of thy works" (Is 3:24), he uses for ornament the same word as for world, namely, kosmos. It is said also that a representation of the world was to be seen on the garment of the high priest, as we find in the Wisdom of Solomon when it says, "Upon the garment was the entire world" (Wis 18:24). This earth of ours together with its inhabitants is also called the world, as when the scripture says, "The whole world lieth in the evil one" (1 Jn 5:19). Clement indeed, a disciple of the apostles, mentions those whom the Greeks call "people of the opposite earth," and speaks of other parts of the world which none of our people can reach, nor can any of those who live there cross over to us; and these parts themselves he called "worlds," when he says, "The ocean is impassable to men, and the worlds beyond it are governed by the same ordinances of God the Ruler."¹³ This universe which consists of heaven and earth is also called a world, as Paul says, "The fashion of this world will pass away" (1 Cor 7:31). Our Lord and Savior indeed alludes to yet another world, which it is difficult to describe and depict in actual truth, beyond this visible one. For he says, "I am not of this world" (Jn 17:14, 16); and the words, "I am not of this world," suggest that he was of some other world. We have already said that it is difficult for us to explain this other world; and for this reason, that if we did so, there would be a risk of giving some men the impression that we were affirming the existence of certain imaginary forms which the Greeks call "ideas." For it is certainly foreign to our mode of reasoning to speak of an incorporeal world that exists solely in the mind's fancy or the unsubstantial region of thought; and how men could affirm that the Savior came from thence or that the saints will go thither I do not see (cf. Jn 17:24).

There is no doubt, however, that the Savior alludes to something more glorious and splendid than this present world, and invites and exhorts all who believe in him to direct their course towards it. But whether that world, which he wishes us to know of, is one that stands widely apart and separate from this in space and quality and glory, or whether, as seems to me more likely, it excels in quality and glory but is nevertheless contained within the limits of this world, is uncertain, and in my opinion an unsuitable subject for the mind and thoughts of men. But from what Clement appears to allude to when he says, "The ocean, which is impassable to men, and the worlds beyond it,"¹⁴ where he uses the plural "worlds" and indicates that they are all directed and ruled by the same providence of the most high God, he would seem to throw out to us some germs of an opinion such as this, that the entire universe of things that exist, both celestial and supercelestial, earthly and infernal may be spoken of in a general way as a single perfect world, within which or by which those other worlds that are in it must be supposed to be contained.

Accordingly there are some who would apply the term "world" to the spheres of the moon and the sun and the heavenly bodies called "planets" or wanderers; and further, they would maintain that the uppermost sphere itself, which they call "fixed," is rightly termed a world. Finally they appeal to the book of the prophet Baruch to bear witness to this assertion, because in it there are very clear indications of the seven worlds or heavens.¹⁵ They would maintain, however, that above the sphere which they call "fixed" there is another; and that, just as in our system the heaven contains all things that are under it, so this sphere, with its immense size and indescribable span, encloses the vast extent of all the other spheres in its yet more magnificent circuit, so that all things are within it as this earth of ours is under the heaven.¹⁶ They believe that this sphere is called in the holy scriptures the "good land" and the "land of the living" (cf. Ex 3:8; Dt 8:8; Jer 11:19; Ps 27:13, 142:5), and that it has its own heaven, the one we have before spoken of, in which the names of the saints are said to be written, or to have been written, by the Savior (cf. Lk 10:20). This heaven it is which contains and encloses that "earth" which the Savior in the gospel promises to the "meek" and gentle (cf. Mt 5:4). Further, they would say that this earth of ours, which was formerly called "dry land," took its new name from that earth, just as our firmament was called "heaven" after the designation of that heaven (cf. Gn 1:10, 8).¹⁷ But we have treated more fully of such opinions in the place in which we inquired into the meaning of the passage, "In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth."¹⁸ For it was shown that there is another "heaven" and another "earth" besides the firmament, which is said to have been made after the second day, and the "dry land," which was afterwards called "earth."

Certainly what some say of this world, that it is corruptible because it was made, and yet does not go to corruption because the will of God, who made it and preserves it from being mastered by corruption, is stronger and more powerful than corruption, may more rightly be believed of that world which we have above called a "fixed" sphere, because by the will of God it is in no way "subject to corruption" (cf. Rom 8:20, 21), for the reason that it has not admitted the causes of corruption. For indeed it is a world of saints and of those who have been completely purified and not of the wicked, as our world is. Now we must see whether the apostle may not have been thinking of that world when he said, "While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. But we know that if the earthly house of this our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor 4:18, 5:1). For when it is said elsewhere, "Because I shall see the heaven, the works of thy fingers" (Ps 8:3 AV and RV),¹⁹ and when God said through the prophet about all visible things that "My hand made all these" (cf. Is 66:2), he declares that that "eternal house" which he promises to the saints in heaven was not "made with hands," which undoubtedly signifies a difference in creation between the "things which are seen" and the "things which are not seen." Now the phrase "things which are not seen" does not mean the same as "things which are invisible." For the things which are invisible are not only not seen, but do not even possess a nature which admits of their being seen; they are what the Greeks have called asomata or incorporeal.²⁰ But the things of which Paul said, "they are not seen," possess a nature which admits of their being seen; he is explaining, however, that they are not yet seen by those to whom they are promised.

7. We have outlined, then, to the best of our knowledge, these three opinions²¹ about the end of all things and the supreme blessedness. Each of our readers must judge for himself, with all care and diligence, whether one of them may be approved and adopted. We have said that either we must suppose it possible to lead a bodiless existence, after "all things have been subjected to Christ" and through Christ to God the Father, when God shall be "all and in all" (cf. 1 Cor 15:27, 28); or that when the universe has been subjected to Christ and through Christ to God, with whom it becomes "one spirit" (1 Cor 6:17) in view of the fact that rational beings are spirits, then also the bodily substance itself, being united to the best and purest spirits, will be changed, in proportion to the quality or merits of those who wear it, into an ethereal condition, according to the apostle's saying, "and we shall be changed" (1 Cor 15:52), and will shine with light; or else that when the fashion of those things which are seen passes away (cf. 1 Cor 7:31; 2 Cor 4:18) and all their corruptible nature has been banished and purified, and the entire condition of the world we know, in which the spheres of the planets are said to be, is left behind and superseded, there exists above that sphere which is called "fixed" an abiding place for the pious and blessed, in as it were a "good land" and a "land of the living," which the "meek" and gentle will receive for an inheritance. To this land or earth belongs that heaven which, with its more magnificent circuit, surrounds and confines it, and this is the true heaven and the first to be so called.

end
 In this heaven and earth the end and perfection of all things may find a safe and most sure abode. There, for instance, those who have for their offences endured the sharp reproof of punishments by way of purgation and have fulfilled and discharged every obligation may be found worthy of a dwelling-place in the earth; while those who have been obedient to the word of God and have already here by their submission shown themselves receptive of his wisdom may be said to gain the kingdom of that heaven or heavens. Thus a worthier fulfillment may be found for the saying, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," and "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for they shall inherit the kingdom of heaven" (cf. Mt 5:5, 3), and for what was said in the psalm, "He shall exalt thee, that thou shalt inherit the earth" (Ps 37:34). For we speak of descending to this earth, but of being "exalted" to that one, which is on high. In this way, therefore, there seems to be opened a road for the progress of the saints from that earth to those heavens, so that they would appear not so much to remain permanently in that earth as to dwell there in the hope of passing on, when they have made the requisite progress, to the inheritance of the "kingdom of heaven."

THAT THE GOD OF THE LAW AND THE PROPHETS, AND THE FATHER OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, IS ONE

Marcelan

1. Now that we have, to the best of our ability, discussed these matters briefly in order, it follows from the plan which we adopted at the beginning that we proceed to refute those who think that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is a different God from him who gave Moses the sayings of the law and sent the prophets, and who is the God of the fathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.¹ For it is of prime necessity that we should be firmly grounded in this article of our faith. We will consider, then, that statement which occurs frequently in the gospels and is attached to various acts of our Lord and Savior: "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken through 'this or that' prophet" (cf. Mt 2:15; 4:14; 8:17) where it is evident that these are prophets of that God who made the world. From this follows the conclusion that he who sent the prophets himself foretold what was to be foretold of Christ, and there is no doubt that it was the Father of Christ, and not some different being, who foretold these things. Further, the fact that illustrations are frequently drawn from the Old Testament

by the Savior and his apostles can only indicate that they both attach authority to the ancient writers. And further, the fact that when urging his disciples to the exercise of kindness, the Savior says, "Be ye perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect, who bids his sun rise on the good and on the evil, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust," (Mt 5:48, 45) suggests even to a man of the smallest intelligence this most obvious meaning, that he is putting before his disciples as a pattern for imitation no other God than the maker of heaven and the giver of the rain.

Again, when he says that those who pray must say, "Our Father, who art in heaven" (Mt 6:9), what does he appear to be indicating, if not that God must be sought for in the better parts of the world, that is, of his own creation? When, too, in laying down those most admirable rules about oaths he says that we are not to swear, "neither by heaven, because it is God's throne, nor by the earth, because it is the footstool of his feet" (cf. Mt 5:34, 35), does he not appear to be in most open agreement with the words of the prophet, "Heaven is my throne, and the earth is the footstool of my feet" (Is 66:1) Further, when he cast out of the temple those who were selling "oxen and sheep and doves" and overturned the "tables of the moneychangers" and said, "Take these things hence; and make not my Father's house a house of merchandise" (cf. Jn 2:14-16), he was undoubtedly calling that God his Father, to whose name Solomon had built the magnificent temple.

Again, the saying, "Have ye not read what was said by God to Moses; I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob; he is not the God of the dead, but of the living" (Mt 22:31, 32), teaches us most clearly that he called the God of the patriarchs, because they were holy and living men, "the God of the living," the same God indeed who had said in the prophets, "I am God, and there is no God beside me" (Is 46:9). For if the Savior, knowing that he who is written of in the law is the God of Abraham, and that it is the same God who says, "I am God, and there is no God beside me," confesses that this very God who, as the heretics suppose,² is ignorant that there is another God above him, is the Father, he is absurdly declaring that being to be the Father who is ignorant of the existence of a higher God. If, however, God is not ignorant, but is deceiving us when he says, "There is no God beside me," it is a greater absurdity still, to think that the Savior should confess that his Father was a liar. From all these considerations the mind is led to this conclusion, that the Savior knows no other Father except God the founder and creator of all things.

2. It would be a long business if we were to gather out of every passage in the gospels the proofs by which we are taught that the God of the law and the gospels is one and the same. Let us, however, touch briefly on the Acts of the Apostles, where Stephen and the apostles direct their prayers to that God "who made heaven and earth" and who "spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets," calling him "the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," the God who led his people out of the land of Egypt (cf. Acts 4:24, 25; 3:13; 5:30; 7:2, 32, 34). These expressions undoubtedly direct our minds to faith in the Creator and implant an affection for him in those who have piously and faithfully accepted this truth about him; in accordance with the words of the Savior himself who, when he was asked what was "the greatest commandment in the law," answered, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind." And a second is like unto it: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; to which he added, "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Mk 12:28, 30, 31; Mt 22:36, 37, 39, 40). How is it, I ask, that he commends to the man whom he was instructing and leading on to discipleship this commandment above all others, as a means undoubtedly of kindling affection for the God of the old law, since both commandments had been previously laid down by the law in those very words?

Nevertheless, let it be granted in spite of all these most evident proofs that it is about some other and unknown God that the Savior says, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," and the rest. Now if the law and the prophets come, as they say,³ from the Creator, that is, from another God than him whom they call good, how can it be logical to add as he does, "On these two commandments hang the law and the prophets." For how can that which is strange and foreign to God depend upon him? And when Paul says, "I give thanks to my God, whom I serve from my forefathers with a pure conscience" (2 Tm 1:3), he shows with perfect clearness that in coming to Christ he did not come to any new God. For what other "forefathers" of Paul can we think of except those of whom he says, "Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I" (2 Cor 11:22).

Further, does not the introduction to his Epistle to the Romans show precisely, to all who know how to understand Paul's letters, the very same thing, namely, what God Paul is preaching? For he says, "Paul a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God, which he promised before by his prophets in the holy scriptures concerning his Son, who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, but foreordained to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of sanctification and the resurrection from the dead of Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom 1:1-4), and the rest. There is also the passage which says, "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox when he treadeth out the corn. Is it for the oxen that God careth? Or saith he it altogether for our sake? Yea, for our sake it was written, because he that plougheth ought to plough in hope, and he that thresheth to thresh in hope of partaking" (1 Cor 9:9-10). Here he shows clearly that God who gave the law says the words "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox when he treadeth out the corn" for our sake, that is, for the sake of the apostles, and that his care was not for the oxen but for the apostles, who were preaching the gospel of Christ. In other passages, too, Paul himself appropriates a promise of the law, speaking as follows: "Honor thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promise, that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long in the land, the good land, which the Lord thy God will give thee" (Eph 6:2, 3; Ex 20:12). In these words Paul undoubtedly declares that the law, and the God of the law, and his promises, are pleasing to him.

3. But since the supporters of this heresy are sometimes wont to beguile the hearts of very simple people by certain fallacious sophistries, I think it not unreasonable to bring forward the points raised in their arguments and to refute their deceit and falsehoods. They say that it is written, "No man hath seen God at any time" (Jn 1:18); yet the God whom Moses proclaims was seen by Moses himself and before that by his fathers, whereas the God who is announced by the Savior has been seen by no one at all. Let us then ask them this question, whether the Being, whom they profess to be God and who they say is different from God the Creator, is visible or invisible. If they should say that he is visible, they will not only be proved to be in opposition to that passage of scripture which says of the Savior that he is "the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1:15), but besides this, they will run into the absurdity of saying that God has a body. For in no other way can anything be seen except by its shape and size and color, which are properties of bodies. And if God is declared to be a body, then, since every body is made of matter, we shall find that God is made of matter too; and if so, then, since matter is undoubtedly corruptible, God will according to them be corruptible. Again, we will ask them this question also. Is matter made or uncreated, that is, not made? If they should say that it is unmade, that is, uncreated, we shall inquire whether one part of matter is God, and another part the world. But if they should answer that matter is made, it will follow undoubtedly that they confess that he whom they call God is made, which certainly neither their reason nor ours will admit.⁵ But they will say, "God is invisible." Now what are you to do? If you say that he is invisible by nature, then he ought not to be visible even to the Savior.⁶ Yet in spite of this God the Father of Christ is said to be seen; for Christ says, "He who hath seen the Son hath seen the Father also" (Jn 14:9). This certainly involves you in serious difficulties, whereas we interpret it more correctly as referring not to sight but to understanding. For he who has understood the Son has understood the Father also. It is in this manner then that we must suppose Moses to have seen God, not by looking at him with eyes of flesh, but by understanding him with the vision of the heart and the perception of the mind, and even this in part only. For it is well-known that he, that is, the one who gave the oracles to Moses, says, "Thou shalt not see my face, but my back" (Ex 33:23). Certainly these statements must be understood by the aid of that symbolism which is appropriate to the understanding of divine sayings, and those old wives' fables, which ignorant people invent on the subject of the front and back parts of God, must be utterly rejected and despised. Nor indeed must anyone suppose that we have entertained some impious thought in saying that the Father is not visible even to the Savior, but he must consider the exact meaning of the terms we use in controverting the heretics. For we have said that it is one thing to see and be seen, another to perceive and be perceived or to know and be known. To see and be seen is a property of bodies, which it would certainly not be right to apply either to the Father or to the Son or to the Holy Spirit in their relations one with another. For the Trinity by its nature transcends the limits of vision, although it grants to those who are in bodies, that is, to all other creatures, the property of being seen one by another. But incorporeal, and above all intellectual nature is capable of nothing else but to know and be known, as the Savior himself declares when he says, "No one knoweth the Son save the Father, neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son willeth to reveal him" (Jn 14:9). It is clear, then, that he did not say, "No one seeth the Father save the Son," but "No one knoweth the Father save the Son."

4. If, however, they think that in those statements which are made in the Old Testament to the effect that God is angry or repents, or is subject to any other human emotion, they are provided with material for refuting us with the assertion that God must be believed to be entirely without passion and destitute of all these emotions, we must show them that similar statements are to be found even in the parables of the gospel, as when it says that God "planted a vine" and "let it out to husbandmen," which husbandmen killed the servants who were sent to them, and when at last the Son was sent they put him to death too, wherefore God is said to have become angry and to have taken away the vineyard from them and to have delivered the wicked husbandmen to destruction and given the vineyard to others who would "render him the fruits in their season" (cf. Mt 21:33-41). Again, in the case of those citizens who, when the father of the household set out to "receive for himself a kingdom," "sent messengers after him saying, We will not have this man to reign over us," on the father's return after having obtained his kingdom he was angry, and commanded them to be slain before him and their city to be burnt by fire (cf. Lk 19:12–27). For ourselves, however, whenever we read of the anger of God, whether in the Old or the New Testament, we do not take such statements literally, but look for the spiritual meaning in them, endeavoring to understand them in a way that is worthy of God. But we dealt with these points, according to our poor ability, when expounding that verse of the second Psalm in which it says, “Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and trouble them in his fury,” where we showed, as best we could, in what way this ought to be understood (cf. Ps 2:5).⁷

THE JUST AND THE GOOD

context
1. But some are influenced by the fact that the leaders of this heresy appear to have made for themselves a distinction, saying that the just is one thing and the good another, and have applied this distinction even to the divine nature, asserting that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is a good God but not just, whereas the God of the law and prophets is just but not good.¹ I think it necessary, therefore, to answer this point as briefly as I can. to answer

→ They reckon, then, that goodness is that sort of disposition by which one is led to do good to all, even when the recipient of the benefit is unworthy and does not deserve our kindness.

→ But, as it appears to me, they have not rightly applied this definition, for they think that no good is done to him who is visited with any sorrow or hardship. Justice, however, they suppose to be the sort of disposition which renders to every man according to his deserts. Yet here again they do not rightly interpret the meaning of their own definition. For they think that justice is to do evil to the evil and good to the good; that is, according to their meaning, that one who is just will not show himself well disposed to the evil, but will behave towards them with a kind of hatred;² and they collect all the stories they can find in the Old Testament to support this view, such for example, as the story of the flood and the punishment of those who are said to have been drowned in it (cf. Gn 7:4, 21–23), or how Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed by a devastating rain of fire and brimstone (cf. Gn 19:24, 25), or how all the children of Israel died in the desert on account of their sins, so that not one of those who had set out from Egypt was found to enter the promised land except Joshua and Caleb (cf. Nm 14:11–24, 30). From the New Testament, however, they gather those sayings of pity and gentleness which the Savior uttered when teaching his disciples and in which he is found to declare that “none is good save one, God the Father” (cf. Mk 10:18; Lk 18:19). Relying on this they have dared to call the Father of our Savior Jesus Christ the good God, but to say that the God of the world is a different being, whom they are pleased to term just, but not good.

Context 2. Now first of all we must, I think, demand of these people an answer to the following question. How, according to their own definition, can they show the Creator to be just in punishing according to their deserts those who perished at the time of the flood, or the men of Sodom, or those who set out from Egypt, when we sometimes see far more wicked and heinous crimes committed than those for which the above mentioned people were destroyed, but do not yet see every sinner paying the just penalty of his deeds? Will they say that he who once was just has now become good? Or will they prefer to adopt this opinion, that he is just now, but patiently bears with man's offences, whereas then he was not even just, when he exterminated innocent children and babes at the breast along with monstrous and impious giants? (Gn 6:1–7, 17; 7:21 ff.).³

Interpretation But they believe as they do because they are ignorant how to interpret any passage except literally. If this is not so, let them show how it is just, in a literal sense, for the sins of the parents to be visited on the heads of the children, and on the children's children after them, to the third and fourth generation? (cf. Ex 20:5, 34:7; Dt 5:9). We, however, do not understand such sayings in a literal sense, but as Ezekiel taught when he uttered his well-known “proverb” (cf. Ez 18:2, 3), we inquire what is the inner meaning of the proverb. Further, they ought also to explain this, how he can be just and one who “rewards every man according to his deserts” (Ps 62:12), when he punishes earthly-minded men and the devil, though they have committed nothing deserving of punishment; for if, as these men say, they were beings of an evil and ruined nature, they could not do anything good. And as for their calling him a judge, he would seem to be a judge not so much of deeds as of natures, if it be a fact that an evil nature cannot do good nor a good nature evil.

Then in the next place, if he whom they call good is good to all, undoubtedly he is good even to those who are destined to perish. Why then does he not save them? If he is unwilling, then he will not be good; if he is willing but cannot, he will not be almighty. On the other hand let them hear from the gospels how the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ “prepares fire for the devil and his angels” (Mt 25:41). How can a work like that, so punitive and sorrowful, be associated with the good God according to their interpretation? Further, the Savior himself, the Son of the good God, openly declares that “if signs and wonders had been done in Tyre and Sidon they would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes” (Mt 11:21). Yet when he came quite near to those very towns and had entered into their “borders” (cf. Mt 15:22), why, I ask, did he decline to enter their actual territories and show their people an abundance of “signs and wonders,” if it had been certain that as a result of such actions they would “repent in sackcloth and ashes”? As he certainly does not do this, without doubt he is abandoning to destruction men whom his very remark in the gospels shows not to have been of an evil and ruined nature; for he points out that they could have repented.

Moreover, in one of the gospel parables, when "the king enters in to see the guests" who had been invited, he sees "one not wearing a wedding garment" and says to him, "Friend, how earnest thou in hither not having on a wedding garment?" Then he says to the servants, "Bind him hand and foot and cast him forth into the outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (cf. Mt 22:11-13). Let them tell us; who is this "king" who entered in to see the guests, and finding one in mean garments commands him to be bound by his servants and thrust into the outer darkness? Is it indeed he whom they call "just"? If so, why had he ordered "good and bad" to be invited, and not directed his servants to inquire into their merits? This conduct certainly indicates the disposition not, as they say, of one who is merely just and who "rewards according to merit" (cf. Ps 62:12), but of one who shows impartial kindness to all. If, however, it is necessary to understand this passage as referring to the good God, that is, either to Christ or to the Father of Christ, what more is there to object to even in the just God? Nay, what action is there which they can charge against the God of the law comparable to this, that he commanded the man, who had been invited by the servants sent by himself to call both good and bad, to be bound hand and foot and flung into the outer darkness, because of the mean garments he was wearing?

3. These arguments, which we have drawn from the authority of the scriptures, ought to suffice for the refutation of those points which the heretics are accustomed to urge. It will not seem unfitting, however, if we discuss the matter with them in a few words from the standpoint of logical reasoning also. Let us ask them, therefore, whether they know what theory of virtue and wickedness is held by men, and whether it seems logical to speak of virtues in God, or, as they think, in these two gods. Let them also answer this question: if they think that goodness is one virtue, which I take it they will undoubtedly admit, what do they say about justice? They will certainly never be so foolish, I think, as to deny that justice is a virtue. Therefore, if a virtue is something good, and justice is a virtue, undoubtedly justice is goodness. If, however, they should say that justice is not something good, the alternative is either something bad, or something indifferent. Now I consider it would be stupid to answer men who said that justice was something bad; I should appear to be answering either senseless arguments or men of unsound mind. For how could that be something bad, which, as even our opponents will admit, can render good to those who are good? But if they should say it is a thing indifferent, it follows that, since justice is indifferent, then temperance and prudence and the rest of the virtues will also be accounted indifferent. What then shall we reply to Paul when he says, "If there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things, which ye both learned and received and heard and saw in me" (Phil 4:8, 9).

Let them, therefore, search the divine scriptures and tell us what the various virtues are, and not hide behind this statement of theirs that the God who "renders to each man according to his desert" renders ill to the evil out of hatred towards them; when the truth is that those who have sinned need severer remedies for their cure, and it is for this reason that he brings upon them the afflictions which, though aiming at improvement, seem at the moment to convey a sense of pain. They do not read what is written about the hope of those who perished in the flood, of which hope Peter in his first epistle speaks as follows: "Because Christ was put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit; in which he went and preached to the spirits who were held in prison, who were aforetime disbelieving, when the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is eight souls, were saved by water, as also by a like figure baptism now saves you" (1 Pt 3:18–21).

And in regard to Sodom and Gomorrah, let them tell us whether they believe the words of the prophets to come from God the Creator, from him, that is, who is related to have "rained upon them a shower of fire and brimstone" (Gn 19:24). What does the prophet Ezekiel say of them? "Sodom shall be restored to her former estate" (Ez 16:55). And when God afflicts those who deserve punishment, how else is it except for their good? It is he who says to the Chaldaean: "Thou hast coals of fire; sit upon them; They shall be a help to thee" (Is 47:14, 15 [LXX]). Further, let them hear what is related in the seventy-seventh psalm, which is ascribed to Asaph, about those who fell in the desert; it says, "When he slew them, then they sought him" (Ps 78:34). It does not say that some sought him after others had been killed, but that those who were slain perished in such a manner that when put to death they sought God. From all these illustrations it is plain that the just and good God of the law and the gospels is one and the same, and that he does good with justice and punishes in kindness, since neither goodness without justice nor justice without goodness can describe the dignity of the divine nature.

Let us add also the following remarks, which are necessitated by their subtle arguments. If the just is different from the good, then since evil is the opposite of good and unjust of just, undoubtedly the unjust will be different from the evil; and as the just man according to you is not good, so neither will the unjust man be evil; and again, as the good man is not just, so also the evil man will not be unjust. And how can it be anything but absurd that the good God should have an opponent who is evil, whereas the just God, whom they say is inferior to the good one, has no opponent? For Satan is called evil, but there is no other corresponding to him who is called unjust. What then shall we do? Let us retrace the steps of our argument to the point from which we started. They will not be able to say that the evil man is not unjust and the unjust man not evil? If, however, in these opposites injustice is inseparably associated with evil and evil with injustice, then undoubtedly the good man will be inseparably associated with the just and the just with the good; so that as we call evil and injustice one and the same wickedness, we should hold goodness and justice to be one and the same virtue.

4. But once again they recall us to the words of scripture, quoting that famous question of theirs. They say: it is written that "a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can an evil tree bring forth good fruit; for a tree is known by its fruit."⁴ What do you make of this, they say? What sort of a tree the law is, is shown by its fruits, that is, by the words of its precepts. For if the law is found to be good, undoubtedly we shall believe that he who gave it is a good God; if, however, it is just rather than good, we shall think of God as a just lawgiver. But Paul the apostle says in no roundabout terms, "The law then is good, and the commandment holy and just and good" (Rom 7:12). It is plain from this that Paul had not learned the doctrines of those who separate the just from the good, but had been instructed by that God and illuminated by the spirit of that God who is at the same time both "holy and good and just," and that it was through his spirit that he spoke when he said that "the commandment of the law is holy and just and good." And in order to show the more clearly that goodness was in the commandment to a greater degree than justice and holiness, in repeating the passage he used goodness alone instead of the three words, when he says, "Is then that which is good death to me? God forbid" (Rom 7:13). He knew, of course, that goodness is the general term for the virtues, while justice and holiness are particular kinds of goodness; and so, where in his former words he had mentioned the general together with the particular, in repeating the passage he fell back on the general term alone.

Further, in the words that follow Paul says, "Sin worked death in me through that which is good" (Rom 7:13). Here he includes in the general term that which before he had described by means of the particular terms. It is in this way also that we must understand the saying, "the good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good, and the evil man out of his evil treasure brings forth evil" (Lk 6:45); for here, too, good and evil are taken in the general sense, the term "good man" undoubtedly indicating both justice and temperance, prudence and piety and everything which can be spoken of or understood as good. Similarly also does it speak of the "evil man," who undoubtedly would be unjust and impure and everything else that in different ways disfigures the "evil man." For just as nobody thinks anyone to be an evil man, nor can he be evil, apart from these works of wickedness, so it is certain that nobody will be thought to be good apart from the opposite virtues.

There still remains to them the passage in the gospel, which they think is as it were specially given to them for a shield, where the Lord said, "None is good save one, God the Father" (cf. Mk 10:18; Lk 18:18).⁵ This, they say, is the proper description of the Father of Christ, who is a different being from God the creator of all things, to which creator Christ gave no title indicating goodness. Let us see, therefore, whether in the Old Testament the God of the prophets and the creator of the world and the lawgiver is not spoken of as good. What is it that is said in the Psalms, "How good is God to Israel, to the upright in heart!" (Ps 73:1) and, "Let Israel now say that he is good, that his mercy endureth forever" (Ps 118:2). And in the Lamentations of Jeremiah it is written, "The Lord is good to those who wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him" (Lam 3:25). As then God is frequently called good in the Old Testament, so too the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is called just in the gospels. Indeed, in the gospel according to John our Lord himself when praying to the Father says, "O just Father, the world hath not known thee" (Jn 17:25). And lest they should say that it was the creator of the world whom our Lord, because he had taken human flesh, called Father, and that it was he whom he termed just, they are prevented by the sentence which immediately follows; for he says, "The world hath not known thee." For according to them it is only the good God whom the world does not know; it most certainly recognizes its founder, as the Lord himself says, "The world loves what is its own" (Jn 15:19). Clearly, then, he whom they think to be the good God is said in the gospels to be just. And when time permits we shall be able to collect still more passages where in the New Testament the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is called just, and where in the Old Testament the creator of heaven and earth is called good, so that the heretics, convinced by the multitude of proofs, may at length perchance blush for shame.

THE INCARNATION OF CHRIST

- Lord and Saviour

1. Now that these points have been discussed, it is time to resume our inquiry into the incarnation of our Lord and Saviour, how he became man and dwelt among men. We have considered, to the best of our small ability, the divine nature, from a contemplation of his own works rather than from our feelings, and while beholding his visible creatures we have also by faith contemplated those that are invisible. For human frailty can neither see everything with the eyes nor comprehend everything by reason, since we men are beings weaker and frailer than all other rational creatures, those that dwell in heaven or above the heavens surpassing us in excellence. Our next task is to inquire about him who stands midway between all these creatures and God, that is, the Mediator (cf. 1 Tm 2:5), whom the apostle Paul declares to be the "firstborn of all creation" (Col 1:15). And when we see what is related in the holy scriptures of his majesty, and perceive that he is called the "image of the invisible God" and the "firstborn of all creation," and that "in him were created all things visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers, all were created through him and in him, and he is before all, and in him all things consist" (cf. Col 1:15-17), who is the "head of all," having as his head only God the Father, as it is written,

"the head of Christ is God" (cf. 1 Cor 11:3); and when we see too that it is written, "No man knoweth the Father save the Son, nor doth any know the Son save the Father" (Mt 11:27)—for who can know what "wisdom" is, except him who brought it into being; or who knows for certain what "truth" is, except the Father of truth; who indeed could trace out the universal nature of his "Word" and of that God who is from God except God alone "with whom the Word was" (cf. Jn 1:1)?—we ought to hold it as certain that none else save the Father alone knows this Word (or reason, if he should be so called), this wisdom, this truth, of whom it is written, "I suppose that not even the world itself could contain the books which should be written" (Jn 21:25), about the glory, that is, and about the majesty of the Son of God. For it is impossible to put into writing all that belongs to the Savior's glory.

When, therefore, we consider these great and marvelous truths about the nature of the Son of God, we are lost in the deepest amazement that such a being, towering high above all, should have "emptied himself" (Phil 2:7) of his majestic condition and become man and dwelt among men, a fact which is evidenced by the "grace poured upon his lips" (Ps 45:3) and by the witness which the heavenly Father bore him (cf. Mt 3:17; Lk 3:22) and confirmed by the signs and wonders and mighty deeds which he did. And before that personal appearance which he manifested in the body, he sent the prophets as heralds and messengers of his coming; while after his ascension into the heavens he caused the holy apostles, unlearned and ignorant men from the ranks of tax-gatherers or fishermen but filled with his divine power, to travel throughout the world, in order to gather together out of every nation and all races a people composed of devout believers in him.

2. But of all the marvelous and splendid things about him there is one that utterly transcends the limits of human wonder and is beyond the capacity of our weak mortal intelligence to think of or understand, namely, how this mighty power of the divine majesty, the very word of the Father, and the very wisdom of God, in which were created "all things visible and invisible" (Col 1:16), can be believed to have existed within the compass of that man who appeared in Judaea; yes, and how the wisdom of God can have entered into a woman's womb and been born as a little child and uttered noises like those of crying children; and further, how it was that he was troubled, as we are told, in the hour of death, as he himself confesses when he says, "My soul is sorrowful even unto death" (Mt 26:38; Mk 14:34); and how at the last he was led to that death which is considered by men to be the most shameful of all,—even though on the third day he rose again.

When, therefore, we see in him some things so human that they appear in no way to differ from the common frailty of mortals, and some things so divine that they are appropriate to nothing else but the primal and ineffable nature of deity, the human understanding with its narrow limits is baffled, and struck with amazement at so mighty a wonder knows not which way to turn, what to hold to, or whither to betake itself. If it thinks of God, it sees a man; if it thinks of a man, it beholds one returning from the dead with spoils after vanquishing the kingdom of death. For this reason we must pursue our contemplation with all fear and reverence, as we seek to prove how the reality of each nature exists in one and the same person, in such a way that nothing unworthy or unfitting may be thought to reside in that divine and ineffable existence, nor on the other hand may the events of his life be supposed to be the illusions caused by deceptive fantasies.¹ But to utter these things in human ears and to explain them by words far exceeds the powers we possess either in our moral worth or in mind and speech. I think indeed that it transcends the capacity even of the holy apostles; nay more, perhaps the explanation of this mystery lies beyond the reach of the whole creation of heavenly beings. It is then in no spirit of rashness, but solely in response to the demands of our inquiry at this stage, that we shall state in the fewest possible words that we may term the content of our faith concerning him rather than anything which needs to be proved by arguments of human reason, bringing before you our suppositions rather than any clear affirmations.

3. The only-begotten Son of God, therefore, through whom, as the course of our discussion in the previous chapters has shown, "all things visible and invisible were made" (Col 1:16), according to the teaching of scripture both made all things and "loves what he made" (cf. Wis 11:24). For since he is the invisible "image" of the "invisible God" (Col 1:15), he granted invisibly to all rational creatures whatsoever a participation in himself, in such a way that each obtained a degree of participation proportionate to the loving affection with which he had clung to him. But whereas, by reason of the faculty of free will, variety and diversity had taken hold of individual souls, so that one was attached to its author with a warmer and another with a feebler and weaker love, that soul of which Jesus said, "No man taketh from me my soul" (Jn 10:18),² clinging to God from the beginning of the creation and ever after in a union inseparable and indissoluble, as being the soul of the wisdom and word of God and of the truth and the true light, and receiving him wholly, and itself entering into his light and splendor, was made with him in a pre-eminent degree one spirit, just as the apostle promises to them whose duty it is to imitate Jesus, that "he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit" (1 Cor 6:17). This soul, then, acting as a medium between God and the flesh (for it was not possible for the nature of God to mingle with a body apart from some medium), there is born, as we said, the God-man, the medium being that existence to whose nature it was not contrary to assume a body. Yet neither, on the other hand, was it contrary to nature for that soul, being as it was a rational existence, to receive God, into whom, as we said above, it had already completely entered by entering into the word and wisdom and truth.

It is therefore right that this soul, either because it was wholly in the Son of God, or because it received the Son of God wholly into itself, should itself be called, along with that flesh which it has taken, the Son of God and the power of God, Christ and the wisdom of God; and on the other hand that the Son of God, "through whom all things were created," should be termed Jesus and the Son of man. Moreover the Son of God is said to have died, in virtue of that nature which could certainly admit of death, while he of whom it is proclaimed that "he shall come in the glory of God the Father with the holy angels" is called the Son of man (cf. Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26).³ And for this reason, throughout the whole of scripture, while the divine nature is spoken of in human terms the human nature is in its turn adorned with marks that belong to the divine prerogative. For to this more than to anything else can the passage of Scripture be applied, "They shall both be in one flesh, and they are no longer two, but one flesh" (cf. Mt 19:5, 6; Gn 2:24). For the Word of God is to be thought of as being more "in one flesh" with his soul than a man is with his wife. Moreover what could more appropriately be "one spirit" (cf. 1 Cor 6:17) with God than this soul, which joined itself so firmly in love to God as to be worthy of being called "one spirit" with him?

4. To⁴ prove that it was the perfection of his love and the sincerity of his true affection which gained for him this inseparable unity with God, so that the taking up of his soul was neither accidental nor the result of personal preference, but was a privilege conferred upon it as a reward for its virtues, listen to the prophet speaking to it thus; "Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity; wherefore God hath anointed thee, thy God with the oil of gladness above thy fellows" (Ps 45:7).

As a reward for its love, therefore, it is anointed with the "oil of gladness," that is the soul with the word of God is made Christ; for to be anointed with the oil of gladness means nothing else but to be filled with the Holy Spirit. And when he says, "above thy fellows," he indicates that the grace of the Spirit was not given to it as to the prophets, but that the essential "fullness" of the Word of God himself was within it, as the apostle said, "In him dwelleth all the fullness of the godhead bodily" (Col 2:9). Finally, this is the reason why he not only said, "Thou hast loved righteousness," but added, "and hated iniquity." For to hate iniquity is the same thing which the scripture says of him: "He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth" (1 Pt 2:22); and again, "He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb 4:15). Further, the Lord himself says, "which of you convicteth me of sin?" (Jn 8:46). And again he says of himself, "Lo, the prince of this world cometh and findeth nothing in me" (Jn 14:30). All of which shows that no consciousness of sin existed in him. And the prophet, in order the more clearly to point out this fact, that the consciousness of iniquity had never entered his mind, says, "Before the boy could know how to call for his father or mother, he turned himself from iniquity" (Is 8:4, 7:16).

5. But if the above argument, that there exists in Christ a rational soul, should seem to anyone to constitute a difficulty, on the ground that in the course of our discussion we have often shown that souls are by their nature capable of good and evil, we shall resolve the difficulty in the following manner. It cannot be doubted that the nature of his soul was the same as that of all souls; otherwise it could not be called a soul, if it were not truly one. But since the ability to choose good or evil is within the immediate reach of all, this soul which belongs to Christ so chose to love righteousness as to cling to it unchangeably and inseparably in accordance with the immensity of its love; the result being that by firmness of purpose, immensity of affection and an inextinguishable warmth of love all susceptibility to change or alteration was destroyed, and what formerly depended upon the will was by the influence of long custom changed into nature. Thus we must believe that there did exist in Christ a human and rational soul, and yet not suppose that it had any susceptibility to or possibility of sin.

6. To explain the matter more fully it will not appear absurd if we use an illustration, although on so high and difficult a subject there is but a small supply of suitable examples. However, if we may use this one without offence, the metal iron is susceptible of both cold and heat. Suppose then a lump of iron be placed for some time in a fire. It receives the fire in all its pores and all its veins, and becomes completely changed into fire, provided the fire is never removed from it and itself is not separated from the fire. Are we then to say that this, which is by nature a lump of iron, when placed in the fire and ceaselessly burning can ever admit cold? Certainly not; it is far truer to say of it, what indeed we often detect happening in furnaces, that it has been completely changed into fire, because we can discern nothing else in it except fire. Further, if anyone were to try to touch or handle it, he would feel the power of the fire, not of the iron. In this manner, then, that soul which, like a piece of iron in the fire, was forever placed in the word, forever in the wisdom, forever in God, is God in all its acts and feelings and thoughts; and therefore it cannot be called changeable or alterable, since by being ceaselessly kindled it came to possess unchangeability through its unity with the word God. And while, indeed, some warmth of the Word of God must be thought to have reached all the saints, in this soul we must believe that the divine fire itself essentially rested, and that it is from this that some warmth has come to all others.

The very fact, too, that it says, "God anointed thee, thy God with the oil of gladness above thy fellows" (Ps 45:7), shows that that soul is anointed with the "oil of gladness," that is, with the word of God and with wisdom, in one way, and his "fellows," it is, the holy prophets and apostles, in another. For the latter are said "to have run in the odor of his ointments" (cf. Sg 1:3 [Vulg.]), but that soul was the vase containing the ointment itself, of whose glowing effluence all the prophets and apostles became worthy partakers. As therefore the odor of the ointment is one thing and the substance of the ointment another, so Christ is one thing and his fellows another. And as the vessel which contains the substance of the ointment can by no means admit any foul smell, whereas it is possible for those who share in its odor, if they move a little farther away from its glowing effluence, to admit any foul smell that meets them, so it was impossible for Christ, who is like the vase itself in which the substance of the ointment lay, to admit an odor of an opposite kind, whereas his fellows will be partakers and receivers of his odor in proportion to their nearness to the vase.

7. I think, too, that the prophet Jeremiah understood what is the nature of the wisdom of God in him, which was also the nature he had assumed for the salvation of the world, when he said: "The breath of our countenance is Christ the Lord, of whom we said that we shall live under his shadow among the nations" (Lam 4:20). For just as the shadow of our body is inseparable from the body and unswervingly undertakes and performs the movements and gestures of the body, so I think the prophet wished to allude to the action and movement of Christ's soul, which was inseparably attached to him and performed everything in accordance with his own movement and volition, and that it was this which he called the "shadow of Christ" the Lord, under which shadow we were to "live among the nations." For the nations which imitate that soul through faith and so reach salvation, live in the mystery of this assumption. Moreover when David says, "Be mindful of my reproach, O Lord, wherewith they have reproached me in the stead of thy Christ" (Ps 89:51, 52 [Vulg. 88:51, 52]), he appears to me to allude to the same thing. And what else does Paul mean when he says, "Our life is hid with Christ in God" (Col 3:3). Also in another place he says, "Do you seek a proof of him who speaks in me, that is, Christ?" (2 Cor 13:3). Yet again, he says that Christ is "hid in God" (Eph 3:9). Unless the meaning of this expression be something like that which, as we said above, was indicated by the prophet in the phrase "the shadow of Christ," it probably exceeds the comprehension of the human mind.

We see moreover many other statements in the divine scriptures which bear upon the interpretation of the word "shadow"; such as that in the gospel according to Luke, where Gabriel says to Mary, "The Spirit of the Lord shall come upon thee and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee" (Lk 1:35). The apostle also, speaking in regard to the law, says that they who hold to the circumcision of the flesh "serve a copy and shadow of the heavenly things" (Heb 8:5). And in another place it says, "Is not our life on the earth a shadow?" (cf. Jb 8:9). If then both the law which is on the earth is a "shadow," and we are to live among the nations in the "shadow of Christ," we must consider whether the truth of all these shadows will not be learned in that revelation when, no longer

 "through a mirror and in a riddle" but "face to face" (cf. 1 Cor 13:12), all the saints shall be counted worthy to behold the glory of God and the causes and truth of things. And seeing that a pledge of this truth has already been received through the Holy Spirit (cf. 2 Cor 5:5) the apostle said, "Even if we have formerly known Christ after the flesh, yet henceforth we know him so no more" (2 Cor 5:16). See P. 1.

In the meantime, these are the thoughts which occur to us at the moment in our discussion of such very difficult subjects as the incarnation and deity of Christ. If there be anyone who can discover something better and prove what he says by clearer statements out of the holy scriptures, let his opinion be accepted in preference to mine.

Chapter VII

165

1. After the first discussions which, as the subject demanded, we entered into at the beginning concerning the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, it seemed that we ought to go back again and prove that the same God was creator and founder of the world and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, that there is one and the same God of the law, the prophets and the gospels. Then also in regard to Christ, who had previously been shown to be the word and wisdom of God, we had to demonstrate in the succeeding chapters how he became man. Our remaining task is to return as briefly as possible to the subject of the Holy Spirit.

126

Holy Spirit

It is time, therefore, for us to discuss to the best of our ability a few points about the Holy Spirit, whom our Lord and Savior in the gospel according to John called the Paraclete (Jn 14:16, etc.). Now just as it is the same God himself and the same Christ himself, so also it is the same Holy Spirit himself who was in the prophets and the apostles, that is, both in those who believed in God before the coming of Christ and in those who have taken refuge in God through Christ. We have heard of heretics who have dared to say that there are two Gods or two Christs, but we have never heard it maintained by anyone that there are two Holy Spirits.¹ For how could they affirm this from the scriptures, or what distinction could they make between one Holy Spirit and the other, even supposing it were possible to discover any definition or description of the Holy Spirit? For granting that Marcion or Valentinus can draw distinctions in regard to deity and describe the nature of the good as one thing and the nature of the just as another, what reasonings or devices will warrant their introducing distinctions into the Holy Spirit? I think they can find nothing that points to any distinction whatsoever.

2. Now we are of opinion that every rational creature receives without any difference a share in the Holy Spirit just as in the wisdom of God and the word of God.² I see, however, that the special coming of the Holy Spirit to men is declared to have happened after Christ's ascension into heaven rather than before his coming into the world. Before that time the gift of the Holy Spirit was bestowed on prophets only and on a few others among the people who happened to have proved worthy of it; but after the coming of the Savior it is written that "the saying was fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet Joel," namely, that "it shall come to pass in the last days, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh and they shall prophesy" (Acts 2:16, 17; Jl 2:28); which indeed is similar to that other saying, "All nations shall serve him" (Ps 72:11).

Through the grace of the Holy Spirit, then, along with many other results, this most splendid fact is revealed, that whereas the truths written in the prophets and the law of Moses were formerly understood by very few, namely by the prophets alone, and scarcely anywhere was there one out of the whole people who could get beyond the literal meaning and perceive something greater, that is, could detect a spiritual sense in the law and prophets, now there are innumerable multitudes of believers who, although unable to explain logically and clearly the process of their spiritual perception, have yet almost to a man the firm conviction that circumcision ought not to be understood literally, nor the Sabbath rest, nor the pouring out of an animal's blood, nor the fact that oracles were given by God to Moses on these points; and there is no doubt that this discernment is suggested to them all by the power of the Holy Spirit.³

3. But just as there are many ways of apprehending Christ, who although he is wisdom, does not exert or possess the power of wisdom in all men, but only in those who apply themselves to wisdom in him; nor, although he is called a physician, does he act as such towards all men, but only towards those who have realized their feeble and sick condition and fly to his compassion in the hope of obtaining health; so, too, I think, is it the case with the Holy Spirit, in whom is every manner of gift. For to some is granted by the Spirit the word of wisdom, to others the word of knowledge, to others faith; and thus to each individual man who is able to receive him the same Spirit becomes and is apprehended as the very thing of which he, who has been deemed worthy to partake of him, stands in need (cf. 1 Cor 12:8, 9).

These divisions and distinctions are unperceived by those who, hearing him called in the gospels the Paraclete (Jn 14:16, etc.), but not considering from what work or activity he takes this name, have likened him to some common spirits or other and by so doing have tried to disturb the churches of Christ even to the point of arousing no small dissensions among the brethren. But the gospel shows him to be of such power and majesty that it says the apostles could not yet receive those truths which the Savior wished to teach them until the time "when the Holy Spirit should come" (Jn 16:12-14), who would pour himself into their souls and to enlighten them, concerning the nature and faith of the Trinity. The men in question, however, owing to the poverty of their understanding, which renders them not only incapable of logically setting forth the truth themselves, but unable even to pay proper attention to what is said by us, have entertained low and unworthy views of his deity and so delivered themselves over to errors and deceits under the malign influence of some spirit of error rather than the wise precepts of the Holy Spirit, according to the saying of the apostle, "Following the doctrine of daemon spirits, who forbid to marry," "to the ruin and destruction of many," and "urging to abstain from meats" (cf. 1 Tm 4:1 and Lk 2:34 [Vg.]), in order that by the outward show of stricter observances they may lead astray the souls of the innocent.

 4. We must know, therefore, that the Paraclete is the Holy Spirit, who teaches truths greater than can be uttered by the voice, truths which are, if I may so say, "unspeakable," and which "it is not lawful for a man to speak" (2 Cor 12:4), that is, which cannot be indicated in human language. For the phrase "not lawful" was spoken, we believe, by Paul as the equivalent of "not possible," as in the place where he says, "all things are lawful, but all things do not edify" (1 Cor 10:23). Those things, that is, which are within our power because we can have them, he speaks of as being "lawful" for us. But the Paraclete, who is called the Holy Spirit, is so called from his work of "consolation" (paraclesis being termed in Latin consolatio); for anyone who has been deemed worthy to partake of the Holy Spirit, when he has learned his unspeakable mysteries, undoubtedly obtains consolation and gladness of heart. Since by the Spirit's guidance he has come to know the reasons for all things that happen, and why and how they happen, his soul can never be in any way disquieted or admit any feeling of sadness (cf. Jn 14:26, 27); nor is it in anything affrighted, for it clings to God's word and wisdom and "in the Holy Spirit calls Jesus Lord" (cf. 1 Cor 12:3).

Word <=> H. Spirit

We have made mention, then, of the Paraclete and to the best of our ability have explained how we ought to think about him. But in the epistle of John our Savior is also called a "paraclete," when it says, "If any man sin, we have a paraclete with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins."⁴ Let us then consider whether perhaps this title "paraclete" means one thing when applied to the Savior and another when applied to the Holy Spirit. Now in regard to the Savior "paraclete" seems to mean intercessor; for in Greek it bears both meanings, comforter and intercessor, but according to the phrase that follows, in which it says that "he is the propitiation for our sins" (1 Jn 2:1, 2), it seems that in the case of the Savior the word "paraclete" must be understood rather in the sense of intercessor, for he is said to intercede with the Father "for our sins." When used of the Holy Spirit, however, the word "paraclete" ought to be understood as "comforter," because he provides comfort for the souls to whom he opens and reveals a consciousness of spiritual knowledge.⁵

Chapter VIII

THE SOUL

1. After this, the course of our inquiry demands that we should deal in a general way with the soul, beginning with souls of a lower and rising to those of a higher order. No one, I suppose, will doubt that all living creatures whatever, even those that live in water, have souls. This view is supported by the general opinion of men and confirmed in addition by the authority of holy scripture, when it says that "God made great whales and every soul of the living creatures that swim, which the waters brought forth after their kind" (Gn 1:21). It is confirmed also, from the common light of reason, by those who lay down a definition of the soul in precise terms. For soul is defined thus, as an existence possessing imagination and desire, which qualities can be expressed in Latin, though the rendering is not so apt as the original, by the phrase, capable of feeling and movement.¹ This may be said of all living creatures, including those that live in water, and the same definition of soul may be shown to apply to birds also. Scripture, too, adds the authority of another pronouncement when it says, "Ye shall not eat the blood, for the soul of all flesh is its blood, and ye shall not eat the soul with the flesh" (cf. Lv 17:14); in which it most plainly describes the blood of all living creatures as their "soul." And if, in regard to the saying that "the soul of all flesh is its blood," anyone should now raise the question of bees, wasps and ants, as well as those creatures that live in water, oysters, cockles and the rest, which have no blood and yet are most clearly seen to be living creatures, we must reply that the same force which in others is due to the energy of the red blood is exerted in creatures of this kind by that fluid which exists in them, though it be of a different color; for it matters not at all what color it is, so long as the substance is endowed with life. As for beasts of burden and cattle, however, even common opinion has no hesitation in admitting that they possess souls. Nevertheless the teaching of scripture is clear, when God says, "Let the earth bring forth the living soul after its kind, four-footed beasts and creeping things and beasts of the earth after their kind" (Gn 1:24). Then in regard to man, although no one has any doubt nor could anyone raise a question about it, yet the divine scripture declares that "God breathed into his face the breath of life, and man became a living soul" (Gn 2:7).

It remains for us to inquire concerning the order of angels, whether they too possess souls or are souls, and also concerning the other divine and heavenly beings including the opposing powers. Nowhere do we find any authority of divine scripture for saying that either angels or any other divine beings who are God's "ministering spirits" (Heb 1:14) possess souls or are called souls; and yet they are believed by very many to be endowed with souls. But in regard to God we find it written as follows: "And I will put my soul upon that soul that has eaten blood, and I will root it out from among my people" (Lv 17:10). And again elsewhere: "Your new moons and sabbaths and great days I will not accept. Your fasts and holidays and feast days my soul hateth" (Is 1:13, 14). And in the twenty-first psalm it speaks thus of Christ—for it is certain that this psalm is composed in the person of Christ, as the gospel bears witness (cf. Mk 15:34 and par.)—"But thou, Lord, be not far from my help, look to my defense; deliver my soul from the sword, my beloved one from the hand of the dog" (Ps 22:20, 21 [Eng.]). There are, however, many other testimonies to the soul that Christ had when he dwelt in the flesh.

2. But all question about the soul of Christ is removed when we consider the nature of the incarnation. For just as he truly had flesh, so also he truly had a soul. As for that, indeed, which is called in the scriptures the "soul of God" (Is 1:14; 42:1, etc.), it is difficult both to think and to state how it ought to be understood; for at the same time we declare that the nature of God is simple and has no intermixture of any additional substance. Still, however we are to think of it, the fact remains that it is apparently called "the soul of God." In regard to Christ, however, there is no doubt. And on that account I see no absurdity in holding or expressing some similar view concerning the holy angels and the other heavenly powers, if we grant that the above-mentioned definition of the soul appears to apply to them. For who can rationally deny that they are capable of feeling and of movement? If then the definition, that an existence which is rationally capable of feeling and movement is called a soul, appears to be correct, the same definition appears to apply to the angels also. For what else is there in them but rational feeling and movement? And things which have one definition have also undoubtedly the same substance. The apostle Paul indeed intimates that there is a kind of soul-like man, whom he says "cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God" (cf. 1 Cor 2:14),² but to whom the doctrine of the Spirit of God appears foolish, and he cannot understand it because it is "spiritually discerned." Also in another place he says: "It is sown a soul-like body" and rises a "spiritual body" (1 Cor 15:44), thus showing that at the resurrection of the just there will be nothing soul-like in those who have been counted worthy of the life of the blessed.

On this account we ask whether there is not some substance which, in so far as it is soul, is imperfect. But whether it is imperfect for this reason, that it falls away from perfection, or whether it was so made by God, we shall inquire when each separate point begins to be discussed in order. For if the soul-like man "does not receive the things of the Spirit of God," and just because he is soul-like cannot receive the knowledge of a better nature, namely the divine, here is perhaps the reason why Paul, in his desire to teach us plainly what it is through which we can understand the things of the Spirit, that is, spiritual things, joins and associates the mind rather than the soul with the Holy Spirit. For this is what I suppose him to indicate when he says, "I will pray with the spirit, I will pray with the mind also. I will sing a psalm with the spirit, I will sing a psalm with the mind also" (1 Cor 14:15). He does not say, I will pray with the soul, but with the spirit and the mind; not, sing with the soul, but sing with the spirit and the mind.

3. But perhaps it will be asked: If it is the mind, which with the spirit prays and sings, and the mind also which receives perfection and salvation, how is it that Peter says, "Receiving the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls" (1 Pt 1:9)? If the soul neither prays nor sings with the spirit, how shall it hope for salvation? Or, if it should attain to blessedness, will it no longer be called a soul? Let us see whether, perhaps, this point may be answered in the following manner, that just³ as the Savior came to save that which was lost (cf. Lk 19:10), and then when it is saved, that which was said to be lost is not lost; so also perhaps that which is being saved is called a soul, but when it has been saved it will be called by the name of its more perfect part. Some, too, will think that this point can be added, that just as that which was lost, undoubtedly existed before it was lost, when it was something, I know not what, other than lost, and just as there will also certainly be a time when it will not be lost; so the soul, which is said to have become lost, will apparently have been something at a time when it was not yet lost and may have been called a soul from the fact of its becoming lost, but when delivered from its lost condition it can once again be that which it was before it became lost and was called a soul.

Further, certain careful investigators have concluded that an interpretation of no slight importance is suggested by the very meaning of the word soul as indicated in its Greek form. For a divine saying speaks of God as a fire, saying, "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb 12:29; Dt 4:24, 9:3). Moreover, Scripture also speaks as follows concerning the nature of the angels: "Who maketh his angels spirits and his ministers a burning fire" (Heb 1:7; Ps 104:4); and elsewhere, "The angel of the Lord appeared in a flame of fire in a bush" (Ex 3:2). In addition we have received a command to be "fervent in spirit" (Rom 12:11), by which expression undoubtedly the word of God is proved to be hot and fiery. Further, the prophet Jeremiah hears from him who gave him the oracles, "Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth as fire" (Jer 5:14).

As therefore God is "fire" and the angels "a flame of fire" and the saints are all "fervent in spirit," so on the contrary those who have fallen away from the love of God must undoubtedly be said to have cooled in their affection for him and to have become cold. For the Lord also says, "Because iniquity has multiplied, the love of the many shall grow cold" (Mt 24:12). And further, all those things, whatever they may be, which in the holy scripture are likened to the adverse power, you invariably find to be cold. For the devil is called a "serpent" and a "dragon" (cf. Rv 12:9, 20:2), and what can be found colder than these? Again, a dragon, an allusion, certainly, to one of the wicked spirits, is said to reign in the waters, while a prophet declares him to live in the sea (cf. Ez 29:3, 32:2).

And elsewhere a prophet says, "I will draw my holy sword upon the dragon, the flying serpent, upon the dragon, the crooked serpent, and it shall slay him" (Is 27:1); and again it says, "Even though they hide from mine eyes and descend into the depth of the sea, there will I command the dragon and he shall bite them" (Am 9:3). In Job also he is said to be the "king of all things which are in the waters" (cf. Jb 41:25 [26] LXX). A prophet declares that "evils shall be kindled from the north upon all who dwell on the earth" (cf. Jer 1:14). Now the north wind is described in the scriptures as cold, as it is written in Wisdom, "the cold north wind" (Sir 43:20).⁴ This then must undoubtedly be understood of the devil. If therefore the things which are holy are termed fire and light and fervent things while their opposites are termed cold, and the love of sinners is said to grow cold, we must ask whether perhaps even the word soul, which in Greek is psyche, was not formed from psychesthai, with the idea of growing cold after having been in a diviner and better state, and whether it was not derived from thence because the soul seems to have grown cold by the loss of its first natural and divine warmth and on that account to have been placed in its present state with its present designation.⁵

Finally, see whether you can easily find in the holy scriptures a place where the soul is described in real terms of praise. Expressions of blame, on the contrary, occur frequently, as here: "An evil soul destroys him that possesses it" (Sir 6:4), and, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ez 18:4). For after it has been said, "All souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so the soul of the son is mine" (Ez 18:4), it certainly seems to follow that he would say, "The soul that doeth righteousness, it shall be saved, and the soul that sinneth, it shall die." Yet in this instance we see that he has associated with the soul the fact of blame, but as to anything worthy of praise he is silent. We must see, therefore, whether perchance, as we said was made clear by its very name, the psyche or soul was so called from its having cooled from the fervor of the righteous⁶ and from its participation in the divine fire, and yet has not lost the power of restoring itself to that condition of fervor in which it was at the beginning. Some such fact the prophet appears to point to when he says, "Turn unto thy rest, O my soul" (Ps 116:7).⁷ All these considerations seem to show that when the mind departed from its original condition and dignity it became or was termed a soul, and if ever it is restored and corrected it returns to the condition of being a mind.⁸

4. Now if this is so, it seems to me that the departure and downward course of the mind must not be thought of as equal in all cases, but as a greater or less degree of change into soul, and that some minds retain a portion of their original vigor, while others retain none or only a very little. This is the reason why some are found right from their earliest years to be of ardent keenness, while others are duller, and some are born extremely dense and altogether unteachable. This statement of ours, however, that mind is changed into soul, or anything else that seems to point in that direction, the reader must carefully consider and work out for himself; for we must not be supposed to put these forward as settled doctrines, but as subjects for inquiry and discussion.

The reader must also take this point into consideration, that of the passages in the gospels which concern the soul of the Saviour, it is noticeable that some refer to it under the name of soul and others under the name of spirit. When scripture wishes to indicate any suffering or trouble that affected him, it does so under the name soul, as when it says: "Now is my soul troubled" (Jn 12:27), and "My soul is sorrowful even unto death" (Mt 26:38 and par.), and "No one taketh my soul from me, but I lay it down of myself" (Jn 10:18). On the other hand he commends "into his Father's hands" not his soul but his spirit (cf. Lk 23:46); and when he says the "flesh is weak" he does not say the "soul" is "willing" but the "spirit" (Mt 26:41 and par.); from which it appears as if the soul were a kind of medium between the weak flesh and the willing spirit.

5. But perhaps someone may meet us with those objections of which we ourselves have given warning in our own arguments, and may say, "How then is mention made even of God's soul?"⁹ To him we shall reply as follows. Just as in all bodily expressions that are applied to God, such as his fingers or hands or arms or eyes or mouth or feet, we do not mean these parts of the human body, but we indicate by such bodily terms certain of God's powers,¹⁰ so also we must suppose that there is some other object which is indicated by this term, the soul of God. And if it is lawful for us to dare to say anything further on such a subject, the "soul of God" may perhaps be understood to mean his only-begotten Son. For as the soul, implanted throughout the whole body, is the source of all movement and directs every operation of the body, so also the only-begotten Son of God, who is his word and wisdom, is in close touch and association with every power of God, being implanted in him. And perhaps it is as an indication of this mystery that God is spoken of or described in the scriptures as a body.¹¹

We must consider, indeed, whether perhaps there may not be this additional reason for understanding God's soul to mean his only-begotten Son, namely, that it was he who came "to this place of affliction" and "descended into the vale of tears" and into the place of our humiliation, as it says in the Psalm: "Because thou hast humiliated us in the place of affliction" (Ps 43:20 [LXX], 84:6). Finally, I know some who, in expounding the passage which is spoken by the Savior in the gospel, "My soul is sorrowful even unto death" (Mt 26:38 and par.), have interpreted it of the apostles, whom he might have termed his soul because they were better than the rest of his body. For they say that "the multitude of believers is called his body" (cf. 1 Cor 12:27; Eph 4:12, 5:30), and that the apostles, because they are better than the remaining multitude, ought to be regarded as his soul.

These points about the rational soul we have brought forward to the best of our ability rather as matters for discussion by our readers than as definite and settled doctrines. As for the souls of cattle and other dumb creatures, let those remarks suffice which we have made above in general terms.¹²

Chapter IX

THE WORLD, AND THE MOVEMENTS OF RATIONAL CREATURES BOTH GOOD AND EVIL, AND THE CAUSES OF THESE MOVEMENTS

1. Now, however, let us return to the order which we fixed upon for our discussion and contemplate the beginning of creation, so far as it is possible for the mind to contemplate the beginning of God's creative work.

We¹ must suppose, therefore, that in the beginning God made as large a number of rational and intelligent beings, or whatever the before-mentioned minds ought to be called, as he foresaw would be sufficient. It is certain that he made them according to some definite number foreordained by himself; for we must not suppose, as some would, that there is no end of created beings, since where there is no end there can neither be any comprehension nor limitation. If there had been no end, then certainly created beings could neither have been controlled nor provided for by God. For by its nature whatever is infinite will also be beyond comprehension. . . .

Moreover when the scripture says that God created all things "by number and measure" (Wis 11:20), we shall be right in applying the term "number" to rational creatures or minds for this very reason, that they are so many as can be provided for and ruled and controlled by the providence of God; whereas "measure" will correspondingly apply to bodily matter, which we must believe to have been created by God in such quantity as he knew would be sufficient for the ordering of the world. These then are the objects which we must believe were created by God in the beginning, that is, before everything else. And it is this truth which we may suppose to be indicated also in that beginning which Moses somewhat obscurely introduces when he says, "In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth" (Gn 1:1). For it is certain that these words refer not to the "firmament" nor to the "dry land," but to that heaven and earth from which the names of the ones we see were afterwards borrowed (cf. Gn 1:6).²

2. But since these rational beings, which as we said above³ were made in the beginning, were made when before they did not exist, by this very fact that they did not exist and then began to exist they are of necessity subject to change and alteration. For whatever may have been the goodness that existed in their being, it existed in them not by nature but as a result of their Creator's beneficence. What they are, therefore, is something neither their own nor eternal, but given by God. For it did not always exist, and everything that is given can also be withdrawn and taken away. But the cause of the withdrawal will lie in this, that the movements of their minds are not rightly and worthily directed. For the Creator granted to the minds created by him the power of free and voluntary movement, in order that the good that was in them might become their own, since it was preserved by their own free will; but sloth and weariness of taking trouble to preserve the good, coupled with disregard and neglect of better things, began the process of withdrawal from the good. Now to withdraw from the good is nothing else than to be immersed in evil; for it is certain that to be evil means to be lacking in good. Hence it is that in whatever degree one declines from the good, one descends into an equal degree of wickedness. And so each mind, neglecting the good either more or less in proportion to its own movements, was drawn to the opposite of good, which undoubtedly is evil. From this source, it appears, the Creator of all things obtained certain seeds and causes of variety and diversity, in order that, according to the diversity of minds, that is, of rational beings (which diversity they must be supposed to have produced from the causes we have stated above) he might create a world that was various and diverse. What we mean by various and diverse it is now our wish to explain.⁴

3. By the world we now mean all that is above the heavens, or in them, or on the earth, or in what are called the lower regions, or any places that exist anywhere; together with the beings who are said to dwell in them. All this is called the world. In this world some creatures are said to be "supercelestial,"⁵ that is, placed in the more blessed abodes and clothed with the brighter and more heavenly bodies; and among these many differences are revealed, as for instance when the apostle said, "There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another star in glory" (1 Cor 15:41).

Some creatures, however, are called "earthly" (1 Cor 15:40), and among these, too, that is, among men, there are no small differences, for some are barbarians, others Greeks, and of the barbarians some are wilder and fiercer, whereas others are more gentle. Some moreover employ laws of the highest excellence, others poorer and ruder ones, while others follow inhuman and savage customs rather than laws. Some men are from the very moment of their birth in a humble position, brought up in subjection and slavery, placed under lords and princes and tyrants; whereas others are brought up with more freedom and under more rational influences. Some have healthy bodies, others from their earliest years are invalids; some are defective in sight, others in hearing and speech; some are born in such a condition, others lose the use of one faculty or another soon after birth or else suffer a like misfortune when fully grown. But what purpose is there in my unfolding and enumerating the tragic tale of human miseries, from which some are free while others are involved in them, when every man can weigh and ponder over all these matters for himself?⁶ There are also certain invisible powers, to which the management of things upon earth is entrusted; and we must believe that among these, too, no small differences exist, just as is found to be the case among men. The apostle Paul indeed intimates that there are also certain "infernal" powers⁷ and among these in like manner a condition of variety must undoubtedly be looked for. As for dumb animals and birds and creatures that live in water, it seems superfluous to inquire about them, since it is certain that they should be regarded as of contingent and not primary importance.

4. Now we are told that all things which were made, were made through Christ and in Christ, as the apostle Paul most clearly intimates when he says, "For in him and through him were all things created, whether things in heaven or things on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all were created through him and in him" (Col 1:16). Moreover John in the gospel reveals precisely the same when he says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; the same was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him was nothing made" (Jn 1:1). Further, in the Psalms it is written, "Thou hast made all things in wisdom" (Ps 104:24).

Seeing then that Christ, as he is the Word and wisdom, is also "righteousness" (cf. 1 Cor 1:30), it will follow undoubtedly that those things which were made in the Word and in wisdom may be said also to have been made in that "righteousness" which Christ is; whence it will be apparent that in the things which were made there was nothing unrighteous, nothing accidental, but all will be shown to be such as the principle of equity and righteousness demands. How then this great variety and diversity of things can be understood to be most righteous and equitable it is, I am sure, impossible for human thought or speech to explain, unless as prostrate suppliants we beseech the Word himself, the "wisdom and righteousness" (cf. 1 Cor 1:30), who is the only-begotten Son of God, that he, pouring himself by his grace into our minds, may deign to enlighten what is dark, to open what is shut, to reveal what is secret; which he will do if only we are found seeking, or asking, or knocking so worthily as to deserve to receive when we seek, to find when we ask and to have the door opened in response to our knock (cf. Mt 7:7, 8; Lk 11:9, 10). Relying, therefore, not on our own intelligence, but on the help of that wisdom which made all things, and that righteousness which we believe to be implanted in all created beings, even though we are for the moment unable to declare the answer, we shall nevertheless, trusting in his mercy, endeavor to search out and discover how the great variety and diversity of the world is consistent with the whole principle of righteousness. I say principle, of course, in a general sense; for only an ignorant man would demand a special justification for every single case and only a fool would offer to give it.

5. But when we say that the world is arranged in this variety, in which as we have explained above it was made by God,⁸ the God whom we call good and righteous and absolutely fair, the following objection is wont to be raised by many, and particularly by those who come from the schools of Marcion, Valentinus and Basilides and who assert that souls are in their natures diverse. They ask how it is consistent with the righteousness of God who made the world that on some he should bestow a habitation in the heavens, and not only give them a better habitation, but also confer on them a higher and more conspicuous rank, favoring some with a "principality," others with "powers," to others again allotting "dominions" (cf. Col 1:16), to others presenting the most magnificent seats in the heavenly courts, while others shine with golden light and gleam with starry brilliance, there being "one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another star in glory" (cf. 1 Cor 15:41). To sum it up briefly, they ask what reason there could be, supposing that God the Creator lacks neither the will to desire what is good and perfect nor the power to produce it, that when creating rational natures, that is, beings of whose existence he himself is the cause, he should make some of higher rank and other of second and third and many still lower and less worthy degrees?

Finally, they raise an objection on the score of the differences that exist among men on the earth. Some, they say, inherit at birth a happier lot, as for example the one who springs from Abraham and is born by promise (cf. Gn 17:16; Gal 4:23), and the other, the child of Isaac and Rebecca who, while yet lying in the womb, supplants his brother and is said, before he is born, to be loved by God (cf. Gn 25:21-26; Rom 9:10-13); and, speaking generally, one man is born among the Hebrews, with whom he finds instruction in the divine law, another among the Greeks who are themselves men of wisdom and no small learning, another among the Ethiopians, whose custom is to feed on human flesh, others among the Scythians, where parricide is practiced as if sanctioned by law, or among the Taurians, where strangers are offered in sacrifice.⁹ If then, they ask us, this great diversity and these various and different conditions of birth, in which certainly the power of free will has no place—for a man does not choose for himself either where or in what nation or what state of life he shall be born,—if, they say, all this is not caused by a diversity in the natures of souls, that is, a soul with an evil nature is destined for an evil nation and a good one for a good nation, what alternative is there but to suppose that it is the result of accident or chance? Now if this were admitted, we should no longer believe the world to have been made by God nor to be ruled by his providence, and consequently it would seem that no judgment of God on every man's deeds is to be looked for. But in this matter what is clearly the truth of things is for him alone to know who "searches all things, even the deep things of God" (1 Cor 2:10).

6. We, however, speaking simply as men, will, in order not to nourish the insolence of the heretics by being silent, to the best of our ability reply to their objections with such arguments as may occur to us, as follows. We have frequently shown in the preceding chapters, by declarations which we were able to quote from the divine scriptures, that God the Creator of the universe is both good and just and omnipotent.¹⁰ Now when "in the beginning" (Gn 1:1) he created what he wished to create, that is rational beings, he had no other reason for creating them except himself, that is, his goodness. As therefore he himself, in whom was neither variation nor change nor lack of power, was the cause of all that was to be created, he created all his creatures equal and alike, for the simple reason that there was in him no cause that could give rise to variety and diversity. But since these rational creatures, as we have frequently shown and will show yet again in its proper place,¹¹ were endowed with the power of free will, it was this freedom which induced each one by his own voluntary choice either to make progress through the imitation of God or to deteriorate through negligence. This, as we have said before,¹² was the cause of the diversity among rational creatures, a cause that takes its origin not from the will or judgment of the Creator, but from the decision of the creature's own freedom.

God, however, who then felt it just to arrange his creation according to merit, gathered the diversities of minds into the harmony of a single world, so as to furnish, as it were, out of these diverse vessels or souls or minds, one house, in which there must be "not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth, and some unto honor and some unto dishonor" (2 Tm 2:20).

These were the reasons, as I think, which gave rise to the diversity of this world, wherein divine providence arranges all creatures individually in positions corresponding to the variation in their movements and the fixed purpose of their minds. For this reason the Creator will not appear to have been unjust when, according to the above principles, he placed everyone in a position proportionate to his merit; nor will the happiness or unhappiness of anyone's birth, or any condition whatever that may fall to his lot, be supposed to be due to chance; nor will it be believed that there are different creators or souls that are diverse by nature.

7. But even holy scripture does not seem to me to be altogether silent on the nature of this secret, as when the apostle Paul, arguing on the subject of Esau and Jacob, says: "For when they were not yet born and had done nothing either good or evil, that the purpose of God which was formed according to election might stand, not from works but from him who called them, it was said that the elder should serve the younger, as it is written, Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated" (Rom 9:11-13). And after this he addresses himself and says:

"What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God?" And in order to give us an occasion of inquiring into these matters and discovering how they are not outside all reason, he replies to himself and says, "God forbid" (Rom 9:14). For, as it appears to me, the same question which faces us in connection with Esau and Jacob may also be raised in regard to all the heavenly beings and all creatures on earth and in the lower regions; and, it seems to me, just as it says there, "When they were not yet born and had done nothing either good or evil," so, too, can it be said about all the rest. For "when they were not yet" created "and had done nothing either good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand" (Rom 9:11-13), then, as certain men think, some were made heavenly, others of the earth and others of the lower regions, "not from works," as the aforesaid men think, "but from him who called them" (Rom 9:11). "What then shall we say," if this is so? "Is there then unrighteousness with God? God forbid" (Rom 9:14).

As, therefore, when the scriptures are examined with much diligence in regard to Esau and Jacob, it is found that there is "no unrighteousness with God" in its being said of them, before they were born or had done anything, in this life of course, that "the elder should serve the younger," and as it is found that there is no unrighteousness in the fact that Jacob supplanted his brother even in the womb, provided we believe that by reason of his merits in some previous life Jacob had deserved to be loved by God to such an extent as to be worthy of being preferred to his brother, so also it is in regard to the heavenly creatures, provided we note that their diversity is not the original condition of their creation, but that for antecedent causes a different position of service is prepared by the Creator for each one in proportion to the degree of his merit, which depends on the fact that each, in being created by God as a mind or rational spirit, has personally gained for himself, in accordance with the movements of his mind and the disposition of his heart, a greater or less share of merit, and has rendered himself either lovable or it may be hateful to God. We must also note, however, that some beings who are of higher merit are ordained to suffer with the rest and to perform a duty to those below them, in order that by this means they themselves may become sharers in the endurance of the Creator, according to the Apostle's own words, "The creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected it, in hope" (Rom 8:20).¹³

Bearing in mind, then, this sentiment, "Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid" (Rom 9:14), which the apostle uttered when expounding the birth of Esau and Jacob, I think it right that the same sentiment should be employed in considering the case of all creatures, since, as we said above, the righteousness of the Creator ought to be apparent in all. And this, it appears to me, will only be shown with real clearness, if each being, whether of heaven or earth or below the earth, may be said to possess within himself the causes of diversity antecedent to his birth in the body. For all things were created by the Word of God and by his wisdom, and were set in order through the operation of his righteousness; and in his gracious compassion he provides for all and exhorts all to be cured by whatever remedies they may, and incites them to salvation.

8. As, then, without any doubt it will happen in the day of judgment that the good will be separated from the evil and the righteous from the unrighteous and every individual soul will by the judgment of God be allotted to that place of which his merits have rendered him worthy, a point which, if God will, we shall prove in the pages that follow,¹⁴ so also in the past some such process, I think, has taken place. For we must believe that God rules and arranges the universe by judgment at all times. And the teaching of the apostle, when he says that "in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth, and some unto honor, and some unto dishonor," with the additional words, "if a man purge himself, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work" (2 Tm 2:20, 21), undoubtedly proves this point, that whoever purges himself when placed in this life, will be prepared for every good work in the future, whereas he who does not purge himself will be, in accordance with the extent of his impurity, a "vessel unto dishonor," that is, an unworthy one.

In this way it is possible for us to understand that even before the present life there were rational vessels, either wholly purged or less so, that is, vessels which had purged themselves or had not, and that from this circumstance each vessel received, according to the measure of its purity or impurity, its place or region or condition in which to be born or to fulfill some duty in this world. All these, down to the very least, God supervises by the power of his wisdom and distinguishes by the controlling hand of his judgment; and thus he has arranged the universe on the principle of a most impartial retribution, according as each one deserves for his merit to be assisted or cared for. Herein is displayed in its completeness the principle of impartiality, when the inequality of circumstances preserves an equality of reward for merit. But the grounds of merit in each individual are known with truth and clearness only to God, together with his only-begotten Word and Wisdom and his Holy Spirit.

Chapter X

THE RESURRECTION
AND THE JUDGMENT

1. But since our discourse has reminded us of the judgment to come and of retribution and the punishment of sinners, in accordance with the threatenings of the holy scriptures and the contents of the Church's teaching¹ to the effect that at the time of the judgment "eternal fire" and "outer darkness" and a "prison" and a "furnace" and other similar things have been prepared for sinners (cf. Mt 25:41, 8:12; 1 Pt 3:19), let us see what we ought to believe about these matters also.

Now to approach them in the requisite order we must first, it seems to me, begin a discussion on the resurrection, in order to learn what it is that shall come either to punishment or to rest and blessedness. On this matter we have already argued more fully in the other books which we have written on resurrection² and have shown what were our views about it. Now, however, for the sake of logical continuity in this treatise, it seems not unreasonable to repeat a few of the arguments from our former works, particularly because some make this objection to the faith of the church, that our beliefs about the resurrection are altogether foolish and silly.³

The chief objectors are the heretics, who must, I think, be answered in the following manner. If they admit, with us, that there is a resurrection of the dead, let them answer this question: "What was it that died? Was it not a body?" If so, there will be a resurrection of the body. Then again, let them say whether they believe that we are to possess bodies, or not. I submit that, seeing that the apostle Paul says, "It is sown a natural body, it will rise again a spiritual body" (1 Cor 15:44), these men cannot deny that a body rises or that in the resurrection we are to possess bodies. What then? If it is certain that we are to possess bodies, and if those bodies which have fallen are declared to rise again—and the expression "rise again" could not properly be used except of that which had previously fallen—then no one can doubt that these bodies rise again in order that at the resurrection we may once more be clothed with them. The one thing, therefore, is bound up with the other. For if bodies rise again, undoubtedly they rise again as a clothing for us, and if it is necessary, as it certainly is, for us to live in bodies, we ought to live in no other bodies but our own. And if it is true that they rise again and do so as "spiritual," there is no doubt that this means that they rise again from the dead with corruption banished and mortality laid aside; otherwise it would seem vain and useless for a man to rise from the dead in order to die over again. Finally, this can be the more clearly understood by carefully observing what is the quality of the "natural body" which, when sown in the earth, can reproduce the quality of a "spiritual body." For it is from the natural body that the very power and grace of the resurrection evokes the spiritual body, when it transforms it from dishonor to glory.

2. Since the heretics, however, think themselves most learned and wise, we shall ask them whether everybody has some form, that is, whether it is fashioned in some shape? If they say there is a body which is not fashioned in some shape, they will show themselves the most ignorant and foolish of men; for no one, except an utter stranger to all learning, will deny that a body has a shape.⁴ But if they give the logical answer and say that everybody is fashioned in some definite shape, we shall inquire of them whether they can explain and describe to us the shape of a "spiritual body"; which they certainly will in no way be able to do. Further, we shall ask them for an explanation of the differences among those who rise again. How will they prove the truth of the saying: "there is one flesh of birds, another of fishes; there are also bodies celestial and bodies terrestrial; but there is one glory of heavenly beings, another of earthly, one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead" (1 Cor 15:39–42)? Let them show us, therefore, that the differences of glory among those who rise are comparable to these gradations among the heavenly bodies; and if by any means they have tried to think out some system along the lines of the differences among the heavenly bodies, we shall request them also to mark the differences in the resurrection indicated by the comparison drawn from earthly bodies.

We indeed understand the matter thus: the apostle, when he wished to describe how great were the differences among those who rise in glory, that is, the saints, drew a comparison from the heavenly bodies, saying, "One glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, another glory of the stars." When, on the other hand, he wished to teach us the differences among those who shall come to the resurrection without being purified in this life, that is, as sinners, he draws an illustration from earthly creatures and says, "One flesh of birds, another of fishes." For heavenly things are worthy of being compared with the saints, and earthly with sinners. Let this be said in opposition to those who deny the resurrection of the dead, that is, the resurrection of bodies.

3. We now direct the discussion to some of our own people, who either from poverty of intellect or from lack of instruction introduce an exceedingly low and mean idea of the resurrection of the body. We ask these men in what manner they think that the "natural body" will, by the grace of the resurrection, be changed and become "spiritual"; and in what manner they believe that what is "sown in weakness" will be "raised in power," and what is sown "in dishonor" is to "rise in glory," and what is sown "in corruption" is to be transformed into "incorruption" (cf. 1 Cor 15:42-44)? Certainly if they believe the apostle, who says that the body, when it rises in glory and in power and in incorruptibility, has already become spiritual, it seems absurd and contrary to his meaning to say that it is still entangled in the passions of flesh and blood, seeing that he says plainly, "Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God, neither shall corruption inherit incorruption" (1 Cor 15:50).⁵ Further, how do they take the passage in which the apostle says, "We shall all be changed" (1 Cor 15:51)? This change, the character of which we have before spoken of,⁶ we must certainly look forward to, and we are undoubtedly right in expecting it to consist in some act that is worthy of the divine grace; for we believe that it will be a change of like character to that in which, as the apostle describes it, "a bare grain of wheat or of some other kind" is sown in the earth, but "God giveth it a body as it pleased him" (1 Cor 15:37, 38), after the grain of wheat itself has first died (cf. Jn 12:24).

So must we suppose that our bodies, like a grain of corn, fall into the earth, but that implanted in them is the life-principle which contains the essence of the body; and although the bodies die and are corrupted and scattered, nevertheless by the word of God that same life principle which has all along been preserved in the essence of the body raises them up from the earth and restores and refashions them, just as the power which exists in a grain of wheat refashions and restores the grain, after its corruption and death, into a body with stalk and ear.⁷ And so in the case of those who shall be counted worthy of obtaining an inheritance in the kingdom of the heavens, the life-principle before mentioned, by which the body is refashioned, at the command of God refashions out of the earthly and natural body a spiritual body, which can dwell in the heavens; while to those who have proved of inferior merit, or of something still meaner than this, or even of the lowest and most insignificant grade, will be given a body of glory and dignity corresponding to the dignity of each one's life and soul; in such a way, however, that even for those who are to be destined to "eternal fire" or to "punishments" (cf. Mt 25:41, 46), the body that rises is so incorruptible, through the transformation wrought by the resurrection, that it cannot be corrupted and dissolved even by punishments. . . .⁸

4. If then this is the character of the body which rises from the dead, let us now see what is the meaning of the threatened "eternal fire" (cf. Mt 25:41, 46). Now we find in the prophet Isaiah that the fire by which each man is punished is described as belonging to himself. For it says, "Walk in the light of your fire and in the flame which you have kindled for yourselves" (Is 50:11). These words seem to indicate that every sinner kindles for himself the flame of his own fire, and is not plunged into a fire which has been previously kindled by someone else or which existed before him. Of this fire the food and material are our sins, which are called by the apostle Paul wood and hay and stubble (cf. 1 Cor 3:12). And I think that just as in the body an abundance of eatables or food that disagrees with us either by its quality or its quantity gives rise to fevers differing in kind and duration according to the degree in which the combination of noxious elements supplies material and fuel for them—the quality of which material, made up of the diverse noxious elements, being the cause which renders the attack sharper or more protracted—so when the soul has gathered within itself a multitude of evil deeds and an abundance of sins, at the requisite time the whole mass of evil boils up into punishment and is kindled into penalties; at which time also the mind or conscience, bringing to memory through divine power all things the signs and forms of which it had impressed upon itself at the moment of sinning, will see exposed before its eyes a kind of history of its evil deeds, of every foul and disgraceful act and all unholy conduct. Then the conscience is harassed and pricked by its own stings, and becomes an accuser and witness against itself.

This, I think, was what the apostle Paul felt when he said, "Their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them . . . in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men, according to my gospel, by Jesus Christ" (Rom 2:15, 16). From which we understand that in the very essence of the soul certain torments are produced from the harmful desires themselves that lead us to sin.⁹

5. But to prevent your thinking that this explanation of the matter is somewhat difficult to grasp, we can consider the effect of those faults of passion which often occur in men, as when the soul is burnt up with the flames of love, or tormented by the fires of jealousy or envy, or tossed about with furious anger, or consumed with intense sadness; remembering how some men, finding the excess of these ills too heavy to bear, have deemed it more tolerable to submit to death than to endure such tortures. You will ask, indeed, whether for men who have been entangled in the ills which arise from the above-mentioned faults and have been unable all the time they were in this life to secure for themselves any amelioration and have so departed from this world, it will be a sufficient punishment that they should be tortured by the long continuance in them of those harmful desires, whose deadly poison was in this life assuaged by no healing remedy; or whether when these desires have been changed they will be tormented by the stings of a general punishment.

Now I think that another species of punishment may be understood to exist; for just as, when the limbs of the body are loosened and torn away from their respective connections, we feel an intense and excruciating pain, so when the soul is found apart from that order and connection and harmony in which it was created by God for good action and useful experience and not at concord with itself in the connection of its rational movements, it must be supposed to bear the penalty and torture of its own want of cohesion and to experience the punishment due to its unstable and disordered condition. But when the soul, thus torn and rent asunder, has been tried by the application of fire, it is undoubtedly wrought into a condition of stronger inward connection and renewal.

6. There are many other matters, too, which are hidden from us, and are known only to him who is the physician of our souls. For if in regard to bodily health we occasionally find it necessary to take some very unpleasant and bitter medicine as a cure for the ills we have brought on through eating and drinking, and sometimes, if the character of the ill demands it, we need the severe treatment of the knife and a painful operation, yes, and should the disease have extended beyond the reach even of these remedies, in the last resort the ill is burnt out by fire, how much more should we realize that God our physician, in his desire to wash away the ills of our souls, which they have brought on themselves through a variety of sins and crimes, makes use of penal remedies of a similar sort, even to the infliction of a punishment of fire on those who have lost their soul's health.

Allusions to this are found also in the holy scriptures. For instance, in Deuteronomy the divine word threatens that sinners are to be punished with "fevers and cold and pallor," and tortured with "feebleness of eyes and insanity and paralysis and blindness and weakness of the reins" (cf. Dt 28:22, 28, 29). And so if anyone will gather at his leisure from the whole of scripture all the references to sufferings which in threats against sinners are called by the names of bodily sicknesses, he will find that through them allusion is being made to either the ills or the punishments of souls. And to help us understand that as physicians supply aids to sufferers with the object of restoring them to health through careful treatment, so with the same motive God acts towards those who have lapsed and fallen into sin, there is proof in that passage in which, through the prophet Jeremiah, God's "cup of fury" is commanded "to be set before all nations" that "they may drink it and become mad and spew it out" (cf. Jer 25:15, 16, 27). In this passage there is a threat which says, "If anyone refuse to drink, he shall not be cleansed" (cf. Jer 25:28, 29); from which certainly we understand that the fury of God's vengeance ministers to the purification of souls.

Isaiah teaches that even the punishments which are said to be inflicted by fire are meant to be applied as a help, when he speaks thus about Israel: "The Lord will wash away the filth of the sons and daughters of Sion, and will purge away the blood from the midst of them by the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning" (Is 4:4). And of the Chaldeans he speaks thus: "Thou hast coals of fire, sit upon them; they shall be to thee for a help" (Is 47:14, 15 [LXX]),¹⁰ and in other places he says: "The Lord shall sanctify them in burning fire" (cf. Is 66:16, 17), and in the prophet Malachi it speaks as follows: "The Lord shall sift and refine his people as gold and silver;

he shall refine and purify and pour forth purified the sons of Judah" (Mal 3:3).

7. Moreover, the saying in the gospel about unjust stewards, who must be "cut asunder" and "their portion placed with the unbelievers" (cf. Lk 12:42-46), as if the portion which was not theirs were to be sent somewhere else, undoubtedly alludes to some sort of punishment, as it seems to me, which falls on those whose spirit has to be separated from their soul. Now if we are to understand this spirit as belonging to the divine nature, that is, as being the Holy Spirit, we shall perceive that the passage relates to the gift of the Holy Spirit. It tells us that when, whether through baptism or the grace of the Spirit, the "word of wisdom" or the "word of knowledge" (cf. 1 Cor 12:8) or of any other endowment has been given to a man as a gift and not rightly used, that is to say, either "hidden in the earth" or "bound up in a napkin" (cf. Mt 25:25; Lk 19:20), the gift of the Spirit will surely be withdrawn from his soul, and the portion which remains, namely the essence of the soul, will be placed with the unbelievers, cut asunder and separated from that Spirit with whom, by joining itself to the Lord, it ought to have been "one spirit" (cf. 1 Cor 6:17).

If, however, we are to understand the spirit as being not the Spirit of God but the nature of the soul itself, then that portion of it will be called the better, which was made in the "image and likeness" of God (cf. Gn 1:26), whereas the other portion will be that which afterwards through the misuse of free will was received in a condition contrary to the nature of its original purity; and this portion, as being the friend and beloved companion of the material body, is visited with the fate of the unbelievers. But the cutting asunder may also be understood in a third sense, namely, that whereas each of the faithful, though he be the least in the Church, is we are told attended by an angel who is declared by the Savior always to "behold the face of God the Father" (cf. Mt 18:10), this angel of God, who was certainly one with him over whom he was set, is to be withdrawn from him if by disobedience he becomes unworthy; and in that case "his portion," that is the portion consisting of his human nature, being torn asunder from God's portion, is to be numbered with the unbelievers, seeing that he did not faithfully observe the warnings of the angel allotted to him by God (cf. Lk 12:46).

8. The "outer darkness" (Mt 8:12, etc.), too, is in my opinion not to be understood as a place with a murky atmosphere and no light at all, but rather as a description of those who through their immersion in the darkness of deep ignorance have become separated from every gleam of reason and intelligence. We must also see whether possibly this expression does not mean that just as the saints will receive back the very bodies in which they have lived in holiness and purity during their stay in this life, but bright and glorious as a result of the resurrection, so, too, the wicked, who in this life have loved the darkness of error and the night of ignorance, will after the resurrection be clothed with murky and black bodies, in order that this very gloom of ignorance, which in the present world has taken possession of the inner parts of their mind, may in the world to come be revealed through the garment of their outward body. (Perhaps,¹¹ however, the "gloom and darkness" [cf. Mt 8:12, etc.] should be taken to mean this coarse and earthly body, through which at the end of this world each man that must pass into another world will receive the beginnings of a fresh birth). . . . The expression "prison" (1 Pt 3:19)¹² must be thought of in a similar way.¹³

Let these remarks,¹⁴ which we have made at this point, to preserve the order of our discourse, in the fewest possible words, suffice for the present.

Chapter XI

THE PROMISES¹

1. Let us now consider briefly what we ought to believe about the promises.

It is certain that no living creature can be altogether inactive and immovable, but that it is eager for every kind of movement and for continual action and volition; and it is clear, I think, that this nature resides in all living beings. Much more then must a rational being such as man be always engaged in some movement or activity. And if a man forgets himself and is unaware of what befits him, his whole purpose centers around bodily experiences and in all his movements he is occupied with the pleasures and lusts of the body. If, however, he is one who strives to care or provide for the common good, he applies himself either to serving the State or obeying the magistrates or to whatever else may seem to be clearly of benefit to people generally. But if there be a man who can discern something better than these activities, which appear to be connected with the body, and can give diligent attention to wisdom and knowledge, he will undoubtedly direct all his efforts towards studies of this sort, with the object of learning, through inquiry into truth, what are the causes and reason of things.² As therefore in this life one man decides that the highest good is the pleasure of the body, another the service of the State, and another devotion to studies and learning, so we seek to know whether in that life which is the true one, the life which is said to be "hid with Christ in God" (cf. Col 3:3), that is, in the eternal life, there will be for us any such order or condition of existence.

2. Now some men, who reject the labor of thinking and seek after the outward and literal meaning of the law, or rather give way to their own desires and lusts, disciples of the mere letter, consider that the promises of the future are to be looked for in the form of pleasure and bodily luxury.³ And chiefly on this account they desire after the resurrection to have flesh of such a soft that they will never lack the power to eat and drink and to do all things that pertain to flesh and blood, not following the teaching of the apostle Paul about the resurrection of a "spiritual body" (1 Cor 15:44). Consequently they go on to say that even after the resurrection there will be engagements to marry and the procreation of children, for they picture to themselves the earthly city of Jerusalem about to be rebuilt with precious stones laid down for its foundations and its walls erected of jasper and its battlements adorned with crystal; it will also have an outer wall composed of different precious stones, namely, jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardius, onyx, chrysolite, chrysoprase, hyacinth and amethyst (cf. Rv 21:10-21; Is 54:12; Ez 28:13). Then, too, they suppose that "aliens" are to be given them to minister to their pleasures, and that they will have these for "plowmen" or "vinedressers" or "wall-builders" (cf. Is 61:5, 60:10), so that by them their ruined and fallen city may be raised up again; and they consider that they are to receive the "wealth of nations" to live on and that they will have control over their riches, so that even the camels of Midian and Ephah will come and bring them "gold, incense and precious stones" (cf. Is 61:6; 60:5, 6).

All this they try to prove on prophetic authority from those passages of scripture which describe the promises made to Jerusalem; where it is also said that "they who serve God shall eat and drink, but sinners shall hunger and thirst," and that "the righteous shall enjoy gladness, but confusion shall possess the wicked" (cf. Is 65:13, 14). From the New Testament, too, they quote the Savior's saying, in which he makes a promise to his disciples of the gladness that wine brings; "I will not drink of this cup until the day that I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom" (Mt 26:29). They add also the following, that the Savior calls those blessed, who now hunger and thirst, and promises them that they shall be filled (cf. Mt 5:6; Lk 6:21); and they quote from the scriptures many other illustrations, the force of which they do not perceive must be figurative and spiritual. Then, too, after the fashion of what happens in this life, and of this world's positions of dignity or rank or supreme power, they consider that they will be kings and princes, just like the corresponding earthly rulers, relying on the saying in the gospel, "Thou shalt have authority over five cities" (cf. Jer 17:25; Lk 19:19). And, to speak briefly, they desire that all things which they look for in the promises should correspond in every detail with the course of this life, that is, that what exists now should exist again. Such are the thoughts of men who believe indeed in Christ, but because they understand the divine scriptures in a Judaistic sense, extract from them nothing that is worthy of the divine promises.

3. Those, however, who accept a view of the scriptures which accords with the meaning of the apostles, do indeed hope that the saints will eat; but they will eat the "bread of life" (Jn 6:35), which is to nourish the soul and enlighten the mind with the food of truth and wisdom and to cause it to drink from the cup of divine wisdom, as the divine scripture says:

"Wisdom has prepared her table, she has slain her victims, she has mingled her wine in the bowl and cries with a loud voice, Turn in to me and eat the bread which I have prepared for you, and drink the wine which I have mingled for you" (cf. Prv 9:2-5). The mind, when nourished by this food of wisdom to a whole and perfect state, as man was made in the beginning, will be restored to the "image and likeness" (Gn 1:26) of God; so that, even though a man may have departed out of this life insufficiently instructed, but with a record of acceptable works, he can be instructed in that Jerusalem, the city of the saints, that is, he can be taught and informed and fashioned into a "living stone," a "stone precious and elect" (cf. 1 Pt 2:4-6), because he has borne with courage and endurance the trials of life and the struggles after piety. There, too, he will come to a truer and clearer knowledge of the saying already uttered here, that "man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Mt 4:4; Dt 8:3). Moreover, the princes and rulers must be understood to be those who both rule over the souls of lower condition and also instruct and teach them and initiate them into things divine.

mind

4. But if these considerations seem scarcely able to produce a worthy desire in minds that hope for literal promises, let us continue our inquiry a little, and see how an eager longing for the reality of things is natural to us and implanted in our soul; so that we may at last be able, by following out a spiritual view of scripture, to describe as it were the true forms of the "bread of life" and the quality of that "wine" and the characteristics of the "principalities" (cf. Jn 6:35; Prv 9:2, 5; Lk 19:17, 19). As, then, in those arts, which are accomplished by manual labor, the design, the why or how or for what uses a thing is made, lies in the mind, but its practical efficacy is unfolded through the help of the work of our hands, so we must believe that in regard to God's works, which have been made by him, their design and meaning remain a secret. Now when our eye sees the works of the craftsman, if it observes an article which has been made with unusual skill, immediately the mind burns to discover of what sort it is and how and for what uses it was made. Much more, and beyond all comparison, does the mind burn with unspeakable longing to learn the design of those things which we perceive to have been made by God. This longing, this love has, we believe, undoubtedly been implanted in us by God; and as the eye naturally demands light and vision and our body by its nature desires food and drink, so our mind cherishes a natural and appropriate longing to know God's truth and to learn the causes of things. 188

Now we have not received this longing from God on the condition that it should not or could not ever be satisfied; for in that case the "love of truth" (cf. 2 Thes 2:10) would appear to have been implanted in our mind by God the Creator to no purpose, if its gratification is never to be accomplished. So when even in this life men devote themselves with great labor to sacred and religious studies, although they obtain only some small fragments out of the immeasurable treasures of divine knowledge (cf. Col 2:2, 3), yet [they gain this advantage,]⁴ that they occupy their mind and understanding with these questions and press onward in their eager desire. Moreover they derive much assistance from the fact that by turning their mind to the study and love of truth they render themselves more capable of receiving instruction in the future. For when a man wishes to paint a picture, if he first sketches with the faint touch of a light pencil the outlines of the proposed figure and inserts suitable marks to indicate features afterwards to be added, this preliminary drawing with its faint outline undoubtedly renders the canvas more prepared to receive the true colors. So it will be with us, if only that faint form and outline is inscribed "on the tablets of our heart" (cf. 2 Cor 3:3) by the pencil of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is perhaps the reason why it is said, "To every one that hath shall be given and added" (Mt 25:29). It is clear, then, that to those who have now in this life a kind of outline of truth and knowledge there shall be added in the future the beauty of the perfect image.

5. Such was, I think, the "desire" indicated by him who said, "I am in a strait between two, having a desire to depart and be with Christ; for this is far better" (Phil 1:23). He knew that when he had gone back to Christ he would learn more clearly the reasons for all things that happen on earth, that is, the reasons which account for man, for his soul or his mind, or whichever of these constitutes man,⁵ and what is the meaning of the "ruling spirit," and of the "spirit who works," and of the "living spirit,"⁶ and of the grace of the Holy Spirit which is given to the faithful. Then also he will understand the significance of the name Israel, and of the diversity of races; and also of the twelve tribes contained in Israel, and of the people of each several tribe. He will also understand the reasons for the priests and Levites and for the different priestly orders, and whose type it was that was seen in Moses; and he will learn, too, what is the true meaning in God's sight of the jubilees and the weeks of years. Further, he will see the reason of the feast days and the holy days and will perceive the causes of all the sacrifices and purifications. He will observe the reason for the cleansing after leprosy and for the different kinds of leprosy, and the meaning of the purification of those who suffer an emission of seed. He will learn about the good powers, what they are, and their greatness and qualities, and likewise about the opposite kind, and the explanation of the love which the former bear towards mankind and of the persistent jealousy of the latter.⁷ He will perceive what is the reason of souls⁸ and the meaning of the diversity among animals, whether those that live in water, or birds, or beasts; and for what cause each genus is divided into so many species; and what purpose of the Creator or what indication of his wisdom is concealed in each individual thing. Further, he will learn the reason why certain properties are attached to certain roots and herbs; and what is the reason of the fallen angels, and for what cause they are allowed to flatter in some respects those who do not despise them with complete faith and to exist for the purpose of deceiving and leading men astray. He will learn the judgment of divine providence about each individual thing; about things which happen to men, that they happen not by chance or accident, but by a reason so carefully thought out, and so high above us, that it does not overlook even the number of the hairs of our head, and that not of the saints only but probably of all men; the scope of which providence extends even to the "two sparrows" (cf. Mt 10:30, 31) which are sold for a penny, whether "sparrows" is to be understood spiritually or literally. For now in this present life we seek, but there we shall see plainly (cf. 1 Cor 13:12).

6. All this leads us to suppose that no small interval of time may pass before the reason merely of things on earth can be shown to worthy and deserving men after their departure from life, in order that through their acquaintance with it all and the grace of full knowledge they may enjoy an indescribable gladness. So then, if the air between heaven and earth is not devoid of living and even rational beings, as the apostle said, "Wherein in times past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of this air, the spirit who now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph 2:2), and again, "We shall be caught up in the clouds to meet Christ in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord" (1 Thes 4:17), we must suppose that the saints will remain there for some time, until they learn the reason of the ordering of all that goes on in the air, in its two-fold form. By two-fold form I mean, for example; when we were on earth we saw animals or trees and we perceived the differences among them and also the very great diversity among men. But when we saw these things we did not understand the reasons for them; but this alone was suggested to us by the very diversity of what we saw, that we should search out and inquire for what reason all these were created diverse and arranged in such variety; and if we have cherished on earth a zeal and love for this kind of knowledge, there will be given to us after death an acquaintance with and understanding of that reason, if indeed the matter turns out as we should wish. When therefore we have comprehended that in its fullness, we shall comprehend in two-fold form the things we saw on earth.

We may speak in some such way also about the abode in the air. I think that the saints as they depart from this life will remain in some place situated on the earth, which the divine scripture calls "paradise" (cf. Gn 2:8, etc. [LXX]; Lk 23:43). This will be a place of instruction and, so to speak, a lecture room or school for souls, in which they may be taught about all that they had seen on earth and may also receive some indications of what is to follow in the future; just as when placed in this life they had obtained certain indications of the future, seen indeed "through a glass darkly," and yet truly seen "in part" (cf. 1 Cor 13:12), which are revealed more clearly and brightly to the saints in their proper times and places. If anyone is "pure in heart" (Mt 5:8) and of unpolluted mind and well-trained understanding he will make swifter progress and quickly ascend to the region of the air, until he reaches the kingdom of the heavens, passing through the series of those "abiding places" (cf. Jn 14:2),⁹ if I may so call them, which the Greeks have termed spheres, that is, globes, but which the divine scripture calls heavens. In each of these he will first observe all that happens there, and then learn the reason why it happens; and thus he will proceed in order through each stage, following him who has "entered into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God" (Heb 4:14), and who has said, "I will that, where I am, they also may be with me" (Jn 17:24). Further, he alludes to this diversity of places when he says, "In my Father's house are many abiding-places" (Jn 14:2). He himself, however, is everywhere and runs through all things; nor are we any longer to think of him as being confined within those narrow limits in which he once lived for our sakes, that is, not as being in that I circumscribed condition which was his when he dwelt on earth, among men in a body like ours, so that it was then possible to think of him as being enclosed in some one place.

7. When the saints have reached the heavenly places, then they will see clearly the nature of the stars, one by one, and will understand whether they are living creatures or whatever may be truth about them.¹⁰ They will also perceive the other reasons for God's works, which he himself shall reveal to them. For now he will show to them, as to sons, the causes of things and the perfection of his creation, teaching them why one star is placed in its particular position in the sky and why it is separated from another by so great an interval of space; what would happen, for example, if it were nearer or farther away; or if this star had been greater than that, how the entire universe would not retain its identity but everything would be changed into another form. And when they have gone through everything connected with the reason of the stars and with those ways of life that exist in heaven they will come to "the things which are not seen" (2 Cor 4:18), or to those whose names alone we have as yet heard, and to the things "invisible" (cf. Rom 1:20; Col 1:16). That there are many of these we learn from Paul the apostle, but what they are or what progres And so the rational being, growing at each successive stage, not as it grew when in this life in the flesh or body and in the soul, but increasing in mind and intelligence, advances as a mind already perfect to perfect knowledge, no longer hindered by its former carnal senses, but developing in intellectual power, ever approaching the pure and gazing "face to face" (cf. 1 Cor 13:12),¹¹ if I may so speak, on the causes of things.¹² And it attains perfection, first that perfection by which it rises to this condition, and secondly that by which it remains therein, while it has for the food on which it feeds the problems of the meaning of things and the nature of their causes. For as in this bodily life of ours we grew first of all bodily into that which we now are, the increase being supplied in our early years merely by a sufficiency of food, whereas after the process of growth has reached its limit we use food not in order to grow but as a means of preserving life within us; so, too, I think that the mind, when it has come to perfection, still feeds on appropriate and suitable food in a measure which can neither admit of want nor of superfluity. But in all respects this food must be understood to be the contemplation and understanding of God, and its measures to be those that are appropriate and suitable to this nature which has been made and created. These measures will rightly be observed by every one of those who are beginning to "see God," that is, to understand him through "purity of heart" (cf. Mt 5:8).

BOOK III

PREFACE OF RUFINUS

The two former books on "First Principles" I translated not merely at your request, but at your urgent demand, during the days of Lent. But since in those days, my devout brother Macarius, you were living near me and were more at leisure than you are now, I also worked the more. These latter two, however, I have been slower in interpreting, seeing that you have paid me fewer visits from the furthestmost part of the city to press forward the work. Now if you remember what I mentioned in my former preface,¹ that certain people would be angry if they did not hear us speak some evil of Origen, this came to pass immediately, as I think you discovered. But if those daemons who incite the tongues of men to evil speaking were so incensed against that work, in which he had not yet fully laid bare their secrets, what do you suppose will happen to this, in which he has revealed all the dark and hidden ways by which they creep into the hearts of men and deceive weak and feeble souls? At once you will see everything in confusion, dissensions aroused, clamor raised throughout the city, and condemnation called down upon the man who strove to dispel the diabolical darkness of ignorance by the light of the gospel lamp. Let such things, however, be counted of small moment by everyone who desires, while preserving unimpaired the rule of the Catholic faith, to be trained in divine instruction.

But this I must needs mention, that, as I did in the former books, so in these also I have taken care not to translate such passages as appeared to be contrary to the rest of Origen's teaching and to our own faith, but to omit them as forgeries interpolated by others.² If, however, he appeared to say anything of a novel kind about rational creatures, then, seeing that the essence of the faith is not involved in this, for the sake of knowledge and discussion, on occasions when perchance we had to reply to certain heresies in a similar order, I have not omitted such statements, either in these or in the former books, except perhaps where he wished to repeat in the later books what had been said in the former; in which case I have thought it right for the sake of brevity to cut out some of these repetitions.

Anyone who reads these books with a desire to advance in knowledge and not to raise objections will do better to have them explained to him by skilled teachers. For it is absurd to have the fictitious songs of the poets and the ridiculous tales in the comedies explained by grammarians, while anyone thinks he can learn without master or interpreter the things which are written about God and the heavenly powers and the entire universe, in which every wicked error whether of pagan philosophers or of heretics is refuted. This is how it comes about that when the discussions concern things difficult and obscure men choose rather to condemn them rashly and ignorantly, than to learn their meaning by study and diligence.

FREE WILL¹

Greek

1. Since the teaching of the church includes the doctrine of the righteous judgment of God, a doctrine which, if believed to be true, summons its hearers to live a good life and by every means to avoid sin—for it assumes that they acknowledge that deeds worthy of praise or of blame lie within our own power—let us now discuss separately a

Latin

1. Such we believe should be our beliefs about the divine promises, when we apply our understanding to the contemplation of that eternal and never-ending age and contemplate its unspeakable joy and blessedness.

Since the teaching of the church includes the doctrine of a future righteous judgment of God, a belief in which summons and persuades men to live a good and blessed life and in every way to avoid sin, and since by this the fact is undoubtedly indicated that it lies within our own power to devote ourselves to a life worthy either

free will

few points on the subject of free will, a problem of the utmost possible urgency. And in order to understand what free will is we must explain its meaning, that when this has been made clear the precise question may lie before us.

2. Of things that move some have the cause of their movement within themselves, while others are moved solely from without.² Those, for example, moved solely from without are portable things, such as logs of wood and stones and all matter that is held together simply by its own constitution. Let the view that would regard the flux of bodies as motion be excluded from the present discussion, since there is no need of this for our purpose. Things that have the cause of their movement in themselves are animals and plants and in a word everything that is held together by its of praise or of blame, I consider it necessary in consequence to discuss a few points on the subject of our free will, inasmuch as this question has been dealt with in no unworthy manner by very many writers. And in order the more easily to understand what free will is, let us inquire what is the nature of will and of desire.

2. Of things that move some have the causes of their movements within themselves, while others receive them from without. Those, for example, moved solely from without are all lifeless things, such as stones, logs of wood and other things of this kind, which are held together simply by the constitution of their material or by their physical structure. We must of course exclude for the present the view that regards it as motion when bodies dissolve in corruption; for this has no bearing on our immediate purpose. Other things have the cause of their movement nature or by soul. Among these they say are included even metals; and in addition fire is self-moved and perhaps also springs of water. But while all these have the cause of their movement within themselves, some are said to be moved out of themselves, others from within themselves; non-living things out of themselves, living things from within themselves.

Now living things are moved from within themselves when there arises within them an image which calls forth an impulse. And again in certain animals images arise which call forth impulses, the imaginative nature setting the impulse in ordered motion; for instance, in the spider, an image of weaving a web arises and the impulse to weave it follows, in themselves, as animals, trees and all things which are held together either by natural life or by soul. Among these some think that even the veins of metals should be reckoned; and, in addition, fire must be supposed to be self-moved and perhaps also springs of water. But of these which have the cause of their movements within themselves, some are said to be moved out of themselves, others from within themselves; and they are so divided because those which have life but no soul move out of themselves, those which have soul from within themselves.

These latter move when there comes to them an image, that is, a kind of desire or incitement, which impels them to move towards an object. Again, there exists in certain animals such an image, that is, a desire or feeling, which by a natural instinct impels and excites them to ordered and complex motion; as we see in spiders, the insect's imaginative nature inciting it to accomplish this task in an orderly manner, and beyond this imaginative nature the insect possesses nothing else. So in the bee there is an impulse to produce a honeycomb.

Greek

Latin

which by an image, that is, a desire and longing to weave a web, are excited to accomplish in an orderly manner the work of weaving, some natural movement undoubtedly calling forth the impulse to do this kind of work; nor do we find that this insect has any other feeling beyond the natural longing to weave a web. So, too, the bee is impelled to fashion honeycombs and to gather, as they call it, aerial honey.

rational animal
3. The rational animal,

however, has something besides its imaginative nature, namely reason, which judges the images. Some it rejects, others it approves of, the object being that the creature may be guided in accordance with these latter images. So it happens that, since there are in the nature of reason possibilities of contemplating good and evil, by following out which and contemplating them both choose good and avoid evil, we are worthy of praise when we devote ourselves to the practice of good,

3. But while the rational animal has in itself these natural movements, it has also, to a greater extent than the other animals, the faculty of reason, by means of which it can judge and discern between the natural movements, disapproving of and rejecting some and approving of and accepting others. So by the judgment of this reason the movements of men may be guided and directed towards an approvable life.

From which it follows that, since the nature of

and of blame when we act in the opposite way.

We must not forget, however, that the greater part of the nature assigned to every rational creature is in the animals in varying degree, some having more and some less so that the instinct in hunting dogs and in war horses comes near, if I may say so, to reason itself. To be subject, then, to a particular external impression which gives rise to such or such an image is admittedly not one of the things lying within our power; but to decide to use what has happened either in this way or in that is the work of nothing else but the reason within us, which, as the alternatives appear, either influences us towards the impulses that this reason in man includes a faculty of distinguishing between good and evil, and when man has done this he possesses also the power of choosing that which he has approved of, he is rightly deemed worthy of praise when he chooses what is good, and of blame when he follows what is base and evil.

We must, however, by no means forget that in certain dumb animals, as for instance clever dogs or war horses, there is found a more complex movement than in the rest, so that some men think that these are moved by a kind of rational intelligence. But we must believe that this results not so much from reason as from an instinctive and natural movement bestowed in especially large measure for purposes of this kind.³ But, as we were saying, since the rational animal is thus constituted, we men are liable to meet with and receive from without, whether through sight or hearing or the other incite to what is good and seemly or else turns us aside to the reverse.

4. But if anyone should say that the impression from without is of such a sort that it is impossible to resist it whatever it may be, let him turn his attention to his own feeling and movements and see whether there is not an approval, assent and inclination of the controlling faculty towards a particular action senses, certain impressions which urge and excite us to good movements or the reverse. Now inasmuch as these come from without, it certainly does not lie within our power to avoid meeting and receiving them; but to judge and determine how we ought to use them when they come is the work and business of that reason which is in us, that is of our own judgment. For by the judgment of this reason we use the stimuli that meet us from without for whatever purpose the reason itself may approve, directing our natural movements at its bidding to courses that are good or the reverse.

Senses

4. But if anyone should say that those impressions from without that call forth our movements are of such a sort that it is impossible to resist them, whether they incite us to good or to evil, let him who thinks thus turn his attention for a little while to himself, carefully examining his own inner movements, on account of some specious attractions.

For instance, when a woman displays herself before a man who has determined to remain chaste and to abstain from sexual intercourse and invites him to act contrary to his purpose, she does not become the absolute cause of the abandonment of that purpose. The truth is that he is first entirely delighted with the sensation and lure of the pleasure and has no wish to resist it nor to strengthen his previous determination; and see whether he does not find that, when the attraction of any desire strikes him, nothing is accomplished until the assent of the soul is gained and the bidding of the mind indulges the wicked suggestion. It is as if an appeal were being made on certain plausible grounds from two different sides to a judge dwelling within the tribunal of our heart, in order that when the grounds have been first stated the sentence to act may proceed from the judgment of reason.

Suppose, for instance, that when a man has determined to live a chaste and continent life and to abstain from all sexual intercourse, a woman appears before him and invites and entices him to do something contrary to his purpose, that woman does not become the true and absolute cause or necessity of his perverse conduct, since it is in his power, by calling to mind his resolution, to bridle the incitements to lust and and then he commits the licentious act. On the other hand the same experiences may happen to one who has undergone more instruction and discipline; that is, the sensations and incitements are there, but his reason, having been strengthened to a higher degree and trained by practice and confirmed towards the good by right doctrines, or at any rate being near to such confirmation, repels the incitements and gradually weakens the desire.

5. But to throw the blame for what so happens to us on external things and to free ourselves from censure, declaring that we are like stocks and stones, which are dragged along by agents that move them from without, is neither true nor reasonable, but is the argument of a man to restrain the delights of the attraction that allures him by the stern rebukes of virtue, so that all desire for the pleasure is put to flight and the firmness and constancy of his determination endures. Finally, if allurements of this kind occur to men of greater learning who have grown strong in divine instruction, they at once remember who they are, calling to mind what they studied and learnt long ago and guarding themselves by the stay of this most holy doctrine; and thus they refuse and reject every attraction the incitement offers and repel the opposing evil desires by the help of the reason implanted within them.

5. Since then it is established by a kind of natural evidence that these things are so, is it not gratuitous to refer the causes of our deeds to what happens to us from without and to remove the blame from ourselves, in whom the entire cause lies, that is, to say that we are like who desires to contradict the idea of free will. For if we were to ask such a one what free will was, he would say it consisted in this, that when I proposed to do a certain thing no external cause arose which incited me to do the opposite.

Education

Again, to throw the blame simply on our constitution is absurd, for education can take the most intemperate and savage of men and, if they will follow her exhortation, can change them, so that the alteration and change for the better is very great, the most licentious men often becoming better than those who formerly seemed not to be such by their very nature, and the most savage changing to such a degree of gentleness that those who had never at any time behaved savagely yet seem to be savage stocks and stones, which have no movement within them but receive the causes of their movement from without? This indeed is neither a true nor a proper assertion, but one invented for the sole purpose of denying the freedom of the will; unless we are to suppose that free will could consist in this, that nothing which happens to, us from without could incite us to good or evil.

But if anyone should refer the causes of our faults to the natural unruly constitution of the body, this can be shown to be contrary to the experience of all education. For how many do we see who, when they have previously lived an uncontrolled and intemperate life and have been the captives of luxury and lust, and are then perchance incited by the word of teaching and instruction to lead a better life, undergo so great a change that instead of being given to luxurious and disgraceful conduct they in comparison with him who has changed to gentleness. We see others also most steady and respectable men, who by perversion to lower ways fall from their respectability and steadiness and change into a condition of licentiousness, often beginning such conduct in middle life and plunging into disorder after the season of youth, which so far as its nature goes is unstable, has passed. Reason therefore shows that external things do not lie within our power; but to use them in this way or the other, since we have received reason as a judge and investigator of the way in which we ought to deal with each of them, that is our task.

become sober and exceedingly chaste, and instead of being fierce and savage they become exceedingly mild and gentle? So on the other hand we see quiet and respectable men who, when they have become associated with turbulent and shameless people, have their "good manners corrupted by evil conversations" (cf. 1 Cor 15:33) and are turned into men of the same sort as those who are steeped in every kind of wickedness. This sometimes happens to men of mature age, so that they prove to have lived more chastely in youth than when advanced years have granted them the opportunity of a freer life. The result of our reasoning, therefore, is to show that things which happen from without are not in our power, but to use them well or badly, when that reason which is within us discerns and decides how we ought to use them, this lies within our power.

6. That it is our own task to live a good life, and that God asks this of us not as his work nor as a thing which comes to us from somebody else, nor, as some think, from fate, but as our own task, the prophet Micah will bear witness when he says, "It hath been told thee, O man, what is good, and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justice and to love mercy and to be ready to walk with thy God?" (Mi 6:8).

And Moses says, "I have set before thy face the way of life and the way of death. Choose the good and walk in it." And Isaiah: "If ye are willing and obey me, ye shall eat the good of the land. But if ye are unwilling and disobey me, a sword shall devour you. For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." And in the Psalms: "If my people had hearkened unto me, and if Israel had walked in my ways, I would

But in order to confirm by the authority of the Scriptures the results of our reasoning, namely, that to live rightly or otherwise is our task and not a thing that depends on external causes, nor, as some think, on the irresistible pressure of fate, Micah the prophet will bear witness when he says in these words, "It hath been told thee, O man, what is good, and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justice and to love mercy and to be ready to walk with the Lord thy God?" (Mi 6:8).

And Moses speaks thus, "I have set before thy face the way of life and the way of death. Choose the good and walk in it" (Dt 30:15, 19). And Isaiah says, "If ye are willing and hearken to me, ye shall eat the good of the land. But if ye are unwilling and do not hearken, a sword shall devour you. For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it" (Is 1:19, 20). And in the Psalms it is written, "If my people have humbled their enemies to nothing and laid my hand upon those that afflict them," where the "hearkening" and "walking in the ways" of God are assumed to be in the people's power.

When, too, the Savior says, "I say unto you, that ye resist not him that is evil" (Mt 5:39), and "Whosoever is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment" (Mt 5:22), and "Whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery already in his heart," and in any other commandment he gives, he tells us that it lies in our power to observe the injunctions and that we shall with good reason be "in danger of the judgment" if we transgress them.

This is why he also says, "Everyone who heareth these words of mine and had hearkened unto me, and if Israel had walked in my ways, I would have humbled their enemies to nothing . . ." (Ps 81:13, 14),⁴ by which he shows that the "hearkening" and "walking in the ways" of God were in the people's power.

Further, when the Savior says, "But I tell you not to resist him that is evil" (Mt 5:39), and "Whosoever is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment" (Mt 5:22), and "Whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Mt 5:28), and in any other commandments he gives, what else does he indicate but that it lies in our power to observe what is commanded, and that for this reason we are rightly brought "in danger of the judgment" if we transgress what we certainly have power to observe?

This is why he also says, "Everyone who heareth these words of mine and doeth doeth them shall be likened to a wise man who built his house upon the rock" (Mt 7:24), and the words that follow; but "he that heareth and doeth them not is like a foolish man who built his house upon the sand" (Mt 7:26), and what follows. And when he says to those on the right hand, "Come to me, ye blessed of my father," and the words that follow, "for I was hungry and ye gave me to eat; I was thirsty and ye gave me to drink" (Mt 25:34, 35), with the utmost clearness he gives the promises as to men who are worthy of being praised, whereas on the contrary he says to the others as to men who are blameworthy in comparison with the former, "Depart, ye cursed, into the everlasting fire" (Mt 25:41).

Let us see how Paul also reasons with us as being men of free will and ourselves responsible for our destruction or salvation.

Further, what he says to those on the right hand, "Come to me, all ye blessed of my father," and the rest, "for I was hungry and ye gave me to eat; I was thirsty and ye gave me to drink" (Mt 25:34, 35), plainly shows that the issue lay with themselves, whether to be counted worthy of praise for keeping the commandments and receiving the promises, or to be counted worthy of blame like the others, whose desert was to hear and receive the opposite, to whom it is said, "Depart, ye cursed, into the everlasting fire" (Mt 25:41).

Let us see how Paul the apostle also speaks to us as having the power of choice and as having in ourselves the causes of our salvation

Indeed, there are in the scriptures ten thousand passages which with the utmost

7. But since certain sayings from both the Old and the New Testaments incline us to the opposite conclusion, namely, that it is not in our power whether we keep the commandments and are saved or transgress them and are lost, let us bring forward some of these sayings and see what is the explanation of them. Thus from the ones we bring forward, any person who in a similar way selects for himself all the sayings that seem to destroy free will may consider our arguments in explanation of them.

Now many have been troubled by the story of Pharaoh, in dealing with whom God says several times, "I will harden Pharaoh's heart" (Ex 4:21; 7:3). For if he show that we have the power of free will. For it would be absurd that we should have commandments given, the keeping of which is to save us and the transgression to condemn, if we do not possess the power to keep them.

7. But since there are found in the divine scriptures certain sayings so laid down that the opposite conclusion appears capable of being understood from them, let us bring them forward and discuss them by the rule of piety⁶ and give the explanations of them. Thus from the few sayings that we now explain, the meaning of the other similar sayings which appear to rule out the power of free will may become clear.

Now many are troubled by the words spoken to Pharaoh by God, who says several times, "I will harden Pharaoh's heart" (Ex 4:21, 7:3). For if he is hardened by God is hardened by God and through being hardened sins, he is not himself responsible for the sin; and if this is so, Pharaoh has no free will. And someone will say that in the same way those who are lost have no free will and will not be lost on their own account. Also the saying in Ezekiel, "I will take away their stony hearts and will put in them hearts of flesh, that they may walk in my statutes and keep my judgments" (11:19, 20), might lead one to suppose that it was God who gave the power to walk in the commandments and to keep the judgments, by his removing the hindrance, the stony heart, and implanting something better, the heart of flesh.

NT

Let us look also at the saying in the gospel, the answer which the Savior gives to those who ask why he speaks to the multitude in and through being hardened falls into sin, he himself is not the cause of his sin. And if this is so, Pharaoh will appear not to have free will, and consequently men will assert that this example shows that all others who perish do not find the cause of their loss in their own free will. Also the saying in Ezekiel, "I will take away their stony hearts and will put in them hearts of flesh, that they may walk in my statutes and keep my judgments" (11:19, 20), might lead one to suppose that it was God who gave the power to walk in his commandments and to keep his judgments, if it was he who removed the stony heart, which hindered them from keeping the commandments, and who implanted in them the better and more sensitive one, which is here called a heart of flesh.

Let us look also at the nature of the saying with which the Lord and Savior in the gospel gives answer to those who asked him why parables (cf. Mt 13:10). "That seeing they may not see," he says, "and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest haply they should be converted and it should be forgiven them" (Mk 4:12). And further, the saying by Paul, that it is "not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy"; and elsewhere, "Both to will and to do are of God" (cf. Phil 2:13); and elsewhere, "So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say to me then, Why doth he yet find fault; for who hath resisted his will?" (Rom 9:18, 19). And, "The persuasion is of him that calleth" (Gal 5:8)⁶ and not of us.

And again, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why didst thou make me thus? Or hath not the potter a right over the clay, from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto he spoke to the multitude in parables (cf. Mt 13:10). He says, "That seeing they may not see, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest haply they should be converted and it should be forgiven them" (Mk 4:12). And further, what was said by Paul the apostle, that it is "not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16); and elsewhere, "Both to will and to do are of God" (cf. Phil 2:13); and again elsewhere, "So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say to me, therefore, why then doth he yet find fault; for who resisteth his will?" (Rom 9:18, 19).

"O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Doth the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why didst thou make me thus? Or hath not the potter a right over the clay, from the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto honor, and another unto dishonor?" (Rom 9:20, 21). These passages are in themselves sufficient to disturb ordinary people with the thought that man is not a free agent, but that it is God who saves and destroys whom he will.

8. Let us begin therefore with the statements made about Pharaoh, that he was hardened by God in order that he might not let the people go. Along with this we shall examine also the apostle's saying, "So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth." Now these passages are used by some of the heretics, who practically destroy free will by bringing in lost natures, which cannot receive salvation, and on the other hand saved natures, which are incapable of being lost.⁷ Pharaoh, they say, having a lost nature, is in consequence hardened by God, who has mercy on dishonor?" (Rom 9:20, 21). These passages and others like them seem to have no small effect on ordinary people, so that they hesitate to believe that each man has freedom over his own will, but think that it depends on the will of God whether a man is saved or lost.

8. Let us begin therefore with the statements made to Pharaoh, who is said to have been hardened by God in order that he might not let the people go. Along with this we shall also deal with that word of the apostle in which he says, "So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom 9:18). Now it is on these passages that the heretics chiefly rely, when they say that it is not in our power to be saved, but that the natures of souls are such that they are absolutely lost or saved, and that a soul with an evil nature can by no means become good nor can one with a good nature become the spiritual men but hardens the earthly.

Let us see, then, what they mean. We shall ask them whether Pharaoh was of an earthly nature. When they answer, we shall say that a man with an earthly nature is completely disobedient to God. But if he is disobedient, what need is there of hardening his heart, and that not once but several times? There is none, unless we assume that it was possible for him to obey and that, since he was not earthly, he would have obeyed completely when put to shame by the portents and signs; but that God, in order to display his mighty works for the salvation of the many, needs Pharaoh to proceed to a further degree of disobedience and hardens his heart on this account.

Latin

evil. So they say that Pharaoh, since he was of a lost nature, was in consequence hardened by God, who hardens those that are of an earthly nature but has mercy on those that are of a spiritual nature.

Let us see, then, what they mean by this assertion; and let us first ask them to tell us whether they mean that Pharaoh had an earthly nature, which they call a lost one. They will doubtless reply: "An earthly one." If then he was of an earthly nature he was altogether incapable of believing in God or obeying him, seeing that his nature was opposed to this. But if this disobedience was implanted in him by nature, what further need was there for his heart to be hardened by God, and that not once but several times? There was none, unless we assume that it was possible for him to yield to persuasion. Nor could anyone be said to be hardened by another except a man who in himself was not hard. But if

This will be our answer to them in the first place, for the purpose of overthrowing their supposition that Pharaoh was of a lost nature.

We must return them the same answer in regard to the words spoken by the apostle. For whom does God harden? The lost? Why? Because they would obey if they were not hardened? Then would they not clearly be saved otherwise, since they are not of a lost nature? And on whom does he have mercy? Is it on those who are to be saved?

Latin

he was not hard of himself, it follows that he was not of an earthly nature, but of such a sort as to be capable of giving way when amazed by the signs and mighty works. And indeed Pharaoh was necessary to God, in order that for the salvation of the many God might display his power in him during his long resistance and struggle against God's will; and it is on this account that his heart is said to be hardened.

Let this be our answer to them in the first place, in order that their supposition that Pharaoh was by nature lost may be overthrown.

Let us also deal with them in a similar way in regard to the words spoken by the apostle Paul. Whom, according to your opinion, does God harden? Is it those who you say are of a lost nature? They would have acted otherwise, I suppose, if they had not been hardened? But if they come to loss through being hardened, they are lost

But how is there need of a second mercy for those who have once for all been fashioned for salvation and who by their nature are in any case destined to be blessed? The truth is that, since they are in danger of being lost unless they obtain mercy, they obtain mercy in order that they may not incur that of which they are in danger, namely, being lost, but may be in the position of those who are saved. This is our answer to such persons.

9. But to those who think they understand the meaning of "hardened"⁸ we must address the further question: What actually do they mean by saying that God in his not by nature but by accident. Then again tell us, on whom does God have mercy? Is it on those who are to be saved? But how is there need of a second mercy for those who once for all were destined by nature for salvation and come to blessedness naturally? The truth is, as even their case shows, that it was possible for the men in question to be lost, and the reason why they obtain mercy is that by this means they may not be lost, but may come to salvation and possess the realms of the holy. Let this be our answer to those who by fabricated stories bring forward doctrines of natures that are good or evil, that is, spiritual or earthly, which natures, they say, determine the salvation or loss of each individual soul.

9. We must now reply to those who would have it that the God of the law is merely just and not good,⁸ asking them: In what way do they suppose that the heart working hardens the heart, and with what purpose does he do this? Now they must safeguard the idea of God, who is according to sound doctrine just and good; but if they do not admit that, let it be granted them for the moment that he is merely just. Then let them show how he that is good and just, or he that is merely just, is acting justly when he hardens the heart of a man who as a result of this hardening is lost; and how he that is just can be a cause of the loss and disobedience of those who are punished as a result of their hardening and disobedience.

Why, too, does he blame Pharaoh, saying, "Thou wilt not let my people go; behold, I will smite all the firstborn in Egypt, even thy firstborn" (Ex 4:23), and all the rest that is recorded as being said by God through Moses to Pharaoh? It is incumbent on him who believes that the scriptures are true and that God is just, if he is a thoughtful man, to of Pharaoh was hardened by God, by what operation or with what purpose in view? For they must safeguard the view and conception of God, who is according to us just and good, but according to them merely just. Then let them show us how God, whom they themselves admit to be just, is acting justly when he hardens a man's heart in order that through this very hardening: the man may sin and be lost; and how God's justice can be defended in this case, where God himself is the cause of the loss of those whom by his authority as judge he will hereafter condemn on the very ground that they were hard and unbelieving.

Why, too, does he blame Pharaoh, saying, "If thou wilt not let my people go, behold, I will smite all the firstborn in Egypt, even thy firstborn" (Ex 4:23), and all the rest that is recorded as being said by God through Moses to Pharaoh? It is incumbent on every man take pains to show how God, in using such expressions as these, can be clearly conceived to be just. If, however, anyone should rise up and in a barefaced manner⁹ champion the doctrine that the Creator is evil,¹⁰ we should need other arguments to answer him.

10. But since they admit that they look upon God as being just, and our view is that he is good as well as just, let us consider how one who is good and just could harden Pharaoh's heart. See then whether we cannot prove, through an illustration used by the apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that God has mercy on one and hardens another by a single operation; that it is not his purpose to harden, but that he acts who believes the record of the scriptures to be true and desires to show that the God of the law and the prophets is just, to give an explanation of all this, and to show how no diminution of the justice of God is involved in it; for, even if they deny that he is good, still they admit that the Judge and Creator of the world is just. There is, however, another kind of answer for those who assert that a wicked being, namely the devil, is the Creator of this world.¹⁰

10. But since we acknowledge that the God who spoke by Moses is not only just but also good, let us consider carefully how one who is just and good can rightly be said to harden Pharaoh's heart. Let us see whether perchance we may solve this difficult problem by certain examples and illustrations taken from the apostle Paul, showing that God has mercy on one and hardens another by one and the same operation; that with kindly intent, and that the hardening follows as a result of the substance of evil present in the particular evil person, so that God is said to harden him who is already hardened. "The land," it says, "which hath drunk the rain that cometh (oft)¹¹ upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them for whose sake it is also tilled, receiveth blessing from God; but if it beareth thorns and thistles, it is rejected and nigh unto a curse, whose end is to be burned" (Heb 6:7, 8). As regards the rain, then, there is one operation, but the land which has been tilled brings forth fruit, while that which is neglected and barren brings forth thorns.

Latin

God's actions and desires do not aim at hardening the man who is hardened, but that during the time in which he is displaying kindness and forbearance those who treat his kindness and forbearance with contempt and pride have their heart hardened while the punishment of their misdeeds is being deferred, whereas they who receive his kindness and forbearance as an opportunity of repentance and amendment obtain mercy. To show our meaning more clearly, we take the illustration used by the apostle Paul in the Epistle to the Hebrews. "The land which hath drunk the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is tilled, shall receive blessing from God; but that which beareth thorns and thistles is rejected and nigh unto a curse, whose end is to be burned" (Heb 6:7, 8). From these words of Paul which we have quoted it is clearly shown that through

Greek

Now it seems almost irreverent to represent the giver of the rain as saying: "It is I who made the fruits and the thorns that are in the earth"; yet in spite of this it is true. For if there had been no rain, there would have been neither fruits nor thorns, but after the rain has fallen in due time and measure, both spring up. For it says: "the land which hath drunk the rain that cometh oft upon it, if it beareth thorns and thistles, is rejected and nigh unto a curse" (Heb 6:7, 8). So then the blessing of the rain comes also on the inferior land, but this, being neglected and untilled, brings forth thorns and thistles. Thus the marvelous works done by God are as it were the rain, while the one and the same operation of God, by which he bestows rain upon the earth, one piece of land being carefully tilled brings forth good fruits, while another, which is neglected and untilled, produces thorns and thistles.

Now if one were to speak as it were in the person of the showers and say, "It was I the rain that made the good fruits, and I, too, made the thorns and thistles," although this would seem to be a hard saying it is nevertheless a true one. For if there were no rain, neither fruits nor thorns and thistles would grow; but after the showers have fallen the earth produces both kinds from out of itself. But although the earth has produced both kinds of growth by the blessing of the rain, the diversity of the growth is not to be attributed to the showers, but the blame for an evil crop must fall on those who, when they might have broken up the land by frequent plowing and turned over the dull clods with the heavy mattocks and cut away and rooted out all useless and harmful weeds and cleansed and tilled the fields with all the toil and skill that such cultivation demands and so prepared them for the expected showers, have neglected this and will accordingly reap those most appropriate fruits of their idleness, thorns and thistles. Thus it happens that the goodness and impartiality of the rain visits all lands alike, yet by one and the same operation of the showers that land which has been tilled produces useful fruits with a blessing to its diligent and useful cultivators, whereas that which by the idleness of its cultivators has become hardened brings forth thorns and thistles. Let us therefore take those signs and mighty works which were done by God to be as it were showers provided by him from above. But the purpose and desires of men must be taken to be the land, whether tilled or untilled, which is of one nature as land compared with land, but not of one and the same degree of cultivation.

It follows from this¹² that the will of each person is either hardened by the mighty and wonderful works of God, if it is untilled and fierce and barbarous, so that it becomes more savage and thorny than ever, or else it becomes softer and brings itself into obedience with the whole mind, if it has been cleansed from its faults and carefully trained.
11. So, too, if the sun were to utter a voice and say, "I melt things and dry them up," when being melted and being dried up are opposites, he would not be speaking falsely in regard to the point in question, since by the one heat wax is melted and mud dried. Thus the one operation which was performed through Moses revealed the hardness of Pharaoh on the one hand, the result of his wickedness, and on the other or untilled, which is of one nature as land compared with land, but not of one and the same degree of cultivation.

It follows from this¹² that the will of each person is either hardened by the mighty and wonderful works of God, if it is untilled and fierce and barbarous, so that it becomes more savage and thorny than ever, or else it becomes softer and brings itself into obedience with the whole mind, if it has been cleansed from its faults and carefully trained.
11. But to prove the matter more clearly it will not be superfluous to employ yet another illustration. For instance, suppose one were to say that the sun binds and loosens, when binding and loosening are opposites. The statement will not, however, be false, for the sun, by one and the same power of its heat, loosens wax and yet dries up and binds together mud. Not that its power operates one way on mud and hand the persuasibility of the mixed Egyptian multitude who joined the Hebrews when they departed.

And the briefly recorded fact that the heart of Pharaoh experienced a kind of softening when he said: "But ye shall not proceed far; ye shall go a three days' journey and leave your wives behind" (cf. Ex 8:27, 28), and whatever else he spoke when yielding before the marvelous works, makes it clear that these signs had some effect even on him, another way on wax, but that mud is of one quality and wax of another, though indeed according to nature they are one thing because each comes from the earth. So therefore one and the same operation of God, which worked through Moses in signs and wonders, revealed on the one hand the hardness of Pharaoh, which he had developed by the intensity of his wickedness, and on the other hand proclaimed the obedience of those other Egyptians who were mingled among the Israelites and are said to have gone out of Egypt along with them.

Moreover, in regard to the passage which implies that the heart of Pharaoh was gradually being softened, so that on one occasion he said, "Ye shall not proceed far; ye shall go a three days' journey, but ye shall leave your wives and your children and flocks behind" (cf. Ex 8:27, 28; 10:9, 11), and any other passages there may be in though they did not entirely accomplish their object. Yet not even this would have happened if the idea held by most people about the words, "I will harden Pharaoh's heart," rightly represented what was wrought by him, that is, by God.¹³

It is not unreasonable to soften down such expressions even from our common manner of speech.¹⁴ For kind masters often say to servants who have been spoiled by their kindness and forbearance, "It was I who made you wicked," or "I am to blame for these serious offences." We must give heed to the character and force of what is said and not misrepresent it through failing to understand the meaning of the expression.

Latin

which he appears to be yielding gradually before the signs and wonders, what else do these indicate except that the power of the signs and wonders had some effect on him, although it did not achieve so much as it ought? For if the hardening had been of such a kind as most people think, we should certainly not have found him yielding even in a few points.¹³

It will not, I think, appear unreasonable to explain even from our common usage the turn and figure of speech which is associated with the expression "hardening."¹⁴ For kind masters are often wont to say to servants who have grown more insolent and wicked as a result of patient and gentle treatment, "It was I who made you this; I have spoiled you; my patience has made you good for nothing; I am the cause of your hard and worthless character, because I do not at once punish you for every single fault according to your deserts."

Greek

Accordingly Paul, after clearly examining this question, says to the sinner: "Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? but after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up for thyself wrath in the day of wrath and revelation and righteous judgment of God" (Rom 2:4, 5). Now let that which the apostle says to the sinner be applied to Pharaoh, and it will be perceived to be entirely appropriate when addressed to him who "according to his hardness and impenitent heart was treasuring up for himself wrath," since his hardness would not have been thus proved and made manifest

Latin

We must first take note of the turn and figure of the speech and so come to understand the force of the expression, and not misrepresent a word whose inner meaning we have not carefully investigated.

Accordingly Paul the apostle, when clearly dealing with this question, says to the man who remained in sin: "Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? but after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up for thyself wrath in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (Rom 2:4, 5). Let us then take that which the apostle says to the man who lives in sin and apply it to Pharaoh, and see whether you will not find it appropriate when spoken concerning him, for he, "according to his hardness and impenitent heart," treasured and stored up for himself "wrath in the unless the signs had been performed, and performed on so large and grand a scale.

12. But since such statements are hard to believe and are considered to be forced, let us see from the words of the prophets also what is said by those who have experienced the great kindness of God and have lived a good life, but have afterwards fallen into sin. "Why didst thou make us to err, O Lord, from thy way? Why didst thou harden our heart that we should not fear thy name? Return for thy servants sake, the tribes of thine inheritance, that for a little while we may inherit thy holy mountain" (Is 63:17, 18). And in Jeremiah: "Thou didst deceive me, O Lord, and I was deceived; thou wast stronger and didst prevail" (Jer 20:7).

day of wrath," since his hardness would never have been thus proved and made manifest unless signs and wonders of such number and grandeur had followed.

12. But if the proofs which we have adduced seem insufficient and the apostolic illustration to be lacking in strength, let us bring forward in addition the witness of prophetic authority and see what the prophets declare about those who by living a good life at the first have deserved to receive very many proofs of God's goodness, but afterwards, as men do, have fallen into sin. The prophet, making himself one with them, says, "Why, Lord, didst thou make us to err from thy way? And why didst thou harden our heart that we should not fear thy name? Return for thy servant's sake, the tribes of thine inheritance, that we, too, may receive for a little while some inheritance of thy holy mountain" (Is 63:17, 18). And Jeremiah speaks in

Now the sentence, "Why didst thou harden our heart, that we should not fear thy name?" spoken by those who are praying for mercy, is spoken in a special sense as follows. Why didst thou spare us so long, not visiting us for our sins, but abandoning us until our transgressions have grown to greatness?

For God abandons most men by leaving them unpunished, in order that from the things that lie within our

the same way: "Thou didst deceive us, O Lord, and we were deceived; thou hast held us and hast prevailed" (Jer 20:7).

Now the sentence, "Why, Lord, didst thou harden our heart, that we should not fear thy name," spoken by those who were praying for mercy, must be taken in a special sense, as if it said, Why hast thou spared us so long and not visited us when we sinned, but hast abandoned us, so that our wickedness has grown greater and our freedom to sin has extended because thy punishment ceased? For so a horse,¹⁵ if it does not continually feel the spur of its rider and have its mouth rubbed by the rough bit, becomes hardened. So a young lad, if not continually subdued by flogging, will grow up into an insolent youth, a ready prey to vices.

God therefore abandons and neglects those whom he judges to be unworthy of chastisement. "For whom power the character of each person may be proved and the better ones may become manifest as a result of the test applied to them; while the others remain unnoticed, not in deed by God, for he knows all things before they come to be (cf. Sus 5:42; Sir 42:18) but by the rational creation and themselves, in order that they may find the way of healing at a later time; for they would not have known the benefit, unless they had condemned themselves.

the Lord loveth he chasteneth and punisheth; and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth" (Heb 12:6).¹⁶ We must suppose from this that those men are already received into the rank and affection of sons, who have deserved to be scourged and punished by God in order that through endurance of trials and tribulations they may be able to say in their own persons, "Who shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus? Shall tribulation or anguish or famine or nakedness or peril or sword?" (Rom 8:35). For through all these is brought out and made manifest the will of each person; and the steadfastness of his perseverance is indicated, not so much to God, who knows all things before they come to be (cf. Sus 5:42; Sir 42:18), as to the rational and heavenly powers, who have been appointed as it were helpers and servants of God in the work of bringing to pass the salvation of

This method is of advantage to each, that he may become aware of his own individual nature and of the grace of God. The man who is not aware of his own weakness and of the divine grace, even if he receives a benefit before he has had experience of himself or condemned himself, will think that what is supplied to him by the grace of heaven is due to his own good works. This produces conceit and pride, and will prove a cause of his downfall, as we believe happened in the case of the devil, who attributed to himself the men.¹⁷ As for the others, who do not yet offer themselves to God with such constancy and affection and are not ready to yield themselves to his service and prepare their souls for trial, these are said to be abandoned by God, that is, not to be instructed, since they are not ready for instruction, their treatment and healing being undoubtedly reserved for a later time.

For these indeed do not know what they obtain from God, unless they first come to the point of desiring to obtain a benefit; which will only happen thus, when a man has previously learned to know himself and to feel what is lacking in himself and to understand from whom he should and can seek the supply of what is lacking. For he who does not first understand his infirmity and sickness is unable to seek a physician; or at any rate the man who has not learned the dangerous nature of his illness will not be grateful to the physician privileges which he enjoyed when he lived blamelessly. "For every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Lk 14:11; 18:14). And observe that for this reason divine things "have been hidden from the wise and understanding" (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:21), in order that, as the apostle says, "no flesh should glory before God" (1 Cor 1:29), and have been "revealed unto babes" (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:21), who after their babyhood have risen to higher things and have remembered that it is not from their own effort so much as from the unspeakable goodness of God that they have reached the uttermost limit of blessedness.

Latin

when he has recovered his health. So, too, if a man has not first learned the defects of his soul and the wickedness of his sins and confessed them openly with his own mouth he cannot be cleansed and absolved; otherwise he might be unaware that what he receives is a gift of grace and might think that the divine liberality was a blessing that belonged to him. This would undoubtedly give rise again to arrogance and pride of heart and become once more the cause of his downfall, as we must believe happened in the case of the devil, who thought that the privileges which he enjoyed when he lived blamelessly were his own and not given to him by God. And in him was fulfilled the saying that "every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled" (Lk 14:11; 18:14). It is for this reason, it seems to me, that the divine mysteries have been "hidden from the prudent and wise" (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:21), in order, as the scripture says, "that no flesh should glory before God" (1 Cor 1:29), and have been "revealed unto babes" (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:21), that is, to those who, after becoming infants and babes, or in other words returning to the simplicity of babes, then make progress, and when they reach perfection remember that they have obtained their blessedness not so much by their own virtues as by the grace and mercy of God.

Greek

13. The man who is abandoned is abandoned therefore by the divine judgment, and towards certain sinners God is longsuffering, not without reason, but because in regard to the immortality of the soul and the eternal world it will be to their advantage that they should not be helped quickly to salvation but should be brought to it more slowly after having experienced many ills. For physicians also,¹⁸ even though they may be able to heal a man quickly, yet act in a contrary

13. The man therefore who must needs be abandoned is abandoned by the judgment of God, and God is longsuffering towards certain sinners, though not without a definite reason. For this very fact that he is longsuffering makes for their advantage, since the soul, whose healing and oversight are his concern, is immortal; and being an immortal and eternal thing it is not, even though it be not quickly healed, thereby shut out from salvation, which is only delayed until more way whenever they suspect the existence of a hidden poison in the body. They do this because they wish to heal the patient more surely, considering it better to let him remain in his fever and sickness for a long time in order that he may regain permanent health, rather than appear to restore him quickly to strength and afterwards to see him relapse and this quicker cure prove only temporary.

convenient times. Moreover it is perhaps expedient for those who have been more deeply infected with the passion of wickedness to attain salvation slowly. For physicians also,¹⁸ when they could very quickly cover the scars of a wound, yet some-times prevent and defer its immediate healing with a view to ensuring better and sounder health; since they know that it is preferable to cause delay in wounds that fester, and to allow the malignant humor to flow for a while, rather than to hasten to a superficial cure and to shut up within the veins the inflamed and poisonous matter, which when cut off from its usual outlets will undoubtedly creep into the interior of the body and penetrate to the vital parts themselves, so as to bring on not merely bodily disease but actual loss of life.

In the same way God, who knows the secrets of the heart and foreknows the future, perhaps in his longsuffering allows the hidden evil to remain while he draws it out by means of external circumstances, with the object of purifying him who owing to carelessness has received into himself the seeds of sin, that having vomited them out when they come to the surface the sinner, even though he has proceeded far in evil deeds, may in the end be able to obtain purification after his evil life and be renewed. For God deals with souls not in view of the fifty years, so to speak, of our life here, but in view of the endless world.¹⁹ He has made our intellectual nature immortal and akin to himself, and the rational soul is not shut out from healing, as if this life were all.

Latin

longsuffering allows some things to happen which, coming upon men from without encourage the passions and faults that are concealed within to emerge and proceed into the light, so that by means of these events men who owing to great negligence and carelessness have received into themselves the roots and seeds of sin may be purified and healed, the seeds being cast up and brought to the surface in order that they may be in a manner vomited forth and dispersed. And thus, even though a man may appear to be involved in very serious evils, suffering convulsions in all his members, he may yet be able in the end to obtain rest and relief, to reach the limit of satiety in his evils and so after many troubles to be restored to his original state. For God deals with souls not in view of the short time of our life here, which is confined to some sixty or a few more years, but in view of the everlasting and eternal age, exercising his providential care over souls that are immortal, just as he himself is eternal and immortal.¹⁹ For he made our rational nature, which he created "in his own image and likeness" (cf. Gn 1:26), incorruptible, and therefore the soul, which is immortal, is not shut out by the shortness of our present life from the divine healing and remedies.

14. If then one were to criticize the farmer for not casting his seed more quickly on the rocky ground, when one saw that other rocky ground which has received seed was flourishing, the farmer would reply: "I shall sow this ground more slowly, putting in seeds that will be able to endure, the slower method being better for this ground and safer than is the case with the ground which has received its seed more quickly but superficially"; and we should agree that the farmer spoke reasonably and had acted like a wise man.

14. But let us take from the gospels also some illustrations of the matters we speak about. It is related that there is a certain rock covered with a small and scanty depth of earth, into which if seed falls it is said to spring up quickly; but after it has sprung up, because it does not take root deeply, the plant is said "to be scorched and to wither away" when the sun arises (cf. Mt 13:5, 6 and par.). Now this rock undoubtedly stands for the soul of man, hardened through its own carelessness and made stony by wickedness. For no one

So, too, the great Farmer of all nature delays the benefit which we should consider quick, for fear lest it should prove superficial.

But it is likely that someone will meet us with the objection, "Why does some of the seed fall upon the soul that has the superficial soil, that which is as it were a rock?" To this we must answer that it was better for the soul that desired the higher things too hastily and not by the way that led to them to obtain what it desired, in order that when it had condemned itself for this it might patiently endure to receive a long time afterwards the cultivation that is in accordance with nature.

Latin

has a "stony heart" created by God, but each person's heart is said to become stony through his own wickedness and disobedience.

If then one were to criticize the farmer for not casting his seed more quickly on the rocky ground when one saw that other rocky ground which had received seed was quickly flourishing, the farmer would certainly say in reply: "I sow this land more slowly for this reason, that it may retain the seeds it has received. For it is better for ground like this to be sown later, lest perhaps the crop should spring up too rapidly, and coming from the very top of a thin soil should be unable to endure the heat of the sun." Would not he who at first criticized now acknowledge the reason and skill of the farmer and agree that what formerly seemed to him illogical was in fact done with good reason? In the same way therefore God, who is a most skillful farmer of his entire creation, prevents and delays, undoubtedly till some future time, the restoration of health in cases where we think it should be more quickly restored, for fear lest the cure should prove superficial rather than internal.

But if someone meets us with the objection, "Why do certain seeds fall upon the rocky ground, that is, upon a hard and rocky soul?" we must answer to this that not even such an event can take place apart from the ordering of divine providence; for unless by this means a knowledge was gained of the great self-condemnation which follows a heedlessness in hearing and a wickedness in examining the divine commands, it would certainly be unknown what useful purpose was served by an orderly training. And so it comes to pass that the soul; becomes aware of its fault and casts the blame upon itself and reserves and yields itself up for the process of cultivation that is to

For souls are, so to speak, innumerable, and their habits are innumerable, and equally so are their movements, their purposes, their inclinations and their impulses, of which there is only one perfect superintendent, who has full knowledge both of the times and the appropriate aids and the paths and the ways, namely, the God and Father of the universe. He knows how by means of the great plagues and the drowning in the sea he is leading even Pharaoh; and his superintending care for him does not stop at this point. For when he was drowned he was not destroyed. "For in the hand of God are both we and our words, and all understanding and knowledge of crafts" (Wis 7:16). This, then, is a fair defense of the statement that "Pharaoh's heart was follow; that is, the soul sees for itself that its faults must first be removed and that it must then undergo instruction in wisdom.

Since, therefore, souls are innumerable, and equally so are their habits, their purposes, their different individual movements, their inclinations and impulses, the variety of which is quite beyond the capacity of the human mind to consider, we must accordingly leave the skill and power and knowledge necessary for their superintendence to God alone, for he only can know the remedies for each individual soul and determine the time for its healing. He, then, who alone, as we have said, is acquainted with the ways of each mortal man, knows by what way he ought to lead even Pharaoh, "in order that through him his name might be named in all the earth" (cf. Rom 9:17; Ex 9:16) chastising him with many plagues and then leading him on to be drowned hardened" (cf. Ex 10:20) and of the other statement that "he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom 9:18).

15. Let us also look at Ezekiel's statement in which he says, "I will take away from them their stony hearts and I will put in them hearts of flesh, that they may walk in my judgments and keep my ordinances" (Ez 11:19, 20). Now if God, when he wills, in the sea. And we must certainly not think that in this drowning the providential care of God for Pharaoh came to an end; for we must not suppose that, because he was drowned, he went immediately out of existence. "For in the hand of God are both we and our words, and all understanding and knowledge of crafts" (Wis 7:16), as the scripture says. These, then, are the arguments we put forth to the best of our ability, in discussing the passage of scripture in which God is said to have hardened Pharaoh's heart (cf. Ex 10:20), and the other statement that "he hath mercy on whom he will and whom he will he hardeneth" (Rom 9:18).

15. Let us now also look at the statement of Ezekiel in which he says, "I will take away from them their stony heart and I will put in them a heart of flesh, that they may walk in my judgments and keep my ordinances" (Ez 11:19, 20). Now if God,

Greek

"takes away the hearts of stone" and implants "hearts of flesh," so that men keep his ordinances and observe his commandments, it is not in our power to put away wickedness, for the taking away of "hearts of stone" is nothing else than the removal, from him for whom God wills it, of the wickedness by reason of which a man is hardened. And the insertion of a "heart of flesh," in order that a man may "walk in the ordinances of God and keep his commandments," what else is this than to become yielding and unopposed to the truth and to be capable of practicing the virtues?

But if God promises to do this, and if we do not lay aside our "stony hearts" before he takes them away, it is clear that it is not in our power to put away wickedness. And if we ourselves do nothing to implant within us the "heart of flesh," but it is the work of God, then to when he wills, takes away the "heart of stone" and puts in a "heart of flesh," so that men may keep his ordinances and observe his commandments, it will be seen that it is neither in our power to put away wickedness—for the taking away of a "heart of stone" would appear to be nothing else than the removal, from him for whom God wills it, of the wickedness by which a man is hardened—nor to insert a "heart of flesh," that a man may "walk in God's ordinances and keep his commandments," which indeed is nothing else but to become obedient to God and unopposed to the truth and capable of practicing the virtues.

If then God promises to do this, and if, before he takes away our "stony heart" we are not able of our own selves to lay it aside, it follows that it is not; in our power to cast off wickedness, but in God's. And again, if it is not by our own act that there comes into us the "heart of flesh," if it is live a virtuous life will not be our work, but something due entirely to the divine grace.

Now this is what will be said by the man who, arguing from the bare words, would destroy our free will. We, however, shall reply that these words must be understood in the following manner. It is as when a man who suffers from ignorance and want of education, and becomes conscious of his personal defects either from the exhortation of his teacher or from his own reflection, entrusts himself to one whom he believes to be capable of leading him on to education and virtue. When he so entrusts himself, his instructor promises to take away his lack of education and to implant in him education, not as if it counted for nothing in regard to his being educated and escaping from his ignorance that he should have brought himself to be cured, but because the work of God alone, then to live a virtuous life will not be our work, but in all respects the work of God's grace.

Now this is what is said by those who wish to prove by the authority of scripture that nothing lies within our own power. We shall reply to them that these words must not be understood in that sense, but as follows. It is as if an uneducated and uninstructed man, becoming conscious of the disgrace of his condition, whether by being stirred at the exhortation of another or by a desire to rival those who are wise, should entrust himself to one by whom he is confident that he can be carefully trained and competently instructed. If then he, who had formerly hardened himself in ignorance, entrusts himself, as we have said, with full purpose of mind to a master and promises to obey him in everything, the master, on seeing clearly his purpose and determination, will the instructor promises to improve one who desires improvement.

So the divine word promises to take away the wickedness which it calls a "stony heart," from those who come to it, not if they are unwilling, but if they submit themselves to the physician of the sick; just as in the gospels the sick are found coming to the Savior and asking to obtain healing and being healed. And, so to speak, to give sight to the blind is (cf. Mt 11:5), so far as concerns the request of those who believe they can be healed, a work of the sufferers, but so far as concerns the restoration of sight it is a work of our Savior. This then is the way by which the word of God promises to implant knowledge in those who come to it, taking away on his part undertake to take away from him his lack of education and to implant in him education, not promising, however, to do this if the disciple withholds his assent and co-operation²⁰ but only if he offers and pledges himself to entire obedience.

So, too, the divine word promises to take away the "stony heart" from those who come to it, not indeed from those who do not listen to it, but from those who submit to the precepts of its teaching; just as in the gospels we find the sick coming to the Savior, asking to obtain health and so being healed. And when, for example, the blind are healed (cf. Mt 11:5) and receive sight, it is, so far as concerns the fact that they made request to the Savior and believed that they could be healed by him, a work of those who were healed; but so far as concerns the fact that their sight was restored, it is a work of the Savior. In this way also does the divine word promise to the stony and hard heart, which signifies wickedness, to enable them to walk in the divine commandments and to keep the divine ordinances.

16. After this there is the passage from the gospel, where the Savior said that he spoke to those that are without in parables for this reason, that "seeing they may not see and hearing they may not understand, lest they should turn and it should be forgiven them" (cf. Mt 10:10, 13; Mk 4:11, 12; Lk 8:10). Now our opponent will say: "If when they have heard a clearer message some people certainly do turn, and turn in such a way as to become worthy of the forgiveness of sins, and if the hearing of this clearer message does not rest with them but with their teacher, and he does not proclaim it to them for this reason, lest they should see and understand, then salvation does not lie in their power; give instruction by taking away the stony heart, that is, by banishing wickedness, in order that men may thus be able to walk in the divine ordinances and keep the commandments of the law.

16. After this there comes before us the passage from the gospel, where the Savior said, "For this reason I speak to them that are without in parables," "that seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest haply they should be turned and it should be forgiven them" (cf. Mt 10:10, 13; Mk 4:11, 12; Lk 8:10). In regard to this our opponent will reply: "If they who hear more clearly are certainly corrected and turned, and turned in such a way as to become worthy of the forgiveness of sins, and if the hearing of this clear message does not rest with them but entirely with their teacher, whose work it is to teach them more openly and clearly, but who says that and if this is so, we are not free as regards salvation and destruction."

Now there would be a convincing answer to this, if it were not for the addition, "lest they should turn, and it should be forgiven them"; namely, that the Savior did not wish those who would not become noble and good to understand the deeper mysteries, and that this was why he spoke to them in parables. But as it stands, with the words "lest they should turn, and it should be forgiven them," the answer is more difficult.

In the first place we must note the passage as an argument against the heretics,²¹ who hunt out similar passages from the Old Testament, in he does not preach the word to them clearly for this reason, 'lest haply they should hear and understand and be turned' and be saved, then their salvation will certainly not rest with themselves; and if this is so, we shall have no freedom as regards either salvation or destruction."

Now if it were not for the addition, "lest they should be turned, and it should be forgiven them," there would be a very simple answer, namely, to say that the Savior did not wish those whom he foresaw would not be good to understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven and that he spoke to them in parables on that account. But as it stands, with the addition, "lest haply they should be turned, and it should be forgiven them," the explanation is rendered more difficult.

And in the first place we must note what a defense this passage furnishes against the heretics,²¹ who are accosted to hunt out from the

which there is revealed, as they are bold enough to say, the cruelty of the Creator or his revengeful and punitive attitude, or whatever they choose to call the quality in question, in regard to the wicked; their sole purpose being to deny that there is any goodness in him who formed the world. With the New Testament, however, they do not deal in a similar way, nor even candidly, but pass over statements closely resembling those which they consider open to criticism in the Old Testament.

For even according to the gospel the Savior is clearly shown, as they themselves assert in regard to the former writings, to refrain from speaking plainly on this account, lest men should turn, and having turned should become worthy of the forgiveness of sins; a

Old Testament any expressions which may appear to them, as they understand them, to point to some severe and cruel quality in God the Creator, as when he is described as moved with the desire or whatever name they choose to call the quality in question, for vengeance or punishment; their object being to deny that there is any goodness in the Creator. In regard to the gospels, however, they do not pass judgment with the same mental bias or the same feeling, nor do they observe that some such passages as they condemn and censure in the Old Testament are to be found also in the gospels.

For clearly in this chapter the Savior is shown, as they themselves say, not speaking openly for this reason, lest men should be turned and when turned should receive forgiveness of sins. Now certainly if this is understood according to the mere letter, it will be in no way less statement which of itself is in no way less than the similar ones from the Old Testament which are attacked. If they seek for a defense of the gospel statement, we must ask them whether they are not to be blamed for dealing in different ways with similar problems; for they do not take offence at the New Testament but seek to defend it, whereas in regard to the Old Testament, in similar passages which they ought to defend equally with those of the New, they make an attack. From these considerations we shall force them to admit that on account of their resemblances the scriptures must all be regarded as coming from one God. But come now, and let us provide, to the best of our ability, a defense to the question before us.

17. We said when investigating the case of Pharaoh that sometimes it does not turn out to the advantage of those who are healed that they should be healed than those passages which are attacked in the Old Testament. If, however, it seems, even to them, to call for an explanation, when passages of such a sort are found in the New Testament, it will follow necessarily that the passages in the Old Testament which are attacked shall be cleared from censure by a similar explanation, so that by this means the writings of each Testament may be proved to come from one and the same God. But let us turn, to the best of our ability, to the question before us.

17. We said before when discussing the case of Pharaoh that sometimes it does not turn out to advantage for one to be healed quickly,²² especially if the disease be thereby quickly,²² if, that is, they have fallen of themselves into difficulties and are then easily released from the conditions into which they have fallen; for despising the evil as being easy of cure and taking no precautions against falling into it they will find themselves in it a second time. In dealing with such persons, therefore, the eternal God, the perceiver of secret things, who knows all things before they come to be (Sus 5:42),²³ in his goodness refrains from sending them the quicker help and, if I may say so, helps them by not helping them, since this course is for their profit.

It is probable, then, that those "who are without" (Mk 4:11; cf. 1 Cor 5:13), concerning whom we are now speaking, were foreseen by the Savior, according to our supposition, as being not likely to prove steadfast in their conversion, if they were to hear more explicitly the message that was spoken. They shut up in the internal organs and so rage more fiercely. Therefore God, who is the perceiver of secret things and who knows all things before they come to be (Sus 5:42), in his great goodness delays the healing of such persons and defers the remedy to a more distant time and, if I may say so, heals them by not healing them, lest a premature recovery of health should render them incurable.

It is possible, therefore, in regard to those whom the word of our Lord and Savior addressed as being "without" (Mk 4:11; cf. 1 Cor 5:13), that since he perceived by his power of "searching the hearts and reins" (Ps 7:10, LXX [RV 9]) that they were not yet fit to receive his teaching in clearer terms, he covered up were therefore destined by the Lord not to hear the deeper teachings more clearly, lest after having quickly turned and been healed by obtaining forgiveness they should despise the wounds of their wickedness as being slight and easy of cure and should very quickly fall into them again. Perhaps, too, though they had paid the penalty for their former sins which they committed against virtue when they abandoned her, they had not yet fulfilled the appropriate time in which to be themselves abandoned by the divine superintendence and to be filled more and more with the particular evils whose seeds they had sown and then afterwards to be called to a more enduring repentance, such as would prevent them from quickly falling again into the sins into which they had previously fallen when they mocked at the high worth of noble things and gave themselves up to all that was worse.

Latin

the deeper mysteries of the faith in veiled speech. For he feared that if they were speedily converted and healed, that is, if the forgiveness of their sins were quickly obtained, they might easily fall again into the same disease of sin which they had found could be cured without any difficulty. And if this should happen, no one can doubt that the penalty would be doubled and the quantity of evil continually increased, when there is not only a repetition of sins which had appeared to be forgiven, but even the court of virtue is polluted by the tread of deceitful-minded and corrupted men, full within of hidden wickedness. And what remedy can there ever be for such persons, who after partaking of the impure and filthy food of wickedness have tasted the pleasure of virtue and received its sweetness into their mouths and have then turned over again to the poisonous and deadly food of iniquity? Who doubts

Greek

Those therefore who are spoken of as being "without," plainly by comparison with those "within" (cf. Mk 4:11; 1 Cor 5:12, 13), are not altogether far away from those within, since while those within hear distinctly, they hear indistinctly because it is spoken to them in parables; nevertheless they hear. But as for the rest of those who are without, those called the Tyrians, although it was that it is better for them to be put off and abandoned for a time, in order that if one day they should happen to have had their fill of wickedness and be able to shudder at the filthy ways in which they now delight, then at last the word of God may be effectively revealed to them, with the result that what is holy is not given to the dogs nor pearls cast before swine who will trample them under their feet and then turn round and rend and attack those who have preached to them the word of God? (cf. Mt 7:6).

These then are they who are said to be "without," doubtless by comparison with those who are said to be "within" (cf. Mk 4:11; 1 Cor 5:12, 13) and to hear the word of God more plainly. Those, however, who are "without" also hear the word, although it is covered up in parables and darkened by proverbs. But there are others besides those who are "without," those namely who foreknown that "they would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes" (cf. Mt 11:21; Lk 10:13), had the Savior come within their borders, these do not even hear what the others hear, for the reason, probably, that they are much farther distant in respect of merit. The purpose is, however, that at some other time, after it has been "more tolerable" (cf. Mt 11:22) for them than for those who refused to receive the word, in whose presence he mentioned the Tyrians, these may find a more opportune moment to hear and may experience a more enduring repentance.

Latin

are called Tyrians, who do not hear at all; and in spite of the fact that the Savior foreknew that "they would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes," "if the mighty works had been done among them which were done among others" (cf. Mt 11:21, 22; Lk 10:13), yet still they do not hear, not even the things which those "without" hear. The reason for this is, I believe, that the condition of these people was far inferior and worse in the matter of wickedness than that of those who are said to be "without," that is, not far from those "within," and who have deserved to hear the word though only in parables; and that probably their healing was reserved for the time when it will be "more tolerable" for them "in the day of judgment" (cf. Mt 11:22) than for those among whom had been performed those mighty works which are recorded. Thus at last, relieved from the weight of

See, however, whether in addition to our investigation of the truth we are not striving even more to preserve in every way an attitude of piety towards God and his Christ, since we endeavor to explain completely how in passages of such importance and difficulty relating to the manifold providence of God he is taking thought for the immortal soul.

their evil deeds they will walk more easily and enduringly in the way of salvation.

But I wish to remind those who read these pages of the following point, namely, that in dealing with most difficult and obscure passages like these we are striving with the utmost earnestness not so much to argue out clearly the solutions of the problems—for this everyone will do as the Spirit gives him utterance (Acts 2:4)—but by the cautiousness of our statements to preserve the rule of piety.²⁴ It is our endeavor to show that the providence of God which governs the universe with justice also rules immortal souls on the most equitable principles in accordance with the merits and motives of each individual. For God's dealings with men are not confined within the life of this age, but a previous state of merit always furnishes the cause of the state that is to follow; and so by an immortal and eternal law of equity and by the

Soul

If, for instance, one were to inquire in reference to the things which are objected to, namely, that while those who saw wonders and heard divine words are not benefited, the Tyrians would have repented if such things had been done and spoken among them, and were to say, "Why, pray, did the Savior preach to such people to their hurt, in order that their sin might be accounted heavier?"—we should answer him thus: that he who knows the hearts of all who find fault with his providence on the ground that they did not believe because it had not given them the chance of seeing what it had allowed others to behold and had not arranged for them to hear what others had heard to their profit, in his desire to prove that the excuse was not reasonable gives them the things which they who control of divine providence the immortal soul is brought to the height of perfection.

If, however, one were to attack us in reference to our statement that the word of the preaching was deliberately rejected by certain very depraved and wicked men, and to ask why it was preached to them when the Tyrians, who were certainly despised, are preferable in comparison, especially as the sin of these men was thereby increased and their condemnation rendered more serious by the fact that they heard the word and were not open to believe it, we must answer, it would seem, in the following manner. God, who knows the hearts of all, foreknew the complaints made about his providence particularly by those who say: "How could we believe, when we neither saw what others saw nor heard what was preached to others? So far are we from being at fault, that those to whom the word was blame his administration asked for. The intention is that after they have received these advantages and have been convicted none the less of the utmost impiety in that they have not even then given themselves up to be benefited, they may cease from such audacity, and when their minds have been set free on this point they may learn that God is sometimes long and slow in doing good to men, not allowing them to see and hear things, the seeing and hearing of which merely reveals their sin to be heavier and more grievous if after such great and wonderful experiences they do not believe.

Latin

proclaimed and the signs displayed made no delay at all but amazed at the very power of the miracles became believers." Wishing therefore to rule out all excuse for complaints of this sort and to show that it was not the delay of the divine providence but the will of each human mind that was the cause of its ruin, God conferred the grace of his benefits even upon unworthy and unbelieving men, in order that "every mouth may be stopped" (Rom 3:19) and the mind of man may know that the failure is entirely on its own part and in no way due to him. At the same time, when he who has despised the divine benefits conveyed to him is condemned more severely than he who has not deserved to obtain them or hear of them at all, we may understand and know that this too is a mark of the divine mercy and of God's most equitable government, which sometimes delays to give men the opportunity of seeing or hearing the mysteries of the divine power, lest after the power of the miracles has been seen and the mysteries of his wisdom have been heard and known they should despise and neglect them and so be visited with a heavier punishment for this impiety.

18. Let us also look at the passage, "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16). Now the objectors say: If it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy, then salvation does not come from what lies in our power but from the constitution we have received from him who constituted us what we are or from the will of him who has mercy when he pleases.

We must ask these persons the following question: Is it a good or a bad thing to will what is good? And is it a matter for praise or for blame that one should run with the desire

18. Let us also look at the saying, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16). Now our opponents say: If it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but that that man is saved on whom God has mercy, then salvation is not in our power. For either our nature is such that we can be saved or cannot be saved, or else it depends solely on the will of him who has mercy and saves us if he pleases.

We must first ask these persons the following question: Is it a good or a bad thing to will what is good? And is it a matter for praise or for blame that he who runs to reach the goal in an eager haste for what is good? If they should say, for blame, they would be answering against all reason, since the saints will and run and clearly in this are doing nothing worthy of blame. But if they should say that it is a good thing to will the good and to run towards it we shall ask them how a lost nature can will better things. That would be like a bad tree bearing good fruit (cf. Mt 7:18), if to will better things is good. They may answer in a third way that to will the good and to run towards it is one of the things indifferent and neither good nor bad. To this we must reply that if to will the good and to run towards it is a thing indifferent, then the opposite of this, namely, to will the evil and to run towards that, is also a thing indifferent. But to will the evil and to run towards it is not a thing indifferent. Nor is it indifferent, therefore, to will the good and to run towards the good.

Greek

should eagerly haste to the goal of what is good? If they should say, for blame, they would clearly be mad; for all the saints will the good and run towards it and certainly they are not worthy of blame. What then if he who is not saved is of an evil nature, and wills the good and runs towards it but does not find it? For they say that a bad tree does not bear good fruit (cf. Mt 7:18), yet to will the good is good fruit, and how does the fruit of a bad tree become good? But if they should say that to will the good and to run towards it is a thing indifferent, that is, neither good nor bad, let us answer them: If to will the good and to run towards it is a thing indifferent, then the opposite of this, namely, to will the evil and to run towards that, will also be a thing indifferent. But it is certain that to will the evil and to run towards it is not a thing indifferent, but plainly a bad thing. It is clear, then, that to will the good and to 19. Such then is the explanation which I think we can offer in regard to the saying, "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16). Now Solomon says in the Book of Psalms—for the Song of Ascents, from which we shall quote the words, is his—"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain" (Ps 127:1).²⁵ In this he is not dissuading us from building or teaching us not to keep awake in order to guard the city in our soul, but he is showing us that what is built without God and what does not receive its guard from him is built in vain and protected to no purpose, since God may reasonably be regarded as the lord of the building and the Master of the universe as the ruler of the guard for the city.

run towards the good is not a thing indifferent, but a good thing.

19. Having then routed our opponents with the above answer let us hasten now to explain the passage in question, in which it says, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16). In the Book of Psalms in the Songs of Ascents, which are attributed to Solomon, it is written thus: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain" (Ps 127:1).²⁵ By these words he is certainly not suggesting that we ought to cease from building or from keeping awake in order to guard that city which is within us, but he is showing us that what is built without God and what is guarded without God is built in vain and protected to no purpose. For in everything that is built well and preserved well the Lord is regarded as the author

Greek

So then, if we were to say, This building is not the work of the builder but of God, or, it is owing to the efforts not of the guard but of God the Ruler of all that this city has suffered no harm from its enemies, we should not be in error; it being understood that some part of the work had been done by man but that the happy result was to be gratefully attributed to God who brought it to pass. In the same way, since human will is not sufficient to enable us to attain the end, nor is the running of those who are, as it were, athletes sufficient to enable them to gain "the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil 3:14)—for these things are accomplished by God's assistance—it is well said that "it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16). Just as if one were to say about farming, as indeed it is actually both of the building and of its safe preservation.

For example, if we were to see a splendid work such as a large and magnificent building reared with architectural beauty, should we not rightly and deservedly say that it was not constructed by human power but by divine help and influence. This, however, would not signify that the labor and toil of human endeavor had ceased and performed nothing at all. Or, again, suppose we were to see a city hemmed in by a strict blockade of its enemies, with threatening engines brought up to its walls and a pressing attack made by means of a rampart with weapons, fire and all the other death-dealing instruments of war; then if the enemy should be repulsed and put to flight, it is right and proper for us to say that deliverance was granted by God to the liberated city. Yet by this we do not mean that the sentinels' night watches, the young written, "I planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase; so that neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase" (1 Cor 3:6, 7); and we could not piously say that the production of full crops was the work of the farmer or the work of the waterer, but the work of God.

Latin

men's readiness for battle and the guards' vigilance were lacking. The apostle must therefore be understood to have spoken in this sense, that the will of man is not by itself sufficient to the accomplishment of salvation, nor is any mortal running able to attain the heavenly promises and to receive "the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil 3:14), unless this good will of ours and our ready purpose and whatever industry we may possess is both helped and strengthened by the divine assistance. The apostle therefore said very logically, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16), just as if we were to say in connection with farming that which actually is written, "I planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase; so that neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase" (1 Cor 3:6, 7).

So, too, our perfection does not come to pass without our doing anything, and yet it is not completed as a result of our efforts, but God performs the greater part of it. And in order to produce a clearer conviction that this is the meaning of the passage we will take an illustration from the art of navigation. To what extent should we say that the navigator's art helps in bringing the ship back to the harbor, when compared with the force of the winds and the favorable state of the atmosphere and the shining of the stars, all of which co-operate to preserve those who sail? Why, even the sailors themselves from feelings of reverence do not often venture to claim that they have saved the ship but attribute it all to

As therefore when a field has brought forth good and rich crops to perfect maturity, no one could piously or logically say that the farmer made these fruits, but all would acknowledge that they were bestowed by God, so, too, our perfection is not effected while we rest and do nothing, nor on the other hand is its completion to be attributed to us, but rather to God, who performs the greater part of it. In the same way when a ship has escaped from the dangers of the sea, although the result is achieved by the exercise of much labor on the part of the sailors and by the complete use of the navigator's art, together with the diligence and industry of the pilot, the direction of the winds and the positions of the stars being also carefully noted, nevertheless when at last after being tossed by the waves and strained by the billows the ship reaches the harbor in safety, no one in his sober senses would attribute

Greek

God; not that they have performed nothing, but that the efforts of God's providence are very much in excess of the effects of their art.

So indeed with our salvation the effects of God's work are very much in excess of the effects of what we can do.

This, I believe, is the reason why it was said, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy" (Rom 9:16). For if we are to take the passage, "It is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy," in the sense that our opponents suggest, the commandments are superfluous, and it is in vain when Paul himself blames its safe return to anything but the mercy of God. Further, not even the sailors themselves nor the pilot would venture to say, "I caused the ship to be saved," but they refer it all to the mercy of God; not that they suppose that they contributed nothing in the way of art or labor to the ship's safety, but that they know that while the labor was provided by them, the ship's safety was due to God.

So also in the journey of our life it is we who must expend labor and zeal and supply diligent toil, but the salvation which is the fruit of our labor we must look to receive from God. Otherwise, if God demands none of our work, the commandments will certainly appear to be superfluous; and it is in vain when Paul himself blames some who have fallen away from the truth and praises others for standing fast in the faith, and to no purpose when he also delivers certain precepts and directions to some for having fallen away and approves of others for remaining steadfast and gives directions to the churches; it is useless, too, for us to yield ourselves up to willing what is better, useless also for us to try to run. But it is not in vain when Paul gives all his advice, and when he blames some and approves of others, nor is it in vain when we yield ourselves up to willing what is better and to desiring eagerly the things that are excellent. Our opponents, therefore have not rightly explained the meaning of the passage.

20. In addition to these there is the passage, "To will and to work are of God" (Phil 2:13). Now some say, If to will is from God, and to work is from God, then even if we will badly and work badly, these come to us from God; and if this is so, we have no free will. Again, when we will what is better and work deeds that are excellent, since to will and to work are from God it is not we who have done the the churches; in vain, too, that we ourselves either will or run towards the good. But it is certain that these things do not happen in vain, and it is certain that the apostles do not deliver precepts in vain, nor does the Lord give laws to no purpose. It remains then for us to declare that the vanity lies rather with the heretics, when they give a false meaning to these good words.

20. After this follows the question, that "both to will and to work are of God" (Phil 2:13). Now they say, If to will is from God, and to work is from God, then whether we will or work well or badly, it is from God; and if this is so, we have no free will.

To this we must reply that the statement of the apostle does not assert that to will what is evil is from God or that to will what is good is from context

free will

Greek

excellent deeds; we seemed to do them, but it was God who bestowed them on us, and so even in this we have no free will. In reply to this we must say that the statement of the apostle does not assert that to will what is evil is of God or that to will what is good is of God; nor that to work deeds that are better or worse is of God; but to will in general and to work in general. For as we have it from God that we are living beings and that we are men, so also we have from him the power of willing in general, as I said, and the power of movement in general. And just as we, because we are living beings, possess the power of movement and can move, for instance, these limbs of ours, hands or feet, and yet we could not reasonably say that we have from God the particular power of moving to strike, or to destroy, or to take away another's goods, but what we received from God was the power of

Latin

God; nor that to work either good or evil is from God; but it says in a general way that "to will and to work are of God." For as we have it from God that we are men, that we breathe and that we move, so also we have from God the power of willing; just as if we were to say that our power of movement is from God, or the fact that each of our members performs its proper function and movements is from God. But it must certainly not be understood from this that if the hand moves, for instance, to strike someone unjustly or to steal, this is from God; for only the power of movement is from God, and it is our part to direct those movements, the power of exercising which we have from God, either to good or to evil purposes. Thus what the apostle says is, that we receive from God the power of willing, but it is we who use the will either for good or for evil desires. We must apply similar reasoning to our works.

Greek

movement in general and it is we who use this power for the worse or for the better, so we have received from God the power of working, by virtue of our being living creatures, and from the Creator the power of willing, but it is we who use the power of willing either for the noblest purposes or for the opposite ones, and likewise the power of working.

21. Still, the saying of the apostle in the passage where he suggests an objection against himself will appear to tend to the conclusion that we are not possessed of free will. He says, "So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he still find fault? For who withstandeth his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why didst thou make me thus? Or hath not the potter a right over the clay from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor?" (Rom 9:18-21).

Latin

21. But there is also the passage where the apostle said, "So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he still find fault? For who withstandeth his will? Nay but O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why didst thou make me thus? Or hath not the potter a right over the clay from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor?" (Rom 9:18-21).

Greek

clay, from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?" (Rom 9:18–21).

Now someone will say, If, just as the potter from the same lump makes some vessels for honor and some for dishonor, so God makes some creatures for salvation and some for destruction, then salvation or destruction does not rest with us nor are we possessed of free will. We must ask the man who interprets the words thus, whether it is possible to imagine the apostle contradicting himself; and I do not believe that anyone will dare to say that it is. If then the apostle does not speak in contrary ways, how according to the man who accepts the passage in this sense is he reasonable in imputing blame to the fornicator at Corinth or to those who had fallen away and had not repented of the licentiousness and impurity of their deeds? (cf. 1 Cor 5:1–5; 2 Cor 12:21). How, too, can

Now someone may perhaps say, If, just as the potter from the same lump makes some vessels for honor and some for dishonor, so God makes some men for salvation and some for destruction, then salvation or destruction does not rest with us; which makes it clear that we have no free will. We must reply therefore to those who interpret the words thus, and ask whether it is possible that the apostle could contradict himself. And if we cannot think this of the apostle, how according to them will it seem just for him to blame those at Corinth who had committed fornication, or those who had fallen away, and had not repented of their deeds of licentiousness and fornication and impurity? (cf. 1 Cor 5:1–5; 2 Cor 12:21). How, too, can he praise those who had acted rightly, he bless for having acted well those whom he praises, as for instance the house of Onesiphorus, in these words: "The Lord grant mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me and was not ashamed of my chain; but when he was in Rome he sought me diligently and found me. The Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day" (2 Tm 1:16–18). It is not like the same apostle to blame the sinner as if he was worthy of blame and to approve as if worthy of praise him who had acted well, and yet on the other hand to assert, as if nothing lay in our power, that it is due to the intention of the Creator that one vessel is made "unto honor" and another "unto dishonor."

Greek

And in regard to the statement that "we must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good as for instance the house of Onesiphorus, saying: "The Lord grant mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me and was not ashamed of my chain; but when he came to Rome he sought me diligently and found me. The Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day" (2 Tm 1:16–18). It is not consistent with the seriousness of the apostle to blame the man who is worthy of blame, that is, the man who has sinned, and to praise the man who is worthy of praise for his good work, and on the other hand to say, as if it were in no one's power to do anything good or evil, that it is the Creator's doing that each man acts either well or ill, since he makes "one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor."

And how could he also add the saying that "we must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one of us may receive in his body according to what he has or bad" (2 Cor 5:10), how is this correct, if those who have done evil have come to this kind of conduct because they were created "vessels of dishonor," and if those who have lived virtuously have done good because they were from the beginning fashioned for this purpose and are "vessels of honor"?

And further, is there not a conflict between this view, which they gather from the words we have quoted, that it is due to the intention of the Creator that a vessel is honorable or the reverse, and the saying found elsewhere: "In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some unto honor, and some unto dishonor. If therefore a man purge himself, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work" (2 Tm 2:20, 21). For if he who purges himself becomes a "vessel unto honor," and he done, whether it be good or bad" (2 Cor 5:10)? For what return of good is due to him who could do no evil, because he was fashioned for good by the Creator? Or what penalty could properly be demanded of him who by the very act of his Maker was unable to do good?

Finally, is there not a contradiction between this assertion and what is said elsewhere: "In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some unto honor, and some unto dishonor. If therefore a man purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work" (2 Tm 2:20, 21). If therefore a man purges himself, he becomes a "vessel unto honor"; but he who has disdained to purge himself from his impurities becomes a "vessel unto dishonor." In view of these declarations who allows himself to remain unpurged becomes a "vessel unto dishonor," so far as these words go the Creator is in no way responsible. For the Creator makes "vessels of honor and vessels of dishonor" not from the beginning by his foreknowledge, since he does not condemn or justify beforehand by that, but he makes those who purge themselves "vessels of honor" and those who allow themselves to remain unpurged "vessels of dishonor"; so that it comes from causes older than the fashioning of vessels unto honor and unto dishonor that one was made "unto honor" and another "unto dishonor."

22. But if we once admit²⁶ that there are certain older causes to account for the "vessel of honor" and the "vessel of dishonor," what is there absurd in our recurring the cause of our deeds can by no means, in my opinion, be referred to the Creator. For God the Creator makes some vessels "unto honor" and he makes other vessels "unto dishonor"; but it is that vessel which has purged itself from all impurity that he makes a "vessel unto honor," while the one which has stained itself with low vices he makes a "vessel unto dishonor." And so we conclude from this that the cause of each man's activities goes back into the past and that each was made by God a vessel of honor or of dishonor in accordance with his merits. Each vessel has therefore from its own self provided the Creator with the causes and occasions in virtue of which it was formed by him either "unto honor" or "unto dishonor."

22. But if this statement appears to be just, as it certainly is just and in harmony with all piety, namely, that each vessel is fashioned by God for honor or for

At the same time it is made quite clear in regard to their fundamental nature that just as it is one clay which is in the hands of the potter, from a lump of which come vessels "unto honor and unto dishonor," so every soul in God's hands is of one nature and all rational beings come, if I may say so, from one lump, though certain older causes have made some to be for honor and others for dishonor.

Latin

dishonor as a result of pre-existing causes, it does not seem absurd for us, when discussing the older causes in the same order and by the same method, to apply the same principle to souls, and to believe that this was the reason why Jacob was loved even before he was born into this world, and Esau was hated while still enclosed in his mother's womb (cf. Mal 1:2, 3; Gn 25:25, 26).

Further, the saying that "from the same lump" is made both a vessel of honor and one of dishonor will not cause us difficulty, for we say that there is one nature for all rational souls, just as one lump of clay is described as being in the hands of the potter. Since then there is one nature for all rational creatures, out of this one nature God formed and created, as the potter does out of one lump of clay, "some men to honor and others to dishonor," in accordance with preexisting grounds of merit.

Greek

But if the language of the apostle conveys a rebuke when he says, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" (Rom 9:20) it probably teaches us that he who has confidence towards God by reason of his faithful and good life would not hear the words, "Who art thou that repliest against God?" A man like Moses, for example—"for Moses spake, and God answered him with a voice" (Ex 19:19); and as God answers Moses, so also the saint answers God. But he who has not obtained this confidence, for the clear reason that he is either lost or else makes these inquiries with a desire not to learn but to cause contention, and who says, "Why doth he still find fault? For who withstandeth his will?" from such motives, this man would deserve the rebuke contained in the words, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" (Rom 9:20).

Latin

But in regard to the apparent rebuke conveyed by the apostle's language when he says, "O man, who art thou that repliest against God" (Rom 9:20), I think that what he teaches here is this, that such a rebuke does not refer to one who is faithful and lives a good and righteous life and has confidence towards God, that is, to a man like Moses, of whom the scripture says that "Moses spake, and God answered him with a voice" (Ex 19:19); and as God answered Moses, so also the saint will answer God. But the man who is unfaithful and loses his confidence in answering before God by the unworthiness of his life and conduct, who makes these inquiries with a desire not to learn and advance, but to cause strife and contention, the kind of man who can say what the apostle indicates in the words, "Why then doth he still find fault? For who withstandeth his will?"—this is the man to whom is rightly directed the rebuke conveyed by the apostle's words, "O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" (Rom 9:20). This rebuke, then, is not for the faithful and the saints, but for the unfaithful and impious.

Greek

23. To those, however, who bring in diverse natures and use this passage in support we must answer as follows. If they retain the doctrine that the lost and the saved come "from one lump" (Rom 9:21) and that the Creator of the saved is also the Creator of the lost, and if he who makes not only the spiritual but also the earthy is good (for this follows from their reasonings), it is none the less possible for one who has become at the present time a vessel of honor in consequence of certain former righteous deeds and yet has not acted similarly here nor in a way befitting a vessel of honor, to become in another age a vessel of dishonor; just as on the other hand it is

23. As for those, however, who bring in diverse natures of souls and adduce this statement of the apostle in support of their doctrine, we must answer them as follows. If they agree with us that the apostle says that both those who are made for honor and those who are made for dishonor, whom they call the persons of saved and of lost natures, come "from one lump" (Rom 9:21), then the natures of souls will not be diverse, but there will be one nature for all. And if they admit that one and the same potter undoubtedly indicates one Creator, then there will not be different Creators for those who are saved and for those who are lost. Now let them choose whether they possible for one who by reason of acts older than this life has become here a vessel of dishonor to become, if he amends his ways in the "new creation" (Gal 6:15 [RV Marg.]), a "vessel of honor sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work."²⁷ wish the passage, to be interpreted as indicating a good God who creates evil and lost men, or a God not good who creates men that are good and prepared for honor. The necessity of giving an answer will extract from them one of these two alternatives. But according to our contention that God makes vessels to honor or to dishonor by reason of preexisting causes, the proof of God's righteousness is in no way compromised. For it is possible that one vessel, which from previous causes has in this world been fashioned for honor, may in another age, if it has acted carelessly here, become a vessel of dishonor in accordance with the deserts of its conduct; just as on the other hand if a man has from pre-existing causes been formed by the Creator as a vessel of dishonor in this life, and yet has amended his ways and purged himself from all his faults and low vices, he may in that new age

And perhaps the present Israelites will be deprived of their racial position for not having lived worthily of their noble birth, being changed as it were from vessels of honor into vessels of dishonor; while many of the present Egyptians and Idumaeans who have come near to Israel²⁸ will, when they have borne more fruit, "enter into the church of the Lord," no longer being reckoned as Egyptians or Idumaeans but for the future becoming Israelites (cf. Dt 23:7, 8). Thus according to this view some men by the exercise of their wills make progress from worse to better, while others fall from better to worse; others, too, are preserved in their good deeds or rise from good to better, while others again continue in their evil deeds and, if the evil flows on, from being bad become still worse.²⁹ become a "vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work."

Finally, those who were formed by God to be Israelites in this age, and have lived a life unworthy of their noble birth and fallen away from their high descent, will in the age to come, for their unbelief, be changed as it were from vessels of honor into vessels of dishonor; while on the other hand many who in this life have been reckoned among the Egyptian or Idumaeans but have embraced the faith and conduct of the Israelites shall "enter into the church of the Lord" and exist as vessels of honor "at the revelation of the sons of God" (cf. Dt 23:7; Rom 8:19). Thus it is more agreeable to the rule of piety³⁰ to believe that every rational creature, according to his will and conduct, is changed at one time from bad to good and at another falls from good to bad; that some continue in good, and some even advance to what is better and ever ascend to higher things until they reach the highest stage of all; while others continue in evil or, if the evil within them begins to overflow, go on to a worse condition and are at last overwhelmed in the lowest depths of wickedness.

We must suppose from this that it is possible for some who have begun at first with small sins to be so given over to wickedness and to go to such lengths of evil that their iniquity equals even that of the opposing powers; and that on the other hand, if, through many severe punishments and most bitter chastisements they are able at last to recover their senses and by degrees endeavor to find a remedy for their wounds, they may when their wickedness has ended be restored to what is good. This leads us to the opinion that since, as we have frequently said, the soul is immortal and eternal, it is possible that in the many and endless periods throughout diverse and immeasurable ages it may either descend from the highest good to the lowest evil or be restored from the lowest evil to the highest good.

24. Now the language of the apostle, in the passage where he speaks of vessels of honor or dishonor, namely, "if a man purge himself, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work" (2 Tm 2:21), seems to put nothing in God's power and everything in ours. In the passage, however, where he says, "The potter hath a right over the clay, from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor" (Rom 9:21), he appears to attribute everything to God.

Now we must not take these passages to be con-

24. In one place, then, the apostle claims that it is not in God's power whether we become vessels unto honor or unto dishonor, but he attributes it entirely to us when he says, "If therefore a man purge himself, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work" (2 Tm 2:21). In another place, however, he claims that it is not in our power, but appears to attribute it entirely to God when he says, "The potter hath a right over the clay, from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor" (Rom 9:21).

Now these sayings of his are not contradictory, but must be taken together and one perfect explanation drawn from them both. It is, then, neither in our power to make progress apart from the knowledge of God, nor does the knowledge of God compel us to do so unless we ourselves contribute something towards the good result; nor does our power apart from the knowledge of God and the full use of the power that deservedly belongs to us cause a man to be created for honor or for dishonor; nor does the power of God by itself fashion a man for honor or for dishonor, but God finds a ground of difference in our will, as it inclines to the better or to the worse.

tradictory to one another, but the meaning of each must be combined into one and a single interpretation drawn from the two; that is, that we are not to think that the things which are in the power of our will can be performed without the help of God, nor that those which are in God's hands can be brought to completion apart from our acts and earnest endeavors and purpose. For indeed we do not have it in our own will either to desire or to perform anything without being bound to recognize that this very power of desiring and performing was given to us by God, subject to the distinction which we spoke of above.³¹ Nor again are we to think that when God fashions vessels, some for honor and some for dishonor, he regards our wills or purposes or merits as a cause of the honor or dishonor, as if they were a kind of matter out of which he may fashion each one of us either for honor or for dishonor. The truth is that the very movement of the soul and purpose of the mind of itself suggests to him, to whom the heart and the thoughts of the soul are not hidden, whether the vessel should be fashioned for honor or for dishonor.

Let these arguments, which we have provided on the subject of free will, be sufficient.

But let these arguments, which we have discussed to the best of our ability on the questions that arise out of free will, be sufficient.

Chapter II

THE OPPOSING POWERS

scriptures

1. We must now see how, according to the scriptures, the opposing powers and the devil himself are engaged in a struggle with the human race, provoking and inciting men to sin. First, a serpent is described in Genesis as having seduced Eve (cf. Gn 3:1–6); and in regard to this serpent, in the Ascension of Moses, a book which the apostle Jude mentions in his epistle, Michael the archangel when disputing with the devil about the body of Moses says that the serpent was inspired by the devil and so became the cause of the transgression of Adam and Eve.¹ Further, the question is asked by some, who is the angel that speaks from heaven to Abraham and says, “Now I know that thou fearest God, and for my sake hast not withheld thy beloved son, whom thou lovedst” (Gn 22:12). For clearly it is an angel who is described and who says that he knew now that Abraham feared. God and had not withheld his beloved son, as the scripture runs, yet he did not declare that it was for God’s sake, but for his own sake, that is, for the sake of him who was speaking. We must also inquire who that being was of whom it is said in Exodus that he wished to kill Moses because he was setting out for Egypt (cf. Ex 4:24). And afterwards, who is it that is called the “destroying angel” (Ex 12:23), and who also is he who in Leviticus is described as Apopompeus, that is, the Averter, of whom the scripture speaks thus: "One lot for the Lord, and one lot for Apopompeus" (Lv 16:8)?²

Further, in the first book of the Kings an evil spirit is said to suffocate Saul (cf. 1 Sm 18:10):³ and in the third book Micaiah the prophet says, "I saw the God of Israel sitting upon his throne, and all the host of heaven stood round about him on his right hand and on his left. And the Lord said, Who shall entice Ahab king of Israel, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the Lord and said, I will entice him. And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt entice him, and shalt prevail also; go forth, and do so. And now the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all thy prophets; and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee" (1 Kgs 22:19–23). This account clearly shows that a certain spirit by his own will and choice elected to entice and to practice deceit, and that God makes use of this spirit to compass the death of Ahab, who deserved that fate.

Also in the first book of the Chronicles it says, "The devil raised up Satan in Israel, and moved David to number the people" (1 Chr 21:1).⁴ In the Psalms an evil angel is said to persecute certain men (cf. Ps 35:5, 6). In Ecclesiastes, too, Solomon says, "If the spirit of one that hath power rise up against thee, leave not thy place, for healing will restrain many transgressions" (Eccl 10:4).⁵ And in Zechariah we read of the devil standing at Joshua's right hand and resisting him (cf. Zec 3:1). Isaiah also says that the sword of God rises up against "the dragon, the crooked serpent" (Is 27:1). And what shall I say of Ezekiel, who in his second vision prophesies most clearly to the prince of Tyre about an opposing power and who says, too, that the dragon dwells in the rivers of Egypt (Ez 29:3)?⁶

And as for the entire book that is written about Job, what else does it contain but an account of the devil seeking for power to be given him over all Job's possessions, and over his sons, and finally over his body? He is conquered, however, through Job's patience. In this book the Lord has by his answers taught us much about the power of that dragon which opposes us. Let these examples from the Old Testament, so far as we can call them to memory at the moment, be now quoted to prove that the opposing powers are both named in the scriptures and are said to be adversaries of the human race and reserved for future punishment.

But let us look also at the New Testament, where Satan comes to the Savior, tempting him (Mt 4:1–11 and par.); and where evil spirits and impure daemons, which had taken possession of very many, were put to flight by the Savior from the bodies of the sufferers, who are said also to have been set free by him (cf. Mk 1:23ff.; 32–34; 5:1ff.). Moreover, Judas, when the devil had now put it into his heart to betray Christ, afterwards received Satan wholly into himself; for it is written that "after the sop Satan entered into him" (Jn 13:2, 27). Paul the apostle teaches us that we should not "give place to the devil" (Eph 4:27) but, he says, "Put on the armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil" (Eph 6:11), pointing out that the saints' wrestling "is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of this world's darkness, against spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (Eph 6:12). Further, he says that the Savior was crucified by "the princes of this world," who are "coming to naught," whose "wisdom," he adds, he does not speak (cf. 1 Cor 2:6–8). Through all these instances, therefore, the divine scripture teaches us that there are certain invisible enemies fighting against us, and it tells us that we must be armed to meet them. This leads the simpler sort of believers in Christ the Lord to suppose that all the sins that men have committed come from the persistent influence of the contrary powers on the sinners' minds, because in this invisible contest the powers are found to be superior. But if, so to speak, there were no devil, no man would ever sin at all.

2. We however, who look more carefully into the reason of things, do not think that this is so; especially when we consider the acts that arise clearly from the necessities of our body. Are we to suppose that the devil is the cause of our being hungry or thirsty? I suppose there is no one who would venture to maintain this. If then he is not the cause of our being hungry or thirsty, what of that condition when an individual has attained the age of puberty and this period has called forth the exciting movements of the natural heat? It follows without a doubt that, as the devil is not the cause of our being hungry or thirsty, so neither is he the cause even of that impulse which is naturally called forth at the time of maturity, that is, of the desire for sexual intercourse. It is certain that this impulse is by no means always aroused by the devil, so as to lead us to suppose that if there were no devil our bodies would not have the desire for such intercourse.

Then again let us consider in regard to food,—if it be true, as we have shown above, that this is not sought for by men at the instance of the devil, but from a natural instinct—whether human experience, supposing there were no devil, could possibly employ such great self-control in partaking of food as absolutely never to exceed the limit, that is, never to take anything but what the occasion demanded or more than reason permitted, and that it should never happen that men went astray in the observance of due measure and moderation in their food. I for my part do not think that, even if there were no impulse from the devil to urge men on, this rule could be so observed by them that no one would exceed due measure and moderation in partaking of food, not at any rate before they had learned this lesson by long practice and experience. What then? In regard to foods and drink it would be possible for us to go wrong even apart from the instigation of the devil, if we happened to be caught at an intemperate or careless moment; and are we to suppose that in regard to the control of the sexual appetite and the natural desires we should not be affected in a similar way? My own opinion is that the same process of reasoning can also be applied to the rest of the natural emotions, such as covetousness, anger, sorrow or any others whatever, which by the fault of intemperance exceed the limits of their natural measure.

The fact is therefore clear that, just as in regard to things that are good the mere human will is by itself incapable of completing the good act,—for this is in all cases brought to perfection by divine help—so also in regard to things of the opposite kind we derive the beginnings and what we may call the seeds of sin from those desires which are given to us naturally for our use. But when we indulge these to excess and offer no resistance to the first movements towards intemperance, then the hostile power, seizing the opportunity of this first offence, incites and urges us on in every way, striving to extend the sins over a larger field; so that while we men supply the occasions and beginnings of our sins, the hostile powers spread them far and wide and if possible endlessly. It is thus that the fall into avarice at last takes place, men first longing for a little money and then increasing in greed as the vice grows. Afterwards their passion is succeeded by a mental blindness and, with the hostile powers stimulating and urging them on, money is now not merely longed for but even seized by force or acquired through the shedding of human blood.

A sure proof that these vast excesses of sin come from the daemons can easily be observed from the following fact, that those who are under the influence of immoderate love or uncontrolled anger or exceptional sorrow suffer no less than those who are tormented in body by daemons. Further, it is related in certain histories that some men have become insane from love, others even for sorrow or excessive joy; and this happens. I think, because these opposing powers, that is, the daemons, have been allowed to occupy a place in their minds, a place which intemperance has first laid open, and have then taken complete possession of their intelligence, especially as no thought of the glory of virtue aroused them to resistance.

 3. That there are, however, certain sins which do not come from the opposing powers but take their beginning from the natural instincts of the body is most clearly declared by the apostle Paul in the place where he says, "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would" (Gal 5:17). If then the "flesh lusteth against the spirit," and the "spirit against the flesh," we have at some time to "wrestle against flesh and blood" (Eph 6:12), that is, when we are "men" and "walk according to the flesh" (1 Cor 3:4; 2 Cor 10:2), and when we cannot be tempted with temptations beyond what are human, when it is said of us that "no temptation hath taken you, except such as is human; but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able" (1 Cor 10:13).

For just as those who preside over the games do not allow the competitors to oppose one another indiscriminately or by chance in the contests, but after a careful examination match them in equal pairs according to size and years, this one with that and this one with that, boys, that is, with boys and men with men as they are suited to one another by close resemblance in age or strength, so also must we understand in regard to the divine providence, that it treats all who descend into the struggles of human life with the most impartial care, according to the nature of each individual's virtue, which he alone knows who alone beholds the hearts of men. One, therefore, fights against one kind of flesh, another against another kind; one for so long a time, another for so long; one is incited by the flesh to this or that, another to something else; one struggles against this or that hostile power, another against two or three at once, or now against one and now against another, and at one particular time against one and at another against another; or after certain acts a man fights against certain powers, after other acts against different ones. For consider whether some such arrangement is not indicated by the saying of the apostle, "But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able" (1 Cor 10:13), that is, because each one is tempted in proportion to the degree and possibilities of the strength he possesses.

It must not be supposed, however, that because we said that by the righteous decision of God each man is tempted in proportion to the degree of his strength, the tempted man ought therefore by all means to be victorious; for the competitor in the games cannot by all means be victorious, even though he may be paired with his opponent in an equal match. But unless the powers of the combatants are equal, the victor's palm will not be justly won nor may the vanquished be justly blamed. For this reason God allows us to be tempted, yet not "above that we are able"; for we are tempted in proportion to our powers. Nor is it written that in temptation God will also make a way to escape from bearing it, but a way to escape that we may be able to bear it. And this possibility that he has given us it is in our hands to utilize either vigorously or feebly. There is no doubt that in every temptation we are given a power of bearing it, if only we use to the full the power thus granted. For to have the power to conquer is not the same thing as to conquer, as the apostle pointed out in carefully chosen language when he said that "God will give a way of escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (1 Cor 10:13) not, that ye may bear it. Many do not bear it, but are conquered by temptation. But what God gives us is not the certainty that we shall bear it, in which case there would appear to be no struggle at all, but the possibility "that we may be able to bear it."

This strength, therefore, which is given to us in order that we may be able to conquer, we by the exercise of our free will either use diligently and conquer or feebly and suffer defeat. For if it were given to us in such completeness as to ensure our victory by all means, that is, to prevent us from being by any possibility conquered, what reason for struggling would remain to him who could not be conquered? Or what merit in gaining the palm when our adversary is deprived of the chance of conquering? But if the possibility of conquering is conferred equally upon us all, while the way in which we should use this possibility, that is, either vigorously or feebly, is a thing that lies in our own power, then it will be just to blame the vanquished and give the palm to the victor. From these considerations, therefore, which we have urged to the best of our ability, I think it is clearly apparent that there are some offences which we commit quite apart from the influence of the evil powers, and others which are carried to excessive and immoderate lengths at their instigation. It follows that we must now inquire how these opposing powers produce the aforementioned incitements within us.

4. We find that the "thoughts which proceed out of the heart" (cf. Mt 15:18, 19; Mk 7:21), whether they are a memory of deeds we have done or a contemplation of any things or causes whatsoever, proceed sometimes from ourselves, sometimes are aroused by the opposing powers, and occasionally also are implanted in us by God or by the holy angels. This would perhaps seem fabulous if it were not proved by the witness of divine scripture. That a thought may arise from ourselves is seen from the witness of David in the Psalms: "For the thought of man shall confess thee, and the residue of his thoughts shall hold a festival day to thee" (Ps 76:10 [LXX]). That it may come also from the contrary powers is seen from the witness of Solomon in Ecclesiastes, as follows: "If the spirit of one that hath power rise up against thee, leave not thy place, for healing will restrain many transgressions" (Eccl 10:4).⁷ And Paul the apostle will bear his witness on the same matter when he says: "Casting down thoughts and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of Christ" (2 Cor 10:5).

That on the other hand a thought may come from God is seen from the witness of David in the Psalms, as follows: "Blessed is the man whose acceptance is with thee, O Lord; thy ascents are in his heart" (Ps 84:5 [LXX]). And the apostle says that "God put it into the heart of Titus" (2 Cor 8:16). That some thoughts are suggested to men's hearts by either good or bad angels is shown both by the angel that accompanied Tobit (Tb 5:4ff.) and by the language of the prophet when he says, "And the angel who was speaking in me replied" (Zec 1:14 [LXX]). Moreover the book of the Shepherd asserts the same thing, teaching that two angels attend each human being, and saying that whenever good thoughts arise in our heart they are suggested by the good angel, and whenever thoughts of the opposite kind they are the inspiration of the bad angel.⁸ The same thing, too, is asserted by Barnabas in his epistle, where he says that there are two ways, one of light and the other of darkness, over which preside certain angels, the angels of God over the way of light and Satan's angels over the way of darkness.⁹

We must bear in mind, however, that nothing else happens to us as a result of these good or evil thoughts which are suggested to our heart but a mere agitation and excitement which urges us on to deeds either of good or of evil. It is possible for us, when an evil power has begun to urge us on to a deed of evil, to cast away the wicked suggestions and to resist the low enticements and to do absolutely nothing worthy of blame; and it is possible on the other hand when a divine power has urged us on to better things not to follow its guidance, since our faculty of free will is preserved to us in either case.

Now we said in the preceding paragraph¹⁰ that certain memories either of good or of evil deeds are also suggested to us, whether through divine providence or through the opposing powers. This is shown in the book of Esther, when Artaxerxes did not remember the benefits he had received from the righteous man Mordecai, and during a weary and sleepless night an idea came into his mind from God that he should send for the records of great deeds that were written in the archives. By these he was reminded of Mordecai's services and ordered his enemy Haman to be hanged, while to Mordecai himself he granted splendid honors and the safety of the whole race of the saints who were then in imminent peril (Est 6-8). On the contrary we must suppose that it was some power of the devil who suggested to the mind of the priests and scribes the remark which they made when they came to Pilate: "Sir, we have remembered that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again" (Mt 27:63).

Moreover the thought of Judas concerning the Savior's betrayal was not one which came solely from the wickedness of his own mind. For the scripture bears witness that the devil had put it into his heart to betray him (cf. Jn 13:2). On this account Solomon rightly utters the precept, "Keep thy heart with all diligence" (Prv 4:23); and Paul the apostle says, "We ought to give more earnest heed to the things that we heard, lest haply we drift away" (Heb 2:1); and when he says, "Give not place to the devil" (Eph 4:27) he shows that by a certain kind of action or a certain kind of inaction a "place" in the mind is given to the devil with the result that, when once he has entered our heart he either takes possession of us, or at any rate pollutes the soul if he cannot take entire possession of it, by hurling at us his "fiery darts" (cf. Eph 6:16), with which we are sometimes merely inflamed, but sometimes pierced and wounded deeply. In rare cases, indeed, and by a few persons these "fiery darts" of his are "quenched" (ibid.), so that they fail to find the place for a wound; that is, when a man has been covered with the strong and defensive "shield of faith." But in regard to the statement in the epistle to the Ephesians, "For our wrestling" is not against flesh and blood, but "against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (Eph 6:12), we shall, be right in understanding the apostle's word "our" as meaning I, Paul, myself and you Ephesians and whoever else has not to wrestle with flesh and blood; for these have their struggle "against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world," as was not the case among the Corinthians, whose struggle was still against "flesh and blood" and whom "no temptation had taken but such as was human" (1 Cor 10:13).¹¹

5. We must not suppose, however, that each person struggles against all these powers. It would, I think, be impossible for any man, however holy he might be, to carry on a struggle against all these at once. If, however, that which in fact can not happen should by any chance come to pass, it would be utterly impossible for human nature to endure it without being completely overwhelmed. And just as, for example, if fifty soldiers were to say that a struggle was about to take place between them and fifty other soldiers, we should not understand from

he thinks

this that one of them was going to fight against fifty, and yet each one of them might rightly say that "we have to fight against fifty," meaning all against all; so, too, we must interpret the apostle's saying in this way, that the whole body of Christ's athletes and soldiers are engaged in a wrestling and struggle against all those powers which have been enumerated; that all will take part in the struggle, but individuals will either be matched against individuals, or at any rate will fight in such a way as shall be approved by God, who is the just president of this contest.

human nature
For I think that human nature has definite limitations, even though there is a Paul of whom it is said, "He is a chosen vessel unto me" (Acts 9:15), or a Peter against whom "the gates of hell shall not prevail" (Mt 16:18), or a Moses, "the friend of God" (Ex 33:11); for not even one of these could face the whole crowd of opposing powers at once without destruction to himself, except perhaps on the condition that, there was working within him the power of him who said, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world" (Jn 16:33). In reliance on him Paul affirmed with confidence, "I can do all things through Christ who strengthened me" (Phil 4:13); and again, "And I labored more abundantly than they all, yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me" (1 Cor 15:10).

It was therefore because he had this power, which certainly is not human, working and speaking in him, that Paul could say: "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor strength, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 8:38, 39). For human nature by itself alone cannot, I think, maintain the struggle against "angels" and "heights and depths" and any "other creature"; but when it has felt the Lord to be present and dwelling within, it will say in confidence of receiving the divine help, "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the protector of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? When evil doers came upon me to eat up my flesh, even my enemies who persecute me, they stumbled and fell. Though a host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, I will put my trust in him" (Ps 27:1-3).

help.
So I think that a man can probably never by himself overcome an opposing power, but only by the use of divine help. That is why an angel is said to have wrestled with Jacob. Now we understand the passage in this way, that to wrestle with Jacob does not mean to wrestle against Jacob, but that the angel, who was present in order to save him, and who after learning of the progress he had made gave him the additional name of Israel, wrestled together with him, that is, was on his side in the contest and helped him in the struggle; for undoubtedly it was some other against whom Jacob was fighting and against whom his struggle was being waged (cf. Gn 32:22-30).¹² And Paul indeed; did not tell us that our wrestling was with principalities or with powers, but against principalities and against powers. If therefore Jacob also wrestled, he wrestled undoubtedly against one of these powers, which Paul enumerates as opposing and making attacks on the human race and especially on the saints. Finally, it is for this reason that scripture speaks of him as having wrestled with the angel and having had "power with God," namely, that while the course of the struggle is sustained by the angel's help, the palm of achievement leads the conqueror to God.

6. Nor indeed must we suppose that struggles like Jacob's are carried on by means of bodily strength and the exercise of the art of wrestling, but that the fight is one of spirit against spirit, in the same way as Paul points out that our present struggle is "against principalities and powers and the rulers of the darkness of this world" (Eph 6:12). This kind of struggle must be understood as follows; that when losses and dangers, insults and accusations are raised up against us, the opposing powers do not do this with the mere object of making us endure these sufferings, but of provoking us by means of them to fierce anger or excessive sorrow or the depths of despair, or indeed, what is more serious, of inducing us when wearied out and overcome by these annoyances to complain against God on the ground that he does not control human life fairly and righteously. Their aim is that by these efforts our faith may be weakened or that we may lose hope or be driven to abandon the true doctrines and persuaded to accept some impious belief about God.

For some such aim is recorded in the case of Job, when the devil had asked God for power over his goods. The story of Job also teaches us that it is not by chance attacks that we are assailed, if ever such losses of property come upon us, nor is it by chance that any one of us is made captive or that our houses fall into ruins, in which some of our dear ones are crushed to death (cf. Jb 1:6-19). In all these circumstances every believer must say, "Thou wouldst have no power against me, except it were given thee from above" (Jn 19:11). For observe that Job's house would not have fallen upon his sons unless the devil had first obtained power against them; nor would the horsemen have made a raid in three bands to seize his camels and oxen and other cattle unless they had been instigated by that spirit to whom they had surrendered themselves as servants by their obedience to his will. Nor would that which appeared to be fire and has been supposed to be a thunderbolt have fallen upon Job's sheep before the devil had said to God, "Hast thou not made a hedge about all that is without and all that is within his house, and the rest of his goods? But now put forth thine hand, and touch all that he hath, and see if he will not curse thee to thy face" (Jb 1:10, 11).

7. From these considerations it is shown that all those events that happen in this world, which are regarded as things indifferent,¹³ whether calamities like the above or events of any other kind whatever, happen neither by God's doing nor yet without God. For when evil and hostile powers wish to bring to pass such events God does not only not prevent them but even gives permission, restricting it, however, to definite times and persons. Thus even in regard to Job himself it is said that at a definite time he was ordained to fall into the power of others and to have his house plundered by wicked men. It is for this reason that divine scripture teaches us to accept all things that happen to us as sent by God, because we know that nothing happens without him. That such is the case, namely, that nothing happens without God, how can we doubt, when our Lord and Savior clearly declares: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and not one of them shall fall on the ground without your Father which is in heaven?" (Mt 10:29).

But necessity has led us into a somewhat lengthy digression on the question of the struggle which the opposing powers maintain against men, while we have also discussed the more sorrowful events which happen to the human race, namely, the trials of this life, as Job says, "Is not the whole life of man upon earth a trial?" (Jb 7:1). Our object has been to expound more clearly how these things happen and what is the pious belief that we ought to hold about them. Let us now see how men slip into the sin of false knowledge, and with what purpose the opposing powers are wont to stir up strife against us on this matter also.

Chapter III

THE THREEFOLD WISDOM

I. When the holy apostle is desirous of teaching us a great and hidden truth concerning knowledge and wisdom he says in the first epistle to the Corinthians: "Howbeit we speak a wisdom among the perfect; yet a wisdom not of this world nor of the rulers of this world, which are coming to naught; but we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, the hidden wisdom which God foreordained before the worlds unto our glory, which none of the rulers of this world knew. For had they known it, they would never have crucified the Lord of Glory" (1 Cor 2:6-8). Here, in his desire to show that there are different kinds of wisdom, he describes one as a "wisdom of this world," one as a "wisdom of the rulers of this world" and another as God's wisdom. Moreover, when he uses the phrase, "wisdom of the rulers of this world," I do not think he means that there is one wisdom for all the rulers of this world, but he seems to me to indicate a particular kind of wisdom for each individual ruler.

And again, when he says, "But we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, the hidden wisdom which God foreordained before the worlds; unto our glory," we must inquire whether he means that this wisdom of God, which has been hidden and in other times and generations has not been made known to the sons of men as it is now revealed to his holy apostles and prophets, is the same as that wisdom of God which existed before the Savior's coming, the wisdom by which Solomon became wise. But the Savior by his own word declares that his teaching is greater than Solomon's, when he says, "And behold, a greater than Solomon is here" (Mt 12:42), in which declaration it is shown that those who were taught by the Savior were taught something more than Solomon knew.

For if anyone says that the Savior did indeed know more than Solomon, but did not impart this knowledge to others, how will this agree logically with what he says in the following words, "The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment and shall condemn the men of this generation, for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, a greater than Solomon is here" (Mt 12:42)? There is therefore a "wisdom of this world" and there is also probably a wisdom belonging to each, individual "ruler of this world." But as for the wisdom of the one God, we believe it refers to that wisdom which was at work to a lesser extent in the men of old, but was more fully and more clearly revealed through Christ. We shall, however, investigate the wisdom of God in the proper place.¹

2. At the moment our task is to treat of the opposing powers² and to ask how they originate those hostile movements by which false knowledge is implanted in men's minds and souls are led astray while supposing that they have discovered wisdom. It is therefore, I think, necessary to discern and distinguish between the "wisdom of this world" and the wisdom of the "rulers of this world," that by so doing we may be able to discover who are the fathers of this wisdom, or indeed of these kinds of wisdom. I think, then, as we said above,³ that the "wisdom of this world" is a different one from those varieties of wisdom which belong to the "rulers of this world," and that in this wisdom there appears to be understood and included all things that belong to this world. Now this wisdom contains in itself nothing which can enable it to decide on questions of the divine nature, or of the cause of the world, or of any higher matters whatsoever, or of the principles of a good and blessed life; but is such, for instance, as deals wholly with the arts of poetry, grammar, rhetoric, geometry and music, to which we should probably add the art of medicine. In all these arts we must suppose that the "wisdom of this world" is present.

As for the wisdom of the "rulers of this world," we understand this to be what they call the secret and hidden philosophy of the Egyptians and the astrology of the Chaldeans and Indians; who profess a knowledge of high things, and further the manifold and diverse opinions of the Greeks concerning the divine nature. Accordingly we find in the holy scriptures that there are rulers over individual nations, as for instance, we read in Daniel of a certain "prince of the kingdom of the Persians" and another "prince of the kingdom of the Greeks" (cf. Dn 10:13, 20) who, as is clearly shown by the sense of the passage itself, are not men but powers. Moreover in the prophet Ezekiel the "prince of Tyre" (cf. Ch. 28)⁴ is most plainly pictured as a certain spiritual power. When these, therefore, and other similar princes of this world, each having his own individual wisdom and formulating his own doctrines and peculiar opinions, saw our Lord and Savior promising and proclaiming that he had come into the world for the purpose of destroying all the doctrines, whatever they might be, of the "knowledge falsely so called" (1 Tm 6:20), they immediately laid snares for him, not knowing who was concealed within him. For "the kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ" (cf. Ps 2:2). But their snares became known and the plots which they had contrived against the Son of God were understood when they "crucified the Lord of glory." Therefore the apostle says, "We speak a wisdom among the perfect; yet a wisdom not of this world, nor of the rulers of this world, which are coming to naught, . . .⁵ a wisdom which none of the rulers of this world knew. For had they known it, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory" (cf. 1 Cor 2:6-8).⁶

3. The question indeed arises whether these varieties of wisdom which belong to the rulers of this world and with which they strive to indoctrinate men are introduced into our minds by the opposing powers with the desire of ensnaring and injuring us, or whether they are offered to us simply in consequence of an error, that is, not with a view to injuring men but because the "rulers of this world" themselves think their wisdom to be true and are therefore anxious to teach others what in their opinion is the truth. The latter is, I think, more likely. For example, just as Greek authors or the leaders of the various heresies have themselves first erroneously accepted a false doctrine for the truth and decided in their own mind that it was the truth, and then afterwards have tried to persuade others to adopt this same doctrine which they have determined is the true one, so we must suppose the "rulers of this world" also to have acted, those beings, namely, that are called by this title because they are spiritual powers who have been appointed to exercise rule over certain definite nations in this world.⁷

There are also, besides these rulers, certain special energies of this world, that is, certain spiritual powers who control definite activities which they have themselves by their own free will chosen as their task, among whom are those spirits who control the "wisdom of this world"; for instance, there is a particular energy or power who is the inspirer of poetry, another of geometry, and in the same way a particular power is the originator of every such art and subject of instruction.⁸ Finally, many Greeks have been of the opinion that the art of poetry cannot exist apart from madness, and accordingly in their histories it is often recorded that those whom they call seers were suddenly filled with the spirit of a kind of madness.⁹ And what is to be said also of those persons whom they call divine, who through the control of the daemons that are over them utter responses in verses formed according to the rules of the poetic art?¹⁰

Further, those men whom they call magi, or the malevolent,¹¹ have often, by invoking daemons over boys of tender years, caused them to recite poems in verse to the wonder and amazement of all. We must suppose that these effects are produced in the following manner. Just as holy and stainless souls, when they have devoted themselves to God with entire affection and entire purity and have kept themselves apart from all contact with daemons and purified themselves by much abstinence and have been steeped in pious and religious exercises, acquire thereby a communion with the divine nature and win the grace of prophecy and of the other divine gifts, so, too, must we think that those who show themselves fit subjects for the opposing powers, that is, those who adopt a work and manner of life and purpose agreeable to them, receive their inspiration and become participators in their wisdom and doctrine. The result of this is that they are filled with the operations of those spirits to whose service they have once subjected themselves.

4. Then in regard to those who teach another doctrine of Christ than that which the rule of scripture allows, it is not superfluous to consider whether it is with treacherous intentions that the opposing powers, in their efforts to check the faith of Christ, have devised certain fabulous and at the same time impious dogmas, or whether in fact even they, after hearing the word of Christ, have been unable either to banish it from the secret recesses of their consciousness or to retain

→ it in a pure and holy form, and so have introduced, through the agency of vessels that suited their purpose and, if I may so call them, through their own prophets, different kinds of error contrary to the rule of Christian truth. The more likely supposition is, that the apostate and exiled powers which have departed from God compose these errors and deceits of false doctrine either from the pure wickedness of their mind and will or else from envy of those for whom, once they have learned the truth, there is prepared a way of ascent to that station from which the powers have fallen, and from a desire to prevent any such progress.

296
→ soul It is, then, clearly demonstrated by many proofs that the soul of man, while in the body, can admit different energies, that is, controlling influences, of spirits either good or bad. Now the bad spirits work in two ways; that is, they either take whole and entire possession of the mind, so that they allow those in their power neither to understand nor to think, as is the case, for example, with those who are popularly called "possessed," whom we see to be demented and insane, such as the men who are related in the Gospel to have been healed by the Savior; or they deprave the soul, while it still thinks and understands, through harmful suggestion by means of different kinds of thoughts and evil inducements, as for example Judas was incited to the crime of the betrayal by the devil's putting the thought into him, according to the statement of scripture, "But when the devil had already put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot to betray him" (Jn 13:2).

On the other hand a man admits the energy and control of a good spirit when he is moved and incited to what is good and inspired to strive towards things heavenly and divine; just as the holy angels and God himself worked in the prophets, inciting and exhorting them by holy suggestions to strive towards better things, though certainly in such a way that it rested with the man's own will and judgment whether or not he was willing to follow God's call to the heavenly and divine. From this we learn to discern clearly when the soul is moved by the presence of a spirit of the better kind, namely, when it suffers no mental disturbance or aberration whatsoever as a result of the immediate inspiration and does not lose the free judgment of the will. Such for example were the prophets and apostles, who attended upon the divine oracles without any mental disturbance. We have shown, moreover, in previous examples, when we mentioned Mordecai and Artaxerxes,¹² that by the suggestions of a good spirit a man's memory is incited to the recollection of better things.

5. It follows, I think, that we must also inquire what are the causes which lead the soul of man to be influenced at one time by good spirits and at another time by bad.¹³ I suspect that this is due to certain causes which are older even than our birth in this body, as John indicated by his leaping and rejoicing in his mother's womb when the voice of Mary's salutation sounded in the ears of his mother Elizabeth, and as is declared by the prophet Jeremiah who, "before he was formed in his mother's belly" was known by God and "before he came forth from the womb" was sanctified by him, and while yet a boy received the gift of prophecy (cf. Jer 1:5, 6). On the other hand¹⁴ it is clearly proved that some people are possessed right from their earliest years, that is, are born with an accompanying daemon (cf. Mk 7:25ff.; 9:17ff.), while others are declared by the testimony of histories to have been under supernatural control from boyhood, and others still have from their earliest years been indwelt by a daemon whom they term a python (cf. Acts 16:16), that is, a spirit of ventriloquism.

In the face of these examples, those who maintain that everything in this world is governed by the providence of God, a doctrine which is also part of our faith, can give no other answer, as it seems to me, which will prove divine providence to be free from all suspicion of injustice, except to say that there were certain pre-existent causes which led these souls, before they were born into the body, to contract some degree of guilt in their sensitive or emotional nature, in consequence of which divine providence has judged them worthy of enduring these sufferings. For the soul always possesses free will, both when in the body and when out of the body; and the will's freedom always moves in the direction either of good or of evil, nor can the rational sense, that is, the mind or soul, ever exist without some movement either good or evil. It is probable that these movements furnish grounds for merit even before the souls do anything in this world, so that in accordance with such causes or merits they are ordained by the divine providence right from their birth, yes, and even before it, if I may so speak, to endure conditions either good or evil.¹⁵

6. Let these assertions, then, be made concerning those events which appear to happen to men right from their birth or even before they emerge into this light. In regard, however to the suggestions made to the soul, that is, to men's thoughts, by different spirits, and which incite men to good or to its opposite, we must suppose that even for these there sometimes exist causes prior to our bodily birth. But sometimes a mind that is watchful and that casts away from itself whatever is evil calls to its side the assistance of the good; whereas on the contrary one that is negligent and slothful, being less cautious, gives a place to those spirits which, like robbers lying in ambush, contrive to rush into the minds of men whenever they see a place offered to them through slackness, as Peter the apostle says; "Your adversary the devil as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour" (1 Pt 5:8). On this account a strict guard must be kept over our heart day and night and no place must be given to the devil (cf. Eph

4:27), but all our actions must be such that God's ministers, that is, "the spirits who have been sent forth to minister to them" who have been called to "inherit salvation" (cf. Heb 1:14), may find a place within us and may delight to enter the guest-chamber of our soul; and dwelling in us, that is, in our heart, may rule us with the better counsels, if so be they shall find the habitation of our heart adorned by the practice of virtue and holiness.

Let these arguments, which we have set out to the best of our ability, be sufficient in regard to those powers which are opposed to the human race.

Chapter IV

WHETHER THE STATEMENT MADE BY SOME IS TRUE, THAT EACH INDIVIDUAL HAS TWO SOULS

1. And now, I think, we must not pass over in silence the "human temptations" (cf. 1 Cor 10:13), those which occasionally arise from "flesh and blood," or from "the wisdom of flesh and blood," which is said to be at enmity with God (cf. Eph 6:12; 2 Cor 1:12; Rom 8:7, 8); for we have already dealt with the temptations that are said to be more than human, that is, with the struggles we maintain "against the principalities and powers and against the rulers of the darkness of this world and the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (Eph 6:12), and with those that befall us against evil spirits and impure daemons.

In this connection we must, I think, if we are to be logical, inquire whether there is in us, that is, in men who consist of soul and body and "vital spirit" (cf. Wis 15:11; 1 Thes 5:23), something else besides which possesses a peculiar inclination and movement in the direction of evil. A question of this kind is accustomed to be raised by some, namely, whether we ought to say that there is in us as it were two souls, the one divine and heavenly and the other of a lower sort; or whether from the very fact that we are joined to bodies (which bodies are

souls

→ in their own proper nature dead and utterly lifeless, since it is from us, that is, from our souls, that the material body derives its life, whereas in itself it is certainly opposed and hostile to the spirit¹) we are drawn and incited to those evils which are pleasing to the body; or whether in the third place, as some Greeks have supposed, our soul though one in its essence is nevertheless composed of several parts, namely, one part that is called rational and another irrational, while that part which they call irrational is again divided into the two emotional elements of appetite and passion.² Now we have found each of the three above-mentioned opinions about the soul held by some. The one of them, however, which we said was approved by certain Greek philosophers, that the soul consists of three parts, I do not observe to be strongly confirmed by the authority of divine scripture, whereas in regard to the remaining two a certain number of passages may be found in the divine writings which appear capable of being applied to them.

2. Of these theories let us first discuss the one which some are accustomed to frame, that we have within us one soul that is good and heavenly and another that is lower and earthly; and that the soul which is superior is implanted from heaven, like the soul which gave to Jacob while still in the womb the prize of victory against his brother Esau whom he supplanted, or, the soul which was sanctified in Jeremiah from the womb, or in the case of John was from the womb filled with the Holy Spirit (cf. Gn 25:22-25; Jer 1:5; Lk 1:41).³ But that which they call the lower soul is, they maintain, produced along with the body from the bodily seed, and consequently they deny that it can live or subsist apart from the body; which is the reason, they say, why it is frequently termed the flesh.⁴ For the passage, "The flesh lusteth against the spirit" (Gal 5:17), they do not take to be spoken of the actual flesh, but of this soul, which is properly the soul of the flesh.

Moreover they endeavor by these arguments to corroborate the passage in Leviticus which runs as follows: "The soul of all flesh is its blood" (Lv 17:14). For from the fact that the blood by being diffused throughout the flesh endows the flesh with life, they say that this soul, which is called "the soul of all flesh," resides in the blood. And as for the saying, "The flesh wars against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh" (Gal 5:17), and the other saying, "The soul of all flesh is its blood" (Lv 17:14), they assert that we have here the same thing which is called in other words "the wisdom of the flesh" (Rom 8:7 [Vg.]), namely, a certain material spirit, which is not subject to the law of God nor indeed can be subject to it, because it possesses earthly wishes and bodily desires.⁵ It is about this that they suppose the apostle to be speaking when he says, "But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity under the law of sin which is in my members" (Rom 7:23).

But if one were to object to them that these statements are made about the body which in its own proper nature is a dead thing and which is only said to possess a mind or a wisdom which is "at enmity with God" (cf. Rom 8:7) or which "wars against the spirit" (cf. Gal 5:17) in the same way as if one were to say that the actual flesh has a voice which protests against being hungry or thirsty or cold, or against enduring discomfort in any respect whatever, whether through excess or through want, they would endeavor to combat and solve this difficulty by showing that the soul has many other passions which in no way at all take their origin from the flesh, and yet the spirit is contrary to these, as for instance ambition, avarice, jealousy, envy, pride and others like them; and seeing that the mind or spirit of man is in conflict with these, they would lay down as the cause of all such evils nothing else but this bodily soul, as it were, of which we have spoken above, and which is generated by the transmission of the seed.⁶

To this statement they are accustomed to add also the witness of the apostle, where he says, "But the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, sorcery, enmities, strife, jealousies, wraths, factions, divisions, heresies, envyings, drunkenness, revellings and such like" (Gal 5:19, 21); for they assert that not all of these take their origin from the use or enjoyment of the flesh in such a way that we could suppose all such passions to be part of that substance which has no soul, that is, the actual flesh. Moreover, when he says, "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many among you are wise after the flesh" (1 Cor 1:26), it would seem to point to this, that there is apparently a wisdom that is peculiarly fleshly and material, and that the wisdom which is after the spirit is a different one; and certainly the former could not be called wisdom unless there existed a soul of the flesh to possess that wisdom which is termed the wisdom of the flesh. To this they also add the following; if "the flesh warreth against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, so that we may not do the things that we will to do" (Gal 5:17), what things are they of which he says, "we may not do what we will to do"? It is certain, they say, that it does not mean things of the spirit, for the will of the spirit is not forbidden; nor is it things of the flesh, for if the flesh does not possess a soul of its own it will undoubtedly not possess a will. It remains, therefore, that it means the will of this soul, for that can have its own proper will which is certainly opposed to the will of the spirit.

If this is so, it is plain that the will of this soul is something intermediate between the flesh and the spirit, undoubtedly serving and obeying one of the two, whichever it has chosen to obey.⁷ If it gives itself up to the delights of the flesh, it makes men fleshly; if, however, it joins itself to the spirit, it causes a man to be "in the spirit" and on this account to be called spiritual. It is this that the apostle seems to indicate when he says, "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit" (Rom 8:9).

We must inquire, therefore, what exactly this will is, which is intermediate between the flesh and the spirit, above and beyond the will which is said to belong to the flesh or to the spirit. For of a certainty we should hold that everything which is said to belong to the spirit is due to the will of the spirit and whatever deeds are called "works of the flesh" are due to the will of the flesh (cf. Gal 5:22, 19). What then above and beyond these is the will of the soul, which is given a separate name and which the apostle wishes us not to do when he says, "So that ye may not do the things that ye will to do" (Gal 5:17)? It seems to be here indicated that this will must be attached to neither of these two, that is, neither to the flesh nor to the spirit. But someone may say that just as it is better for the soul to do its own will than to do the will of the flesh, so again it is better for it to do the will of the spirit than its own will. Why then does the apostle say, "So that ye may not do the things that ye will to do"?—since in that contest which is waged between the flesh and the spirit, the spirit is by no means certain of victory; for it is clear that in many cases the flesh obtains the mastery.

3. We have entered here upon a very deep discussion, in which it is necessary to investigate the possible arguments from every aspect. Let us see, therefore, whether at this point we may not perhaps establish some such conclusion as the following; that as it is better for the soul to follow the spirit at the time when the spirit has obtained the victory over the flesh, so, too, even though it appears worse for it to follow the flesh when this is warring against the spirit and desiring to call the soul to its side, yet perhaps it may turn out to be more advantageous for the soul to be mastered by the flesh than to remain within the sphere of its own will. For so long as it continues in its own will, then is the time when it is said to be "neither hot nor cold" (Rv 3:15); but remaining in a sort of lukewarm condition it may find conversion a slow and somewhat difficult process. If, however, it attaches itself to the flesh, it will be satiated and filled after a time with those very evils which it endures as a result of the vices of the flesh and will be wearied out as it were by the very heavy burdens of luxury and lust, and so may be the more easily and quickly converted from low material desires to a longing for heavenly things and to spiritual grace. And we must suppose that the apostle uttered the saying, "The spirit warreth against the flesh and the flesh against the spirit, so that we may not do the things that we will to do" (Gal 5:17),—the things referred to being undoubtedly those which are apart from the will of the spirit and apart from the will of the flesh—meaning, if we were to say it in other words, that it is better for a man to be in a state of virtue or in a state of wickedness rather than in neither of these; and that before the soul turns to the spirit and is made one with it, during the time it is attached to the body and occupied with fleshly thoughts, it appears to be neither in a state of goodness nor yet clearly in a state of wickedness, but to be, if I may so say, like an animal. It is better, if it be possible, that it should attach itself to the spirit and become spiritual. If, however, this is not possible, it is more expedient for it to follow even the wickedness of the flesh than by remaining fixed in the sphere of its own will to occupy the position of an irrational animal.⁸

will

We have dealt with these points because we were desirous of discussing every opinion that is put forward; and we have gone further afield than was our wish in order that it may not be supposed that we are unaware of the questions commonly raised by those who ask whether there exists within us, besides the heavenly and rational soul, another one which is by its nature contrary to the first and which is called either the flesh, or the wisdom of the flesh, or the soul of the flesh (cf. Rom 8:6, 7 [Vg.]).

4. Let us now see what answer is given to the above arguments by those who maintain that there is in us a single movement and a single life of one and the same soul, whose salvation or loss is properly to be attributed to itself as the result of its own actions. And let us first see what is the nature of the passions of the mind to which we are subject whenever we feel within us that we are being dragged in one direction and another, when a conflict of thoughts arises in our heart and certain images are suggested to us which incline us now this way and now that and by which we stand at one time reproved and at another time self-approved (cf. Rom 2:15).

Now it is nothing remarkable if we say that evil natures have a judgment that is variable and conflicting, and out of harmony with itself; since this is found to be the case with all men, whenever a doubtful matter comes into consideration and they look ahead and deliberate which is the better or more useful choice to make. It is in no way surprising, therefore, that if two images occur to a man in turn and suggest contrary modes of action they should drag the mind in different directions. For example, if a man's thought invites him to the faith and fear of God, it cannot then be said that the flesh is warring against the spirit; but so long as it is uncertain what is the true and useful course, the mind is dragged in different ways. So, too, when we think of the flesh as inciting a man to lust, while a better counsel opposes this sort of allurements, it must not be supposed that there is one life acting in opposition to another, but that the conflict is due to the nature of the body, which is striving to empty out and exhaust the places filled with seminal fluid. Neither must it be supposed that it is any opposing influence or the life of another soul which excites thirst in us and impels us to drink or which causes us to become hungry and urges us to take food; but just as these things are alike desired and evacuated through natural movements of the body, so also the moisture of the natural seed collecting from time to time in its appointed regions strives to find an issue and outlet, a result which is so far from never happening except at the impulse of some external excitement that sometimes the seed is even spontaneously emitted.

When therefore it is said that "the flesh warreth against the spirit" (Gal 5:17), these persons understand the passage thus, that the use or the needs or delights of the flesh excite a man and draw and entice him away from divine and spiritual things. For when we are drawn away by reason of the needs of the body we are not allowed leisure for things that are divine and profitable for eternity; just as on the other hand when a soul has leisure for divine and spiritual things and is united with the Spirit of God it is said to war against the flesh, for it does not allow itself to become relaxed through indulgences and to be tossed about by the pleasures in which it takes a natural delight. This is the meaning they give to the saying, "The wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God" (Rom 8:7 [Vg.]); not that the flesh really has a soul or wisdom of its own, but just as we are accustomed to say by a peculiar use of language that the ground is thirsty and wishes to drink water,—where we certainly use the word, "wish" not in a literal but in a peculiar sense, as if, again, we were to say that a house "wants" rebuilding, and many other similar expressions—so, too, must we interpret the phrase "wisdom of the flesh," and the saying, "the flesh lusteth against the spirit."

They are accustomed also to add to these the saying, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground"

(Gn 4:10). For what cries to God is not the actual blood that was shed, but by a peculiar use of language the blood is said to cry out when vengeance is demanded from God upon the shedder of the blood. Moreover when the apostle says, "I see another law in my members" (Rom 7:23), they understand it as if he had said that the man who desires to apply himself to God's word is distracted and diverted and hindered from this purpose by the bodily needs and functions, which exist as a kind of "law" in the body, and that these prevent him from applying himself to the "wisdom of God" (cf. 1 Cor 1:21, 24) and so being able more earnestly to behold the divine mysteries.

5. In regard, however, to the fact that heresies, envyings, strifes and other things are included in the list of "works of the flesh" (cf. Gal 5:19, 21), they interpret it in this way. When the sensitiveness of the soul has grown duller through its subservience to the passions of the body, it is weighed down by the mass of its vices and becomes sensitive to nothing refined or spiritual. It is then said to become flesh, taking a name from that element in which it exercises the greater part of its vigor and effective purpose. They also put the following question: "Whom can we find, or whom shall we speak of as being the maker of this evil mind which is called the mind of the flesh?" For they maintain the belief that there is no other creator of soul and flesh but God. If we should say that the good God in his own creation made something at enmity with himself it will certainly appear absurd. If then it is written that "the wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God" (Rom 8:7 [Vg.]), and if we are to say that this is a result of the creation, then God himself will appear to have made a certain nature that is at enmity with himself, a nature that cannot be subject to him or to his law, in which case indeed we should suppose it to be an animal of which these statements are made. But if the passage is to be understood in this way, what pray will be our difference from those men who say that souls are created diverse in their natures, so as to be destined by nature either for salvation or for destruction? This is certainly satisfactory to none but the heretics, who because they cannot defend the justice of God by pious reasoning compose impious inventions like this.

We have brought forward, then, to the best of our ability in the person of each of the parties, the arguments that can be used in discussion concerning each opinion in turn. It is for the reader to choose which of them deserves the preference.

Chapter V

THAT THE WORLD TOOK ITS BEGINNING IN TIME

1. After the foregoing discussion, since one of the dogmas of the Church, held chiefly in consequence of our belief in the truth of our records, is that this world was made and began to exist at a definite time and that as a result of the consummation of the age to which all things are subject it must be dissolved through its own corruption,¹ there appears to be nothing unreasonable in bringing up afresh a few points relating thereto. And so far as the matter concerns our belief in the scriptures the discussion seems to be a very easy one. Indeed even the heretics, divided as they are on many other matters, yet seem on this point to agree with one another in submitting to the authority of scripture.

In regard, then, to the creation of the world, what other book of scripture is more able to enlighten us than that which was written by Moses concerning its origin?² This account may well enshrine certain deeper truths than the mere record of the history seems to reveal and may contain a spiritual meaning in many passages, using the letter as a kind of veil (cf. 2 Cor 3:14f.) for profound and mystical doctrines; nevertheless the language of the narrator certainly indicates this, that all visible things were created at a definite time. And as for the consummation of the world, Jacob is the first to refer to this when, in giving his testament to his sons he says, "Gather to me, ye sons of Jacob, that I may tell you what shall be in the last days," or, "after the last days" (Gn 49:1 [LXX]). If then there are "last days," or a time "after the last days," it follows of necessity that the days which had a beginning also come to an end. David also says: "The heavens shall perish, but thou shalt remain; and they all shall grow old as a garment, and as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail" (Ps 102:26, 27). And when our Lord and Savior says, "He who created in the beginning made them male and female" (Mt 19:4), he himself bears witness that the world was made; whereas when he says that "heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away" (Mt 24:35 and par.), he shows that it is corruptible and destined to come to an end.

Moreover, the saying of the apostle, "The creation was subjected to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected it in hope, because the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God" (Rom 8:20, 21) clearly asserts the end of the world, as when he says again, "The fashion of this world passeth away" (1 Cor 7:31); while in the very fact that he says "the creation was subjected to vanity" he points also to its beginning. For if the creation was subjected to vanity by reason of a certain hope, it was certainly so subjected from a cause, and what proceeds from a cause must necessarily have a beginning; since apart from some beginning the creation could not have been subjected to vanity nor could it hope to be "delivered from the bondage of corruption" if it had never begun to be a servant of corruption. Moreover, anyone who looks for them at his leisure can find in the divine scriptures very many other sayings of this sort, which assert that the world both had a beginning and is expecting an end.

2. If, however, there is anyone who in this matter would oppose either the authority or the credibility of our scripture, let us ask him the question, whether he asserts that God can comprehend all things or that he cannot? Now to say that he cannot is clearly impious. If, however, he should say, as he must, that God comprehends all things, it follows from this very fact that they can be comprehended that they are understood to have both a beginning and an end. For that which is absolutely without any beginning can in no way be comprehended. However far the understanding may reach out, so far is the ability to comprehend withdrawn and removed endlessly when there is held to be no beginning.

3. But they are accustomed to meet us with this objection; "If the world had a beginning in time, what was God doing before the world began?" For it is alike impious and absurd to say that God's nature is to be at ease and never to move, or to suppose that there was a time when goodness did not do good and omnipotence did not exercise its power.³ They raise this objection when we say that this world began at a definite time and when in accordance with our belief in scripture we also calculate how many years old it is. To these propositions I do not think that any of the heretics can easily give an answer that will accord with the nature of their own doctrine.

We, however, will give a logical answer that preserves the rule of piety, by saying that God did not begin to work for the first time when he made this visible world, but that just as after the dissolution of this world there will be another one, so also we believe that there were others before this one existed.⁴ Both of these beliefs will be confirmed by the authority of divine scripture. For Isaiah teaches that there will be another world after this, when he says, "There shall be a new heaven and a new earth, which I will cause to endure in my sight, saith the Lord" (Is 66:22). And that there were other worlds before this one Ecclesiastes shows when he says, "What is it that hath been? Even that which shall be. And what is it that hath been created? That very thing that is to be created; and there is nothing at all new under the sun. If one should speak and say, "See, this is new; it hath been already, in the ages which were before us" (Eccl 1:9, 10). By these testimonies each proposition is proved at the same time, namely, that there were ages in the past and that there will be others hereafter. We must not suppose, however, that several worlds existed at the same time, but that after this one another will exist in its turn. But it is not necessary to go through these questions again in detail now, since we have already done this in a former chapter.⁵

4. Still, there is a point which I do not think we ought lightly to pass by, and that is that the holy scriptures call the foundation of the world by a new and peculiar name, terming it katabole. This word is very incorrectly translated into Latin by constitutio, or foundation, for katabole in Greek has rather the significance of deicere, that is, to cast downwards, and is, as we have said, incorrectly rendered into Latin by constitutio.⁶ An example occurs in the gospel according to John, when the Savior says, "And there shall be tribulation in those days, such as hath not been from the foundation of the world" (Mt 24:21).⁷ Here "foundation" stands for katabole, the meaning of which term must be taken to be as we have explained it above. Moreover the apostle used the same word in the epistle to the Ephesians, when he says, "Who chose us before the foundation of the world" (Eph 1:4); for here, too, "foundation" represents katabole, which must be taken to have the same meaning as that given in our interpretation above. It seems worthwhile, therefore, to inquire what it is that is indicated by this new name.

Now I think⁸ that since the end and consummation of the saints will happen in those worlds "that are not seen and are eternal" (2 Cor 4:18), we must suppose, from a contemplation of this end, as we have frequently shown in former chapters, that rational creatures have also had a similar beginning.⁹ And if they had a beginning that was such as they expect their end to be, they have undoubtedly existed right from their beginning in those worlds "that are not seen and are eternal" (ibid.). If this is so, there has been a descent from higher to lower conditions not only on the part of those souls who have by the variety of their own movements deserved it, but also on the part of those who have been brought down, even against their will, from those higher invisible conditions to these lower visible ones, in order to be of service to the whole world. For indeed "the creation was subjected to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected the same in hope" (Rom 8:20), the hope being that both sun and moon and stars and the angels of God should fulfill an obedient service for the world; and it was for those souls which on account of their excessive spiritual defects required these grosser and more solid bodies and also for the sake of those others for whom this arrangement was necessary that the present visible world was instituted. A descent, therefore, of all alike from higher to lower conditions appears to be indicated by the meaning of this word katabole. Nevertheless the entire creation cherishes a hope of liberty, a hope of being "delivered from the bondage of corruption" (Rom 8:21) when the "children of God," who had both fallen and become scattered, have been gathered into one (cf. Jn 11:52), and when the others have fulfilled in this world the rest of their duties, which are known solely to God, the Artificer of all things.¹⁰ We must recognize, however, that the world was made of such a size and character as to be able to hold all those souls which were destined to undergo discipline in it¹¹ and also those powers which were appointed to be at hand to serve and assist them. Moreover it is proved by many declarations that all rational creatures are of one nature, and it is only on this ground that the justice of God in all his dealings with them can be defended, namely, when each contains within himself the reasons why he has been placed in this or in that rank of life. !!!

5. This arrangement,¹² therefore, which God established afterwards, when he had already from the beginning of the world foreseen the thoughts and motives both of those who through spiritual defect deserved to descend into bodies and of those who were carried away by their eager desire for visible things and also of those who were compelled whether willingly or unwillingly by him who subjected them "in hope" to perform certain duties for such as had fallen into this condition,—this arrangement, I say, some men have not understood; and because they have not perceived that this variety of arrangement has been instituted by God as a result of previous causes arising from free will, they have supposed that everything in this world is governed either by chance movements or by a fateful necessity and that nothing is within the power of our will. As a result they have been unable to free God's providence from the imputation of blame.

6. But just as we said that all souls that have dwelt in this world have stood in need of many ministers and rulers and helpers, so in the last times, when the end of the world was near at hand and the whole human race was hastening towards its final destruction, and when weakness had overtaken not only those that were ruled but those also to whom the care of ruling had been committed, then there arose the need not of such help as this nor of defenders like these, but the aid of the author and Creator himself was demanded in order to restore to the first the capacity to obey and to the second the capacity to rule, which in both cases had been corrupted and profaned. And so the only-begotten Son of God, who was the word and wisdom of the Father, when he lived with the Father in that glory which he had before the word was (cf. Jn 17:5), emptied himself, and taking the form of a servant became obedient even unto death (cf. Phil 2:7, 8) in order to teach them obedience who could in no other way obtain salvation except through obedience; and also restored the corrupted laws of ruling and of reigning in that he "subdues all enemies under his feet" (1 Cor 15:27); and by the fact that he must reign till he puts his enemies under his feet he teaches the rulers themselves the arts of control.

Because then he had come, as we have said, to renew the capacity not only for ruling and reigning but also for obeying, he first fulfilled in himself what he wished to be fulfilled by others and not only became obedient to the Father "even unto the death of the cross" (Phil 2:8), but also at the consummation of the age, by his including in himself all those whom he subjected to the Father and who through him come to salvation, he himself with them and in them is also said to be "subjected" to the Father, when "all things" shall "subsist in him" and he shall be the "head of all things" and in him shall be the "fullness" of those who obtain salvation. This then is what the apostle says of him: "When all things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected unto him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all" (cf. 1 Cor 15:28; Col 1:17–19; Eph 1:22ff.).

7. But the heretics, not understanding, I cannot tell why, the apostle's meaning contained in these words, deprecate using the term subjection in regard to the Son; though if the propriety of its ascription to him be questioned, the truth may easily be discovered by assuming the contrary. For if to be subjected is not good, it follows that the contrary, that is, not to be subjected, is good. Moreover the language of the apostle as they would interpret it, appears to prove this when it says "When all things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected unto him that did subject all things to him" (1 Cor 15:28), as if he who now is not subjected to the Father will then be subjected when the Father has first subjected the universe to him.

But I wonder how this can be the meaning, that he who when all things are not yet subjected to him is not himself subjected should then, when all things have been subjected to him, when he is king over all and holds power over the universe, be thought worthy of being subjected although he was not subjected before. Such men do not understand that the subjection of Christ to the Father reveals the blessedness of our perfection and announces the crowning glory of the work undertaken by him, since he offers to the Father not only the sum total of all ruling and reigning which he has amended throughout the entire universe but also the laws, corrected and renewed, of the obedience and subjection due from the human race. If therefore that subjection by which the Son is said to be subjected to the Father is taken to be good and salutary, it is a sure and logical consequence that the subjection of his enemies which is said to happen to the Son of God should also be understood to be salutary and useful; so that, just as when the Son is said to be subjected to the Father the perfect restoration of the entire creation is announced, so when his enemies are said to be subjected to the Son of God we are to understand this to involve the salvation of those subjected and the restoration of those that have been lost.

8. But this subjection will be accomplished through certain means and courses of discipline and periods of time; that is, the whole world will not become subject to God by the pressure of some necessity that compels it into subjection, nor by the use of force, but by word, by reason, by teaching, by the exhortation to better things, by the best methods of education, and also by such merited and appropriate threatenings as are justly held over the heads of those who contemptuously neglect to care for their own salvation and advantage and their spiritual health. For even we men, in training slaves or children, restrain them by means of threats and fear so long as their age renders them incapable of listening to reason; but when they have acquired an understanding of what is good, profitable and honorable then the fear of blows may cease and they can be persuaded by word and by reason to acquiesce in everything that is good.

But how, consistently with the preservation of free will in all rational creatures, each person ought to be dealt with, that is, who they are whom the Word of God discovers to be prepared and capable and so instructs; who they are whom he puts off for a time; who they are from whom the word is utterly hidden and who are destined to be far away from the hearing of it (cf. Prv 15:29); who again they are that despise the word when it is declared and preached to them and consequently are visited with God's corrections and chastisements and pressed into salvation and whose conversion is as it were compelled and extorted; who they are for whom God even provides special occasions for salvation so that sometimes a man has obtained an assured salvation when his faith was revealed by a mere answer;¹³ from what causes or on what occasions these things happen, or what the divine wisdom sees as it looks into these men or what movements of theirs will lead God to arrange all these things thus, is known to God alone and to his only-begotten Son, through whom all things were created and restored, and to the Holy Spirit, through whom all things are sanctified, who proceedeth from the Father himself (cf. Jn 15:26), to whom is the glory forever and ever, Amen.

Chapter VI

THE CONSUMMATION OF THE WORLD

1. In regard to the end and consummation of all things we have already in a previous chapter discussed to the best of our ability, so far as the authority of divine scripture allowed us, those points which we consider sufficient for purposes of instruction.¹ Now, however, we call to mind a few further points, since the course of our inquiry has brought us again to that topic. The highest good, towards which all rational nature is progressing, and which is also called the end of all things, is defined by very many even among philosophers in the following way, namely, that the highest good is to become as far as possible like God.² But this definition is not so much, I think, a discovery of their own, as something taken by them out of the divine books. For Moses, before all others, points to it when in recording the first creation of man he says, "And God said, Let us make man in our own image and likeness" (Gn 1:26). Then he adds afterwards, "And God made man; in the image of God made he him; male and female made he them, and he blessed them" (Gn 1:27, 28).

Now the fact that he said, "He made him in the image of God," and was silent about the likeness, points to nothing else but this, that man received the honor of God's image in his first creation, whereas the perfection of God's likeness was reserved for him at the consummation.³ The purpose of this was that man should acquire it for himself by his own earnest efforts to imitate God, so that while the possibility of attaining perfection was given to him in the beginning through the honor of the "image," he should in the end through the accomplishment of these works obtain for himself the perfect "likeness." More openly and unmistakably the apostle John lays down that such is the case when he makes this declaration: "Little children, we know not yet what we shall be; but if he shall be revealed"—speaking undoubtedly of the Savior—"we shall be like him" (1 Jn 3:2). Here he most certainly indicates that we are to hope both for the end of all things, the nature of which he says is still unknown to him, and also for the likeness to God which will be conferred on us in proportion to the perfection of our merits. The Lord himself also in the gospel points out that these things will not only come to pass but will come to pass by his own intercession, when he deigns to make this request to the Father for his disciples: "Father, I will that, where I am, they also may be with me," and, "as I and thou art one, so they may be one in us" (Jn 17:24, 21). Here indeed the likeness seems, if we may say so, to make an advance and from being something similar to become "one thing"; for this reason undoubtedly, that in the consummation or end God is "all in all" (1 Cor 15:28).

In this connection⁴ the question is asked by some whether the essence of our bodily nature, however perfectly purified it may be and rendered completely spiritual, does not appear to offer an obstacle both to the honor of our likeness to God and to our fitness for union with him. For it does not seem possible to say that the nature which is in a body can either be like the divine nature, which is certainly above all things incorporeal, or that it can be truly and rightly described as becoming one with it; especially⁵ since the fact of the Son being "one with

(And further,⁶ when the same apostle says that "the whole creation shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God," we understand it in such a way as to say that the first creation of rational creatures was also an incorporeal one, which was not meant to be in bondage to corruption for the reason that it was not clothed with bodies; for wherever bodies are, corruption follows immediately. But it will afterwards be "delivered from the bondage of corruption" when it has received the glory of the Son of God and when "God shall be all in all" [cf. Rom 8:21; 1 Cor 15:28].

We are also led to believe that the end of all things will be incorporeal by the statement of our Savior, in which he says, "That as I and thou are one, so they also may be one in us" [Jn 17:21]. For we ought to know what God is and what the Savior will be in the end, and how the likeness of the Father and the Son has been promised to the saints, so that as the Father and the Son are one in themselves, so, too, the saints may be one in them. For we must either suppose that the God of the universe is clothed with a body and enveloped with some sort of matter in the same way as we are with flesh, in order that the likeness of God's life may in the end be brought to the level of the saints; or, if this view is unseemly, as it most certainly is to those who desire even in the smallest degree to dwell on the majesty of God and to apprehend the glory of his unbegotten and all-surpassing nature, then we are compelled to accept one of two alternatives and either despair of ever attaining the likeness of God if we are destined always to have bodies, or else, if there is promised to us a blessedness of the same life that God has, then we must live in the same condition in which God lives).⁷

2. Now⁸ when it is promised that in the end God is "all in all" (1 Cor 15:28), we must not imagine, in strictly logical wise, that animals, either cattle or wild beasts, will come to that end, lest it should be implied that God dwells even in animals, whether cattle or wild beasts; neither will stocks and stones, lest it should be said that God dwells in them also. So, too, we must not suppose that any evil reaches that end, lest when it is said that "God is in all" he should be said to dwell even in some vessel of evil.

For although we say that even now God is everywhere and in all things, for the reason that nothing can be empty of God, still we do not say it so as to mean that he now actually is all things in which he is present. Hence we must look more carefully to see what this condition is which marks the perfection of blessedness, and the end of things, in which God is said not only to be in all things but even to be all things. Let us inquire, therefore, what are these "all things" which God shall be "in all things" (1 Cor 15:28).

3. Now I myself think that when it is said that God is "all in all," it means that he is also all things in each individual person. And he will be all things in each person in such a way that everything which the rational mind, when purified from all the dregs of its vices and utterly cleared from every cloud of wickedness, can feel or understand or think will be all God and that the mind will no longer be conscious of anything besides or other than God, but will think God and see God and hold God and God will be the mode and measure of its every movement; and in this way God will be all to it. For there will no longer be any contrast of good and evil, since evil nowhere exists; for God, whom evil never approaches, is then all things to it; nor will one who is always in the good and to whom God is all things desire any longer to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gn 2:17).

If then the end is renewed after the pattern of the origin and the issue of things made to resemble their beginning and that condition restored which rational nature once enjoyed when it had no need to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, so that all consciousness of evil has departed and given place to what is sincere and pure and he alone who is the one good God becomes all things to the soul and he himself is all things not in some few or in many things but in all things; when there is nowhere any death, nowhere any sting of death (cf. 1 Cor 15:55), nowhere any evil at all, then truly God will be all in all. But some think that this perfection and blessedness of rational natures can only remain in the condition which we have described above, that is, the condition in which all things possess God and God is all things to them, if they are in no way impeded by union with a bodily nature. Otherwise, if there were any intermingling of a material substance, they consider that the glory of the highest blessedness would be prevented.⁹ On this subject the arguments that may be raised have been fully dealt with and discussed by us in a previous chapter.¹⁰

4. But now, since we find the apostle Paul making mention of a "spiritual body" (cf. 1 Cor 15:44), let us inquire to the best of our ability what sort of idea we ought to form from this passage about such a body. So far then as our understanding can grasp it, we believe that the quality of a spiritual body is something such as will make a fitting habitation not only for all saints and perfected souls but also for that "whole creation" which is to be delivered from the bondage of corruption (cf. Rom 8:21). Of this body the same apostle has also said that "we have a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor 5:1), that is, in the dwelling-places of the blest. From this statement we may then form a conjecture of what great purity, what extreme fineness, what great glory is the quality of that body, by comparing it with those bodies which, although heavenly and most splendid, are yet made with hands and visible. For of that body it is said that it is a house not made with hands but "eternal in the heavens" (cf. 2 Cor 5:1). Now since "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal" (2 Cor 4:18), all those bodies which we see whether on earth or in the heavens, which are capable of being seen and are made with hands and not eternal, are very greatly surpassed in excellence by that which is neither visible nor made with hands but is eternal.

From this comparison we may gain an idea of how great is the beauty, how great the splendor and how great the brightness of a spiritual body, and how true is the saying that "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what things God hath prepared for them that love him" (1 Cor 2:9). But we must not doubt that the nature of this present body of ours may, through the will of God who made it what it is, be developed by its Creator into the quality of that exceedingly refined and pure and splendid body, according as the condition of things shall require and the merits of the rational being shall demand. Finally, when the world was in need of variety and diversity, matter lent itself to the fashioning of the diverse aspects and classes of things in wholly obedient service to the Maker, as to its Lord and Creator, that from it he might produce the diverse forms of things heavenly and earthly. But when events have begun to hasten towards the ideal of all being one as the Father is one with the Son (cf. Jn 17:21; 10:30), we are bound to believe as a logical consequence that where all are one there will no longer be any diversity.¹¹

5. It is on this account, moreover, that the last enemy, who is called death, is said to be destroyed (cf. 1 Cor 15:26); in order, namely, that there may be no longer any sadness when there is no death nor diversity when there is no enemy. For the destruction of the last enemy must be understood in this way, not that its substance which was made by God shall perish, but that the hostile purpose and will which proceeded not from God but from itself will come to an end. It will be destroyed, therefore, not in the sense of ceasing to exist, but of being no longer an enemy and no longer death.¹² For to the Almighty nothing is impossible (cf. Jb 42:2), nor is anything beyond the reach of cure by its Maker; for it was on this account that he made all things, that they might exist, and those things which were made in order to exist cannot cease to exist. Consequently they will suffer change and difference of such a kind as to be placed in a better or worse position in accordance with their merits; but things which were made by God for the purpose of permanent existence cannot suffer a destruction of their substance. Those things which in the opinion of the common people are believed to perish have not really perished, as the principles of our faith and of the truth alike agree.

Our flesh indeed is considered by the uneducated and by unbelievers to perish so completely after death that nothing whatever of its substance is left. We, however, who believe in its resurrection, know that death only causes a change in it and that its substance certainly persists and is restored to life again at a definite time by the will of its Creator and once more undergoes a transformation; so that what was at first flesh, "of the earth earthy" (cf. 1 Cor 15:47), and was then dissolved through death and again made "dust and ashes" (cf. Gn 18:27),—for "dust thou art," it is written, "and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gn 3:19)—is raised again from the earth and afterwards, as the merits of the "indwelling soul" shall demand, advances to the glory of a "spiritual body" (cf. 1 Cor 15:44).¹³

6. Into this condition, therefore, we must suppose that the entire substance of this body of ours will develop at the time when all things are restored and become one and when "God shall be all in all" (1 Cor 15:28). We must not think, however, that it will happen all of a sudden, but gradually and by degrees, during the lapse of infinite and immeasurable ages, seeing that the improvement and correction will be realized slowly and separately in each individual person. Some will take the lead and hasten with swifter speed to the highest goal, others will follow them at a close interval, while others will be left far behind; and so the process will go on through the innumerable ranks of those who are making progress and becoming reconciled to God from their state of enmity, until it reaches even to the last enemy, who is called death (cf. 1 Cor 15:26),¹⁴ in order that he, too, may be destroyed and remain an enemy no longer.

When therefore all rational souls have been restored to a condition like this, then also the nature of this body of ours will develop into the glory of a "spiritual body" (cf. 1 Cor 15:44). For just as in the case of rational natures we see that there is not one kind which on account of its sins has lived in dishonor and another kind which on account of its merits has been summoned to blessedness, but that these are the same natures, which were formerly sinful and afterwards through being converted and reconciled to God were recalled to blessedness; so, too, in regard to our bodily nature we must understand that there is not one body which we now use in lowliness and corruption and weakness, and a different one which we are to use hereafter in incorruption and power and glory, but that this same body, having cast off the weaknesses of its present existence, will be transformed into a thing of glory and made spiritual, with the result that what was a vessel of dishonor shall itself be purified and become a vessel of honor and a habitation of blessedness (cf. Rom 9:21). And we must believe that in this condition it remains forever unchangeably by the will of the Creator, of which fact we are made certain by the statement of the apostle Paul in which he says, "We have a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor 5:1).

For the faith of the Church does not accept the opinion derived from certain Greek philosophers, that besides this body which is composed of the four elements, there is a fifth body which is entirely other than and diverse from our present body;¹⁵ since we can neither produce from the holy scriptures the least suspicion of such an opinion, nor can its acceptance be allowed as a logical inference, particularly as the holy apostle clearly lays it down that no new bodies are to be given to those who rise from the dead but that they are to receive the same ones which they possessed during life, only transformed from a worse to a better condition. For he says: "It is sown a natural body, it will rise a spiritual body," and, "it is sown in corruption, it will rise in incorruption; it is sown in weakness, it will rise in power; it is sown in dishonor, it will rise in glory" (cf. 1 Cor 15:42-44). As therefore man makes a kind of progress, so that although he is first a "natural man," who does not understand the "things of the Spirit of God," he arrives by means of instruction at the stage of becoming spiritual and of "judging all things while he himself is judged of no man" (1 Cor 2:14, 15); so also in regard to the condition of the body we must suppose that this same body which now on account of its service to the soul is called a soul-like or natural body will "advance through a kind of progress, when the soul has been joined to God and made "one spirit" (cf. 1 Cor 6:17) with him and the body then as it were renders service to the spirit, into a spiritual condition and quality, especially since the bodily nature, as we have often shown, was so made by the Creator that it could easily pass into whatever quality he should wish or the circumstances should demand.¹⁶

7. The whole argument, then, comes to this, that God has created two universal natures, a visible, that is, a bodily one, and an invisible one, which is incorporeal.¹⁷ These two natures each undergo their own different changes. The invisible, which is also the rational nature, is changed through the action of the mind and will by reason of the fact that it has been endowed with freedom of choice; and as a result of this it is found existing sometimes in the good and sometimes in its opposite. The bodily nature, however, admits of a change in substance, so that God the Artificer of all things, in whatever work of design or construction or restoration he may wish to engage, has at hand the service of this material for all purposes, and can transform and transfer it into whatever forms and species he desires, as the merits of things demand. It is to this, clearly, that the prophet points when he says, "God who makes and transforms all things" (Am 5:8 [LXX]).

8. And now we must certainly ask whether in the consummation of all things, when "God shall be all in all" (cf. 1 Cor 15:28), the whole of bodily nature will consist of one species and whether the only quality of body will be that which will shine with that unspeakable glory which we must believe will belong to the spiritual body. Now if we interpret correctly the passage which Moses writes in the forefront of his book, namely, "In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth" (Gn 1:1), as referring to the beginning of the entire creation, it is appropriate that the end and consummation of all things should consist of a return to this beginning;¹⁸ that is, that the heaven and earth there spoken of should exist as a dwelling place and rest for the pious, so that the saints and the meek may be the first to obtain an inheritance in that earth (cf. Dt 4:38; Ps 37:11; Mt 5:4; Heb 4:9);¹⁹ for this is the teaching of both the law and the prophets and the gospel. In that earth there exists, I believe, the true and living forms of that divine service which Moses handed down through the "shadow" of the law (cf. Heb 10:1). For it is said of them, that is, of those who served under the law, that "they serve that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things" (Heb 8:5). Moreover it was said to Moses himself, "See that thou make all things according to the form and likeness which was shown thee in the mount" (Ex 25:40). It seems to me, therefore, that as in this earth the law was a kind of schoolmaster to those who by it were appointed to be led to Christ (cf. Gal 3:24) and to be instructed and trained in order that after their training in the law they might be able with greater facility to receive the more perfect precepts of Christ, so also that other earth, when it receives all the saints, first imbues and educates them in the precepts of the true and eternal law in order that they may with greater facility accept the precepts of heaven which are perfect and to which nothing can ever be added. And in heaven will truly exist what is called the "eternal gospel" and the testament that is always new, which can never grow old (cf. Rv 14:6; Heb 9:15, 12:24, 8:13).

9. This, then, is how we must suppose that events happen in the consummation and restitution of all things, namely, that souls, advancing and ascending little by little in due measure and order, first attain to that other earth and the instruction that is in it, and are there prepared for those better precepts to which nothing can ever be added. For in the place of "stewards" and "governors" (cf. Gal 4:2) Christ the Lord, who is King of all, will himself take over the kingdom; that is, he himself will instruct those who are able to receive him in his character of wisdom, after their preliminary training in the holy virtues, and will reign in them until such time as he subjects them to the Father who subjected all things to him;²⁰ or in other words, when they have been rendered capable of receiving God, then God will be to them "all in all." It follows of necessity that then even their bodily nature will assume that supreme condition to which nothing can ever be added.²¹

So far, then, we have discussed the question of our bodily nature and of the spiritual body. We leave it to the reader's judgment to choose which of the two opinions he decides to be the better. For our part we shall here bring the third book to a conclusion.

BOOK IV

Chapter I

THE DIVINE INSPIRATION OF THE SCRIPTURES¹

Greek

1. Now in our investigation of these important matters we do not rest satisfied with common opinions and the evidence of things that are seen, but we use in addition, for the manifest proof of our statements, testimonies drawn from the scriptures which we believe to be divine, both from what is called the Old Testament and also from the New, endeavoring to confirm our faith by reason. We have not yet, however, discussed the divine character of the scriptures. Well then, let us deal in a brief manner with a few points concerning them, bringing forward in

Latin

1. Now since in our discussion of these great and important subjects it is not sufficient to leave the conclusion of the matter to human opinions and the common understanding and, so to speak, to pronounce on things invisible through visible means, we must take into account, for the proof of these statements of ours, the testimonies of the divine scriptures. And in order that these testimonies may carry an assured and indubitable conviction both in regard to what we are about to say and in regard to what we have said already, it seems this connection the reasons that influence us to regard them as divine writings. And first of all, before we make use of statements from the writings themselves and from the events disclosed in them, let us speak of Moses, the Hebrew lawgiver, and of Jesus Christ, the introducer of the saving doctrines of Christianity.

For although there have been very many lawgivers among both Greeks and barbarians, and teachers who proclaimed doctrines which professed to be the truth, we have no record of a lawgiver who has succeeded in implanting an enthusiasm for the acceptance of his teachings among nations other than his own. A great apparatus of supposed logical proof has been introduced by men who profess that their philosophy is concerned with necessary first of all to show that the scriptures themselves are divine, that is, are inspired by the Spirit of God. We shall therefore set our seal to this proposition in as brief a manner as we can by quoting from the divine scriptures themselves the passages that chiefly influence us, that is, first the passages from Moses the lawgiver of the Hebrew people, and then from the words of Jesus Christ, the author and leader of the Christian religion and doctrine.

For although there have been very many lawgivers among both Greeks and barbarians, as well as innumerable teachers or philosophers who professed that they taught the truth, we remember no lawgiver who has succeeded in instilling into the minds of foreign nations a desire and enthusiasm either to adopt his laws voluntarily or to defend them whole-heartedly. Nor has anyone succeeded in introducing and implanting what he truth, and yet none of them has succeeded in implanting what he regarded as the truth among different nations or even among any number of persons worth mentioning in a single nation.

Yet it would have been the wish of the lawgivers to put in force the laws which appeared to them to be good among the whole race of mankind, had that been possible; while the teachers would have wished that what they imagined was the truth should be spread everywhere throughout the world. But knowing that they could not summon men of other languages and of many nations to the observance of their laws and the acceptance of their teachings they wholly refrained even from attempting to do this, considering not unwisely how impossible it was that such a result should happen to them. Yet all over Greece and in the barbarian part of our world there are thousands of enthusiasts regarded as the truth among, I will not say many other foreign nations, but even among the people of a single nation, in such a way so to cause a knowledge of and belief in it to extend to all.

Yet we cannot doubt that the lawgivers would have wished their laws to be observed by all men, had that been possible; while the teachers would have wished that what they regarded as the truth should become known to all. But knowing that this was altogether impossible and that they did not possess the enormous influence that was necessary to summon men of foreign nations to the observance of their laws and teachings they did not venture to make the least attempt at this, for fear lest an ineffective and futile effort to do so should stamp their conduct with folly. Yet all over the world, in the whole of Greece and in every foreign nation, there are innumerable people who have abandoned their ancestral who have abandoned their ancestral laws and their recognized gods for observance of the laws of Moses and of the teaching contained in the words of Jesus Christ, in spite of the fact that those who submit to the law of Moses are hated by the worshippers of images and that those who accept the word of Jesus Christ are not only hated but in danger of death.²

2. Now if we consider how in a very few years, although those who profess Christianity are persecuted and some are put to death on account of it while others suffer the loss of their possessions, yet the word has been able, in spite of the fewness of its teachers, to be "preached everywhere in the world" (cf. Mt 24:14) so that Greeks and barbarians, wise and foolish (cf. Rom 1:14) have adopted the religion of Jesus, we shall laws and their recognized gods and have submitted themselves to the observance of the law of Moses and to the discipleship and worship of Christ, and this in spite of the fact that an intense hatred has been aroused against them by those who worship images, to such an extent that they are often subjected to tortures at the hands of these men and sometimes even led to death. Nevertheless they embrace and guard with all affection the word of Christ's teaching.²

2. Now we can see how in a short time this religion has grown up, making progress through the persecution and death of its adherents and through their endurance of confiscation of property and every kind of torture. And this is particularly wonderful since its teachers themselves are neither very skillful nor very numerous. For in spite of all, this word is "preached in all the world" (cf. Mt 24:14) so that Greeks and not hesitate to say that this achievement is more than human, remembering that Jesus taught with all authority and convincing power that his word should prevail (cf. Mk 13:31).

Consequently we may reasonably regard as oracles those utterances of his such as, "Ye shall be brought before kings and governors for my sake, for a testimony to them and to the Gentiles" (Mt 10:18; Mk 13:9); and...³ "Many shall say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, did we not eat in thy name and drink in thy name and in thy name cast out daemons? And I shall say unto them, Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity; I never knew you" (Mt 7:22, 23; Lk 13:26). Now there was once a possibility that in uttering these words he was talking idly, because they were not true; but when words spoken barbarians, wise and foolish (cf. Rom 1:14) now adopt the Christian religion. Hence there can be no doubt that it is not by human strength or resources that the word of Christ comes to prevail with all authority and convincing power in the minds and hearts of all men.

Moreover it is plain that this result was predicted by him and established by the divine oracles he uttered, as when he says, "Ye shall be brought before governors and rulers for my sake, for a testimony to them and to the gentiles" (Mt 10:18; Mk 13:9); and again, "This gospel shall be preached to all nations" (Mt 24:14); and also, "Many shall say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not eaten and drunk in thy name, and in thy name cast out daemons? And I shall say unto them, Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity; I never knew you" (Mt 7:22, 23; Lk 13:26). Now if these words had been spoken by him and with such authority have come to pass it shows that God has really become man and delivered to men the doctrines of salvation.

Latin

had not come to the predicted fulfillment they might have appeared to be scarcely true and to possess no authority; but now, since the events which were predicted by him do come to pass, and since they were predicted with so great power and authority, it is most plainly shown that he is really God who has become man and has delivered to men the precepts of salvation.

3. And what need is there to say also that it was predicted that those who are called "rulers" "shall fail from Judah and the leaders from his thighs, when he shall come for whom it"—that is, clearly, the kingdom—"is reserved," and when "the expectation of the gentiles shall dwell here" (cf. Gn 49:10 [LXX]). For it is abundantly clear, from history and from what we see at the present day that after the times of Jesus there were no longer any who were called kings of the Jews, and that all those Jewish customs on which

3. And what are we to say of this, that the prophets have predicted beforehand of him that "rulers shall not fail from Judah nor leaders from his thighs, until he shall come for whom it"—that is, clearly, the kingdom—"is reserved," and "until the expectation of the gentiles shall come" (cf. Gn 49:10 [LXX]). For it is abundantly clear from history and from what we see at the present day that after the times of Christ kings have not existed among the Jews.

Moreover all those Jewish ceremonies of which they boasted so much and on they prided themselves, I mean those connected with the temple and the altar and the performance of worship and the garments of the high priest, have been destroyed.⁴ For the prophecy has been fulfilled which says, "The children of Israel shall sit for many days without king or ruler, without sacrifice or altar or priesthood or oracles" (Hos 3:4).

Now we use these sayings as an answer to those who, in regard to the difficulty arising from the words in Genesis spoken by Jacob to Judah, say that the Ethnarch,⁵ who comes from the tribe of Judah, is the ruler of the people, and that men of his seed will not fail until the advent of the Christ as they picture him. For if "the children of Israel shall sit for many days without king or ruler, without sacrifice or altar or priesthood or oracles" (Hos 3:4) and if from which they prided themselves, that is, those connected with the adorning of the temple and the decorations of the altar and all those sacerdotal fillets and the garments of the high priests were destroyed at one blow.⁴ For the prophecy has been fulfilled which said, "The children of Israel shall sit for many days without king, without ruler; there shall be neither sacrifice nor altar nor priesthood nor oracles" (Hos 3:4).

Now we use these sayings as evidence against those who apparently maintain that what is said by Jacob in Genesis is said of Judah, and who declared that there remains to this day a ruler who comes from the tribe of Judah, that is to say, that person who is the ruler of the Jewish nation and whom they call the Patriarch, and, they add, men of his seed cannot fail to continue until the advent of that Christ whom they picture to themselves. But if what the prophet says is true, that "the children the time the temple was razed to the ground there has been "neither sacrifice nor altar nor priesthood," it is clear that a ruler has "failed from Judah and a leader from his thighs." And when the prophecy says, "A ruler shall not fail from Judah nor a leader from his thighs until there shall come what is reserved for him" (Gn 49:10)⁶ it is clear that he has come for whom are the things reserved, that is, he who is the expectation of the gentiles. This is evident from the number of gentiles who through Christ have believed in God.

4. And in the song in Deuteronomy it is prophetically revealed that there shall be an election of foolish nations on account of the sins of God's former people; which has come to pass of Israel shall sit for many days without king, without ruler; neither shall there be sacrifice nor altar nor priesthood" (Hos 3:4), and if certainly from the time the temple was overthrown no sacrifices have been offered nor has an altar been found there nor a priesthood existed, then it is quite clear that rulers have "failed from Judah," as it was written, "and a leader from his thighs, until he comes for whom it was reserved" (Gn 49:10).⁶ It is evident, then, that he has come, "for whom it was reserved," he in whom also is "the expectation of the gentiles." This seems plainly to have been fulfilled in the multitude of those who from different gentile nations have through Christ believed in God.

4. Moreover in the song in Deuteronomy it is prophetically revealed that there shall be an election of a foolish nation on account of the sins of God's former people; which election is certainly through no other than Jesus. For it says: "They moved me to jealousy with that which is not God; they have provoked me to anger with their idols; and I will move them to jealousy with that which is not a nation, and with a foolish nation I will provoke them to anger" (Dt 32:21). Now it can be very clearly perceived in what manner the Hebrews, who are said to have moved God to jealousy with that which is not God and to have provoked him to anger with their idols, have themselves been provoked to anger and jealousy with that which is not a nation, and with a "foolish nation," which God chose through the advent of Christ Jesus and his disciples.

We see, then, our calling, that "not many wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called; but God chose the foolish things of the world, that he might put to shame them that are wise; and the base things and the things that are despised none other than that which has come to pass through Christ. For it speaks thus: "They have provoked me to anger with their idols, and I will move them to jealousy; with a foolish nation I will stir them to anger" (Dt 32:21). Now it can be very clearly perceived in what manner the Hebrews, who are said to have moved God to anger with those that are no gods and to have provoked him with their idols, have themselves been provoked to anger and jealousy by a "foolish nation," which God chose through the advent of Christ Jesus and his disciples.

For the apostle speaks as follows: "Ye see your calling, brethren, that not many among you are wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble; but God chose the foolish things of the world and those which are not, that he might destroy did God choose, yea, and the things that are not, that he might bring to nought those things that were before them." So let not "Israel after the flesh," which is called by the apostle "flesh," "glory before God" (1 Cor 1:26–29, 10:18).

5. And what need is there to speak of the prophecies relating to Christ in the Psalms, in which a certain ode is headed "For the beloved," whose tongue is said to be the "pen of a ready writer" who is "fairer than the children of men" because "grace was poured on his lips" (Ps 45:1–3)?⁷ Now a proof that "grace was poured on his lips" is the fact that although the time he spent in teaching was short—for he taught only about a year and a few months⁸—the world has been filled with this teaching and with the religion that came through him. For there has arisen "in his days" "righteousness and an abundance of peace" lasting until the consummation, which is those things that were before them." Therefore let not Israel after the "flesh"—for so is Israel called by the apostle—"glory"; let "no flesh," I say, "glory before God" (1 Cor 1:26–29, 10:18).

5. What must we say, moreover, of the prophecies relating to Christ in the Psalms, and particularly in that one which is headed "A song for the beloved," where it is said that his tongue is the "pen of a ready writer" who is "fairer than the children of men" because "grace was poured on his lips" (Ps 45:1–3)?⁷ Now a proof that "grace was poured on his lips" is the fact that although the time he spent in teaching was short—for he taught but a year and a few months⁸—nevertheless the whole world has been filled with his teaching and religious faith. For there has arisen "in his days" "righteousness and an abundance of peace" lasting until the end, here called the "taking away of the moon"; and he continues to "have dominion from sea to sea and from the rivers to the ends of the earth" (cf. Ps 72:7, 8). And a "sign" has been given to the house of David, for "the virgin" did "conceive and bear a son," and his name is "Emmanuel," which means "God with us" (Is 7:14; Mt 1:23).

There has also been fulfilled that which the same prophet says, "God is with us. Know it, ye nations, and be overcome; ye that are strong, be overcome" (Is 8:8, 9 [LXX]). For we who have been captured from among the nations have been overcome and conquered by the grace of His word. Moreover the place of his birth is foretold in Micah. "And thou, Bethlehem," it says, "land of Judah, art in no way least among the rulers of Judah; for out of thee shall come a governor, who shall shepherd my people Israel" (Mt 2:6; Mi which end is called the "taking away of the moon"; and he has "dominion from sea even to sea and from the river even to the ends of the earth" (cf. Ps 72:7, 8). And a sign also has been given to the house of David; for "the virgin" has "conceived in the womb and has borne Emmanuel," which means, "God is with us" (Is 7:14; Mt 1:23).

There has also been fulfilled that which the same prophet says, "God is with us. Know it ye nations, and be overcome" (Is 8:8, 9 [LXX]). For we have been overcome and conquered, we who come from the nations and are as it were the spoils of his victory, we who have bowed our necks to the yoke of his grace. Moreover the place of his birth is foretold in the prophet Micah, who says; "And thou, Bethlehem, land of Judah, art in no way least among the rulers of Judah; for out of thee shall come a governor, who shall rule my people Israel" (Mt 2:6; Mi 5:2).

Greek

5:2). And the "seventy weeks" until the coming of Christ the governor were fulfilled in accordance with Daniel's prophecy (cf. Dn 9:24). He, too, has come who according to Job has "subdued the great fish" (Jb 3:8 [LXX]) and who has given to his true disciples authority to "tread on serpents and scorpions and over every power of the enemy," without being in any way harmed by them (cf. Lk 10:19).

Let anyone also consider how the apostles who were sent by Jesus to preach the gospel sojourned everywhere, and he will see that their daring venture was not merely human and that the command was from God. And if we examine how, when people heard the new teachings and strange words, they welcomed these men, the desire to plot against them being frustrated by some divine power that watched over them, we shall not refuse to Further, the weeks of years until the coming of Christ the governor, which Daniel the prophet foretold, have been fulfilled (cf. Dn 9:24). He, too, has come who was foretold by Job to be about to "destroy the huge beast" (Jb 3:8 [LXX]) and who also gave to his personal disciples authority to "tread on serpents and scorpions and over every power of the enemy," without being in any way harmed by them (cf. Lk 10:19).

And if anyone will consider the journeyings of Christ's apostles through all the various places in which they were sent by him to preach the gospel, he will find that what they ventured to undertake was beyond the power of man and that their success in having accomplished what they ventured upon is from God. If we consider how, when people heard that a new teaching was being introduced by these men, they were able to receive them, or rather how while believe that they even worked miracles, "God bearing witness with their words, and through signs and wonders and manifold powers" (cf. Heb 2:4; Acts 5:12).

6. Now when we thus briefly demonstrate the divine nature of Jesus and use the words spoken in prophecy about him, we demonstrate at the same time that the writings which prophecy about him are divinely inspired and that the words which announce his sojourning here and his teaching were spoken with all power and authority and that this is the reason why they have prevailed over the elect people taken from among the nations. And we must add that it was after the advent of Jesus that the inspiration of the prophetic words often desiring to destroy them they were restrained by some divine power that was present with them, we shall find that in this matter nothing was wrought by human strength but all by divine power and providence, "signs and powers manifest beyond all doubt bearing witness to their word and teaching" (cf. Heb 2:4; Acts 5:12).

6. Now that we have briefly demonstrated these points, namely, the deity of Jesus Christ and the fulfillment of all those prophecies that were spoken about him, it is, I think, also proved at the same time that the writings themselves which have prophesied about him were divinely inspired, those which foretold either his advent or the power of his teaching or the ingathering of all the nations. To which must also be added the following, that the divine nature and inspiration both of the oracles of the prophets and of the law of Moses has been specially brought and the spiritual nature of Moses's law came to light. For before the advent of Christ it was not at all possible to bring forward clear proofs of the divine inspiration of the old scriptures. But the advent of Jesus led those who might have suspected that the law and the prophets were not divine to the clear conviction that they were composed by the aid of heavenly grace.

And he who approaches the prophetic words with care and attention will feel from his very reading a trace of their divine inspiration and will be convinced by his own feelings that the words which are believed by us to be from God are not the compositions of men. Now the light which was contained within the law of Moses, but was hidden away under a veil, shone forth at the advent of Jesus, to light and proved since the time when Christ came into this world. For before the predictions made by these were fulfilled, although they were true and inspired by God, still they could not be shown to be true because they were not yet proved to have come to pass; but the advent of Christ proclaimed the truth and divine inspiration of what had been spoken, whereas before it would certainly have been considered doubtful whether the issue of what had been predicted would come to pass.

Further, if any one ponders over the prophetic sayings with all the attention and reverence they deserve, it is certain that in the very act of reading and diligently studying them his mind and feelings will be touched by a divine breath and he will recognize that the words he is reading are not the utterances of man but the language of God; and so he will perceive from his own experience that these books have been

when the veil was taken away and there came at once to men's knowledge those "good things" of which the letter of the law held a "shadow" (cf. 2 Cor 3:15, 16; Heb 10:1).

7. It would be a long business if we were to record at this point the ancient prophecies relating to every future event, in order that the doubter might be struck by their divine origin and, putting away all hesitation and indecision, might devote himself with his whole soul to the words of God. But if in every passage of the scriptures the superhuman element of the thought does not appear obvious to the uninstructed, that is no wonder. For in composed not by human art or mortal eloquence but, if I may so speak, in a style that is divine. The splendor of Christ's advent has, therefore, by illuminating the law of Moses with the brightness of the truth, withdrawn the veil which had covered the letter of the law and has disclosed, for everyone who believes in him, all those "good things" which lay concealed within (cf. 2 Cor 3:15, 16; Heb 10:1).

7. It would be a matter of considerable labor if we were to record the time and manner in which every event predicted of old by the prophets has been fulfilled, in the hope that we might thereby confirm those who are in doubt; although it is possible for anyone who desires more accurate knowledge about these things to gather proofs in abundance from the books of the truth themselves. But if at first sight of the letter the superhuman meaning does not at once appear obvious to regard to the works of that providence which controls the whole world, while some show themselves most plainly to be works of providence, others are so obscure as to appear to afford grounds for disbelief in the God who with unspeakable skill and power superintends the universe.

The skillful plan of the providential ruler is not so clear in things on earth as it is in regard to the sun and moon and stars, and not so plain in the events that happen to men as it is in regard to the souls and bodies of animals, where the purpose and reason of the impulses, the mental images and the natures they possess and the structures of their bodies are accurately discovered by those who investigate these matters.

Latin

those who have been but little instructed in divine things, that is no wonder; because divine things are communicated to men somewhat obscurely and are the more hidden in proportion to the unbelief or unworthiness of the inquirer. For while it is certain that everything which exists or happens in this world is arranged by the providence of God, there are some things which show themselves quite plainly to be subject to the control of providence, whereas others evolve in a manner so obscure and so hard to understand that in their case the plan of divine providence is utterly concealed. The result is that occasionally there are some who disbelieve that certain things have any connection with providence, since the plan on which the works of divine providence are arranged with unspeakable skill is hidden from them; although this plan is not equally concealed in regard to all things. Moreover among men themselves it is pondered over less by one and more by another, while the inhabitant of heaven, whoever he may be, knows more of it than any man on the earth.⁹ And the plan of bodies is apparent to us in one way, that of trees in another, while that of souls, in yet another way, is concealed from us. In what manner, too, the divine movements of rational minds are ordered by divine providence is to a large extent hidden from men, and not a little, in my opinion, from the angels also.

But just as divine providence is not proved to be a fiction, particularly for those who are convinced of its existence, because its workings and arrangements are beyond the comprehension of human minds, so neither will the divine inspiration of holy scripture, which extends through its entire body, be supposed to be nonexistent because the weakness of our understanding cannot discover the deep and hidden thoughts in every sentence; for the treasure of divine wisdom is concealed in vessels of poor and humble words, as the apostle points out when he says: "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the greatness of the divine power may shine forth the more" (2 Cor 4:7), when no taint of human eloquence is mingled with the truth of the doctrines. For if our books had attracted men to belief because they were composed with rhetorical skill or with philosophical cleverness, our faith would undoubtedly have been supposed to rest in the skillful use of words and in human wisdom, and not in the power of God (1 Cor 2:5). But now it is well known to all that "the word of this preaching" has been so accepted by multitudes in almost the whole world that they have realized that their belief rests "not in persuasive words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power" (cf. 1 Cor 2:4).

meditation Since therefore we have been drawn by a celestial, nay, by an even super-celestial power, to faith and trust, for this purpose, that we may worship the only Creator of all things as our God, let us also endeavor to strive earnestly to "leave behind the doctrine of the first principles of Christ," which are the elementary principles of knowledge, and to "press on to perfection" (cf. Heb 6:1), that that wisdom which is delivered to the perfect may be delivered also to us. For such is the promise of him to whom the preaching of this wisdom was committed, and who says, "Howbeit we speak wisdom among the perfect, yet a wisdom not of this world nor of the rulers of this world, who are to come to nought" (cf. 1 Cor 2:6). By this he shows that our wisdom, so far as concerns polished language, has nothing in common with the wisdom of this world. This wisdom, therefore, will be the more clearly and perfectly inscribed in our hearts, if it is made known to us "according to the revelation of the mystery which hath been hidden through times eternal, but now is manifested through the scriptures of the prophets" and "through the coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," to whom is the glory forever and ever. Amen (cf. Rom 16:25-27; 2 Tm 1:10; 1 Tm 6:14).

Chapter II

MANY, NOT UNDERSTANDING THE SCRIPTURES SPIRITUALLY, AND INTERPRETING THEM ERRONEOUSLY, HAVE FALLEN INTO HERESIES

Greek

1. Now that we have spoken cursorily about the inspiration of the divine scriptures it is necessary to discuss the manner in which they are to be read and understood, since many mistakes have been made in consequence of the method by which the holy documents ought to be interpreted not having been discovered by the multitude. For the hard-hearted and ignorant members of the circumcision have refused to believe in our Savior because

Latin

1. Now that we have dealt, therefore, with this point, that the divine scriptures were inspired by the Holy Spirit, it appears necessary also to explain how some men have involved themselves in numerous errors through not reading or understanding them aright, because the method by which we should approach the interpretation of the divine writings is unknown to the multitude. For the Jews, owing to their hardness of heart and their they think that they are keeping closely to the language of the prophecies that relate to him, and they see that he did not literally "proclaim release to captives" or build what they consider to be a real "city of God" or "cut off the chariots from Ephraim and the horse from Jerusalem" or "eat butter and honey, and choose the good before he knew or preferred the evil" (cf. Is 61:1, Lk 4:19; Ps 46:4; Ez 48:15ff.; Zec 9:10; Is 7:15).

context

Further, they think that it is the wolf, the four-footed animal, which is said in prophecy to be going to "feed with the lamb, and the leopard to lie down with the kid, and the calf and bull and lion to feed together, led by a little child, and the ox and the bear to pasture together, desire to appear wise in their own sight, have refused to believe in our Lord and Savior because they suppose that the prophecies that relate to him must be understood literally, that is, that he ought actually and visibly to have "proclaimed release to captives," and that he ought to have at once built a city such as they think the "city of God" really is, and at the same time to have "cut off the chariots from Ephraim and the horse from Jerusalem," and also to have eaten "butter and honey" and "chosen the good before he knew how to prefer the evil" (cf. Is 61:1; Lk 4:19; Ps 46:4; Ez 48:15ff.; Zec 9:10; Is 7:15).

Latin

Further, they think that it is the wolf, the four-footed animal, of which it is prophesied that at the coming of Christ it must "feed with lambs, and the leopard lie down with the kids, and the calf and the bull feed with lions and be led to their pastures by a little child, their young ones growing up with each other, and the lion to eat straw like the ox" (cf. Is 11:6, 7); and having seen none of these events literally happening during the advent of him whom we believe to be Christ they did not accept our Lord Jesus, but crucified him on the ground that he had wrongly called himself Christ.

And the members of the heretical sects, reading the passage, "A fire has been kindled in mine anger" (Dt 32:22; Jer 15:14); and "I am a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation" (Ex 20:5); and "It repenteth me that I and the ox and the bear lie down together in the green fields and their young ones be brought up side by side, and lions to stand at stalls with oxen and feed on straw" (cf. Is 11:6, 7). Seeing, then, that there was no fulfillment in history of all these things which were prophesied of him and in which they believed that the signs of the advent of Christ were specially to be observed, they refused to acknowledge the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ; nay, contrary to all right and justice, that is, contrary to the faith of prophecy, they nailed him to the cross for assuming for himself, the name of Christ.

Then again the heretics, reading in the law, "A fire has been kindled in my anger" (Dt 32:22; Jer 15:14); and "I am a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation" (Ex 20:5); and "It repenteth me that I have anointed Saul to have anointed Saul to be king" (1 Sm 15:11); and "I, God, make peace and create evil" (Is 45:7); and elsewhere, "There is no evil in a city, which the Lord did not do" (Am 3:6); and further, "Evils came down from the Lord upon the gates of Jerusalem" (Mi 1:12); and "An evil spirit from the Lord troubled Saul" (1 Sm 18:10); and ten thousand other passages like these, have not dared to disbelieve that they are the writings of God, but believe them to belong to the Creator, whom the Jews worship.¹ Consequently they think that since the Creator is imperfect and not good, the Savior came here to proclaim a more perfect God who they say is not the Creator, and about whom they entertain diverse opinions. Then having once fallen away from the Creator, who is the sole unbegotten God, they have given themselves up to fictions, fashioning mythical hypotheses according to which they suppose that there

For they think that the Savior came here to proclaim to us a more perfect God, who they say is not the Creator of the world, and about whom they entertain diverse opinions; since having once fallen away from their faith in God the Creator, who is the God of all, they have given themselves up to various fictions and fables, are some things that are seen and others that are not seen, all of which are the fancies of their own minds.

Moreover, even the simpler of those who claim to belong to the Church, while believing indeed that there is none greater than the Creator, in which they are right, yet believe such things about him as would not be believed of the most savage and unjust of men.

2. Now the reason why all those we have mentioned hold false opinions and make impious or ignorant assertions about God appears to be nothing else but this, that scripture is not understood in its spiritual sense, but is interpreted according to the bare letter. On this account we must explain to those who believe that the sacred books inventing false opinions and saying that there are certain visible things made by one power and certain invisible things created by another power, just as they are led by the fancy and vanity of their own minds.

Moreover some of the simpler of those who appear to remain within the faith of the Church, while holding that there is none greater than the Creator God, in which they maintain a right and sound opinion, yet believe such things about him as would not be believed even of the most unjust and savage of men.

2. Now the reason why those we have mentioned above have a false apprehension of all these matters is nothing else but this, that the holy scripture is not understood by them in its spiritual sense, but according to the sound of the letter. On this account we shall try to demonstrate, so far as our moderate ability will are not the works of men, but that they were composed and have come down to us as a result of the inspiration of the Holy Spirit by the will of the Father of the universe through Jesus Christ, what are the methods of interpretation that appear right to us, who keep to the rule of the heavenly Church of Jesus Christ through the succession from the Apostles.

That there are certain mystical revelations made known through the divine scriptures is believed by all, even by the simplest of those who are adherents of the word; but what these revelations are, fair-minded and humble men confess that they do not know. If, for instance, an inquirer were to be in a difficulty, about the intercourse of Lot with his

That there are certain mystical revelations made known through the holy scriptures is admitted, I think, by all, even by the simpler kind of believers; but what these revelations are, or of what nature they are, any man who is fair-minded and not possessed by the vice of boasting will reverently confess that he does not know. If, for instance, we are asked daughters (cf. Gn 19:30ff.), or the two wives of Abraham (cf. Gn 16), or the two sisters married to Jacob (cf. Gn 29:21ff.), or the two handmaids who bore children by him (Gn 30:1-13), they can say nothing except that these things are mysteries not understood by us.

But when the passage about the equipment of the tabernacle is read (cf. Ex 25ff.), believing that the things described therein are types, they seek for ideas which they can attach to each detail that is mentioned in connection with the tabernacle. Now so far as concerns their belief that the tabernacle is a type of something they are not wrong; but in rightly attaching the word of scripture to the particular idea of which the tabernacle is a type, here they Gn 16), or the two sisters who were married to Jacob (cf. Gn 29:21ff.), or the two handmaids who increased the number of his sons (Gn 30:1-13), what else can we reply than that these are sacraments and figures of spiritual things but that we are ignorant of their precise nature?

When, moreover, we read of the equipment of the tabernacle (cf. Ex 25ff.), we hold it as certain that the things described therein are figures of some hidden realities, but to attach them to their appropriate meanings and to bring to light and discuss each separate detail is, I think, a very difficult, not to say impossible task. However, as I said, it does not escape even the common intellect that that description is full of mysteries. And all those narratives which appear to be sometimes fall into error. And they declare that all narratives that are supposed to speak about marriage or the begetting of children or wars or any other stories whatever that may be accepted among the multitude are types; but when we ask, of what, then sometimes owing to the lack of thorough training, sometimes owing to rashness, and occasionally, even when one is well trained and of sound judgment, owing to man's exceedingly great difficulty in discovering these things, the interpretation of every detail is not altogether clear.

not clear

OT 3. And what must we say about the prophecies, which we all know are filled with composed about marriages or the begetting of children or different kinds of battles or any other stories whatever, what else can we believe them to be but the forms and figures of hidden and sacred things? But either because men pay too little attention to the training of their mind, or because they think they already know before they learn, the consequence is that they never begin to know; otherwise if neither earnestness is lacking, nor a master, and if these questions are studied as befits divine, and not merely human matters, that is, in a reverent and pious spirit, and as questions that we hope will in most cases be made clear by the revelation of God, since to human sense they are exceedingly difficult and obscure, then, perhaps, he who thus seeks will at last find all that it is lawful for us to find.

Latin

3. But it may possibly be supposed that this difficulty belongs only to the prophetic difficult

riddles and dark sayings? (cf. Prv 1:6).² Or if we come to the gospels, the accurate interpretation even of these, since it is an interpretation of the mind of Christ, demands that grace that was given to him who said, "We have the mind of Christ, that we may know the things that were freely given to us by God. Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth" (1 Cor 2:16, 12, 13). And who, on reading the revelations made to John, could fail to be amazed at the deep obscurity of the unspeakable mysteries contained therein, which are evident even to him who does not understand what is written? And as for the apostolic epistles, what man who is skilled in literary interpretation would think them to be plain and easily understood, when even in them there are thousands of passages that provide, as if through a window, a narrow opening writings, seeing it is certain to all of us that the prophetic style is everywhere sprinkled with figures and riddles (cf. Prv 1:6).² What, then, when we come to the gospels? Is there not also hidden in them an inner meaning which is the Lord's meaning, and which is only revealed through the grace that was given to him who said, "We have the mind of Christ, that we may know the things that were freely given to us by God. Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth" (1 Cor 2:16, 12, 13). And who indeed, on reading the revelations made to John, could fail to be amazed at the deep obscurity of the unspeakable mysteries contained therein? For even those who cannot understand what is concealed in these writings yet understand clearly that something is concealed there. And as for the apostolic epistles, which to some appear to be simpler, leading to multitudes of the deepest thoughts?

Latin

Seeing, therefore, that these things are so, and that thousands of men make mistakes, it is dangerous for us when we read to declare lightly that we understand things for which the "key of knowledge" is necessary, which the Savior says is with "the lawyers" (cf. Lk 11:52). And as for those who are unwilling to admit that these men held the truth before the coming of Christ, let them explain to us how it is that our Lord Jesus Christ says that the "key of knowledge" was with them, that is, with men who as these objectors say, had no books containing the secrets of knowledge and the all-perfect mysteries.³ For the passage runs as follows:

Latin

are they not filled with deep meaning, so that men who can understand the inner meaning of divine wisdom seem through them, as if through some narrow opening, to be flooded with the brightness of immeasurable light?

Seeing, therefore, that these things are so, and that there are many who in this life make mistakes, I do not think that anyone can without danger declare that he knows or understands those things for the opening of which the "key of knowledge" is necessary, which key the Savior said was with those "learned in the law" (cf. Lk 11:52). And at this point, though by a slight digression, I think we should ask those who tell us that before the coming of the Savior the truth did not rest with those who were trained in the law, how it is that our Lord Jesus Christ says that the "keys of knowledge" were with those who had in their hands the

"Woe unto you lawyers, for ye have taken away the key of knowledge. Ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered" (Lk 11:52).

4. The right way, therefore, as it appears to us, of approaching the scriptures and gathering their meaning, is the following, which is extracted from the writings themselves. We find some such rule as this laid down by Solomon in the Proverbs concerning the divine doctrines written therein: "Do thou portray them threefold in counsel and knowledge, that thou mayest answer words of truth to those who question thee" (Prv 22:20, 21).

One must therefore portray the meaning of the sacred writings in a threefold way upon one's own soul, so that books of the law and the prophets. For the Lord spoke as follows: "Woe to you, doctors of the law, for ye have taken away the key of knowledge. Ye entered not in yourselves, and them that wished to enter in ye hindered" (Lk 11:52).

4. But, as we had begun to say, the right way, as it appears to us, of understanding the scriptures and investigating their meaning, is the following; for indeed we are taught out of scripture itself how we ought to think of it. We find some such rule as this laid down in the Proverbs of Solomon concerning the examination of divine scripture. "Do thou," it says, "portray these things to thyself threefold in counsel and knowledge, so that thou mayest answer words of truth to those who question thee" (Prv 22:20, 21).

Each one must therefore portray the meaning of the divine writings in a threefold way upon his own soul; that ① the simple man may be edified by what we may call the flesh of the scripture, this name being given to the obvious interpretation; while the man who has made some progress may be edified by its soul, as it were; and the man who is perfect and like those mentioned by the apostle: "We speak wisdom among" the perfect; yet a wisdom not of this world, nor of the rulers of this world, which are coming to nought; but we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden, which God foreordained before the worlds unto our glory" (1 Cor 2:6, 7)—this man may be edified by the spiritual law (cf. Rom 7:14), which has "a shadow of the good things to come" (cf. Heb 10:1). For just as man consists of body, soul and spirit, so in the same way does the scripture, which has been prepared by God to be given for man's salvation.

Rom 7:14); which has "a shadow of the good things to come" (cf. Heb 10:1), as if by the Spirit. We therefore read in this light the passage in The Shepherd, a book which is despised by some, where Hermas is bidden to "write two books," and after this to "announce to the presbyters of the Church" what he has learned from the Spirit. This is the wording: "Thou shalt write two books, and shalt give one to Clement and one to Grapte. And Grapte shall admonish the widows and the orphans. But Clement shall send to the cities without, and thou shalt announce to the presbyters of the Church."⁴

Now Grapte, who admonishes the widows and orphans, is the bare letter, which admonishes those child souls that are not yet able to enroll God as their Father and are on this account called orphans, and which also admonishes those who while no longer associating with been bestowed by the divine bounty for man's salvation.

It is this fact that we believe to be referred to in the book called The Shepherd, which apparently is despised by some, in the passage where Hermas is bidden to "write two books," and after this to "announce to the presbyters of the Church" what he has learned from the Spirit. It is written in these words: "Thou shalt write two books, and shalt give one to Clement and one to Grapte. And Grapte shall admonish the widows and the orphans, but Clement is to send through all the cities that are without, and thou shalt announce to the presbyters of the Church."⁴

Now Grapte, who is bidden to admonish the orphans and widows, is the bare meaning of the letter, by which child souls, who have not yet deserved to have God for their Father and are on that account called orphans, are admonished. The widows are those who have departed

But Clement, who has already gone beyond the letter, is said to send the sayings "to the cities without," as if to say, to the soul that are outside all bodily and lower thoughts; while the disciple of the Spirit is bidden to announce the message in person, no longer through letters but through living words, to the presbyters or elders of the whole Church of God, to men who have grown grey through wisdom.

from the wicked husband to whom they had been united contrary to the law, but remain widows because they have not yet advanced to the point of being united to the heavenly bridegroom. Clement is bidden to send the sayings to those who are already departing from the letter, into the "cities that are without," as if to say, to those souls which by means of these sayings have begun to be built up into a condition superior to the cares of the body and the desires of the flesh. Hermas himself is bidden to announce what he has learned from the Holy Spirit, not through letters nor through a book but by the living voice, to the presbyters of the Church of Christ, that is, to those who, owing to their capacity to receive spiritual doctrine, possess a ripe endowment of wisdom.

And possibly this is the reason why the water pots which, as we read in the gospel according to John, are said to be set there "for the purifying of the Jews," contain two or three firkins apiece (cf. Jn 2:6). The language alludes to those who are said by the apostle to be Jews "inwardly" (cf. Rom 2:29), and it means that these are purified through the word of the scriptures, which contain in some cases "two firkins," that is, so to speak, the soul meaning and the spiritual meaning, and in other cases three, since some passages possess, in addition to those before mentioned, a bodily sense as well, which is capable of edifying the hearers. And six water pots may reasonably allude to those who are being purified in the world, which was made in six days, a perfect number.⁵

that is, the logical and literal meaning, is not found, as we shall show in what follows; and there are places where those meanings which we have called the soul and the spirit are alone to be looked for. I believe that this fact is indicated in the gospels, when six water pots are said "to be set there for the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece" (cf. Jn 2:6). Here, as I said, the language of the gospel seems to allude to those who are said by the apostle to be Jews "inwardly" (cf. Rom 2:29), and to mean that these are purified through the word of scripture, by receiving in some cases "two firkins," that is, by accepting the soul meaning and the spiritual meaning in accordance with what we said above, and in other cases three firkins, when the reading also retains for the edification of the hearers a bodily meaning, namely the literal one. And six water pots are approximately mentioned

6. That it is possible to derive benefit from the first, and to this extent helpful meaning, is witnessed by the multitudes of sincere and simple believers. But of the kind of explanation which penetrates as it were to the soul an illustration is found in Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians. "For," he says, "it is written; thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." Then in explanation of this law he adds, "Is it for the oxen that God careth? Or saith he it altogether for our sake? Yea, for our sake it was written, because he that ploweth ought to plow in hope, and he that thresheth, to thresh in hope of partaking" (1 Cor 9:9, 10; Dt 25:4).⁶ And most of the interpretations adapted to the multitude which are in

6. How much value there is in this first meaning, which we have called the literal one, is witnessed by the entire multitude of those believers who accept the faith quite trustfully and simply; and this needs no long argument because it is obvious to all. But of the kind of explanation which we have spoken of above as the soul, as it were, of Scripture, many illustrations are given us by the apostle Paul, as, for example, first of all in his epistle to the Corinthians. "For," he says, "it is written; thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." Then in explaining how this precept ought to be understood, he adds: "Is it for the oxen that God careth? Or saith he it altogether for our sake? Yea, for our sake it was written, circulation and which edify those who cannot understand the higher meanings have something of the same character.

But it is a spiritual explanation when one is able to show of what kind of "heavenly things" the Jews "after the flesh" served a copy and a shadow, and of what "good things to come" the law has a "shadow" (cf. Heb 8:5; Rom 8:5; Heb 10:1). And, speaking generally, we have, in accordance with the apostolic promise, to seek after "the wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden, which God foreordained before the worlds unto the glory" of the righteous, "which none of the rulers of this world knew" (cf. 1 Cor 2:7, 8). The same apostle also says somewhere, after mentioning certain narratives because he that ploweth ought to plow in hope, and he that thresheth, to thresh in hope of partaking" (1 Cor 9:9, 10; Dt 25:4).⁶ Moreover, many other similar passages which are interpreted in this manner out of the law, impart the utmost instruction to those who hear them.

But a spiritual explanation is like this, when one is able to show of what "heavenly things" those who are Jews "after the flesh" serve a copy and a shadow, and of what "good things to come" the law has a "shadow" (cf. Heb 8:5; Rom 8:5; Heb 10:1), and any other matters of this kind which may be found in the holy scriptures; or when we inquire what is that "wisdom hidden in a mystery, which God foreordained before the worlds unto our glory, which none of the rulers of this world knew" (cf. 1 Cor 2:7, 8), or ask the meaning of the same apostle's statement, when he makes use of certain illustrations from Exodus and Numbers, that "these things happened unto them figuratively, and they were written for our sake, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (1 Cor 10:11). He also gives hints to show what these things were figures of, when he says: "For they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ" (1 Cor 10:4).

In another epistle, when outlining the arrangements of the tabernacle he quotes the words: "Thou shalt make all things according to the figure that was shown thee in the mount" (Heb 8:5; Ex 25:40). Further, in the epistle to the Galatians, speaking in terms of reproach to those who believe that they are reading the law and yet do not understand it, and laying it down that they who do not believe that there are allegories in the writings do not from Exodus and Numbers and says that "these things happened unto them figuratively, and they were written for our sake, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (1 Cor 10:11), and when he affords us an opportunity of understanding how we can learn of what those events that happened to them were figures, by saying, "For they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ" (1 Cor 10:4).

Moreover in another epistle he mentions that command about the tabernacle which was enjoined upon Moses: "Thou shalt make all things according to the figure that was shown thee in the mount" (Heb 8:5; Ex 25:40). And when writing to the Galatians and reproaching some who believe they are reading the law and yet do not understand it, because they are unaware that there are, allegories in these writings, he addresses them in a understand the law, he says: "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, one by the handmaid and one by the free woman. Howbeit the son by the handmaid is born after the flesh; but the son by the free woman is born through promise. Which things contain an allegory; for these women are two covenants" (Gal 4:21-24), and what follows. Now we must carefully mark each of the words spoken by him. He says, "Ye that desire to be under the law" (not, "ye that are under the law") "do ye not hear the law?" hearing being taken to mean understanding and knowing.

And in the epistle to the Colossians, briefly epitomizing the meaning of the entire system of the law, he says: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink or in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a sabbath, which are a shadow of the things tone of rebuke: "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by the handmaid and one by the free woman. Howbeit he who was born of the handmaid was born according to the flesh, but he of the free woman was born according to promise. Which things contain an allegory. For these are the two covenants" (Gal 4:21-24), and what follows. Here we must also observe this point, how carefully the apostle says, "Ye that desire to be under the law" (and not, "ye that are under the law") "do ye not hear the law?" Do ye not hear? that is, do ye not understand and know?

Moreover in the epistle to the Colossians he briefly sums up and condenses the meaning of the entire law and says: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink or in respect of solemn days or a new moon or a sabbath, which are a shadow to come" (Col 2:16, 17). Further, in the epistle to the Hebrews, when discoursing about those who are of the circumcision, he writes: "They who serve that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things" (Heb 8:5). Now it is probable that those who have once admitted that the apostle is a divinely inspired man will feel no difficulty in regard to the five books ascribed to Moses; but in regard to the rest of the history they desire to learn whether those events also "happened figuratively" (cf. 1 Cor 10:11). We must note the quotation in the epistle to the Romans: "I have left for myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to Baal" (Rom 11:4; 1 Kgs 19:18), found in the third book of the Kings. Here Paul has taken it to stand for those who are Israelites "according to election" (cf. Rom 11:5), for not only are the gentiles benefited by the coming of Christ, but also some who belong to the divine race.

of the things to come" (Col 2:16, 17). Also when writing to the Hebrews and discoursing about those who are of the circumcision he says: "They who serve that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things" (Heb 8:5). But probably through the above examples those who accept the apostle's writings as divinely inspired will feel no doubt in regard to the five books of Moses. In regard to the rest of the history, however, they will ask whether the events related therein may also be said to have "happened figuratively" (cf. 1 Cor 10:11) to those about whom they are written. We notice that this point has been spoken of in the epistle to the Romans, where the apostle takes an illustration from the third book of the Kings, which says: "I have left for myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to Baal" (Rom 11:4; 1 Kgs 19:18). This Paul takes as spoken figuratively of

7. This being so, we must outline what seems to us to be the marks of a true understanding of the scriptures. And in the first place we must point out that the aim of the Spirit who, by the providence of God through the Word who was "in the beginning with God" (cf. Jn 1:1), enlightened the servants of the truth, that is, the prophets and apostles, was pre-eminently concerned with the unspeakable mysteries connected with the affairs of men—and by men I mean at the present moment souls that make use of bodies—his purpose being that the man who is capable of being taught might by "searching out" and devoting himself to the "deep things" (cf. 1 Cor those who are called Israelites "according to election" (cf. Rom 11:5), in order to show that the coming of Christ was beneficial not only to the gentiles but also to very many of the race of Israel who have been called to salvation.

7. This being so, we shall now outline the manner in which divine scripture should be understood on these several points using such illustrations and examples as may occur to us. And in the first place we must call to mind and point out that the Holy Spirit, who by the providence and will of God through the power of his only begotten Word who was "in the beginning with God" (cf. Jn 1:1), enlightened the servants of the truth, that is, the prophets and apostles, (wished above all to lend them)⁷ to the knowledge of the mysteries connected with those affairs and causes which concern the lives and relationships of men. By men I mean at the present moment souls

2:10) revealed in the spiritual meaning of the words become partaker of all the doctrines of the Spirit's counsel.

Latin

that are located in bodies. These mysteries which were made known and revealed to them by the Spirit, the prophets portrayed figuratively through the narration of what seemed to be human deeds and the handing down of certain legal ordinances and precepts. The aim was that not everyone who wished should have these mysteries laid before his feet to trample upon (cf. Mt 7:6), but that they should be for the man who had devoted himself to studies of this kind with the utmost purity and sobriety and through nights of watching, by which means perchance he might be able to trace out the deeply hidden meaning of the Spirit of God, concealed under the language of an ordinary narrative which points in a different direction, and that so he might become a sharer of the Spirit's knowledge and a partaker of his divine counsel.

And when we speak of the needs of souls, who cannot

For in no other way can the soul reach the perfection

Greek

otherwise reach perfection except through the rich and wise truth about God, we attach of necessity pre-eminent importance to the doctrines concerning God and His only-begotten Son; of what nature the Son is, and in what manner he can be the Son of God, and what are the causes of his descending to the level of human flesh and completely assuming humanity; and what, also, is the nature of his activity, and towards whom and at what times it is exercised. It was necessary, too, that the doctrines concerning beings akin to man and the rest of the rational creatures, both those that are nearer the divine and those that have fallen from blessedness, and the causes of the fall of these latter, should be included in the accounts of the divine teaching; and the question of the differences between souls and how these differences arose, and what the world is and why it exists, and further, of knowledge except by being inspired with the truth of the divine wisdom. Therefore it is chiefly the doctrine about God, that is, about the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, which is indicated by those men who were filled with the divine Spirit. Then, too, the mysteries relating to the Son of God, how the Word became flesh, and for what reason he went to the length of "taking upon him the form of a servant" (cf. Phil 2:7), have also been made known by those who were filled, as we have said, with the divine Spirit. After that it followed of necessity that they should instruct the race of mortal men by divine teaching concerning rational creatures, both heavenly and earthly, the more blessed and the lower ones alike, and also concerning the differences between souls and how these differences arose; and then the question what this world is and why it was made, and further, how it comes about that evil is so widespread how it comes about that evil is so widespread and so terrible on earth, and whether it is not only to be found on earth but also in other places—all this it was necessary that we should learn.

Latin

373 → 8. Now while these and similar subjects were in the mind of the Spirit who enlightened the souls of the holy servants of the truth, there was a second aim, pursued for the sake of those who were unable to endure the burden of investigating matters of such importance. This was to conceal the doctrine relating to the before-mentioned subjects in words forming a narrative that contained a record dealing with the visible creation, the formation of man and the successive descendants of the first human beings until the time when they became many; and also in other stories that recorded the acts of righteous men and the sins that these same men occasionally committed, seeing and so terrible on earth, and whether it is found only on earth or in some other places as well—all this it was necessary that we should learn from the divine teaching.

8. But while it was the intention of the Holy Spirit to enlighten holy souls, who had devoted themselves to the service of the truth, on these and similar subjects, there was in the second place another aim in view, namely, that for the sake of such as either could not or would not give themselves up to this labor and industry in order to prove themselves worthy of being taught and of coming to know matters of such value and importance, the Spirit should wrap up and conceal within ordinary language under cover of some historical record or account of visible things certain secret mysteries. There is introduced therefore an account of the visible creation and of the formation and fashioning of they were but human, and the deeds of wickedness, licentiousness and greed done by lawless and impious men.

But the most wonderful thing is, that by means of stories of wars and the conquerors and the conquered certain secret truths are revealed to those who are capable of examining these narratives; and, even more marvelous, through a written system of law the laws of truth are prophetically indicated, all these having been recorded in a series with a power which is truly appropriate to the wisdom of God. For the intention was to make even the outer covering of the spiritual truths, I mean the bodily part of the scriptures, in many

the first man, and then of the descendants that follow in succession from him. There are also recorded certain acts performed by righteous men and occasionally, too, mention is made of the sins these same men committed, seeing they were but human; and then also a considerable number of the licentious and wicked deeds of impious men are related.

In a wonderful manner, too, an account of wars is presented, and the different fortunes now of the conquerors, now of the conquered are described, and by this means, to those who know how to examine writings of this kind, certain unspeakable mysteries are revealed. Further, by a marvelous example of wisdom, in the writings of the law the law of truth is implanted and prophetically indicated; and all these are by the divine skill and wisdom woven together to form a kind of outer covering and veil for spiritual meanings, respects not unprofitable but capable of improving the multitude in so far as they receive it.

9. But if the usefulness of the law and the sequence and case of the narrative were at first sight clearly discernible throughout, we should be unaware that there was anything beyond the obvious meaning for us to understand in the scriptures. Consequently the Word of God has arranged for certain stumbling-blocks, as it were, and hindrances and impossibilities to be inserted in the midst of the law and the history, in order that we may not be completely drawn away by the sheer attractiveness of the language, and so either reject the true doctrines absolutely, on the ground that we learn from the scriptures nothing which is what we meant by the body of holy scripture; with the result that even through this that we have called the outer covering of the letter, woven by the art of wisdom, very many readers may be edified and make progress, who otherwise could not do so.

9. But if in every detail of this outer covering, that is, the actual history, the sequence of the law had been preserved and its order maintained, we should have understood the scriptures in an unbroken course and should certainly not have believed that there was anything else buried within them beyond what was indicated at a first glance. Consequently the divine wisdom has arranged for certain stumbling-blocks and interruptions of the historical sense to be found therein, by inserting in the midst a number of impossibilities and incongruities, in order that the very interruption of the narrative might as it were worthy of God or else by never moving away from the letter fail to learn anything of the more divine element.

And we must also know this, that because the principal aim was to announce the connection that exists among spiritual events, those that have already happened and those that are yet to come to pass, whenever the Word found that things which had happened in history could be harmonized with these mystical events he used them, concealing from the multitude their deeper meaning. But wherever in the narrative the accomplishment of some particular deeds, which had been previously recorded for the sake of their more mystical present a barrier to the reader and lead him to refuse to proceed along the pathway of the ordinary meaning and so, by shutting us out and debarring us from that, might recall us to the beginning of another way, and might thereby bring us, through the entrance of a narrow footpath, to a higher and loftier road and lay open the immense breadth of the divine wisdom.

And we must also know this, that because the aim of the Holy Spirit was chiefly to preserve the connection of the spiritual meaning, both in the things that are yet to be done and in those which have already been accomplished, whenever he found that things which had been done in history could be harmonized with the spiritual meaning, he composed in a single narrative a texture comprising both kinds of meaning, always, however, concealing the secret sense more deeply. But wherever the record of deeds that had been done meanings, did not correspond with the sequence of the intellectual truths, the scripture wove into the story something which did not happen, occasionally something which could not happen, and occasionally something which might have happened but in fact did not. Sometimes a few words are inserted which in the bodily sense are not true, and at other times a greater number.

A similar method can be discerned also in the law, where it is often possible to find a precept that is useful for its own sake, and suitable to the time when the law was given. Sometimes, however, the precept does not appear to be useful. At other times even impossibilities are recorded in the law for the sake of the more skillful and inquiring readers, in order that these, by giving themselves to the toil of examining what is written, may gain a sound conviction of the

could not be made to correspond with the sequence of the spiritual truths, he inserted occasionally some deeds of a less probable character or which could not have happened at all, and occasionally some which might have happened but in fact did not. Sometimes he does this by a few words, which in their bodily sense do not appear capable of containing truth, and at other times by inserting a large number.

This is found to happen particularly in the law, where there are many things which as literal precepts are clearly useful, but also a considerable number in which no principle of utility whatever is disclosed, while sometimes even impossibilities are detected. All this, as we have said, the Holy Spirit supervised, in order that in cases where that which appeared at the first glance could neither be true nor useful we should be led on to search for a truth deeper down and needing necessity of seeking in such instances a meaning worthy of God.

And not only did the Spirit supervise the writings which were previous to the coming of Christ, but because he is the same Spirit and proceeds from the one God he has dealt in like manner with the gospels and the writings of the apostles. For the history even of these is not everywhere pure, events being woven together in the bodily sense without having actually happened; nor do the law and the commandments contained therein entirely declare what is reasonable.

Latin

more careful examination, and should try to discover in the scriptures which we believe to be inspired by God a meaning worthy of God.

And not only did the Holy Spirit supervise the writings which were previous to the coming of Christ, but because he is one and the same Spirit and proceeds from the one God he has acted similarly in regard to the gospels and the writings of the apostles. For even the narratives which he inspired through them were not woven together without the spell of that wisdom of his, the nature of which we explained above. And so it happens that even in them the Spirit has mingled not a few things by which the historical order of the narrative is interrupted and broken, with the object of turning and calling the attention of the reader, by the impossibility of the literal sense, to an examination of the inner meaning.

ILLUSTRATIONS FROM THE SCRIPTURES OF THE METHOD IN WHICH SCRIPTURE SHOULD BE UNDERSTOOD

Greek

I. Now¹ what man of intelligence will believe that the first and the second and the third day, and the evening and the morning existed without the sun and moon and stars? And that the first day, if we may so call it, was even without a heaven? (cf. Gn 1:5-13). And who is so silly as to believe that God, after the manner of a farmer, "planted a paradise eastward in Eden," and set in it a visible and palpable "tree of life," of such a sort that anyone who tasted its fruit with his bodily teeth would

Latin

1. But in order to learn the truth of what we say from the facts themselves, let us now examine the actual passages of scripture. What man of intelligence, I ask, will consider it a reasonable statement that the first and the second and the third day, in which there are said to be both morning and evening, existed without sun and moon and stars, while the first day was even without a heaven? (cf. Gn 1:5-13). And who could be found so silly as to believe that God, after the manner gain life; and again that one could partake of "good and evil" by masticating the fruit taken from the tree of that name? (cf. Gn 2:8, 9).² And when God is said to "walk in the paradise in the cool of the day" and Adam to hide himself behind a tree, I do not think anyone will doubt that these are figurative expressions which indicate certain mysteries through a semblance of history and not through actual events (cf. Gn 3:8).

Further, when Cain "goes out from the face of God" it seems clear to thoughtful men that this statement impels the reader to inquire what the "face of God" is and how anyone can "go out" from it (cf. Gn 4:16).³ And what more need I say, when those who are not altogether of a farmer, "planted trees in a paradise eastward in Eden," and set therein a "tree of life," that is, a visible and palpable tree of wood, of such a sort that anyone who ate of this tree with bodily teeth would gain life; and again that anyone who ate of another tree would get a knowledge of "good and evil" (cf. Gn 2:8, 9)?² And further, when God is said to "walk in the paradise in the evening" and Adam to hide himself behind a tree, I do not think anyone will doubt that these statements are made by scripture in a figurative manner, in order that through them certain mystical truths may be indicated (cf. Gn 3:8).

Again, when Cain "goes out from the face of God," the statement clearly impels a thoughtful reader to inquire what the "face of God" is, and how anyone can "go out" from it (cf. Gn 4:16).³ But not to extend unduly the work we have in hand, it is quite easy for anyone who blind can collect thousands of such instances, recorded as actual events, but which did not happen literally?

Even the gospels are full of passages of this kind, as when the devil takes Jesus up into a "high mountain" in order to show him from thence "the kingdoms of the whole world and the glory of them" (cf. Mt 4:8). For what man who does not read such passages carelessly would fail to condemn those who believe that with the eye of the flesh, which requires a great height to enable us to perceive what is below and at our feet, the kingdoms of the Persians, Scythians, Indians and Partisans were seen, and the manner in which their rulers are glorified by men? And the careful reader will detect thousands of other passages like this in the gospels, which will convince him that events which did not take place at all wills to collect from the holy scriptures instances that are recorded as actual events, but which it would be inappropriate and unreasonable to believe could possibly have happened in history.

This kind of scripture is to be found in considerable abundance even in the gospels, as when the devil is said to have taken Jesus up into "a high mountain" in order to show him from thence "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them" (cf. Mt 4:8). How could it possibly have happened literally, either that the devil should have led Jesus up into a high mountain or that to his fleshly eyes he should have shown all the kingdoms of the world as if they were lying close to the foot of a single mountain, the kingdoms for instance of the Persians, Scythians and Indians, and in addition, the manner in which the rulers of these kingdoms are glorified by men. And the diligent reader will find in the gospels are woven into the records of what literally did happen.

2. And to come to the Mosaic legislation, many of the laws, so far as their literal observance is concerned, are clearly irrational, while others are impossible. An example of irrationality is the prohibition to eat vultures, seeing that nobody even in the worst famine was ever driven by want to the extremity of eating these creatures (Lv 11:14).⁴ And in regard to the command that children of eight days old who are uncircumcised "shall be destroyed from among their people" (cf. Gn 17:14 [LXX]) if the law relating to these children were really meant to be carried out according to the letter, the proper course would be to order the death of their very many other passages like this, from which he may learn that among those narratives which appear to be recorded literally there are inserted and interwoven others which cannot be accepted as history but which contain a spiritual meaning.

2. Moreover in the passages containing the laws similar things are found. In the Mosaic law it is ordered that "every male who has not been circumcised on the eighth day is to be destroyed" (cf. Gn 17:14 [LXX]); which is most illogical, since if the law were meant to be carried out according to the letter, the proper course would certainly be to order the punishment of the parents who had not circumcised their children, or else of those who were bringing up the little ones. But as it is the scripture says: "A male that is uncircumcised," that is, "who shall not be circumcised on the eighth day, shall be destroyed from among his people" (ibid.).

Greek

fathers or those by whom they were being brought up. But as it is the Scripture says: "Every male that is uncircumcised, who shall not be circumcised on the eighth day, shall be destroyed from among his people" (ibid.).

And if you would like to see some impossibilities that are enacted in the law, let us observe that the goat-stag,⁵ which Moses commands us to offer in sacrifice as a clean animal, is a creature that cannot possibly exist; while as to the griffin,⁶ which the lawgiver forbids to be eaten, there is no record that it has ever fallen into the hands of man. Moreover in regard to the celebrated sabbath, a careful reader will see that the command, "Ye shall sit each one in your dwellings; let none of you go out from his place on the sabbath day" (Ex 16:29), is an impossible one to observe literally, for no living creature could sit for a whole day and not move from his seat.

Latin

And if we are to look for laws that are impossible, we find mention made of an animal called the goat-stag,⁵ which cannot possibly exist, but which Moses allows to be eaten among the clean animals; while as to the griffin,⁶ which the lawgiver forbids to be eaten, there is no record or knowledge that it has ever fallen into the hands of man. Moreover in regard to the celebrated observance of the sabbath he speaks thus: "Ye shall sit each one in your dwellings; no one shall move from his place on the sabbath day" (Ex 16:29). It is certainly impossible for this to be observed literally; for no man can sit for a whole day so as never to move from the place where he is sitting.

Greek

Consequently the members of the circumcision and all those who maintain that nothing more than the actual wording is signified make no inquiry whatever into some matters, such as the goat-stag, the griffin and the vulture, while on others they babble copiously, bringing forward lifeless traditions, as for instance when they say, in reference to the sabbath, that each man's "place" is two thousand cubits (cf. Nm 35:5). Others, however, among whom is Dositheus the Samaritan,⁷ condemn such an interpretation, and believe that in whatever position a man is found on the Sabbath day he should remain there until evening.

Latin

In dealing with these various points the members of the circumcision and all those who maintain that in the holy scriptures nothing is to be understood beyond the meaning of the letter, think that no inquiry need be made concerning the goat-stag, the griffin and the vulture; but in regard to the sabbath they produce certain vain and trifling fables drawn from some traditional source or other, and allege that each man's "place" is reckoned as extending to two thousand cubits (cf. Nm 35:5). Others, however, among whom is Dositheus the Samaritan,⁷ condemn interpretations of this kind, and yet themselves maintain something still more ridiculous, namely, that in whatever posture or place or position a man is found on the sabbath day he should remain there until evening; that is, if sitting, he should sit all the day, or if lying down, he should lie down all the day.

Greek

Further, the command "not to carry a burden on the sabbath day" (cf. Jer 17:21) is impossible; and on this account the teachers of the Jews have indulged in endless chatter, asserting that one kind of shoe is a burden, but another is not, and that a sandal with nails is a burden, but one without nails is not, and that what is carried on one shoulder is a burden, but not what is carried on both.

3. If now we approach the gospel in search of similar instances, what can be more irrational than the command: "Salute no man by the way" (cf. Lk 10:4), which simple people believe that the Savior enjoined upon the apostles? Again, to speak of the right cheek being struck (cf. Mt 5:39) is most incredible, for every striker, unless he suffers from some unnatural defect, strikes the left cheek with his

Further, the command "not to carry a burden on the sabbath day" (cf. Jer 17:21) seems to me to be an impossible one. For in consequence of these words the teachers of the Jews have become involved in "endless fables" (cf. 1 Tm 1:4) as the holy apostle says, asserting that it is not reckoned as a burden if a man wears shoes without nails, but that it is a burden if he wears galoshes with nails, and deeming it a burden if a man carries something on one shoulder, but not a burden if he carries it on both.

3. If now we seek for similar instances from the gospels, how can it seem anything but absurd to interpret literally the saying: "Salute no man by the way" (cf. Lk 10:4)? This, however, is what simple people, suppose that our Savior enjoined upon the apostles. Further, how would it be possible, especially in those countries where the bitterness of winter is accentuated by icy frosts, to observe right hand. And it is impossible to accept the precept from the gospel about the "right eye that offends"; for granting the possibility of a person being "offended" through his sense of sight, how can the blame be attributed to the right eye, when there are two eyes that see? And what man, even supposing he accuses himself of "looking on a woman to lust after her" and attributes the blame to his right eye alone, would act rationally if he were to cast this eye away? (cf. Mt 5:28, 29; 18:9).

Further, the apostle lays down this precept: "Was any called being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised" (1 Cor 7:18). Now in the first place any one who wishes can see that the precept that a man should not possess two coats, nor any shoes? (cf. Mt 10:10). Again, what shall we say of the command that if anyone strikes us on the right cheek we are to offer him the left one also (cf. Mt 5:39), seeing that a man who strikes with the right hand will strike the left cheek? As for the saying in the gospel; "If thy right eye offend thee, let it be plucked out," this must be reckoned among the impossibilities for even if we grant that it refers to eyes of flesh, how can it be logical, when both eyes see, to attribute the blame of the offence to one only, and that the right one? (cf. Mt 5:28, 29; 18:9). Or who would be accounted innocent of a most serious crime, if he were to lay hands on himself?

But perhaps the letters of Paul the apostle will appear to be free from these difficulties. Yet what is the meaning of his saying: "Was any called being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised" these words have no relation to the subject in hand; and how can we help thinking that they have been inserted at random, when we remember that the apostle is here laying down precepts about marriage and purity? In the second place who will maintain that it is wrong for a man to put himself into a condition of uncircumcision, if that were possible, in view of the disgrace which is felt by most people to attach to circumcision?

4. We have mentioned all these instances with the object of showing that the aim of the divine power which bestowed on us the holy scriptures is not that we should accept only what is found in the letter; for occasionally the records taken in a literal sense are not true, but actually absurd and impossible, and even with the history that actually happened and

(1 Cor 7:18). Now in the first place, if you consider the saying carefully, it does not appear to be related to the subject which the apostle had in hand; for he was laying down precepts about marriage and purity, and on such a subject the words in question would certainly seem to be a superfluous addition. In the second place, what objection could there be if, in order to avoid the disgrace which comes from being circumcised, a man were able to become uncircumcised? In the third place, it is certain that this is utterly impossible.

4. We have mentioned all these instances with the object of showing that the aim of the Holy Spirit, who deigned to bestow on us the divine scriptures, is not that we may be edified by the letter alone or in every case by it at all; for we recognize that the letter is often impossible and inconsistent with itself, that is, that things not only irrational but even impossible are the legislation that is in its literal sense useful there are other matters interwoven.

386 But someone may suppose that the former statement refers to all the scriptures, and may suspect us of saying that because some of the history did not happen, therefore none of it happened; and because a certain law is irrational or impossible when taken literally, therefore no laws ought to be kept to the letter; or that the records of the Savior's life are not true in a physical sense; or that no law or commandment of his ought to be obeyed. We must assert, therefore, that in regard to some things we are clearly aware that the historical fact is true; as that Abraham was buried in the double cave at Hebron, together with Isaac and Jacob and one wife occasionally described by it; but that we are to realize that with this external story are interwoven certain other matters which, when considered and comprehended in their inward meaning, provide us with a law which is useful to men and worthy of God.

But someone may suspect us of saying this, that because we suppose that some of the scriptural history did not happen, we do not believe that any of it happened; or that because we maintain that some precepts of the law cannot be kept according to the letter, those, that is in regard to which either reason or the possibility of the case do not admit of a literal observance, therefore no precepts of the law are valid according to the letter; or that we do not believe that the events of our Savior's life occurred in a physical sense; or that his precepts ought not to be obeyed literally. We must reply, therefore, that it is perfectly obvious to us that of each of them (cf. Gn 23:2, 9, 19; 25:9, 10; 49:29-32; 50:13); and that Shechem was given as a portion to Joseph (cf. Gn 48:22; Jos 24:32); and that Jerusalem is the chief city of Judaea, in which a temple of God was built by Solomon; and thousands of other facts.

And again, who would deny that the command which says: "Honor thy father and thy mother, that it may be well with thee" (Ex 20:12) is useful quite apart from any spiritual interpretation, and that it ought certainly to be observed, especially when we remember that the apostle Paul has quoted it in the in most instances the truth of the historical record can and ought to be preserved. For who can deny that Abraham was buried in the double cave at Hebron, together with Isaac and Jacob and one wife of each of them? (cf. Gn 23:2, 9, 19; 25:9, 10; 49:29-32; 50:13). Or who doubts that Shechem was given as a portion to Joseph? (cf. Gn 48:22; Jos 24:32). Or that Jerusalem is the chief city of Judaea, in which a temple of God was built by Solomon; and countless other facts? For the passages which are historically true are far more numerous than those which contain a purely spiritual meaning.

Then again, who would deny that the command which says: "Honor thy father and mother that it may be well with thee" (Ex 20:12), is sufficient of itself apart from any spiritual interpretation and that its observance is binding on us, especially when we remember that Paul has confirmed the command self-same words? (cf. Eph 6:2, 3). And what are we to say of the following: "Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not commit adultery; thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not bear false witness" (Ex 20:13–16)?

Once again, in the gospel there are commandments written which need no inquiry whether they are to be kept literally or not, as that which says, "I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his brother" (Mt 5:22)⁸ and what follows; and, "I say unto you, swear not at all" (Mt 5:34). Here, too, is an injunction of the apostle of which the literal meaning must be retained: "Admonish the disorderly, encourage the faint-hearted, support the weak, be longsuffering toward all" (1 Thes 5:14); though in the case of the more earnest readers it is possible to preserve each of the meanings, that is, while not setting aside the commandment in its literal by quoting it in the self-same words? (cf. Eph 6:2, 3). And what are we to say of the passage: "Thou shalt not commit adultery; thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not steal, thou shalt not bear false witness" (Ex 20:13–16), and others of this kind?

Then in regard to the commandments given in the gospel, there can be no doubt that very many of these are to be kept according to the letter; as when it says . . . "But I say unto you, swear not at all" (Mt 5:34); and also, "But whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (cf. Mt 5:28);⁹ and the injunctions given by the apostle Paul: "Admonish the disorderly, encourage the faint-hearted, support the weak, be longsuffering toward all" (1 Thes 5:14); and very many others.

sense, to preserve the "depths of the wisdom of God" (cf. Rom 11:33; 1 Cor 2:10).

5. Nevertheless the exact reader will hesitate in regard to some passages, finding himself unable to decide without considerable investigation whether a particular incident, believed to be history, actually happened or not, and whether the literal meaning of a particular law is to be observed or not. Accordingly he who reads in an exact manner must, in obedience to the Savior's precept which says, "Search the scriptures" (Jn 5:39)¹⁰ carefully investigate how far the literal meaning is true and how far it is impossible, and to the utmost of his power must trace out from the use of similar expressions the meaning scattered everywhere through the scriptures of that which when taken literally is impossible.

When, therefore, as will be clear to those who read, the passage as a connected whole

5. Nevertheless I have no doubt that the careful reader will be uncertain in very many cases whether this or that story is to be regarded as literally true, or true in a less degree, and whether this or that precept is to be literally observed or not.

Much effort and toil must therefore be exercised, so that each reader may in all reverence become aware that he is dealing with words that are divine and not human, inserted in the holy books. As for us, therefore, the method of interpretation which we think ought rightly and logically to be employed in dealing with the holy scriptures is as follows.

is literally impossible, whereas the outstanding part of it is not impossible but even true, the reader must endeavor to grasp the entire meaning, connecting by an intellectual process the account of what is literally impossible with the parts that are not impossible but are historically true, these being interpreted allegorically in common with the parts which, so far as the letter goes, did not happen at all. For our contention with regard to the whole of divine scripture is, that it all has a spiritual meaning, but not all a bodily meaning; for the bodily meaning is often proved to be an impossibility. Consequently the man who reads the divine books reverently, believing them to be divine writings, must exercise great care. And the method of understanding them appears to us to be as follows.

6. The accounts tell us that God chose out a certain nation on the earth, and they call this nation by many

Latin

6. The divine writings declare that a certain nation on the earth was chosen by God, and they call this nation names. For the nation as a whole is called Israel, and it is also spoken of as Jacob. But when it was divided in the days of Jeroboam the son of Nebat (cf. 1 Kgs 12:2ff.), the ten tribes said to have been subject to him were named Israel, and the other two together with the tribe of Levi, which were ruled over by men of the seed of David, were called Judah. The entire country which was inhabited by men of this race and which had been given them by God, is called Judaea, the metropolis of which is Jerusalem, this being the mother city of a number of others whose names lie scattered about in many different places of scripture but are gathered together into one list in the book of Joshua the son of Nun (cf. Jos 13-21).

This being so, the apostle, raising our spiritual apprehension to a high level, says

by many names. Sometimes the nation as a whole is called Israel, sometimes Jacob; and in particular, when the nation was divided into two parts by Jeroboam the son of Nebat (cf. 1 Kgs 12:2ff.), the ten tribes which became subject to him were called Israel, and the other two, with which was included the tribe of Levi and the tribe which sprang from the royal family of David, were named Judah. The entire country inhabited by this race, which had been given them by God, was called Judaea, the metropolis of which was Jerusalem, called the metropolis or mother city as being a kind of mother of many cities. The names of these cities you will find frequently mentioned here and there in the other divine books, but they are gathered together into a single group in the book of Joshua the son of Nun (cf. Jos 13-21).

This being so, the holy apostle, desiring as it were to raise up and exalt our somewhere: "Behold Israel after the flesh" (1 Cor 10:18), inferring that there is an Israel after the spirit. He says also in another place: "For it is not the children of the flesh that are children of God" (Rom 9:8),¹¹ nor are "all they Israel, who are of Israel" (Rom 9:6).

Latin

understanding above the earth, says in a certain place: "Behold Israel after the flesh" (1 Cor 10:18). In saying this he certainly indicates that there is also another Israel, which is not "after the flesh" but after the spirit. And again he says in another place: "For they are not all Israel, who are of Israel" (Rom 9:6).

Greek

And¹² again: "Neither is he a Jew, who is one outwardly, nor is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew, who is one inwardly, and circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter" (Rom 2:28, 29). For if we take the phrase "a Jew inwardly" as a test, we shall realize that as there is a race of bodily Jews, so, too, there is a race of those who are "Jews inwardly," the soul having acquired this nobility of race in virtue of certain unspeakable words.¹³ Moreover there are many prophecies spoken of Israel and Judah, which relate what is going to happen to them. And when we think of the extraordinary promises recorded about these people, promises that so far as literary style goes are poor and distinguished by no elevation or character that is worthy of a promise of God, is it not clear that they demand a mystical interpretation? Well, then, if the promises are of a spiritual kind though announced through material imagery, the people to whom the promises belong are not the bodily Israelites.

Greek

7. But we must not spend time discussing who is a "Jew inwardly" and who an Israelite "in the inner man," since the above remarks are sufficient for all who are not dull-witted. We will return to the subject before us and say that Jacob was the father of the twelve patriarchs, and they of the rulers of the people, and they in their turn of the Israelites who came after.¹⁴ Is it not the case, then, that the bodily Israelites carry back their descent to the rulers of the people, the rulers of the people to the patriarchs, and the patriarchs to Jacob and those still more ancient; whereas are not the spiritual Israelites, of whom the bodily ones were a type, descended from the clans, and the clans from the tribes, and the tribes from one whose birth was not bodily, like that of the others, but of a higher kind (i.e., as in Gn 25:21–23); and was not he born of Isaac, and Isaac descended from Abraham, while all go back to Adam, who the apostle says is Christ? (cf. 1 Cor 15:45). For the origin of all families that are in touch with the God of the whole world began lower down with Christ, who comes next after the God and Father of the whole world (cf. Lk 3:38) and is thus the father of every soul, as Adam is the father of all men. And if Eve is interpreted by Paul as referring to the Church (cf. Eph 5:31–32), it is not surprising (seeing that Cain was born of Eve and all that come after him carry back their descent to Eve) that these two should be figures of the Church; for in the higher sense all men take their beginning from the Church.

Greek

8. Now if what we have stated about Israel, its tribes and its clans, is convincing, then when the Savior says, "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 15:24), we do not take these words in the same sense as the poor-minded Ebionites do (men whose very name comes from the poverty of their mind, for in Hebrew ebion is the word for poor),¹⁵ so as to suppose that Christ came especially to the Israelites after the flesh. For "it is not the children of the flesh that are children of God" (Rom 9:8).¹⁶

Again, the apostle gives us the following instances of teaching about Jerusalem: "The Jerusalem which is above is free, which is our mother" (Gal 4:26); and in another epistle: "But ye are come to Mount Sion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company

8. Now¹⁹ that we have learned from him, therefore, that there is one Israel according to the flesh and another according to the spirit, then when the Savior says, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 15:24), we do not take these words in the same sense as do they who "mind earthly things," that is, the Ebionites, who even by their very name are called poor (for in Hebrew the word ebion means poor),¹⁵ but we understand that it is a race of souls which is called Israel, as the meaning of the word itself indicates; for Israel means "the mind seeing God" or "man seeing God."²⁰

Again, the apostle gives us revelations such as this concerning Jerusalem, that "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is our mother" (Gal 4:26). And in another epistle of his he says: "But ye are come to Mount Sion and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to a multitude of praising of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn who are written in heaven" (Heb 12:22, 23).

If therefore Israel consists of a race of souls, and Jerusalem is a city in heaven, it follows that the cities of Israel have for their mother city the Jerusalem in the heavens; and so consequently does Judaea as a whole.¹⁷

In all prophecies concerning Jerusalem, therefore, and in all statements made about it, we must understand, if we listen to Paul's words¹⁸ as the words of God and the angels, and to the church of the firstborn which is written in heaven" (Heb 12:22, 23).

If then there are in this world certain souls who are called Israel, and a city in heaven which is named Jerusalem, it follows that those cities which are said to belong to the Israelite nation have for their mother city the heavenly Jerusalem, and that we are to understand in this way all references to Judaea as a whole. For we believe that the prophets were speaking about this heavenly country by means of mystical narratives whenever they uttered prophecies concerning Judaea or Jerusalem, or whenever the sacred records declare that this or that kind of invasion had happened to Judaea or Jerusalem.

All statements or prophecies, therefore, which are made concerning Jerusalem we must understand, if we listen to the words of Paul as being those of Christ utterances of wisdom, that the scriptures are telling us about the heavenly city and the whole region which contains the cities of the holy land. Perhaps it is to these cities that the Savior lifts our attention when he gives to those who have deserved praise for the good use of their talents authority over ten or over five cities (cf. Lk 19:17-19).

9. If therefore the prophecies relating to Judaea, to Jerusalem, and to Israel, Judah and Jacob suggest to us, because we do not interpret them in a fleshly sense, mysteries such as these, it will follow also that the prophecies which relate to Egypt and the Egyptians, to Babylon and the Babylonians, to Tyre and the Tyrians, to Sidon and speaking in him (cf. 2 Cor 13:3), to refer in the thought of Paul himself to that country which he calls the heavenly Jerusalem, and to all those regions or cities which are said to belong to the holy land, the mother city of which is Jerusalem. Moreover we must suppose that these are the cities from among which the Savior, desiring to raise us to a higher level of understanding, promises to those who have made good use of the money committed to them by him, that they shall have authority "over ten cities," or "over five" (cf. Lk 19:17-19).

9. If therefore the prophecies relating to Judaea and Jerusalem, and to Israel, Judah and Jacob indicate to us, because we do not interpret them in a fleshly sense, various divine mysteries, it certainly follows that those prophecies which were uttered concerning Egypt and the Egyptians, or Babylon and the Babylonians, the Sidonians, or to any of the other nations, are not spoken solely of the bodily Egyptians, Babylonians, Tyrians and Sidonians (cf. Ez 29ff.). If the Israelites are spiritual, it follows that the Egyptians and Babylonians are also spiritual. For the statements made in Ezekiel about Pharaoh king of Egypt entirely fail to apply to any particular man who was or will be ruler of Egypt, as will be clear to those who study the passage carefully (cf. Ez 29:1-9).

Greek

Similarly the statements concerning the ruler of Tyre cannot be understood of any particular man who is to rule over Tyre (cf. Ez 28). And as for the numerous statements made about Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Is 14:3-23), especially in Isaiah, how it is possible to interpret them of that particular man? For the man Nebuchadnezzar neither "fell from heaven," nor was he the "morning star," nor did he "rise in the morning" over the earth (cf. Is 14:12).

Latin

or Sidon and the Sidonians, must not be understood to refer to the Egypt which is situated on the earth, or to the earthly Babylon or Tyre or Sidon (cf. Ez 29ff.). Nor can the prophecies which the prophet Ezekiel utters concerning Pharaoh king of Egypt apply to any particular man who may have reigned in Egypt, as the context of the passage clearly shows (cf. Ez 29:1-9).

Similarly the statements concerning the prince of Tyre cannot be understood as being made in respect of any man who was an actual king of Tyre (cf. Ez 28); and further, in regard to the statements made about Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Is 14:3-23), which are found in many places of scripture and especially in Isaiah, how is it possible for us to accept them as spoken of a man? For he is no man, who is said to have "fallen from heaven," or to be

Let us see,²¹ however, whether the above passages may not be more worthily interpreted as follows. Just as there is a heavenly Jerusalem and Judaea, and no doubt a people dwelling therein who are called Israel, so it is possible that near to these there exist certain other places, which apparently are called Egypt or Babylon, or Tyre or Sidon; and the princes of these Places and the souls, if there are any, who dwell in them, may be called Egyptians, Babylonians, Tyrians and Sidonians. From among these souls, in accordance with the manner of life which they lead there, a kind of captivity would seem to have taken place. As a result of which they are said to have gone down from higher and better places into Egypt, or to have been scattered among other nations.

Greek

Nor indeed will any man of intelligence interpret the statements made in Ezekiel concerning Egypt, that it shall be "laid waste forty years" so that "no foot of man" shall be found there, and that it shall one day be so overwhelmed with war, throughout the whole land shall be blood up to the knees, as referring to the Egypt which lies next to the Ethiopians whose bodies are blackened by the sun (cf.

Latin

the "morning star," or to have "risen in the morning" (cf. Is 14:12).

Moreover, as for the statements which are made in Ezekiel concerning Egypt, that it shall be "laid waste forty years" so that "no foot of man" shall be found there, and that it shall be so overwhelmed with war that throughout the land human blood shall flow to a height up to the knees, I do not know how any man of intelligence could interpret these as referring to that earthly

10. For perhaps,²² just as those who depart from this world by the common death of all, are distributed according to their deeds and merits, as a result of the judgment, some going to a place which is called the "lower world"²³ others to "Abraham's bosom" (cf. Lk 16:22) and to the various position and dwelling-places²⁴ in it; so the inhabitants of the regions above, when they die here, if one may so speak, descend from those upper places to this lower world.

For the other lower world, to which are conveyed the souls of those who die on earth, is called by scripture, I believe on account of this distinction, "the lower Hades," as it says in the Psalms, "And thou hast delivered my soul from the lower Hades" (cf. Ps 86:13).²⁵ Each of those, therefore, who descend into the earth, is destined in

See German French

Latin

It would appear to follow²⁶ from this that the prophecies which are uttered concerning the various nations ought rather to be referred to souls and the different heavenly dwelling-places occupied by them.²⁷ Moreover in regard to the records of events that are said to have happened to the nation of Israel, or to Jerusalem or Judaea, when they were assailed by this people or that, there is need of careful inquiry and examination, seeing that in very many cases the events did not happen in a physical sense, to discover in what way these events are more suitably ascribed to those nations of souls who once dwelt in that heaven which is said to "pass away" (cf. Mt 24:35) or who may be supposed to dwell there even now.²⁸

11. If, however, anyone should demand of us clear and manifest declarations on these matters out of the holy scriptures, we must reply that it was the method of the Holy Spirit rather to conceal these truths and to hide them deeply underneath narratives which appear to be records of actual events, narratives in which people are said to go down into Egypt or to be led captive to Babylon, where some were greatly humiliated and put under bondage to masters, while others in the very places of their captivity were regarded as famous and illustrious, so that they held positions of power and leadership and were set to rule over nations.

Judaea. Nevertheless the Savior came to gather together the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (cf. Mt 15:24), and since many from Israel have not submitted to his teaching, those from the Gentiles are also called. . . .

11. But these truths, as we think, have been concealed in the narratives. For "the kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hid in a field, which when a man findeth he hideth it, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field" (cf. Mt 13:44). Now let us consider whether the outward aspect of scripture and its obvious and surface meaning does not correspond to the field as a whole, full of all kinds of plants, whereas the truths that are stored away in it and not seen by all, but lie as if buried of religious parents or the reverse, so that it happens occasionally that an Israelite falls among the Scythians, and a poor Egyptian is conveyed to Judaea. Nevertheless our Savior came to gather together the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (cf. Mt 15:24), and since most of the Israelites have not submitted to his teaching, those who belonged to the Gentiles have been called.

All these truths, as we have said, lie hidden and concealed, covered up in the narratives of holy scripture; because "the kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hid in a field, which when a man findeth he hideth it, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field" (cf. Mt 13:44). Now consider carefully whether there is not here an indication that the actual soil and surface, so to speak, of scripture, that is, the literal meaning, is the field, abundantly filled with all kinds of plants, whereas beneath the visible plants, are the hidden "treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (cf. Col 2:3), which the Spirit speaking through Isaiah calls "dark and unseen and concealed" (cf. Is 45:3).

These treasures require for their discovery the help of God, who alone is able to "break in pieces the gates of brass" (cf. Is 45:2) that conceal them and to burst the iron bars that are upon the gates, and so to make known all the truths taught in Genesis concerning the various legitimate races and as it were seeds of souls, whether closely akin to Israel or far apart from him, and the descent of the "seventy souls" into Egypt, in order that they may there become "as the stars of the heaven in multitude."²⁹ But since not all who are sprung from these are a "light of the world" (cf. Mt 5:14), for "they are not all Israel, who are of Israel" (Rom 9:6), there come from the seventy a people "even as the sand which is the higher and profounder spiritual meaning is the "hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (cf. Col 2:3), which the Holy Spirit speaking through Isaiah, calls "dark and unseen and concealed treasures" (cf. Is 45:3).

These treasures require for their discovery the help of God, who alone is able to "break in pieces the gates of brass" (cf. Is 45:2) By which they are shut in and concealed, and to burst the iron, bolts and bars which prevent us from entering in and reaching all those truths written in veiled language in Genesis concerning the various races of souls and the seeds and generations named there, whether closely akin to Israel or widely separated from his posterity; as well as the meaning of the descent of the seventy souls into Egypt, that these seventy may become in Egypt "as the stars of the heaven in multitude."²⁹ But since not all who are sprung from these

12. This descent of the holy fathers into Egypt, that is, into this world, will be seen to have been granted by the providence of God for the enlightenment of the rest of men and for the instruction of the human race, that through them all other souls might be enlightened and succored. "For to them first were entrusted the oracles of God" (Rom 3:2), it being this people alone which is said to "see God"; for the name Israel when translated has this meaning.³¹ It follows at once that we must adapt and interpret in the light of these principles the statement that Egypt was scourged with ten plagues to allow God's people to depart (cf. Ex 7:14–12:36), or the account of what happened to the people in the desert (cf. Ex 19ff.), or of the construction of the tabernacle by means of contributions from all the people (cf. Ex 25ff.), or of the weaving of the priestly garments (cf. Ex 28), or the description of the vessels of the ministry (cf. Ex 30:17ff.); because, as it is written, these things truly contain within them a "shadow" and form of the "heavenly things." For Paul clearly says of them that they "serve a shadow and pattern of the heavenly things" (Heb 8:5). In the same law there is also contained an account of the particular laws and institutions under which men are to live in the holy land. Threats, too, are held over those who are a "light of this world" (cf. Mt 5:14), for "they are not all Israel, who are of Israel" (Rom 9:6), there come from these seventy souls people even "as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable" (Heb 11:12; Gn 32:12).

souls

shall transgress the law; and for those who stood in need of purification various kinds of purifications are given, adapted to men who were liable to frequent pollution (cf. Lv 12–15); the object being that by means of these they should arrive at last at that our purification, after which they must not be polluted any more (cf. Heb 9, 6:6).

Moreover a reckoning is made of the number of this people, though not of all (cf. Nm 1–4, 26). For the childlike souls have not yet lived long enough to be numbered in accordance with the divine command (cf. Nm 1:3 et al.); while those souls which cannot become the head of some other but are themselves subject to others as to a head, souls which the scripture terms “women,” these, too, are not reckoned in that numbering which is ordered by God (cf. Nm 1:2, 4, et al.; cp. 1 Cor 11:3). Only those called men are numbered, in order to show that the former souls could not be numbered apart by themselves but that they are included in the number of those called men.

Especially, however, there come to the holy number they who are ready to go forth to the wars of Israel, they who can fight against those enemies and adversaries whom the Father puts in subjection to the Son who sits on his right hand, in order that he may destroy every principality and power (cf. Eph 1:20, 22; 1 Cor 15:27, 24). By these numbers; of his soldiers, who because they are fighting for God do not entangle themselves in the affairs of this world (cf. 2 Tm 2:4), he intends to overthrow the kingdoms of the adversary.³² By these “the shields of faith” are borne and the “darts” of wisdom are hurled; on them gleams the helmet which is the hope of salvation, and the breast plate of charity guards their heart that is filled with God (cf. Eph 6:16; 1 Thes 5:8). Such are the soldiers who appear to me to be indicated in scripture, and such is the kind of warfare for which they are prepared who are ordered in the divine books to be numbered by God’s command.

But far more renowned and perfect than these are they, the very hairs of whose head are said to be numbered (cf. Mt 10:30 and par.). Those, however who were punished for their sins, whose carcasses “fell in the wilderness,” appear to me to bear a resemblance to those who though they have made not a little progress, have yet been for various reasons quite unable to reach the goal of perfection because they are said either to have murmured, or to have worshipped idols, or to have committed fornication, or to have planned some wickedness such as it is wrong for the mind even to think of (cf. Nm 11, 14, 16, 21, 25; Ex 32; and 1 Cor 10:5–10; Heb 3:17).

Nor is the following fact, I believe, devoid of some mystical meaning, that certain of the people, who possess large flocks and much cattle, go and seize beforehand a region suitable for pasturing their flocks, which was the first of all the places that the right hand of the Israelites secured by war. This region they beg Moses to grant them, and consequently they are placed apart beyond the streams of Jordan and cut off from the occupation of the holy land (cf. Nm 32). Now this Jordan would appear, when taken as a figure of the heavenly things, to water and flood the thirsty souls and minds that lie close beside it.

And here this other fact will not appear to be without significance, that it is Moses who hears from God all that is written down in the law of Leviticus, whereas in Deuteronomy it is the people who are represented as listening to Moses and learning from him they could not hear from God (cf. Lv 1:1 and throughout; Dt 1:1, 5:1). This indeed is why it is called Deuteronomy, meaning the second law; a fact which some will think points to this, that when the first law given through Moses came to an end (cf. Jn 1:17), a second legislation was apparently composed and this was specially delivered by Moses to his successor Joshua (cf. Dt 31); and Joshua is certainly believed to be a figure of our Savior, by whose second law, that is, by the precepts of the Gospels, all things are brought to perfection.

13. We must also see, however, whether the scriptures may not perhaps indicate this further truth, that just as the legislation is presented with greater clearness and distinctness in Deuteronomy than in those books which were written at the first, so also we may gather from that coming of the Savior which he fulfilled in humility, when he "took upon him the form of a servant" (cf. Phil 2:7), an indication of the "more splendid and glorious second coming in the glory of his Father" (cf. Mt 16:27 and par.), at which coming, when in the kingdom of heaven all the saints shall live by the laws of the "eternal gospel" (cf. Rv 14),³³ the figure of Deuteronomy will be fulfilled; and just as by his present coming he has fulfilled that law which has a "shadow of the good things to come" (cf. Heb 10:1), so also by that glorious coming the shadow of his first coming will be fulfilled and brought to perfection. For the prophet has spoken of it thus: "The breath of our countenance is Christ the Lord, of whom we said that under his shadow we shall live among the nations" (Lam 4:20), that is, at the time when he shall duly transfer all the saints from the temporal to the eternal gospel, to use a phrase employed by John in the Apocalypse, where he speaks of the "eternal gospel."³⁴

14. But in all these matters let it suffice us to conform our mind to the rule of piety and to think of the Holy Spirit's words not as a composition depending upon feeble human eloquence but in accordance with the sayings of scripture, "All the king's glory is within" (Ps 45:13 [LXX]), and, "a treasure" of divine meanings lies hidden within the "frail vessel" of the poor letter (cf. 2 Cor 4:7). If, however, a reader is more curious and persists in asking for an explanation of every detail, let him come and hear along with us how the apostle Paul, scanning by the aid of the Holy Spirit, who "searches even the depths of God" (cf. 1 Cor 2:10), the "depth of the divine wisdom and knowledge" (cf. Rom 11:33), and yet not being able to reach the end and to attain, if I may say so, an innermost knowledge, in his despair and amazement at the task cries out and says, "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" (Rom 11:33). And in what despair of reaching a perfect understanding he uttered this cry, hear him tell us himself: "How unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out!" (ibid.). He did not say that God's judgments were hard to search out, but that they could not be searched out at all; not that his ways were hard to find out, but that they were impossible to find out. For however far one may advance in the search and make progress through an increasingly earnest study, even when aided and enlightened in mind by God's grace, he will never be able to reach the final goal of his inquiries.

For no created mind can by any means possess the capacity to understand all; but as soon as it has discovered a small fragment of what it is seeking, it again sees other things that must be sought for; and if in turn it comes to know these, it will again see arising out of them many more things that demand investigation. This is why Solomon, wisest of men, whose wisdom gave him a clear view of the nature of things, says: "I said, I will become wise; and wisdom herself was taken far from me, farther than she was before; and who shall find out her profound depth?" (Eccl 7:23, 24 [LXX 24, 25]). Moreover Isaiah, knowing that the beginnings of things could not be discovered by mortal nature, no, and not even by those natures which, though diviner than man's nature, are yet themselves made and created, knowing, I say, that none of these could discover either the beginning or the end says; "Tell ye the former things, what they were, and we shall know that ye are gods; or declare the last things, what they are, and then shall we see that ye are gods" (Is 41:22, 23).

Context → My Hebrew teacher also used to teach as follows, that since the beginning or the end of all things could not be comprehended by any except our Lord Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit, this was the reason why Isaiah spoke of there being in the vision that appeared to him two seraphim only, who with two wings cover the face of God, with two cover his feet, and with two fly, crying one to another and saying, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of thy glory" (cf. Is 6:2, 3).³⁵ For because the two seraphim alone have their wings over the face of God and over his feet, we may venture to declare that neither the armies of the holy angels, nor the holy thrones, nor the dominions, nor principalities, nor powers can wholly know the beginnings of all things and the ends of the universe. We must understand, however, that those holy spirits and powers who are here enumerated are nearest to the very beginnings of things and reach a point which the rest of creation cannot attain to. Nevertheless whatever it is that these powers may have learned through the revelation of the Son of God and of the Holy Spirit—and they will certainly be able to acquire a great deal of knowledge, and the higher ones much more than the lower—still it is impossible for them to comprehend everything; for it is written, "The more part of God's works are secret" (Sir 16:21).

It is therefore to be desired that each one according to his capacity will ever "reach out to the things which are before, forgetting those things which are behind" (cf. Phil 3:14), that is, will reach out both to better works and also to a clearer understanding and knowledge, through Jesus Christ our Savior, to whom is the glory forever.

15. Let everyone, then, who cares for truth, care little about names and words (cf. 2 Tm 1:4, 6:4), for different kinds of speech are customary in different nations. Let him be more anxious about the fact signified than about the words by which it is signified, and particularly in questions of such difficulty and importance as these. For example, we may inquire whether there exists any substance in which we can discern neither color nor shape nor possibility of touch nor size, a substance perceptible to the mind alone, which anyone can call whatever he pleases. The Greeks speak of this substance as asomaton, or incorporeal;³⁶ but the divine scriptures call it "invisible"; for the apostle declares that God is invisible, when he says that Christ is the "image of the invisible God" (cf. Col 1:15, 16). On the other hand he says that "all things, visible and invisible, were created through Christ" (ibid.). Here it is asserted that there exist even among created things certain existences which are in their own nature invisible. These, however, while not in themselves corporeal, yet make use of bodies, though they themselves are superior to bodily substance. But the substance of the Trinity, which is the beginning and cause of all things, "of which are all things and through which are all things and in which are all things," must not be believed either to be a body or to exist in a body, but to be wholly incorporeal (cf. Rom 11:36).³⁷

Let it suffice, however, for us to have spoken briefly on these matters, in a digression indeed, but one which has been forced upon us by the necessities of the subject. Our aim has been to show that there are certain things, the meaning of which it is impossible adequately to explain by any human language, but which are made clear rather through simple apprehension than through any power of words. This rule must control our interpretation even of the divine writings, in order that what is said therein may be estimated in accordance not with the meanness of the language but with the divine power of the Holy Spirit who inspired their composition.

7 see

1. It¹ is now time for us, after having dealt to the best of our ability with the matters previously discussed, to summarize the particular points, with the object of gathering together what we have said in scattered references, and first of all to repeat our teaching concerning the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. God the Father, since he is both invisible and inseparable from the Son, generated the Son not, as some suppose, by an act of separation from himself.² For if the Son is something separated from the Father, and if this expression signifies something resembling the offspring of animals and human beings, then both he who separated and he who is separated are of necessity bodies. For we do not say, as the heretics suppose, that a part of God's substance was changed into the Son, or that the Son was procreated by the Father out of no substance at all, that is, from something external to → God's own substance, so that there was a time when the Son did not exist; but setting aside all thought of a material body, we say that the Word and Wisdom was begotten of the invisible and incorporeal God apart from any bodily feeling,³ like an act of will proceeding from the mind. Nor will it appear absurd, seeing that he is called the "Son of his love" (cf. Col 1:13), that he should also be regarded in this way as the "Son of his will."⁴

Moreover John tells us that "God is light" (1 Jn 1:5) and Paul declares that the Son is the "brightness of the eternal light" (cf. Heb 1:3). As therefore light can never exist without its brightness, so neither can the Son, who is called the "impress" of the Father's "substance," and his Word and Wisdom, be conceived as existing without the Father. How then can it be said that there was a time when the Son did not exist?⁵ For this is nothing else but to say that there was a time when truth did not exist, when wisdom did not exist, when life did not exist, whereas we must believe that in all these the substance of God exists in perfection. For these cannot be taken away from him or ever be separated from his substance. Although in our mind they are regarded as being many, yet in fact and substance they are one, and in them resides the "fullness of the godhead" (cf. Col 2:9).⁶

This phrase that we use, however, that there never was a time when he did not exist, must be accepted with a reservation. For the very words, when, or never, have a temporal significance, whereas the statements we make about the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit must be understood as transcending all time and all ages and all eternity. For it is this Trinity alone which exceeds all comprehension, not only of temporal but even of eternal intelligence. The rest of things, however, which are external to the Trinity, must be measured by ages and periods of time. The fact, therefore, that the Word is God, and was in the beginning with God (cf. Jn 1:1, 2), must not lead anyone to suppose that this Son of God is contained in any place; nor must the fact that he is wisdom, or truth, or righteousness, or sanctification, or redemption; for all these need no place in which to act or work, but each of them must be understood as referring to those who receive a share of the Word's power and effectiveness.

2. But if anyone should maintain that through those who receive a share of God's Word, or of his wisdom or truth or life, the Word himself and the wisdom appear to exist in a place, we must answer him by saying that undoubtedly Christ, in his character of Word and Wisdom and all the rest, was in Paul, according to Paul's own statement: "Or do ye seek a proof of him who speaks in me, even Christ?" (2 Cor 13:3). And again: "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal 2:20). Since then he was in Paul, who will doubt that he was similarly in Peter and in John and in every one of the saints, and not only in those on earth, but also in those in heaven? For it is absurd to say that Christ was in Peter and in Paul, but that he was not in Michael the archangel and in Gabriel. From this we can clearly perceive that the divinity of the Son of God is not confined in any place, otherwise it would be present in that place and not present in any other; but that while, in virtue of the majesty of its incorporeal nature, it is confined to no place, in no place, on the other hand, can we think of it as being absent.

We must, however, bear in mind this one difference, that although he is present in various individuals such as those we have mentioned, Peter, Paul, Michael or Gabriel, he is not present in all beings whatsoever in the same degree. For he is more fully and clearly and, if I may say so, more openly present in the archangels than in other saints. This is plain from the following fact, that when the saints reach the height of perfection they are said to be made like, or equal to, the angels, according to the gospel statement (cf. Mt 22:30; Lk 20:36). It is clear from this that Christ becomes present in each individual in such a degree as is warranted by the extent of his merits.

3. Having therefore briefly repeated these points concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, our next step is to lay equal stress on this, that all things are said to have been created through the Son, "things in heaven and things on earth, things visible and invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all were created through him and in him, and he is before all, and all things subsist for him, who is the head" (Col 1:16-18). With this agrees the statement made by John in the Gospel: "All things were made through him, and without him nothing was made" (Jn 1:3). David, too, points to the mystery of the Trinity in the creation of the universe when he says: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made strong, and all their power by the spirit of his mouth" (Ps 33:6).

After this it will be appropriate for us to make mention of the bodily coming and incarnation of the only-begotten Son of God.⁷ And here we must not suppose that all the majesty of his godhead was confined within the limits of a tiny body, in such a way that the whole of God's Word and his wisdom and essential truth and life was either separated from the Father or forced and imprisoned within the tiny compass of that body, so that it is not to be thought of as operating anywhere else. The reverent confession of piety should rather lie between these extremes, neither admitting that any quality of the godhead was lacking in Christ, nor yet supposing that there took place any separation whatever from the essence of the Father, which exists everywhere. Some such truth is indicated by John the Baptist, when with Jesus in the bodily sense absent he thus addressed the multitudes: "There standeth one among you whom ye know not, who cometh after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose" (Jn 1:26, 27).⁸ Certainly it could not be said of one who so far as his bodily presence went was absent, that he stood "among" them with whom he was not bodily present. This shows that the Son of God was both wholly present in his body and also wholly present everywhere.

4. Let no one imagine, however, that when we say this we are asserting that one part of the godhead of the Son of God was in Christ while the other part was elsewhere or everywhere. This can only be believed by those who are ignorant of the nature of incorporeal and invisible substance. For it is impossible to speak of a part of what is incorporeal or to make any division in it. It exists rather in all things and through all things and above all things, in the way we have previously spoken of, that is, in the way in which it is understood as being either wisdom or word or life or truth, by which mode of understanding all idea of confinement in a particular place is undoubtedly excluded. The Son of God, therefore, because for the salvation of the human race he wished to appear to men and to dwell among them, assumed not only, as some think, a human body, but also a soul, in its nature indeed like our souls, but in will and virtue like himself, and of such a kind that it could unswervingly carry into effect all the wishes and plans of the Word and Wisdom.⁹ Now that he possessed a soul, the Savior himself most clearly proves in the gospels when he says: "No one taketh from me my soul, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it up again" (Jn 10:18). And again: "My soul is sorrowful even unto death" (Mt 26:38 and par.); and also: "Now is my soul troubled" (Jn 12:27). For the soul¹⁰ that is "sorrowful" and "troubled" must not be understood to be the Word of God, because with the authority of his godhead he says: "I have power to lay down my soul" (Jn 10:18). Nor do we say that the Son of God was in that soul in the same way as he was in the soul of Paul or of Peter and the rest of the saints, in whom we believe that Christ spoke just as he did in Paul.¹¹ Of all these, indeed, we must hold that opinion which the scripture expresses: "No man is pure from uncleanness, not even if his life has lasted but one day" (Jb 14:4, 5 [LXX]). But the soul that was in Jesus "chose the good, before it knew the evil" (cf. Is 7:15, 16);¹² and because it "loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore God anointed it with the oil of gladness above its fellows" (cf. Ps 45:7). Now it was anointed with the "oil of gladness" when it was united in a spotless partnership with the Word of God and thereby alone among all souls became incapable of sin, because it was well and fully capable of receiving the Son of God, and on that account is even one with him,¹³ and is addressed by his titles and called Jesus Christ, through whom all things are said to have been made (cf. Jn 1:3, Col 1:16).

It was of this soul, since it had received into itself the whole wisdom of God and his truth and life, that I think the apostle spoke when he said: "Your life is hid with Christ in God; but when Christ, your life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory" (Col 3:3, 4). For who else can be meant by this Christ, who is said to be hidden in God and to be destined afterwards to appear, except him who is related to have been anointed with the "oil of gladness," that is, filled with the essence of God, in whom now he is said to be hidden. This is why Christ is set forth as an example to all believers, because as he ever chose the good, even before he knew the evil at all, and loved righteousness and hated iniquity, wherefore God anointed him with the oil of gladness (cf. Is 7:15, 16; Ps 45:7); so, too, should each one of us, after a fall or a transgression, cleanse himself from stains by the example set before him, and taking a leader for the journey proceed along the steep path of virtue, that so perchance by this means we may as far as is possible become, through our imitation of him, partakers of the divine nature (cf. 2 Pt 1:4); as it is written, "He who saith he believeth in Christ ought himself to walk even as he walked" (1 Jn 2:6). This Word, then, and this wisdom, by our imitation of whom we are called wise or rational, becomes "all things to all men, that he may gain all," and to the weak becomes weak, that he may gain the weak (cf. 1 Cor 9:22); and because he is made to become weak it is said of him, "Though he was crucified in weakness, yet he liveth in the power of God" (2 Cor 13:4). Finally, in dealing with the Corinthians, who were weak, Paul determines that he will "know nothing among them except Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (1 Cor 2:2).

5. Some, however, would have it appear that it was in reference to this very soul, at the time when it assumed a body from Mary, that the following statement of the apostle was made:¹⁴ "Who, though he was in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be equal with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant" (Phil 2:6, 7); the object being, doubtless, to restore the soul into the form of God by superior examples and precepts, and to recall it to that fullness from which it had emptied itself.

But as by participation in the Son of God a man is adopted among God's sons, and by participation in the wisdom which is in God he becomes wise, so, too, by participation in the Holy Spirit he becomes holy and spiritual. For this is one and the same thing as to receive a share of the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of the Father and the Son, since the nature of the Trinity is one and incorporeal. And all that we have said about the participation of the soul is to be understood of the angels and heavenly powers in a similar way to that in which it is understood of souls; for every rational creature needs to participate in the Trinity.

Moreover, in regard to the plan of this visible world, the very important question of how the world is constituted is frequently raised. We have therefore spoken on this point to the best of our ability in the preceding chapters,¹⁵ for the benefit of those who set themselves to examine the grounds for belief in our religion, and also of those who stir up heretical arguments against us and who are constantly bringing forward the term "matter," the meaning of which even they themselves have not yet succeeded in understanding. I think it necessary to make brief mention of this subject now.

6. In the first place it must be noted that up to the present we have nowhere found the term "matter" itself used in the canonical scriptures to denote that substance which is said to underlie bodies. For the saying of Isaiah: "And he shall burn up the hyle," that is the matter, "like hay" (Is 10:17), spoken in reference to those who have been appointed for punishment, uses the terms "matter" to denote sins. And even if the word happens to be written in any other place it will nowhere be found, I think, to bear the meaning with which our present inquiry is concerned. The only exception is in Wisdom, a book which is said to be Solomon's, but which is certainly not regarded as authoritative by all.¹⁶ Still, we do find it written there as follows: "For thine all-powerful hand, that created the world out of formless matter, lacked not means to send upon them a multitude of bears, or fierce lions" (Wis 11:17). Very many, indeed, think that the actual matter of which things are made is referred to in the passage written by Moses in the beginning of Genesis: "In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth, and the earth was invisible and without order" (Gn 1:1, 2); for by the phrase, "an earth invisible and without order," it seems to them that Moses was alluding to nothing else but formless matter. Yet if this truly is matter, it is clear from this passage that the constituent parts of bodies are not things incapable of change.

For those who assume that bodily substances are composed of atoms, either the ones which cannot be divided into parts or those which are divisible into equal parts, or else that they are composed of one of the elements, could not reckon matter, at least in the main sense of the term, among these constituents. Nor, if they suppose matter to be a substance underlying every body throughout the universe, a substance capable of change, alteration and division, will they maintain that it exists in its own proper nature without qualities. And we agree with them; since we absolutely deny that matter should be called unbegotten or uncreated, for the reasons which we have given to the best of our ability in previous chapters, for we have there pointed out that from water and earth, air and heat, various kinds of fruit are produced in the various kinds of trees, and that fire, air, water and earth are changed alternately into one another and that one element is resolved into another in virtue of a sort of mutual relationship, and further that from the food of men or of animals the substance flesh comes into existence and that the seminal moisture is changed into solid flesh and bones. All these instances go to prove that bodily substance is capable of change and can pass from any given quality into any other.¹⁷

7. This, however, should be noted, that a substance never exists without quality, and that it is by the intellect alone that this substance which underlies bodies and is capable of receiving quality is discerned to be matter.¹⁸ On this account some who were desirous of inquiring more deeply into these questions have ventured to assert that bodily nature consists of nothing else but qualities. For if hardness and softness, heat and cold, wetness and dryness, are qualities, and when these and all the others like them are taken away nothing is conceived to lie beneath, then the qualities will appear to be everything. And so those who hold this opinion have endeavored to establish the following argument, that since all who say that matter is uncreated allow that its qualities were created by God, the result is that even according to their view matter is not uncreated if qualities are everything, for all without exception declare that qualities were created by God.

Those, however, who desire to prove that qualities are added from without to an underlying matter employ illustrations such as the following: Paul is without any question either silent or speaking, either awake or asleep, or again he is in a certain bodily posture, either sitting or standing or lying down. These things are accidental to men, who are scarcely ever perceived apart from them. Nevertheless our mind clearly does not include any of these things in the definition of man, but we think of him and consider him by their means in such a way as not to form a general idea of his condition, regarding him simply in respect of his being awake or asleep, speaking or silent, or in any of the other accidental conditions to which man is of necessity subject. Just as, then, we can think of Paul as existing apart from all these accidents to which he is subject, so, too, we can conceive of the underlying substance apart from its qualities. And so, when our mind by a purely intellectual act sets aside every quality and gazes at the mere point, if I may so call it, of the underlying substance in itself and clings to that, without in the least considering its hardness or softness or heat or cold or wetness or dryness, then by this somewhat artificial mode of thought it will apparently behold matter stripped of all its qualities.

8. But someone may perhaps ask whether we can obtain any support for this view of things from the scriptures. It appears to me that some such view is indicated in the Psalms, when the prophet says: "Mine eyes have seen thine incompleteness" (Ps 139:16 [LXX]). In this passage the prophet's mind, examining with piercing insight the beginning of things and by reason and understanding alone separating matter from its qualities, appears to have perceived God's "incompleteness," a state which we certainly think of as being brought to perfection by the addition of qualities. Moreover Enoch speaks thus in his book: "I walked until I came to what is incomplete,"¹⁹ which I think may also be understood in a similar way, namely, that the prophet's mind, in the course of its investigation and study of every visible thing, came right to the very beginning, where it beheld matter in an incomplete state without qualities. For it is written in the same book, Enoch himself being the speaker: "I perceived every kind of matter."²⁰ Now this certainly means: "I beheld all the divisions of matter, I which from one original have been broken off into all the various species, of men, animals, sky, sun and everything else in the world."

Next, we have proved to the best of our ability in the foregoing chapters, that all things that exist were made by God, and that there is nothing that was not made except the nature of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit; and that because God, who is good by nature, wished to have those whom he might benefit and who might enjoy receiving his benefits, he made creatures worthy of himself, that is, creatures capable of worthily receiving him, whom he also says he has "begotten as sons" (cf. Is 1:2). But he made all things by number and measure; for to God there is nothing either without end or without measure.²¹

For by his power he comprehended all things, while he himself is not comprehended by the mind of any created being.²²

For that nature is known to itself alone. The Father alone knows the Son, and the Son alone knows the Father (cf. Jn 10:15, 17:25), and the Holy Spirit alone searches out even the depths of God (cf. 1 Cor 2:10).

merit
Every created thing, therefore, is distinguished in God's sight by its being confined within a certain number and measure, that is, either number in the case of rational beings or measure in the case of bodily matter. Since, then, it was necessary for intellectual nature to make use of bodies, and this nature is proved to be changeable and convertible by the very condition of its being created—for what was not and began to be is by this very fact shown to be of a changeable nature and so to possess goodness or badness as an accident, and not as part of its essence—since, then, as we have said, rational nature is changeable and convertible, so of necessity God had foreknowledge of the differences that were to arise among souls or spiritual powers, in order to arrange that each in proportion to its merits might wear a different bodily covering of this or that quality; and so, too, was it necessary for God to make a bodily nature, capable of changing at the Creator's will, by an alteration of qualities, into everything that circumstances might require. This nature must needs endure so long as those endure who need it for a covering; and there will always be rational natures who need this bodily covering.

There will always exist, therefore, this bodily nature whose coverings must necessarily be used by rational creatures; unless someone thinks²³ that he can prove by any arguments that rational nature can lead a life without a body at all. How difficult, if not altogether impossible, this is for our understanding, we have shown when discussing the particular questions in the foregoing chapters.²⁴

9. It will certainly not, I think, appear contrary to the plan of this work of ours, if we repeat as briefly as possible

God had to have someone to rule over the arguments concerning the immortality of rational natures. Everyone who shares in anything is undoubtedly of one substance and one nature with him who shares in the same thing. For example, all eyes share in the light, and therefore all eyes, which share in the light, are of one nature. But though every eye shares in the light, yet since one eye sees clearly and another dimly, every eye does not share equally in the light. Again, all hearing receives the voice and sound, and therefore all hearing is of one nature; but each person is quick or slow to hear in proportion to the pure and healthy condition of his hearing faculty. Now let us pass from these examples drawn from the senses to the consideration of intellectual things.

Every mind which shares in intellectual light must undoubtedly be of one nature with every other mind which shares similarly in this light. If then the heavenly powers receive a share of intellectual light, that is, of the divine nature, in virtue of the fact that they share in wisdom and sanctification, and if the soul of man receives a share of the same light and wisdom, then these beings will be of one nature and one substance with each other.²⁵ But the heavenly powers are incorruptible and immortal; undoubtedly therefore the substance of the soul of man will also be incorruptible and immortal. And not only so, but since the nature of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, to whom alone belongs the intellectual light in which the universal creation has a share, is incorruptible and eternal, it follows logically and of necessity that every existence which has a share in that eternal nature must itself also remain forever incorruptible and eternal, in order that the eternity of the divine goodness may be revealed in this additional fact, that they who obtain its blessings are eternal too. Nevertheless, just as in our illustrations we acknowledged some diversity in the reception of the light, when we described the individual power of sight as being either dim or keen, so also we must acknowledge a diversity of participation in the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, varying in proportion to the earnestness of the soul and the capacity of the mind.

On the other hand let us consider whether it does not appear almost impious to say that the mind, which is capable of receiving God, should admit of a destruction of its substance; as if the very fact that it can perceive and understand God would not be sufficient to secure its perpetual existence. This is the more likely since, even if the mind through carelessness should fall away from the pure and perfect reception of God into itself, it nevertheless always possesses within some seeds as it were of restoration and recall to a better state, which become operative whenever the inner man, who is also termed the rational man, is recalled into the image and likeness of God who created him. This is why the prophet says: "All the ends of the earth shall remember and be turned unto the Lord, and all the families of the nations shall worship before him" (cf. Ps 22:27).

10. If, however, anyone dares to ascribe a corruption of substance to him who was made after the "image and likeness of God," he will be extending this impious charge, in my opinion to the Son of God himself; for he, too, is called in the scriptures the "image of God" (cf. Col 1:15; 2 Cor 4:4). At least he who thinks thus will certainly be attacking the authority of scripture, which says that man was made in the "image of God." Moreover the marks of the divine image in man may be clearly discerned, not in the form of his body, which goes to corruption, but in the prudence of his mind, in his righteousness, his self-control, his courage, his wisdom, his discipline, in fact, in the whole company of virtues; which exist in God essentially, and may exist in man as a result of his own efforts and his imitation of God, as the Lord points out in the gospel when he says: "Be ye merciful, as your Father also is merciful" (Lk 6:36), and, "Be ye perfect, as your Father also is perfect" (Mt 5:48). Here we are clearly shown that in God all these virtues exist forever and that they can never come to him or depart from him, whereas men acquire them gradually and one by one. We see, therefore, that men have a kind of blood-relationship with God; and since God knows all things and not a single intellectual truth can escape his notice—for God the Father, with his only-begotten Son and the Holy Spirit, stands alone in his knowledge not only of the things he has created but also of himself—it is possible that a rational mind also, by advancing from a knowledge of small to a knowledge of greater things and from things visible to things invisible, may attain to an increasingly perfect understanding. For it has been placed in a body, and of necessity advances from things of sense, which are bodily, to things beyond sense perception, which are incorporeal and intellectual. But in case it should appear mistaken to say as we have done that intellectual things are beyond sense perception we will quote as an illustration the saying of Solomon: "You will find also a divine sense" (Prv 2:5 [LXX]). By this he shows that intellectual things are to be investigated not by bodily sense but by some other which he calls divine.

It is with this sense that each of the rational questions which we have dealt with above must be perceived; and with this sense that the words we speak must be listened to and our writings pondered. For the divine nature knows even the silent thoughts which revolve in our minds. Our belief, therefore, on the questions dealt with herein, and on all that follows logically from them, must be framed in accordance with the principles explained above.

Additional Bibliography by John C. Cavadini

This addition to the original bibliography provides a starting point for those who would like further reading about Origen or On First Principles. A diversity of views is represented. Most of the works listed are relatively recent and will help the reader develop a more complete bibliography of earlier literature, although a few of the more standard earlier works are also listed.

Preface of Rufinus

1. See Plato, Symposium 177 D.
2. See Introduction, p. xlviii.

Book I, Preface

1. See Hermas, Mand. I. 1.

2. Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 2, says that in the beginning of the first book of the De Principiis Origen declared that "Christ was not begotten the Son of God, but made such." (Lat. factum = Gr. γενητόν). Rufinus has modified this statement. It is probable, however, that γενητόν and γεννητόν were not very clearly distinguished in Origen's time. Origen certainly taught that the Son and Holy Spirit were created, but he thought that the alternative to this was to assert that they were unbegotten, which was true of the Father alone. See the quotation from this same letter in n. 3, below, and p. xlv.

3. Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 2, says: "As third in dignity and honor after the Father and the Son he (i.e., Origen) adds the Holy Spirit, of whom, though he professes to be ignorant whether he was created or uncreated, yet later on he has expressed his real opinion, when he insists that nothing is uncreated except God the Father alone." Rufinus has modified Origen's "created or uncreated" (γενητός ἢ ἀγέννητος) to "begotten or unbegotten" (Lat. natus aut innatus = Gr. γενητός ἢ ἀγέννητος). Origen explains his doctrine in his Comm. in Ioh. II. 10. "But we must inquire whether, if it be true that 'all things were created through him,' the Holy Spirit also was created through him. Now I think we are forced to admit to the man who says that he was created, and who quotes the text, 'All things were created through him,' that the Holy Spirit was created through the Word, since the Word is older than he. But the man who is unwilling to say that the Holy Spirit is created through Christ must assert that he is unbegotten... We, however, believe that there are three hypostases, the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, and being of opinion that no one is unbegotten except the Father, maintain the pious and true belief to be that while all things were created through the Word the Holy Spirit is of more honor than all others and first in rank of all who have been created by the Father through Christ."

4. The extant fragments of "The Teaching of Peter" are collected in Von Doberschütz, Das Kerygma Petri (Texte und Unters. xi. 1), and in Hilgenfeld, N. T. extra canonem iv. 51ff. The fragment is found in Greek, ὅτι οὐκ εἰμι δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον, in Ignatius, ad Smyrnaeos 3, where, however, its source is not mentioned.

Book I, Chapter I

1. Origen quotes the passage in this form in two other places, Con. Celsum viii. 18 and Hom. in Jerem. viii. 1.

2. Rufinus has kept the Greek philosophical terms Monas (= Unit, Unity) and Henas (= Oneness) probably from the difficulty of finding Latin equivalents. Some of the later Pythagoreans seem to have distinguished, as Origen does here, between the Monad, the primal Unity which gives rise to multiplicity, and the bare One, a kind of Absolute which they tried to conceive as unrelated to anything. See Zeller, Pre-Socratic Philosophy, trans. S. F. Alleyne, Vol. I, p. 390ff. Clement of Alexandria, Origen's predecessor and teacher, describes the Monad thus: "Abstract from body its physical qualities, taking away the dimension of depth, then that of breadth and then that of length. The point which remains is as it were a unit having position. Take away its position, and you get the conception of unity." Stromata V. 71, 2 ff. (Stählin ii. 374, 7f.).

3. Origen is hampered by an imperfect psychology, but his meaning is clear. The senses, which are regarded as bodily or material things, have their appropriate subject matter. Mind, which Origen contends is purely spiritual, must also have its appropriate "substance" to act on. Substance (Lat. substantia; Gr. υπόστασις) is here to be understood in a spiritual sense; the mind's business is with God, truth and the reasons of things. Origen contradicts the view that mind is an epiphenomenon, or by-product of matter.

4. Koetschau inserts here this sentence taken from Jerome, Con. Ioh. Hieros. c. 7. Origen was frequently attacked for the opinion here expressed, which Rufinus has softened down considerably. Epiphanius (Haer. 64, 4) adds that Origen also asserted that "angels could not see the Spirit, nor could men see angels." See also Justinian, Ep. ad Mennam (Mansi IX. 489 B) and Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 2. Arius used Origen's language, cp. Athanasius, Con. Arian. i. 6.

5. Origen's reading, the Greek of which we have in Con. Celsum VII. 34, αἰσθησιν θεῖαν εὐρήσεις, is different from the Septuagint, which says, "Thou shalt find the knowledge of God."

Book I, Chapter II

1. Origen, in his Hom. in Jerem. IX. 4 ad fin. lays stress on the present tense (Gr. γεννᾷ: Lat. generat) as evidence of his doctrine of the Son's eternal generation by the Father.

2. Lat. aliquid insubstantivum. It almost means "something impersonal," but Origen wishes to make it clear that personal existence does not involve the possession of a body.

3. The Acts of Paul is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. III. 3, 25) as a writing used in some parts of the Church but not considered authoritative. Another quotation from it is to be found in Origen, Comm. in Ioh. XX. 12. In Hom. in Jerem. XX. 1, there is also a reference to the passage on page 23, the Word being called ζῶον (= animal vivens). This appears to depend upon a misreading of Hebrews 4:12, ζῶν γὰρ ὁ λόγος. The Acts of Paul is not extant, and must be distinguished from the Acts of Paul and Thecla.

4. For "effluence" Rufinus retains the Greek ἀπόρροια translating it afterwards by manatio.

5. Origen discusses the passage in his Hom. in Gen. I. 13. See Introduction, p. xl.

6. According to Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 2, what Origen really said here was that "nothing is uncreated except God the Father only." But see p. 438, n. 3 to Book I, Preface.

7. These were the theories of the Gnostics. See Bk. IV, Ch. iv. (p. 417).

8. Rufinus has here altered his original. See the quotation made by Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 2: "The Son, who is the image of the invisible Father, is not the truth when compared with the Father; but in relation to us, who are unable to receive the truth of God almighty, he is a shadow and semblance of the truth." That this correctly represents what Origen wrote is shown by an anonymous defender of Origen whose book is described by Photius, Bibl. Cod. 117. According to this work Origen was accused of saying that "the image of God, considered in relation to God whose image he is, and in so far as he is image, is not truth." In Theophilus Alex., Ep. Synod. 2 (the letter written after the Council at Alexandria in 400 AD, where Origenism was condemned: see Jerome, Ep. 92), the charge is made in the following exaggerated form; "The Son compared with us is truth, but compared with the Father he is falsehood." See further the Greek fragment that follows.

9. A Greek fragment from Justinian was inserted here in the original Butterworth translation. For further information on this attestation see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 44–45, n. 41.

10. Koetschau suspects an omission by Rufinus at this point, where possibly the two following passages may originally have stood. Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 2, "God the Father is light incomprehensible. In comparison with the Father, Christ is a very small brightness, though to us by reason of our weakness he seems to be a great one." Theophilus Alex., Ep. Synod. (in Jerome, Ep. 92): "Again, as much as Paul or Peter differ from the Savior, so much is the Savior less than the Father."

11. See Ch. II. 4 (p. 23).

12. Jerome refers to this passage in his Ep. ad Avitum 2. "He gives an illustration of two statues, an immense one and a very small one; the former fills the world and is in a way invisible from its very size, the latter is perceptible to our sight. The former he compares to the Father, the latter to the Son."

13. See p. 27.

14. See Ch. IV. 3–5, pp. 52–55.

15. The Latin reads "that the Lord Jesus is in the glory of God the Father." But we have Origen's Greek in Comm. in Ioh. VI. 44; Con. Cels. VIII. 59; Hom., in Jerem. XVIII. 3, and in each case it agrees with the text of the N.T.

16. See Ch. I. 6, p. 3.

17. See Ch. II. 9, p. 30. Rufinus uses the Greek word ἐnergieας and then translates it by inoperationis.

18. See Origen, Comm. in Cant. iii. "Perhaps as God made man in his own image and likeness, he also created all other creatures in the likeness of other heavenly forms." It looks as if the opinion expressed in the text above belongs really to Origen, and Rufinus is rejecting it.

19. Butterworth inserts here a Greek fragment from Justinian. For further information on this attestation see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 53–55, n. 75.

20. See above, p. 36.

21. See Ch. I. 6, p. 13.

22. For "good angel" see Tb 5:21 and 2 Mc 15:23; "good man," Mt 12:35; "good slave," Mt 25:21; "good treasure," Mt 12:35; "good heart," Lk 8:15; "good tree," Mt 7:17.

23. Origen makes such a collection in his Comm. in Ioh. I. 21–24.

Book I, Chapter III

1. See Ch. II. 6, p. 26.

2. The doctrine of the Logos, the Reason or Thought of God immanent in creation, was first expressed by Heraclitus (c. 500 BC). Plato, in the Timaeus, 34 B, describes the World-soul which the Creator put within the body of the universe to be the source of life and reason.

3. This is a Gnostic doctrine, taught by Marcion among others. Tertullian, Adv. Marc. I. xv. "If, then, he constructed the world out of some underlying material that was unborn and uncreated and contemporaneous with God, as Marcion believes the Creator did..."

4. See Origen, Con. Cels. IV. 30. "We shall not, however, imitate him (i.e., Celsus) nor speak after his style about the philosophers who declare that they know the nature of the universe and argue with one another whether. . . souls are unbegotten and not created by God but simply arranged in order by him and changed from one body to another, or whether they are originated at the same time as the body and then either endure forever or pass away." Origen's own opinion, according to Rufinus (Apol. ad Anastas. 6) was as follows: "Some maintain that souls were created long ago, when God made all things of nothing, and that now he simply arranges them in bodies according to his own judgment. This is the opinion of Origen and certain other Greeks."

5. The second title occurs in Hermas, Vis. V. 8, and in Clem. Alex. Strom. I. 85, 4 (Stählin ii. 55, 12f.)

6. Hermas, Mand. 1.

7. Enoch, Ch. II. 5.

8. Butterworth inserts here a Greek fragment from Justinian. For further information on this attestation see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 60–61, n. 20.

9. Not extant.

10. Or, "The Spirit (or wind) bloweth where it listeth."

11. Cp. Origen, Hom. in Num. XI. 8. "I think therefore that the Holy Spirit is holy without ever having been made holy. For there did not come to him from some external source a holiness which he did not previously possess, but he always was holy, and never experienced a beginning of holiness."

12. Butterworth inserts here a Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of this attestation see Crouzel SC 253, p. 71, n. 29.

13. In hominibus rationalibus. Semler suggests omnibus for hominibus. Koetschau, however, thinks that the text needs further emendation and proposes the following: "the activity of the Father and the Son is to be, seen in all rational beings, both saints and sinners; that of the Father in dumb animals also, yes, and even. . . ." But Rufinus may well have written the text as it stands, in his keen desire to avoid anything like Origen's subordination of the Son.

14. Cp. Origen, Comm. in Cant. II. "Adam also is reckoned among the prophets, because he prophesied the 'great mystery' in regard to Christ and the Church." See Eph 5:32. Also. Clem. Alex. Strom. I. 135, 3 (Stählin II. 84. 5). "Before the law Adam uttered prophecies in regard to the woman and in regard to the naming of the animals."

15. Koetschau (following Schnitzer, who regarded the passage from "But more" to "spirit of his mouth" as interpolated by Rufinus) points out that this sentence contradicts the Greek fragment discussed in n. 12, above. The probability would seem to be that Rufinus has modified some such phrase as "there is no separation in the Trinity" (see p. 48) into what appears here.

16. See n. 15 above.

Book I, Chapter IV

1. It is evident that Rufinus has omitted a considerable section at this point, for in his text there is no discussion of "what is involved in the acquisition of this knowledge, and what in its loss."

2. Butterworth, following Koetschau, inserts a Latin excerpt from Jerome here. For a discussion of this excerpt see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 78–79, n. 4.

See Jerome, Con. Joh. Hieros. 16, "We wish to know . . . whether the doctrine of Origen is true, who said that all rational creatures. . . ."

3. This doctrine of the descent of the soul is found in Plato, Phaedrus 246 B–D, a passage clearly referred to by Origen in Con. Cels. IV. 40. Jerome says (Con. Joh. Hieros. 19), in connection with this doctrine: "What you admire so much we long ago despised when we found it in Plato." Koetschau refers also to the doctrine of Carpocrates, the Gnostic, as set forth in Irenaeus Adv. Haer. I, XXV. 4. But there is no resemblance between the ethical system of Origen and the antinomian theories of Carpocrates beyond the fact that both are based on the idea of transmigration.

4. See Jerome, Ep. ad. Avitum 3, "When he comes to deal with rational creatures and says that they have descended into earthly bodies through negligence, he adds the following: It is a mark of extreme negligence. . . ." Jerome says also in Con. Joh. Hieros. 19, that "Origen used Jacob's ladder to teach that rational creatures descend gradually to the lowest step, namely, to flesh and blood." This may also belong here.

5. We return to Rufinus at this point.

6. I.e., in Ch. V. (p. 57ff.).

7. This section, to the end of Ch. IV., is found in one MS only and has been obliterated from another. See Koetschau's ed., p. 65, note on I. 8.

8. Latin text in Lactantius, Inst. Div. IV. 6.

Book I, Chapter V

1. See Ch. II. 13 (p. 36f.).

2. Rufinus transliterates the Greek ἀποστάτης and then gives the Latin equivalent refuga, runaway, fugitive, or exile.

3. Jerome's version of this passage should be compared with the above, which Koetschau regards as unfaithful to the original. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 3. "Moved by these considerations we believe that as a result of their own free will some are included in the number of the saints and those who serve God, while others of their own fault have departed from holiness and descended to such a pitch of negligence as to be changed into opposing powers."

Book I, Chapter VI

1. See Preface 3–10 (pp. 2–7).

2. Again Rufinus has altered Origen, considerably weakening his precise statements. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 3. "Once again a beginning arises from the end and an end from the beginning, and all things are so changed that one who is now a man may in another world become a daemon, while a daemon, if he lives negligently, may be bound to a grosser body, that is, may become a man. Thus," continues Jerome, “he mixes up everything, so that one may be changed from an archangel into a devil, and on the other hand a devil may turn into an angel.”

3. Butterworth inserts here a parallel Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 93–95, n. 13.

4. Cp. Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 3. “Those, however, who have descended, but whose movement has not involved them in utter ruin, will be made subject to the care and rule and governance of the principalities, powers, thrones and dominions; and perhaps out of these the human race will one day be constituted in one of the worlds that will be made when, as Isaiah says, there shall be a ‘new heaven and a new earth.’”

5. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 3. “Those, however, who do not deserve to return to their former state by passing through a human life, will become the ‘devil and his angels’ and the worst kind of daemons, and will be appointed to different tasks in one of the many worlds according to their varying degrees of merit.”

6. See p. 58ff.

7. Here Butterworth inserts a parallel fragment in Greek from Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 97–99, n. 24.

8. Rufinus leaves the salvation of the devil and his angels an open question, though Origen had asserted it as a fact. See Jerome, Ep. Ad Pamm. et Ocean. 7 (Origen teaches that) “after many ages and the one restoration of all things Gabriel will be in the same state as the devil, Paul as Caiaphas and virgins as prostitutes.”

9. See p. 74.

10. Jerome’s version of this is as follows (Ep. ad Avitum 4). “Bodily substances will utterly disappear, or at any rate in the end of all things bodies will be similar to our air and sky or to any clearer and purer body that can be conceived.”

Book I, Chapter VII

1. Origen refers to Chs. V and VI.

2. This was a Gnostic doctrine. Some men are by nature “spiritual,” possessing a spark of the divine life. Others, at any rate according to the earlier Gnostic teaching, are earthly and incapable of salvation. See Hastings, Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, Art. Gnosticism (E. F. Scott), Vol. VI, p. 235.

3. It was a widespread opinion that the stars were living beings. Plato regarded them as divine (Timaeus 40 B). The Stoics held the same view (Cicero, De Natura Deorum II. 15, 39). Philo (De Mundi Opif. 24) says that they are pure and divine beings, but susceptible only of virtue, and not of evil. Origen probably introduced a new idea in regard to the stars when, in order to fit them into his theory of the continual progress or relapse of all rational creatures, he argued that they were capable of sin.

4. Origen quotes this passage again in his Comm. in Ioh. I. 35, but there he more wisely adds: “unless indeed this statement is hyperbolic.”

5. Origen in Con. Celsum V. II expresses his belief that the “sun, moon and stars pray to God who is over all through his Only-begotten.”

6. Koetschau concludes that there is an omission in the text at this point, relying on Rufin. Palaest. De Fide 19, where it is stated that Origen quotes “the prophet David,” i.e., Ps 103:18, as well as Is 45:12.

7. See p. 5.

8. Koetschau inserts in the text this passage from Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 4. He follows Schnitzer in placing it here because Jerome definitely associates it with the quotation from Rom 8:20, 21, which occurs at the beginning of paragraph 5. The passage is clearly meant to give a true representation of the original, though not perhaps in a strict translation. In the quotation which follows it Jerome claims to give Origen’s own words. In another passage (Jerome, Con. Ioh. Hieros. 17) he gives Origen’s doctrine as follows: “the sun itself and the moon and the whole host of the stars are souls of creatures once rational and incorporeal, but now subject to vanity, that is to fiery bodies, which we in our ignorance and simplicity call the lights of the world.” Justinian (Ep. ad Mennam—Mansi IX. 513) charges Origen with saying that “the sky and the sun and moon and stars and the waters above the heavens are living and rational powers.” Rufinus has apparently toned down the original and changed its order, but he does not seem to have omitted much at this point.

9. Here Butterworth includes a parallel Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 109–10, n. 28.

10. The passage in brackets is inserted here by Koetschau, following Schnitzer, from Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 4. Jerome prefaces this passage with the statement: “lest anyone should suppose that what we say is our own, let us quote his very words.”

Book I, Chapter VIII

1. For the names of the archangels and their tasks, see Enoch Ch. XL.

2. Here Butterworth inserts an extensive Greek fragment from a composite of sources. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 114–15, n. 5.

3. In some MSS this title has been incorporated into the text. It is at this point that we return to Rufinus.

4. Words such as these appear to be missing from the text.

5. See p. 59ff.

6. Here Butterworth includes a parallel Greek fragment from Antipater of Bostra. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel SC 253, p. 117, n. 14.

7. Here Butterworth inserts an extensive Greek fragment from Gregory of Nyssa and Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel SC 253, pp. 119–25, n. 28.

8. Rufinus’s text here is precisely the opposite of what Origen wrote.

Book II, Chapter I

1. See Bk. I, Ch. VI. 2 (p. 70).

2. The theory of the World-soul comes from Plato, Timaeus 30 AB. See Zeller, Plato and the Older Academy, Ch. VII. 3 (Eng. Trans. 1876, p. 341).

3. See p. 70.

4. See Zeller, Aristotle and the Earlier Peripatetics, Ch. IX. B. (Eng. trans. 1897, pp. 482–5).

5. See Plato, Timaeus 51 A. “The mother and receptive basis of the visible and sensible world is neither earth, nor air, nor fire, nor water, nor anything derived from these nor anything from which they are derived, but an invisible and formless substance, capable of receiving all.”

6. See Zeller, Plato and the Older Academy, Ch. VII. 1. (Eng. trans. 1876, p. 293ff.).

7. Hermas, Mand. I. 1. See p. 41.

Book II, Chapter II

1. See Bk. I. Ch. II. 2 (p. 21). In Bk. I. Ch. VII. 1, (p. 77) Origen says that all rational beings are, so far as their essential nature goes, incorporeal. It is their fall which causes them to assume bodies; see Ch. IV. 1 (pp. 51–52). Rufinus has probably modified this passage.

Book II, Chapter III

1. With this paragraph compare Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 5. “In the second book he (i.e., Origen) asserts that there are innumerable worlds, not, in the manner of Epicurus, many similar worlds existing at one time, but that after the end of one world comes the beginning of another. A world existed before this world of ours, and another in turn will exist after it, and another after that, and others in constant succession. But he is in doubt whether there will ever be a world similar in every respect to another world, so that the two would appear to differ in no particular, or whether it is certain that there will never be one world quite like another and totally indistinguishable from it.”

In Theophilus of Alexandria’s Paschal letter, translated by Jerome in his Ep. 96, we also find the following: “Nor does any man die over and over again, as Origen dared to write, in his desire to establish that most impious doctrine of the Stoics by the authority of the divine scriptures.”

Rufinus has carefully avoided giving the views that Origen really expressed.

2. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 109) says that Clement, Origen’s predecessor at Alexandria, “talked marvels about transmigrations of souls and about many worlds having existed before Adam.”

3. See Bk. II. Ch. I. 2. (p. 102).

4. See Jerome, Ed. ad Avitum 5. “If,” he says (i.e., Origen), “as the course of the argument forces us to admit, all things have lived without bodies, then all bodily existence will be swallowed up, and that which was once created out of nothing will be resolved into nothing. And a time will come when its use will once again be necessary.” So Theophilus Alex. in Jerome, Ep. 96: “For if, according to the error of Origen, bodily nature is empty and transient. . . .” and the same author in Jerome, Ep. 92: “What shall I say about the resurrection of the dead, in regard to which he (i.e., Origen) most clearly blasphemes, declaring that after a succession of many ages our bodies will gradually be resolved into nothing and vanish into thin air; and, lest we should think this a trifle, he adds that the resurrection body will be not only corruptible but mortal.” Other similar passages occur in these two letters. Rufinus has again modified the outspoken views of Origen and omitted much.

5. I.e., Origen: see quotation from Jerome in the note that follows.

6. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 5. “And in the words that follow (Origen says); if, as has been proved by reason and by the authority of the scriptures, this corruptible shall put on incorruption and this mortal shall put on immortality, and death shall be swallowed up in victory and corruption in incorruption, then perhaps also the whole of bodily nature will be destroyed, for on this alone can death have its effect.”

7. For the passage beginning here see Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 5: “And a little further on (Origen says); if these opinions are not contrary to the faith, perhaps we shall one day live without bodies. And if he who is perfectly subjected to Christ must be understood to be without a body, and all are to be subjected to Christ, then we too shall exist without bodies, when we have become perfectly subjected to him.”

8. Butterworth includes here a Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel SC 253, pp. 145–47, n. 16.

9. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 5 (following the passage last quoted): “If all shall be subjected to God, then all will lay aside their bodies; and then the entire universe of bodily things will be dissolved into non-existence; but, if necessity should demand it a second time, it would come into existence again in the event of the fall of rational creatures. For God has given souls over to struggle and conflict, in order that they may understand that their complete and final victory has been attained not by their own strength but by the grace of God. I think, therefore, that on account of the variety of causes worlds become diverse, and that the errors of those who maintain their similarity are hereby shattered.” The words “If all . . . rational creatures” agree with Frag. 19.

10. Cp. Origen Con. Celsum IV. 67, 68; V. 20, 21. The identical recurrence of things in cycles was a Stoic doctrine. See Hicks, Stoic and Epicurean, p. 33ff., and Arnold, Roman Stoicism, p. 193.

11. Jerome, in his Apology I. 20, says that “your Origen allows himself to assert that Christ has often suffered and will often suffer, on the ground that what was beneficial once will be beneficial always.” Compare Book IV. Ch. III. 14 (26), on p. 414.

12. This is a misinterpretation of “from this time forth and forevermore,” Ps 115:18; 121:8; 125:2.

13. The “people of the opposite earth” are the Greek antichthonēs. See Clem. Ad Cor. XX. 5, 8. “The unsearchable places of the abysses and the unfathomable realms of the lower world are controlled by the same ordinances. . . . The ocean, which men cannot pass, and the worlds beyond it, are ruled by the same injunctions of the Master.” (Kirsopp Lake’s translation, Loeb Classical Library, Apostolic Fathers, Vol. I. p. 45).

14. I Clem. Ad Cor. XX. 8.

15. The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch is an account of the journey of Baruch through five heavens. But both M. R. James (Texts and Studies, Vol. V., p. li, 1897) and R. H. Charles (Apoc. and Pseudep. of O. T. Vol. II., p. 527) regard the work as being incomplete in the form in which we have it; so that probably when Origen read it there were seven heavens described. It is called 4 Baruch by James and 3 Baruch by Charles, and is probably a Christian redaction of a Jewish work dating from early in the second century.

16. Koetschau quotes the following parallels. Cicero, De Repub. VI. 17 (Somm. Scip. 4). “All things are bound together by nine circles or spheres, one of which, the outside one, is the heavenly sphere, which embraces all the rest.” Gregor. Nyss. In Hexaëm. (Migne, PG 44, p. 117). “On account of the limitless extent of the sphere of the fixed stars the great wisdom of God established in the middle of the entire span the nature of the sun, to be the basis of earthly things.”

17. See also Origen, Hom. In Psalm. II. 4. “There is also that other earth, of which the scripture speaks, the one that flows with milk and honey, which the Savior in the Gospels promises to the meek, when he says: ‘Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the earth.’ This earth which we inhabit is in its true designation called the ‘dry land,’ just as the heaven which we behold is properly called the firmament. But the firmament takes the name of heaven from the appellation of that other heaven, as the scripture teaches in Genesis.”

18. This is not found in Origen, Hom. in Gen. I. 1, 2. See the previous note.

19. The reading is that of VIII. 4 in Vg. and LXX.

20. See Book I, Preface 8 (p. 6).

21. Compare Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 5, 6. “Three notions of the end are suggested to us, from which the reader is invited to discover the truest and best. Either we shall live without a body, when by being subjected to Christ we shall be subjected to God, and God shall be all in all; or else, just as what is subjected to Christ will with Christ himself be subjected to God and joined into one compact union, so every substance will be resolved into its highest condition and changed into ether, which is of a purer and simpler nature; or else, that that sphere which we have above called the ‘fixed’ sphere, and all that is comprised within its span, shall be dissolved into nothing, but that the further sphere, by which the lower zone is itself contained and bounded, will be called the ‘good land,’ while yet another sphere, which revolves around this same land and is called heaven, will serve as a dwelling-place for the saints. In talking like this (Jerome adds), is he not most plainly following the errors of the nations and foisting the ravings of philosophers on the simplicity of the Christian faith?”

Book II, Chapter IV

1. This was the doctrine held by Marcion, a heretical Christian teacher of the earlier half of the second century. He was puzzled by the character attributed to God in the Old Testament and declared that, although that God might be just, he could not be regarded as good or as the Father whom Jesus revealed. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. IV. 11 and Tertullian, Con. Marc. passim. Many of the Gnostics adopted the same doctrine, as a means of overcoming the difficulties of the Old Testament and fitting it into their systems.

2. Basileides (see Hippolytus, Philosophum, VII. 23) and Valentinus (ibid. VI. 33). The Valentinians maintained that the Creator of the world made the statement (Is 46:9) in ignorance: see Irenaeus, in Epiphanius; Oehler, Corpus haeres. II. i., p. 348.

3. Koetschau refers to Origen, Hom. In Jerem. XII. 5. “The heretics say: ‘You see what the Creator is like. He is the God of the prophets, who says, I will not spare nor have compassion to save them from destruction. How can this God be good?’” See Jer 13:14.

4. Compare this with 1 Pref, 9 (p. 7). [This refers to Origen’s preface at the start of Book I]

5. Compare this with Bk. II., I. 4 (p. 96).

6. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 6. “In the same book he (i.e., Origen) says: Grant that God is invisible. If then he is invisible by nature, he will not be visible even to the Savior.”

7. We do not possess the explanation to which Origen here refers. In his Hom. in Jerem. XVIII. 6 he says: “If you hear of the anger of God and the wrath of God, do not suppose that this anger and wrath are passions of God.”

Book II, Chapter V

1. The protagonist of this view was Marcion, whose teaching is described and combated in Tertullian, Adv. Marcionem.

2. See Plato Repub. 331 E–336 A.

3. Origen is fully alive to the problem of undeserved suffering.

4. See Hippolytus’ Epitome of the teaching of Marcion and Cerdo in Philosophum. X. 19, where the above saying is quoted. For the saying itself see Mt 7:18, 12:33.

5. For the use made of this text see Hippolytus, Philosophum. VII. 31. Prepon, a disciple of Marcion, said that “the just” was a third principle, intermediate between good and evil. Marcion himself, according to Hippolytus, said that Christ, in order to be a mediator, had to be free from all connection not only with evil but even with good, and adduced this text in support of his doctrine. The Naassenes (ibid. V. 7) used the same text to support their doctrine that the primal seed, the generative cause of all existence, was alone good.

Book II, Chapter VI

1. I.e., as the various docetic heresies asserted.

2. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 6. “And lower down he (i.e., Origen) says, No other soul, which has descended into a human body, has revealed in itself so pure and genuine a likeness to its former condition as that of which the Savior says, No man taketh my soul from me, but I lay it down of myself.”

3. This is an example of the principle called the Communicatio idiomatum, by which qualities that are in strictness only applicable to the divine nature are sometimes predicated of the human, and vice versa.

4. Butterworth includes here a parallel Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel SC 253, pp. 178–79, n. 25.

5. See Bk. I. Ch. III. 3 (p. 87).

Book II, Chapter VII

1. In the Apostolic Canons (49) it is enacted that anyone who baptizes into “three unoriginated beings, or three sons, or three paracletes” shall be deprived of his office. Origen, too, in another place mentions some who affirmed the existence of two Holy Spirits: see Comm. In Ep. ad Titum (Lomm. V. 287f.) “Moreover if there are any who say that it was one Holy Spirit who was in the prophets, but another who was in the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, they commit one and the same offense of impiety as those who, so far as in them lies, cut and rend the nature of the deity, by saying that there is one God of the law and another of the gospels.”

2. See Bk. I. Ch. III. 5 (p. 43), where the Spirit’s operation is said to extend to the saints alone. The Spirit is given potentially to all, but his effective working is confined to the saints, of Old and New Testament times alike.

3. The basis of this “spiritual” interpretation of the Old Testament is given in Con. Celsum VII. 34. “Walking” with God, having “ears to hear,” or having our “eyes” opened, are clearly metaphorical expressions, which make nonsense when interpreted literally. Origen, however, with other writers of the school of Alexandria, uses this poetical phraseology to justify an arbitrary treatment of passages where a literal interpretation is demanded. A merely literal interpretation, even of a plain historical narrative, was despised on the ground that it indicated inferiority of spiritual capacity in the commentator. See Origen, Comm. in Matt. ser. 27, “for the spiritual and prophetic meaning of scripture is veiled beneath the outward narrative, so that all scripture may be understood literally by inferior readers, but in a mystical way by the spiritual and the perfect.”

4. Origen appears to have overlooked Rom 8:26, 27.

Book II, Chapter VIII

1. See Aristotle, De anima 3, 9, 1. “The soul of living creatures is defined by its two powers, that of discernment, which is a function of thought and perception, and that of movement in space.” Philo, Legis. alleg. II. 7 (71) “Soul is a nature that possesses imagination and desire.” See also Tertullian, De anima 14–16.

2. The word translated “natural” is in Greek psychikos, from psyche, soul.

3. Butterworth includes here a parallel Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 201–2, n. 16.

4. Origen calls Ben Sira’s book by the name of Wisdom in Comm. in Ioh. Frag. 74 and 136 (Koetschau).

5. Aristotle (De anima I. 2, 405b) mentions this etymological explanation of the word: “others say that the soul is the cold element, so called from breathing and cooling (katapsyxis).” See also Plato, Cratylus 399 D–E and Tertullian, De anima 25 and 27.

Directly following this paragraph, Butterworth inserts a Greek fragment from Epiphanius. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 204–6, n. 24.

6. See p. 156.

9. See p. 152.

10. See Origen, Comm. in Ioh. XIII. 22, “When we find eyes, eyelids and ears, hands, arms and feet ascribed to God, yes and even wings, we allegorize these terms, despising those who invest God with a form like that of man.”

11. In his De Oratione XXIII. 3, Origen shows that he is alluding to such passages as Gn 3:8 and Ps 11:4.

12. See Book II. Ch. VIII. 1. (p. 151).

Book II, Chapter IX

1. Butterworth includes a Greek fragment parallel to this paragraph, from Justinian. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 211–13, n. 2.

2. See Bk. II. Ch. III. 6 (p. 110f.); also Con. Celsum VI. 59.

3. See Bk. I. Ch. VIII. 3f. (p. 87).

4. With this paragraph cp. Origen, Comm. in Ioh. II. 13. “The evil or the wicked is opposite to the good, and not-being is opposite to being; from which it follows that the wicked and the evil are not-being.”

Also Con. Celsum IV. 70. “For admitted that God, while preserving each individual’s free will, makes use of the evil of wicked men in the administration of the world, so disposing them as to conduce to the benefit of the whole, nevertheless such men are deserving of blame.”

See also Origen, Hom. in Num. XIV. 2 (Lomm. X. 162). Theophilus Alex., Ep. pasch. II. 10 (in Jerome, Ep. 98) says that Origen affirmed that “it was through the negligence and movement and descent of the higher rational creatures that God was led to create this world of diversity.”

13. This sentence, though contrary to Origen’s system considered in a strictly logical way, shows that he was not unmindful of the nobility and necessity of sacrifice.

14. See the next chapter.

Book II, Chapter X

1. See p. 4.

2. Only small fragments of these works are extant. See Lomm. XVII. 55–64. Origen’s views on the Resurrection are clearly set forth in the Con. Celsum V. 17–19, VII. 32 and VIII. 49–50. His endeavor to uphold a spiritual doctrine of the resurrection body was misinterpreted by Methodius, Jerome, and others as an attack upon the Church’s faith.

3. Rufinus, (Apol. in Hieron. II. 4) claims that in his translation of the First Principles he had adhered to the teaching of the Church in the passages dealing with the “resurrection of the flesh.”

4. See Methodius, De Resurr. 25, 2. According to Methodius, Origen taught that in the resurrection men would have the same form as previously, but not a form of flesh.

5. According to Photius, Ep. I. 8, 15 (Migne, PG 102, p. 645), Origen and his followers expressed themselves more clearly than Rufinus will allow on the spiritual nature of the Resurrection. “They will have it that our bodies do not rise with our souls, but that the latter rise without bodies, thus giving the name resurrection to I do not know what. For it should be a resurrection of that which has fallen and died, and not of something which exists and remains in incorruption forever, such as the soul is."

6. See p. 174.

7. See Origen, Con. Celsum V. 23. "We do not, therefore, maintain that the body which has undergone corruption returns to its original nature, any more than the grain of wheat which has undergone corruption returns to the condition of a grain of wheat. What we say is that, just as over the grain of wheat there arises a stalk, so there is implanted in the body a certain life-principle, from which, not being corruptible, the body arises in incorruption." See also Con. Celsum V. 18, 19 and VII. 32.

8. Koetschau assumes a gap here to allow for certain statements made by Origen which Rufinus does not give. See Anathema X of the Second Council of Constantinople: "[If anyone shall say that] the Lord's body after the resurrection was ethereal and spherical in shape, and that after the resurrection all other men's bodies will be the same, and that when the Lord has put away his own body and all men have done likewise, then the nature of bodies will disappear into nonexistence, [let him be anathema]."

Also Justinian, Ep. ad Mennam. Mansi IX 516 D. "He (i.e., Origen) says that in the resurrection the bodies of men will rise spherical."

9. Origen's doctrine of the purifying nature of "eternal fire," stated in this and the succeeding paragraphs, is also described in Con. Celsum V. 16 and VI. 25, 26.

Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 7, says: "As for the fire of Gehenna and the torments, with which holy scripture threatens sinners, Origen does not make them consist in punishments, but in the conscience of sinners, when by the goodness and power of God the whole memory of our offenses is placed before our eyes. The entire crop of our sins springs up as it were from seeds which have remained hidden in the soul, and every shameful and impious act that we have done is represented in an image before our eyes, so that the mind, beholding its former acts of self-indulgence is punished by a burning conscience and stung by the pricks of remorse."

So also Comm. in Ep. ad Ephes. III. 5 and Apol. adv. Rufin. II. 7. Cp. Clem. Alex., Strom. VII. 6, 34 (Stahlin III. 27, 5–8). "We, however, maintain that the fire purifies not flesh, but sinful souls; for we call it not the all-devouring and tormenting, but the discerning fire."

10. And see p. 130.

11. This passage, taken from Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 7, has been omitted by Rufinus. Jerome adds: "In so speaking he clearly supports the doctrine of transmigration taught by Pythagoras and Plato."

12. See also p. 174. This sentence belongs to Rufinus.

13. Directly following this paragraph, Butterworth inserts a Greek fragment from Leontius of Byzantium and Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel, SC 253, pp. 241–42, n. 43.

14. This concluding sentence is from Rufinus.

Book II, Chapter XI

1. For the title see Acts 26:6 and Heb 6:12.

2. See Virgil, Georgics II. 490.

3. These simple folk (Lat. simpliciores), who took the Scriptures literally, are further described in Origen, Comm. In Matt. XVII. 35 (Lomm. IV. 167ff.) and In Cant. Proleg. (Lomm. XIV. 295).

4. The sentence is not complete in Latin, and Koetschau suggests inserting the words lucris habent et, which are translated above.

5. See Bk. II. Ch. VIII. 3, 4 (p. 154ff.).

6. These titles are probably suggested by passages such as Eph 2:2; 1 Cor 12:6, 11; Rom 8:2.

7. See Bk. I. Ch. V. (p. 57ff.).

8. See Bk. II. Ch. VIII. (p. 151ff.).

9. The Greek idea of the heavens was that of a series of revolving spheres, beginning with that of the moon and ending with the sphere of the fixed stars (see par. 191). Philo says (De somniis I. 22) that the lower air nearest the earth is the home of disembodied souls.

10. See Bk. I. Ch. VII. 3 (p. 79ff.).

11. Jerome's paraphrase of this passage is as follows (Ep. ad Avitum 7): "And at the end of the second book, in the course of his argument about our final perfection, he says: When we have progressed so far that we are no longer flesh and bodies, and possibly not even souls, but mind and understanding come to perfection and not blinded by any cloud of disturbing passions, we shall see rational and spiritual beings 'face to face.'"

Book III, Chapter I

1. This chapter, marked as Frag. 26, Koetschau, is preserved in Ch. XXI of the Philocalia, a collection of extracts from Origen's works made by Gregory and Basil. See the Edition of J. A. Robinson, Cambridge 1893, p. 152ff.

2. A similar passage is found in Origen, De Oratione VI. I. "Of things that move some derive their movement from without, such as non-living things and things that are held together simply by their own constitution, as well as things that are moved by nature and soul when occasionally these move not as such but in a manner similar to that of things held together simply by their own constitution. For instance, stones hewn from the quarry and logs which have lost their power of growth, are held together simply by their own constitution and derive their movement from without; and so also do the bodies of animals and the portable fruits of plants which, when changed in position by anyone, change not like animals or plants but like stones or logs which have lost the power of growth. And even if these latter move in virtue of the fact that all bodies are in a state of flux as they decay, nevertheless this movement in the process of decay is inseparably connected with the former kind. A second class of things comprises those that are moved by their inherent nature or soul, which are said, by those who use words in a very precise manner, to be moved out of themselves. A third kind of movement is that observed in animals, which is called movement from within themselves. And I think that the movement of rational creatures is movement through themselves." The Greek prepositions used are ἐξ (out of), ἀπὸ (from within) and διὰ (through). For the sources of this fragment of Origen's teaching on Physics see Clem. Alex. Strom. II. 20, 110 (Stählin II. 173, 17ff.) and Von Arnim, Chrysippi Frag. Phys. 714.

3. Rufinus's qualification of Origen's bold statement will be noticed.

4. The end of the quotation may have dropped out of the Latin text by accident.

5. A characteristic addition of Rufinus. Cp. Bk. III. Ch. V. 3 (p. 313).

6. This quotation is missing, probably by accident, from the text of Rufinus.

7. The heretics are the followers of Marcion, Valentinus and Basilides. Cp. Bk. II. Ch. IX. 5 (p. 165).

8. I.e., the Marcionites and other Gnostics. See Bk. II. Ch. IX. 5 (p. 165).

9. Lit. "with uncovered head," a phrase taken from Plato, Phaedrus p. 243 B.

10. See Book III. Ch. I. 16 (p. 241).

11. This word is missing, probably by accident, from the Greek text. See Latin text on p. 218.

12. This sentence is not in the Greek text as we have it in the Philocalia. Robinson (ed. Philocalia, Int., p. xxxiii) regards it as a summary of the preceding argument, due to Rufinus alone. Koetschau (see note ad. loc.) thinks it is not an addition by Rufinus.

13. Origen deals again with the subject of the "hardening of Pharaoh's heart" in his Comm. in Exod. Ch. X. 27. This is preserved in the Philocalia, Ch. XXVII. (ed. Robinson, p. 242). The passage, Origen says, presented great difficulty to many readers. Some thought that God had mercy on some and hardened others purely at random. Others felt that here was one of the mysteries which no ingenuity could penetrate, but which must be accepted by faith. Others went further and supposed two Gods, a just one and a good one. Origen's own solution lies in the thought that God, like a good physician, works for the salvation of all, though sometimes by painful remedies.

14. This argument is repeated in the Comm. in Exod. (see Philocalia, Ch. XXVII., ed. Robinson, p. 252, 18ff.).

15. The illustrations of the horse and the lad are apparently added by Rufinus.

16. This quotation and the one that follows are added by Rufinus.

17. See Bk. I. Ch. VIII. 1 (p. 85).

18. See Origen, Philocalia, Ch. XXVII. (ed. Robinson, p. 246, 24ff. and 251, 22ff.), and p. 223.

19. See Bk. I. Ch. VI. 3 (p. 73).

20. Rufinus has misunderstood the Greek.

21. See Book II. Chs. IV. and V. (p. 117ff.).

22. See p. 230.

23. See also p. 227.

24. The difference between Rufinus and Origen is well illustrated at this point. Origen is anxious to prove the absolute goodness of God; Rufinus to keep the reader in touch with the faith of the Church. See Bk. I. Ch. V. 4 (p. 61) and Bk. III. Ch. I. 7 (p. 209).

25. The Psalms of Ascents were sung by pilgrims as they went up to the feasts at Jerusalem. See Ex 34:24; 1 Kgs 12:27; Is. 30:29.

26. This paragraph is quoted by Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 8. "In the third book also the following errors are found: If we once admit that it is from previous causes that one vessel was created for honor and another for dishonor, why should we not recur to the secret history of the soul and conclude that it is loved in one man and hated in another by reason of deeds long past, in Jacob's case before he became a supplanter and in Esau's case before his heel was grasped by his brother?"

27. Jerome translates the foregoing lines as follows. Ep. ad Avitum 8. "And in another place: But according to us a vessel which has by reason of pre-existing merits been fashioned for honor may, if it fails to do work worthy of its title, become in another age a vessel of dishonor; and on the other hand a vessel which as a result of former sin has received a name of dishonor may, if in the present life it has willed to receive correction, become in the new creation a vessel sanctified and useful to the Lord, prepared unto every good work."

28. The thought of connecting Egyptians with Idumaeans is suggested by I Kgs 11:14ff. and Dt 23:7, 8. See Philocalia Ch. XIII. 3.

29. [The following] paragraph was omitted, for obvious reasons, by the compilers of the Philocalia. It adds nothing new, and yet was likely to cause unnecessary offense by its detailed inferences from the preceding argument.

Jerome has quoted it for the purposes of condemnation in his Ep. ad Avitum 8. "And he (i.e., Origen) immediately adds: I think it possible for some men who have begun with small faults to reach such a degree of wickedness, if they refuse to change for the better and to amend their sinful life by penitence, that they even become opposing powers; and on the other hand for some so to apply a remedy to their wounds over long spaces of time and to check the offenses that formerly flowed on that they pass to the condition of the best. We have frequently said that in the infinite and unceasing ages during which the soul remains in existence some are so carried downwards towards what is worse that they come to the last degree of evil, while others make such progress that from the last degree of evil they reach the perfection and consummation of virtue. In these words," Jerome adds, "he tries to prove that men, that is, souls, can become daemons, and that on the other hand daemons may be restored to the dignity of angels."

31. See p. 260.

Book III, Chapter II

1. The Epistle of Jude (Ver. 9) alludes to the Assumption (Gr. Analepsis or Anabasis) of Moses, but does not mention its title. See Charles, Assumption of Moses; and the same author's Apoc. and Pseudep. of O. T. II. 421ff.

2. The true meaning of the Hebrew Azazel is unknown. He was an evil spirit dwelling in the wilderness, who was supposed to receive the sins of the people transmitted through the scapegoat on the day of Atonement. The Septuagint renders it Apompeus, the Vulgate simply tribes the goat, capere emissarius, and Rufinus translates Origen's Apompeus by the neutral transmissor. For want of a more suitable term I have used Gesenius' suggestion Averter (see Hastings' Dic. of the Bible, Art. Azazel, S. R. Driver, Vol. I, p. 208a), which probably indicates the true function of Azazel.

3. As this verse is not in the LXX it is impossible to say what word of Origen's it is that Rufinus translates by offocare (v. I. effocare, suffocare). The Vulgate has invasit.

4. The passage has been confused with I Kgs 11:14, where "Satan" means simply an adversary. This was probably Origen's meaning here, misunderstood by Rufinus.

5. Rufinus's sanitas answers to the Greek ἰαμα healing. The meaning is probably, a healing spirit, as opposed to a spirit of provocation.

6. See also Bk. I. Ch. V, 4 (p. 61).

7. See note p. 5, above.

8. See Hermas, Mand. VI. 2.

9. See Ep. Barnabas, 18.

10. See par. 4 (p. 282).

11. A fragment of Origen (In Eph. VI. 12; see Cramer, Catenae Graec. Patr. in N.T. VI. 215) preserves a similar statement in Greek. "I consider that the temptations against flesh and blood are the temptations which are said by him to be human."

12. Koetschau refers to Origen, Sel. in Gen. (Lomm. VIII. 82ff.): "Who else is he who is called both a man and a god, who wrestles and struggles with Jacob, but he who by diverse portions and in diverse manners spoke to the fathers, the holy Word of God?"

13. Rufinus has media, which may be a translation of either μέσα or ἀδιάφορα. The reference is to the Stoic doctrine that all external things and events were indifferent, virtue alone being a good and vice alone an evil Cp. Zeno's saying, preserved in Stobaeus, II. 7, 5a (quoted by Arnold, Roman Stoicism p. 289). "Some things are good, some are evil, some indifferent. Good are wisdom, temperance, justice, fortitude, everything that is virtue or an aspect of virtue; evil are folly, intemperance, injustice, cowardice, everything that is vice or an aspect of vice. Indifferent are life and death, glory and disgrace, pain and pleasure, riches and wealth, disease, health and so forth."

2. See Ch. II. (p. 275ff.).

3. See preceding paragraph.

4. See also Bk. I. Ch. V. 4. (p. 61).

5. Part of the quotation appears to be missing.

6. The interpretation of this passage and of Ps 2:2 as referring to the spiritual powers is found also in Origen's comment on Lam 4:12. See Klostermann's edition, p. 273 Frag. CVII.

7. See Bk. I. Ch. VIII. 1, 2 (p. 85ff.).

8. Koetschau quotes here, as a possible extract from the original work at this point, the passage from Theophilus Alex. Ep. Synod. c. 2. "And the foreknowledge of events, which belongs to the Lord alone, he (i.e., Origen) attributes to the motions of the stars, namely, that from their courses and the variety of their forms daemons can tell the future and either bring things to pass or else require them to be brought to pass by the stars. It is quite clear from this that he approves of idolatry and astrology and of the various deceits of the fraudulent divination practiced by the Gentiles."

With this Koetschau compares the extract from an anonymous writer quoted in Photius. Bibl. Cod. 117, stating the charges which were made (according to this writer falsely) against Origen: "And (Origen teaches) that the doctrines of the Magi are not evil, and that astronomy is able to bring events to pass." It is probable that Rufinus has omitted some things here, but it is not likely that Theophilus has reproduced them fairly.

9. See Plato, Io 533 E-534 D; Phaedrus 245 A.

10. The best known instance is that of the priestess of the Delphic oracle. See Origen, Con. Celsum III. 25, VII. 3.

11. This epithet is doubtless due to Rufinus, not to Origen.

12. See p. 284.

13. Cp. the parallel passage in Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 8, "And in the same book he says: Moreover we must also inquire why the soul of man is influenced in different directions now by one group of powers and now by another. And he supposes that the souls of some people have previously acquired merit before they came into bodies, as was the case with John, who leaped for joy in his mother's womb when at the voice of Mary's salutation Elizabeth confessed herself to be unworthy of conversing with her." See Luke 1:41-44.

14. This passage also has a parallel in Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 8. "And immediately following this he adds: On the other hand little boys and almost infants are sometimes possessed by evil spirits, and diviners and soothsayers are inspired to such a degree that some are possessed by a daemon python right from their earliest years. That these should be abandoned by the providence of God, when they have done nothing to warrant this kind of madness, cannot be maintained by him who believes that nothing happens apart from God and that all things are governed by his justice."

15. On this point Clement of Alexandria (Stromata III. 3, 20; Stählin II. 204, 27ff.) quotes Plato, Politicus 273 B C and (Stromata IV. 12, 83; Stählin II. 285, 3ff.) Basileides, of whom he says: "The hypothesis of Basileides is that the soul undergoes punishment here for sins committed in another life."

See Jerome, Ep. ad Hedibiam, 10: "We must not say, as do Pythagoras and Plato and their disciples, who under the name of Christians introduce the doctrines of the gentiles, that souls have fallen from heaven and in accordance with the diversity of their merits pay the penalties for ancient sins in bodies of one sort or another."

Book III, Chapter IV

1. For the deadness of the body apart from the soul see Justin, De Resurr. X. 2: "The soul is in the body; but the body without the soul is not alive, and when the soul leaves it, it no longer exists."

See also Plato, Cratylus 399 D E. Marcion and Basileides taught that the soul alone was saved, not the body (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I. xxv. 2 and I. xix. 3). Origen's remark on the hostility of body and spirit to each other alludes to such scriptural passages as Rom 8:6, 10; Gal 5:17; Jn 6:63, but the term "flesh" in St. Paul's writings is quite different in meaning from the term "body" as used. See p. 303f.

2. This is Plato's division of the soul. See Plato Repub. IV. 436 A-441C; Timaeus 42 A.

3. See also pp. 266 and 297.

4. See p. 301.

5. See Clem. Alex., Excerpta ex Theodoto 50, 1 (Stählin III. 123, 9ff.). "Taking dust from the earth, not from the dry earth, but a portion of the diverse and manifold matter, God created an earthly and material soul, irrational and similar to that of the beasts. This is the man formed 'according to the image.' But the man formed 'according to the likeness' of the Creator himself is he whom the Creator breathed into and implanted in the first man."

The "irrational spirit" or "bodily spirit" is also mentioned by Clement in Stromata VI. 136, 1 and VII. 79, 6.

Cp. also the Valentinian doctrine in Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I. v. 5). For the scriptural reference see Rom 8:7.

6. See pp. 5 and 302.

7. Cp. Origen Comm. in Ioh. XXXII. 18, "I observe in the whole of scripture a distinction made between the soul and the spirit, the soul being indifferent in character and receptive of either virtue or vice." So, too, Comm. In Ep. ad Rom. I. 18, "When it is said that the flesh lusteth against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, the middle position is undoubtedly occupied by the soul, which either acquiesces in the longings of the spirit or else inclines to the lusts of the flesh. If it joins itself to the flesh, the body becomes one with it in impurity and lust, but if it associates with the spirit, the spirit will become one with it."

8. This is a bold piece of ethical reasoning. It should be compared with the account of the soul in the Greek fragment, not necessarily a literal one, taken from Gregory of Nyssa, which is discussed in n. 7. to Bk. I. Ch. VIII, on p. 445.

Book III, Chapter V

1. See Bk. I. Ch. VI. (p. 69f.)

2. I.e., Genesis.

3. See Bk. I. Ch. IV. 3 (p. 52f.)

4. The passage beginning with the sentence and ending at "will exist in its turn" has a parallel in Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 9. "And again in regard to the world (Origen says): Our opinion is that before this world there existed another and that another will exist after it. Would you learn that after the dissolution of this world another will come into existence? Hear the words of the prophet Isaiah: 'There shall be a new heaven and a new earth, which I will cause to endure in my sight.' Would you know that before the construction of this world other worlds existed in the past? Listen to Ecclesiastes: 'What is it that hath been? Even that which shall be. And what is it that hath been made? The very thing that shall be. And there is nothing new under the sun, nothing which can speak and say, Behold this is new. For it hath been already, in the ages of old which were before us.' This testimony proves the existence not only of past but also of future worlds, not all existing side by side at the same time, but one after another."

5. See Bk. II. Ch. III. 1-5 (pp. 103-10).

6. Origen used the word katabole as proof of his belief that the present world is a descent from a more perfect condition which preceded it, and that the souls of most men were enclosed in bodies and sent here as a punishment for former sins, a few great ones like St. Paul being allowed to come as guides and teachers of the rest. See Origen's comment on Jn 17:24 in his Comm. in Ioh. XIX. 22, where he maintains that this meaning must be attached to katabole, otherwise ktisis would have been used.

Jerome, in his Commentary on Ephesians, in which, as the preface admits, he relied largely on Origen, gives the same interpretation of Eph 1:4 ("before the foundation of the world"). This furnishes a handle to Rufinus, when in his Apology (see Bk. I. Chs. 25-27) he attacks Jerome for his Origenistic teaching.

7. The illustration is probably an addition by Rufinus. It is from St. Matthew, not St. John, and it does not contain the word katabole, but arche (beginning). Katabole occurs in Mt 25:34.

8. With the passage beginning here and ending at "the present visible world was instituted" compare the parallel in Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 9. Jerome's version is nearer the original than that of Rufinus. "And immediately after this he (i.e., Origen) adds: I think we must believe that there is in the regions above a more divine dwelling-place and a true rest, where rational creatures used to live before they descended to these lower regions and traveled from invisible to visible surroundings, and where, before they were cast down to the earth and forced to wear gross bodies, they enjoyed a primeval blessedness. And, so, God the Creator made for them bodies appropriate to their lowly stations, and fashioned this visible world, and sent into it ministers to work for the correction and salvation of those who had fallen. Of these ministers some obtained fixed positions and became obedient to the necessities of the world, while others zealously performed the duties laid upon them at the various times which are known to God the Artificer. To the former class belong the sun, moon and stars, which are called by the apostle 'the creation,' and these have been given their place in the higher regions of the universe. This 'creation' has been subjected to vanity by being clothed in gross bodies and made visible to sight. Nevertheless it was subjected to vanity not of its own will, but by the will of him who subjected it 'in hope.'"

9. See pp. 70, 93f., 96.

10. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 9 (following the last passage quoted). "And again: Others, however, in their various places and times, which the Artificer alone knows, undertake the governance of the world. These we believe to be the angels."

11. See Vergil, Aeneid VI. 739f.

12. For the first part of this paragraph see Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 9. "And a little way further on: This system of things, the universe in its entirety, is ruled by the providence of God, in such a way that some powers fall suddenly from the higher spheres, while others glide gradually to the earth, some descend of their own free will, while others are hurled down against their will, some freely undertake the duty of stretching out a hand to those who are falling, while others are forced without their own consent to continue to perform an allotted task for a certain definite period. And again: From which it follows that these different movements result in the creation of different worlds, and after this world in which we live there will arise another world quite unlike it. And no one can estimate the precise worth of those who in different degrees fall or rise, or the rewards due for virtue or the punishments for sin, either in the present or the future or in any time whatever either past or to come, nor can anyone bring the universe once again to a single end, except God alone the Creator of all, who knows the reasons why he allows some to perform their own will and to sink gradually from the higher spheres to the lowest, while others he begins to visit and gives them a helping hand in order to lead them slowly back to their original condition and to set them once again on high." Rufinus has greatly abbreviated this.

13. Origen has in mind such an incident as Lk 18:41f.

Book III, Chapter VI

1. See Bk. II. Chs. X. and XI. (pp. 173–92).

2. Plato, Theaetetus 176 B. This was a favorite passage of Clement of Alexandria: see Protrepticus XII. 122, 4; Stromata II. 97, 1; 100, 3.

3. For the distinction drawn between the "image" and the "likeness" see Origen Con. Celsum IV. 30, Comm. In Ep. ad Rom. IV. 5; Irenaeus Adv. Haer. V. 6; Clem. Alex. Stromata II. 38, 5.

4. For this paragraph, which has been toned down by Rufinus, see the parallel in Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 9a. "And when he enters upon a discussion of the end, he speaks as follows: Because, as we have frequently said before, a fresh beginning arises out of the end, we must inquire whether there will then be bodies, or whether we are to live without bodies since these will have been reduced to nothing; and whether we must believe that the life of incorporeal beings is incorporeal, such as we know the life of God to be. Now there can be no doubt that, if all bodies belong to this sensible world which is called by the apostle the world of 'things visible' the life of incorporeal beings will be an incorporeal one." This statement formed one of the grounds of Origen's condemnation. See Anathema XI. of the Second Council of Constantinople, 553: "[If anyone shall say] that the judgment to come signifies the complete destruction of bodies and that the end of the story is an immaterial essence, and that nothing material will thereafter exist, but only mind [let him be anathema]." See Theophilus Alex. Ep. Synod. 2; and cp. Bk. II. Ch. III. 2 (p. 104).

5. Koetschau regards this sentence as being added by Rufinus.

6. Koetschau inserts here these two paragraphs from Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 9a. Following Schnitzer, he thinks that they fill up gaps left by Rufinus at this point. The reader will have very little doubt that this is so.

7. The quotation from Jerome ends here. Origen's doctrine was condemned its Platonism, in denying the resurrection of the body. Cp. Plato, Phaedo 114 C. "Those who are thoroughly purified by philosophy live entirely without bodies in the age to come."

8. Butterworth here includes a parallel Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of this fragment see Crouzel SC 269, p. 131, n. 13.

9. Here again Rufinus has greatly abbreviated the original, as will be seen from a comparison with Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 10. "And again, when he is arguing for a variety of worlds and maintaining that angels may become daemons and daemons angels or men, or that on the contrary men may become daemons and any being may become any other, he confirms his opinion by concluding in the following way: Nor can we doubt that after certain periods of time matter will exist again and bodies will be created and a world of diversity constructed in conformity with the varying wills of rational creatures, who after becoming perfect in blessedness at the end of all things have gradually fallen to lower levels and have admitted evil to so great an extent as to be turned into the opposite of what they were, by reason of their unwillingness to preserve their first estate and to retain their blessedness uncorrupted. And this, too, we must know, that many rational creatures preserve their first estate to the second or third or fourth world, giving no occasion for a change in their condition; others will fall so little from their original state that they appear to have lost scarcely anything; while some have to be hurled in complete ruin into the lowest pit. And God the dispenser of all things alone knows how to make use each class in the creation of new worlds, in conformity with merit and opportunity and motives, so that they may be the means, of initiating and sustaining the course of the world; and one who has surpassed all others in wickedness and has completely lowered himself to the level of the earth may in another world, afterwards to be constructed, become a devil, 'the beginning of the creation of God,' to be a laughing-stock to the angels who have lost their primeval virtue." For the last sentence see Jb 40:14 (LXX).

10. See Bk. II. Ch. III. 2, 3 (p. 104ff.).

11. Rufinus has apparently omitted some of Origen's statements about the final unity of all spiritual beings. See the four last Anathemas of the Second Council of Constantinople, which condemn all who assert the following doctrines. XII: "That the heavenly powers and all men and the devil and the spiritual hosts of wickedness are as unchangeably united to the Word of God as the Mind itself which is by them called Christ and which was in the form of God and, as they assert, emptied itself; and that there will be an end to the kingdom of Christ." XIII is similar. XIV runs as follows: "That all rational creatures will form one unity, hypostases and numbers alike being destroyed when bodies are destroyed; and that the knowledge of purely rational creatures will be accompanied by a dissolution of the worlds, an abandonment of bodies and an abolition of names; and that there will be an identity between knowledge and hypostases; and that in what they call the restoration only the bare spirits will exist." XV: "That the life of spirits will be the same as it formerly was, when they had not yet descended or fallen, so that the beginning is the same as the end, and the end is the measure of the beginning."

12. Origen's reference here is to the devil, though this is concealed by Rufinus. See Theophilus Alex., Ep. pasch. Gr. Frag. 16 (in Doctrina patrum ed. Diekamp, p. 180, 12): "He has dared to pay great honor to the devil, saying that when he is freed from all sin he will be restored to his ancient rank, and that the kingdom of Christ will come to an end and that Jesus will then together with the devil be reigned over by God."

15. I.e., Aristotle's aether. See Zeller, Aristotle and the earlier Peripatetics, (Eng. trans. Costelloe and Muirhead 1897), pp. 475–77.

See also Cicero, Academica I. 7, 26: "There is also a fifth element, out of which the stars and minds are constituted, which Aristotle maintained to have a nature of its own and to be something quite different from the four which I have mentioned above."

Origen again states his objection to the hypothesis of this "fifth body," in Con. Celsum IV. 60.

17. See Plato, Phaedo 79 A.

18. See p. 70.

19. See also Bk. II. Ch. III. 7 (p. 114ff.).

20. Origen's inference from 1 Cor 15:28, that Christ's kingdom would one day come to an end, was one of the many charges made against him. See Theophilus Alex., Ep. pasch. (Jerome, Ep. 96) and Ep. synod. (Jerome, Ep. 92); and also p. 459, n. 11.

21. With this sentence cp. Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 10 "And after a very long discussion, in which he asserts that all bodily nature must be changed into spiritual bodies of extreme fineness and that the whole of matter must be transformed into a single body of the utmost purity, clearer than all brightness and of such a quality as the human mind cannot conceive, at the close he states: And God shall be all in all, so that the whole of bodily nature may be resolved into that substance which is superior to all others, namely, into the divine nature, than which nothing can be better."

Book IV, Chapter I

1. Chs. I and II, with part of Ch. III., marked as Frag. 28, Koetschau, are preserved in Ch. I of the Philocalia. See the edition of J. A. Robinson, p. 7ff. The titles of the chapters, which form together a single title to Ch. I of the Philocalia, are here separated to agree with the chapter division found in Rufinus.

2. See also Origen, Con. Celsum I. 26, 27.

3. Mt 24:14. The quotation is omitted in the Greek, no doubt by mistake.

4. The Christian argument from Gn 49:10 is given also by Justin Martyr, I Apol. XXXII; Dial. cum Tryph. LII.

5. In Origen's Ep. ad Africanum 14 (Migne, PG 11, p. 82f.) he states that the Ethnarch has almost the powers of a king granted to him by the Romans. The Jewish contention, therefore, was not utterly without force.

6. For the two forms of the quotation see Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. CXX.

7. For the title see LXX, Ps 44.

8. See Origen, Hom. In Luc. 32 (Lomm. V. 208). The "one year" is based upon Lk 4:19. In another passage, Comm. In Matt. ser. 40 (Lomm. IV. 276), Origen gives the time as three years.

9. Rufinus seems to have misunderstood the original.

Book IV, Chapter II

1. See Bk. II. Ch. V. 1 (p. 125ff.).

2. See also Origen, Con. Celsum III. 45; VII. 10.

3. Books, that is, such as the Gnostics claimed to possess.

4. Hermas, Vis. II. 4, 3. Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria both treated Hermas as an inspired writer, as Origen does here. His book was read in the Church for several centuries, but had fallen into disuse in the West by the time of Jerome (De vir. illus. X.).

5. Why the number six is perfect is explained by Philo, de opificio mundi 3. A perfect number is equal to the sum of its factors; i.e., $6 = 1 \times 2 \times 3$. The number six is also the product of the first male number, 3, and the first female number, 2. The six days, Philo tells us, do not represent length of time, but order in thought. Neither he nor Origen would have regarded the days as literal periods.

6. For the same quotation in a slightly different form see p. 120f.

7. A few words appear to be missing from the Latin at this point, and Koetschau replaces them thus.

Book IV, Chapter III

1. This sentence (to "moon and stars") is found in Justinian Ep. ad Mennam (Mansi IX. 533). Koetschau marks it Frag. 29.

2. See also cp. Philo, Legis alleg. I. 14. "Let not our reasoning admit such gross impiety as to suppose that God works as a farmer and plants gardens."

3. See also Philo, De poster. Cain I. I.

4. Rufinus has omitted this example.

5. The word only occurs in two MSS of the LXX, Dt 14:5. The tragelaphos was a fantastic animal mentioned by many Greek writers, but the creature of Dt 14:5 is really elaphos, the hart or perhaps roebuck (see Hastings, D.B., art. Hart, G.E. Post).

6. Gr. gryps, a variety of eagle. Lv 11:13; Dt 14:12.

7. The founder of an ascetic sect in Samaria, which maintained an existence for several centuries at least, although Origen says (Con. Celsum VI. II) that he did not suppose the whole number of the Dositheans in his day amounted to thirty. See Dic. of Christ. Biog. s.v.

8. Omitted in Rufinus's text.

9. Koetschau regards this as an addition by Rufinus.

10. Rufinus has here omitted a passage, probably because he could not understand it. Origen is certainly not clear, but his meaning seems to be as follows. The scriptures contain many composite narratives, one part being historically true and the other false. In the story of the Fall, for instance, he would have regarded Adam and Eve as being historically true and God walking in the garden as historically false. He would then interpret the whole story allegorically, feeling that the literal, or "bodily," meaning was valueless. In other instances the literal meaning has a value of its own: e.g. the Commandments. But even here the deeper meanings, when discovered, are the more important.

11. Not in Rufinus.

12. Rufinus has omitted a long passage at this point. As the passage contains no unorthodox doctrines the reason for its omission may be simply that Rufinus did not understand all the allusions in it, which are certainly far from clear.

For a discussion of this passage see Crouzel SC 269, pp. 207–8, n. 36–36a.

13. It is possible that this phrase alludes to the baptismal formula.

14. In this passage Origen has in mind the two genealogies of our Lord, found respectively in St. Matthew and St. Luke. It is clear that these genealogies, with their manifest differences, would have set him a task in spiritual interpretation. He appears to have solved the problem by taking the Matthaean genealogy to indicate the Israelites in a literal sense, and the Lucan the spiritual Israelites. The former is traced through the kings of Judah, whom Origen calls the demarchs ("rulers of the people"), and ends with Abraham. The latter, which descends through private persons, goes back through Jacob (whose divinely ordered birth—Gn 25:21–23—is here emphasized) to Adam, who is interpreted as Christ, in accordance with St. Paul's parallel in 1 Cor 15:45. So the Church, the bride of Christ (Eph 5:31–32) is seen in Eve; and even Cain, too, is a figure of the Church. Rufinus could have had no reason to object to these interpretations. The reason he omitted the passage was because he did not understand it.

15. The Ebionites were a sect of Jewish Christians, who kept the Law. Their name indicates that they practiced, at least originally, a voluntary poverty and simplicity of life, such as that described in Acts 2:44–45. It has, of course, no reference whatever to poverty of mind, as Origen declares. For a full account of them see Smith's Dictionary of Christian Biography s. v. Ebionism and Ebionites.

16. (Omitted from Rufinus).

17. A sentence appears to be missing from the Greek at this point.

18. Reading, with Koetschau, Παύλου for the manifestly corrupt Θεοῦ of the text.

19. The text of Rufinus continues at this point from p. 398.

20. See Origen, Hom. In Num. XI. 4. "The name Israel is found even among the orders of angels; nay, they are more truly to be called Israel, for they are more truly the 'mind seeing God'; for this is the meaning of the word Israel."

21. This paragraph was omitted by the compilers of the Philocalia.

22. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 11. "Also in the fourth book, which is the last book of this work, he (i.e., Origen) inserts the following statements which must be condemned by the churches of Christ: 'And perhaps, just as those who die in this world by the separation of body and soul obtain different positions in the world below in accordance with the differences of their deeds, so those who die, so to speak, in the realm of the heavenly Jerusalem, descend to the lower regions of our world, in such a way as to occupy different positions on earth in proportion to their merits.'"

23. Lat. inferus, translating the Gr. ᾗδης Hades. [p 303]

24. Lat. mansiones: Gr. μοναί. See Jn 14:2. [303]

25. This sentence is omitted from the Philocalia, but both Koetschau and Robinson (ed. Philocalia Int., p. xxxvii) regard it as part of Origen's text. The LXX reading is literally, "the lowest Hades," but Rufinus reads "the lower Hades" (de infero inferiori), which was no doubt Origen's reading.

26. This paragraph is also missing from the Philocalia.

27. See Origen, Hom. In Num. XXVII. 2, where he says that Nm 33:1–2 must refer to the spiritual journey from this world to the heavenly abodes.

28. Butterworth, following Koetschau, places an extract from Jerome in the text at this point. For a discussion of this extract see Crouzel SC 269, pp. 218–20, n. 62c.

29. For the whole passage see Gn 10, 11, 25, 36, 46; and for the quotations Dt 10:22 (Gn 46:27, Ex 1:5, Gn 22:17).

30. The extract from the Philocalia ends here.

31. See p. 400.

32. The following extract from Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 11, appears to belong here. "Not content with this, he (i.e., Origen) says that in the end of all things, when we return to the heavenly Jerusalem, wars of hostile powers will arise against the people of God, in order that their valor may not be idle, but that they may display it in battles and so gain strength, which would be impossible unless like brave men they had first resisted adversaries. And we read in the book of Numbers that these have conquered by the exercise of reason and order, and by skill in fighting" (cf. Nm 31).

Cp. too, Origen, Hom. In Num. VII. 5: "It is necessary, therefore, that the spiritual hosts of wickedness, who are said to be in the heavenly places, should be conquered by you, in order that you may speedily pass over to the heavenly realms and dwell there instead of them."

33. Origen apparently made much more of the "eternal gospel" than Rufinus allows us to see. Cp. Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 12. "And when he (i.e., Origen) has said that the 'eternal gospel' of the Apocalypse of John, that is, the gospel which is to exist in the heavens, is as far superior or to our gospel as the preaching of Christ is to the rites of the old law, he goes to the extreme length of inferring (what it is impious even to have thought of) that Christ will also suffer in the air and in the realms above for the salvation of the daemons. And although he does not actually say so, yet it must be understood as a logical consequence, that as God was made man for the sake of men, to set them free, so also for the salvation of the daemons he will be made what they are, for whose liberation he is then to come. And in case it should be supposed that we are putting our own interpretation upon his statements, we will give his very words: 'For just as he fulfilled the shadow of the law through the shadow of the gospel, so because all law is a copy and shadow of the heavenly rites, we must carefully inquire whether we ought not to regard even the heavenly law and the rites of the higher worship not as possessing completeness, but as standing in need of the truth of that gospel which in the Apocalypse of John is called the 'eternal gospel,' in comparison, that is, with this gospel of ours, which is temporal and was preached in a world and an age that are destined to pass away.'

34. Directly following this passage Butterworth includes a Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 228–30, n. 80.

35. For the reference to the Hebrew teacher see the Greek fragment in Bk. I., Ch. III. 4. (p. 42).

36. See pp. 7 and 114.

37. See also p. 14.

Book IV, Chapter IV

1. Here Butterworth inserts a parallel Greek fragment from Marcellus. See Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 238–39, n. 1.

2. See Jerome, Apol. adv. Rufin. II. 19. "There exists in Greek a dialogue between Origen and Candidus, the defender of the heresy of Valentinus. . . . Candidus admits that the Son is of the substance of the Father, but errs in asserting a probole, that is, an act of separation. On the other side Origen, in the manner of Arius and Eunomius, controverts the assertion that the Son was produced or born, for fear of dividing God the Father into parts; but he asserts that he is a sublime and pre-eminent creature who came into existence by the will of the Father like all other creatures."

3. See p. 26.

4. Butterworth here includes two Greek fragments, from Justinian and then Athanasius. For a discussion of these fragments see Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 242–46, n. 9.

5. This was what Arius afterwards did say.

6. Butterworth includes a Greek fragment from Athanasius directly following this passage. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 269, p. 247, n. 13.

7. See Bk. II. Ch. VI. 1, 2. (p. 135ff.).

8. See also Origen, Comm. in Iob. VI. 39, where Heracleon's interpretation of the passage is given.

9. See Bk. II. Ch. VIII. 2, 4 (pp. 153 and 157). Koetschau suspects an omission at this point, containing Frag. 35 from Justinian, Ep. ad Mennam (Mansi IX. 506); "that the soul of the Lord pre-existed, and that God the Word was united to it before he took flesh of the Virgin."

For more on this Greek fragment see Crouzel SC 269, pp. 250–251, n. 30.

10. Here Butterworth inserts a parallel Greek fragment from Theophilus of Alexandria. See Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 251–52, n. 31, for a discussion of this fragment.

11. See p. 419.

12. See also p. 354.

13. Butterworth includes a parallel Greek fragment from Theophilus of Alexandria. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 253–54, n. 34.

14. This paragraph, in which Origen asserted the pre-existence of the soul of Christ, and his various manifestations to the angelic orders, has been considerably modified and abbreviated by Rufinus. The following quotations give some idea of the original text.

Anathema VII, Second Council of Constantinople: "If anyone shall say that Christ, who is said to have been 'in the form of God' and to have been united with God the Word before all ages and in the last days to have emptied himself to the level of man, because he pitied (as they say) the various falls that had happened to those who originally belonged to the same unity, and wished to restore them, went through all modes of being and was invested with different kinds of bodies and took different names, becoming all things to all, being changed into an angel among the angels, into a power among the powers, and into other ranks or species of rational beings according to the necessities of each particular case, and then at last shared in flesh and blood like us and became a man among men,. . . let him be anathema."

This is equivalent to the Fourth Anathema of the Emperor Justinian against Origen, which runs as follows: "If anyone shall say or think that the Word of God has become like all the heavenly orders, having become a cherub for the cherubim, a seraph for the seraphim and something equivalent to every single one of the powers let him be anathema."

See also Jerome, Apol. II. 12, where he asserts the following to be one of the distinctly heretical statements of the First Principles: "that the soul of the Savior existed before it was born of Mary, and that it was this soul which was in the form of God, and thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but emptied itself, taking the form of a servant."

Also, Theophilus Alex., Ep. synod. 4 (Jerome, Ep. 92): "besides in the books on 'First Principles,' he even endeavors to persuade us that... the living Word of God did not assume a human body; for he writes, contrary to the statement of the apostle (i.e., in Phil 2:7), that he who being in the form of God was equal with God was not the Word of God, but a soul that descended from the heavenly region and emptying itself of the form of its eternal majesty assumed a human body. In saying this he most clearly contradicts John who writes: 'And the Word was made flesh.' Nor is it credible that it was the soul of the Savior and not the Word of God which possessed the form of and equality with the Father's majesty."

Also, Ep. pasch. II. 14 (Jerome, Ep. 98) and Bk. II. Ch. VI. 3 (p. 138).

15. See Bk. II. Chs. I. and III. (pp. 93ff. and 103ff.).

16. Elsewhere Origen speaks of Wisdom as an inspired book: cp. Con. Celsum III. 72.

17. See Bk. II. Ch. I. 4 (p. 96ff.).

18. See p. 97.

19. Enoch, Ch. XXI. I. In Con. Celsum V. 54, Origen says that the book of Enoch was not received everywhere in the Church as inspired.

20. Slav. Enoch Ch. XL. 1, 12. The Greek text is found in Clem. Alex. Eclog. prophet. 2, 1.

21. Butterworth inserts a Greek fragment from Justinian directly following this paragraph. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 262–63, n. 63.

22. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 13. "And again he (i.e., Origen) blasphemes against the Son by speaking in the following manner: For if the Son knows the Father, it would seem that by virtue of this knowledge he can comprehend the Father, as if we were to say that the mind of the craftsman knows the measure of his craft. Nor can we doubt that if the Father is in the Son, he is also comprehended by him in whom he is. If, however, we mean that kind of comprehension in which one comprehends another not only by understanding and wisdom but in the sense of holding the object of his knowledge under his authority and power, then we cannot say that the Son comprehends the Father." Rufinus has compressed this into one short sentence and has evaded all the points raised by Origen.

Directly following this passage, Butterworth inserts a Greek fragment from Justinian. See Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 263–66, n. 64., for a discussion of the fragment.

23. This sentence is Rufinus's substitute for a longer and more categorical statement, which is preserved by Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 14. "The following passage, too, convicts him (i.e., Origen) of believing in the transmigration of souls and the annihilation of bodies: If anyone can show that incorporeal and rational nature, when deprived of a body, can live by itself, and that it is in a worse condition when clothed with a body and in a better when it lays the body aside, then no one can doubt that bodies did not exist in the beginning, but are now created at intervals on account of the different movements of rational creatures, in order to supply a covering to such as need it; and that on the other hand, when these creatures have risen out of the degradation of their falls to a better condition, the bodies are dissolved into nothing; and that these changes go on happening forever." The later half of this quotation is the equivalent of Frag. 40, inserted in the text a few lines further on.

For more on this passage from Jerome see Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 267–70, n. 66.

24. See p. 101.

Directly following this passage, Butterworth inserts a Greek fragment from Justinian. For a discussion of the fragment see Crouzel, SC 269, pp. 268–70, n. 66.

25. Origen went farther than this, and asserted a kinship between man and God. See Jerome, Ep. ad Avitum 14, "And in case we should suppose that the impiety of these previous quotations was too little, at the end of the same volume he adds the following: That all rational natures, that is, the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, all angels, authorities, dominions and other powers, and even man himself in virtue of his soul's dignity, are of one substance. For he says, God and his only begotten Son and the Holy Spirit are conscious of an intellectual and rational nature: so are the angels and authorities and the other powers; so, too is the "inner man," who was made in the image and likeness of God. From which the conclusion is drawn that God and all these creatures are in some way of one substance. He adds this phrase, "in some way," in order to escape the charge of gross impiety; and the man who in another place is unwilling to admit that the Son and the Holy Spirit are of the Father's substance, lest he should seem to be dividing the divine essence into parts (see p. 27), is here distributing the essence of Almighty God to angels and men."

Cp. Origen, Exhort. in Martyr. 47. "Man earnestly desires life, deriving confidence from the rational nature of his soul, as being in some way akin to God."

Origen (ca. 184-ca. 253) is considered the most important biblical scholar and theologian of the early Greek Church, and some have even called him the finest scholar of the first millennium of Christianity. He fits into a legacy of prominent figures from the Alexandrian Church, which was under persecution during his time. His father was martyred when he was seventeen, and several of the students whom he converted to Christianity also went on to martyrdom.

On First Principles was one of Origen's earliest and most significant writings. Another was his Hexapla, an enormous edition of the Old Testament arranged in six columns of Hebrew and Greek text. It is known as a colossal landmark in the study of scripture. Many of his homilies were also recorded, and are widely read today.

Around 250 AD, Origen was tortured by civil authorities in an effort to make him apostatize. While they did not succeed, Origen died a confessor from related causes a few years later.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Introduction.

SKETCH OF LIFE.

DIONYSIUS was born¹ in Athens, A.D. 5, nine years after the birth of Jesus Christ. He was educated first at Athens, then at Heliopolis, in Egypt. There, at the age of twenty-five, he witnessed, with Apollophanes, the miraculous darkness² of the sun, which occurred at the time of the Crucifixion, A.D. 30.³ Returned to Athens, he married a woman of noble birth named Damaris, and was elected one of the nine Archons of Athens. Having filled the office of Archon without reproach, he was elected member of the Areopagus, a court of justice consisting of fifty-one citizens of Athens, distinguished for birth, wealth, intelligence, and character. In A.D. 49,⁴ nineteen years after the Crucifixion, and ninth of Claudius, St. Paul was brought before the court of the Areopagus as the setter forth of strange gods, because he was preaching Jesus and the Resurrection. The Court of the Areopagus was the guardian of the religion of Athens, and had condemned Socrates to death, on the ground that, by teaching one God as supreme, he dishonoured the gods of Greece. The Athenians, however, were so much ashamed of their treatment of that great philosopher, that no person afterwards was subjected to the same fate for the same cause. Hence St. Paul escaped. Nor was this all. Dionysius, with other illustrious men, clave unto Paul, and embraced the Christian Faith. The moving cause of his conversion was, that he learned from St. Paul that the darkness which he had observed in Egypt was coeval⁵ with the Crucifixion. He was baptized 3rd October, A.D. 49, in the forty-fourth year of his age. St. Paul soon after left Athens, attended by Dionysius, who was his companion for three years,⁶ during which time he was prepared for the Diaconate, and formed that intimate friendship with Timothy which lasted until death. Dionysius was present with Hierotheus, St. Paul, St. Peter, St. James, St. John, and other Apostles at the funeral rites of the Blessed Virgin, who died at Jerusalem, A.D. 54,⁷ twenty-four years after the Ascension, in the seventy-second year of her age. Dionysius was, in due time, ordained Priest. We do not know the date, but we gather the fact from his letter to Demophilus, in which he intimates that he had admitted Demophilus to the order of the Therapeutæ. It was the priest's function alone to admit to that order. Dionysius would seem to have been a member of a College¹ of Clergy in Athens, whose duty was to impart instruction to candidates for baptism, to study the higher theology, and to impart² such information as was needed by the Church at large. Dionysius of Corinth says that he took the oversight *τῇ ἐπισκοπῇ*³ of the Parish of Athens. He also wrote letters to individuals who sought explanations of statements contained in his works in circulation. He would appear to have travelled to other centres. He was absent from Athens when Demophilus was guilty of the act of insubordination, which called forth his instructive letter in rebuke. The same letter alludes to his visit to Crete, where he was the guest of Carpus, who afterwards became Bishop of the Troad, 2 Timothy iv. 13. Dionysius was ordained Bishop of Athens by St. Paul, in succession to Hierotheus, who, most probably, accompanied St. Paul in his first journey to Spain.⁴ St. Paul, before his martyrdom, sent for Dionysius to Rome to take charge of the congregations planted by himself in Gaul. Dionysius arrived too late to see the Apostle alive, but Clement confirmed the commission, and Dionysius, with Rusticus, Eleutherius, and others, departed for Gaul. They arrived first at Arles, where Regulus was appointed Bishop, in succession to Trophimus,⁵ who had returned to Asia in consequence of sickness. Dionysius, with his two companions, ultimately established themselves in Lutetia Parisiorum, the emporium of trade between Britain and the Mediterranean. There, as a centre of operations, he remained till A.D. 96, when he returned to Athens for the purpose of meeting St. John after his release from Patmos. St. John and Dionysius met at Ephesus to "speak face to face," and it is probable that the last chapter was then added to St. John's Gospel. The tenth letter of Dionysius clearly implies that St. John's Gospel was then in circulation, and already read by Dionysius. The last chapter was added to correct an impression prevalent in the Church that St. John should not die. Dionysius remained in Asia for two years. Before his return to Gaul St. Timothy died in the reign of Nerva, 97-98—as Polycrates, a writer of the second century, and Bishop of Ephesus, affirms. It is probable that Dionysius revised and completed his works during that time. Upon his return to Gaul, Dionysius presented a copy of the "Divine Names" to Eugenius Marcellus, as to a second Timothy in pious memory of the first.⁶

Through his sanctity, learning, and venerable age, Dionysius

acquired a commanding influence in Spain, Germany and Britain (*παρὰ τοῖς ἑσπερίοις μέγεσι*¹). The Druid Priests² made desperate efforts to thwart him. His influence became known in Imperial Rome. Nearly the whole of the last years of the Emperor Trajan³ were spent in the East, for the subjugation of the Parthian and other kingdoms. In A.D. 115, he left Syria for the Parthian expedition. In August, A.D. 117, he died at Selinus in Cilicia, on his return to Rome. Hadrian was proclaimed Emperor at Antioch, 11th August, 117. He at once arranged matters in the East, and arrived at Rome, 118 A.D., where, by concessions to the Senate and gifts to the people, he consolidated his position. In A.D. 119 he began his tour of the provinces, by passing through Gaul, on his way to Britain. He then sent the Prefect of Gaul to allure Dionysius from Christianity to Paganism. In that case, he was to bring him with honour to the Imperial presence. If he failed, he was to cut off his head. Dionysius rejected the Imperial honours, and chose the crown of martyrdom. With his two companions, united in life, and in death not divided, he joyfully sealed his testimony in his own blood, and "migravit ad Christum," 9th October, A.D. 119,⁴ in the seventieth year of his Christian course and in the one hundred and fourteenth of his natural life. The hill on which he suffered is hence called Montmartre. In order to terrorize Dionysius and his companions, Lisbius, the first-fruits of Gaul, with his repentant wife, suffered martyrdom a few days previously. Hence the title, "Premier Baron Chretien," borne by the noble house of Montmorency,⁵ as his representatives, to this day. It is, perhaps, more than a coincidence, that Monseigneur Darboy, Archbishop of Paris, who had written so nobly and so bravely in defence of the writings of Dionysius, and had translated them into French, suffered, as Archbishop, in the same city, if not on the same mount, on 24th May, 1871.

The East, naturally, commemorates the Baptism of Dionysius on the 3rd of October. The West, as naturally, commemorates his martyrdom on the 9th of the same month.

THE WORKS OF DIONYSIUS.

If spurious works, throwing light upon the doctrines and services of the Church in Apostolic times, had been found in an Egyptian tomb, what a stir the discovery would have made! These works have been entombed in public libraries the last 150 years—known and read by only a chosen few. They are not spurious, which will detract from their interest with some. Further, they show the New Testament as in circulation and of Divine authority in the first century. That again will destroy their value with those Christian advocates who seek to present the Christian Faith under incredible conditions, and whose logical purpose is to insist at once upon the necessity and the folly of Faith. Others may say they are spurious. We must, however, be faithful to Truth and to glorious “men of old time,” and affirm that they are the genuine works of Dionysius the Areopagite—the convert and faithful disciple of St. Paul. The writings of Dionysius are a collection of letters, written at various intervals, between A.D. 58 and 98. The larger treatises are addressed to Timothy. Dionysius was chief of a college of Preceptors¹ at Athens, whose occupation was the instruction of new converts, and the study of the higher theology. They were taught the deeper mysteries of the Christian Faith by Hierotheus, the first local Bishop² of Athens. Hierotheus wrote several abstract treatises, similar in style to Aristotle's Ethics, which were too deep and too compressed to be understood by ordinary intellects.³ At the request of Timothy, and by order of Hierotheus, Dionysius wrote the “Divine Names,” in order that he might present the teaching of Hierotheus in a form more easily understood. The letters were begun whilst Dionysius and Timothy were both Presbyters, and the original superscription was retained for the whole treatises. Is not this the case with nearly all the Prophets and with some of St. Paul's Epistles? When Dionysius writes to St. John, or Polycarp, or Titus, he addresses the former as Theologos—Apostle, Evangelist—the latter as Hierarches, and Gaius as Therapeutes. The appeal to the Episcopal judgment of Timothy, in the ninth chapter of the celestial hierarchy, shows that Timothy had become Bishop when that letter was written. It is worthy of remark that the superscription is not attached to the mystic theology—the last of the works—although it was written to “friend Timothy.” The whole works probably received their finishing touches between 96-98, during the two years that Dionysius spent in Asia, when he met St. John at Ephesus.

² The Archbishop of Athens gives me the succession at Athens thus:—1st Hierotheus, A.D. 52; 2nd, Dionysius; 3rd, Narcissus, one of the seventy; 4th, Publius, from 118-124; 5th, Quadratus, who presented Apology to Emperor Hadrian.

³ Divine Names, c. iii., s. 2.

EVIDENCE OF DATE IN WRITINGS.

The works are full of personal allusions. Dionysius affirms that he was converted to the Christian Faith by St. Paul, whose teaching on the holy Angels he transmits. After St. Paul he claims Hierotheus as his chief instructor, whose abstract treatises he tries to make more intelligible, whilst preserving his doctrine with the utmost fidelity. He declares himself to have been present at the funeral rites of the Blessed Virgin, who died in Jerusalem, A.D. 54. He mentions Peter, James, and other Apostles as being present. He reminds Timothy that, after the Apostles, Hierotheus excelled all others in the hymns by which on that occasion he extolled the Divine compassion and condescension as manifested in the Incarnation. He writes to St. John when exiled in Patmos; to Titus when Bishop of Crete; to Polycarp when Bishop of Smyrna. He alludes to Gaius and Carpus, both mentioned in the New Testament. He mentions the philosopher Clemens—either Clemens Atrius, to whom the younger Pliny addressed two of his letters, or Clemens, Bishop of Rome. He writes at a time when the Psalms were yet read in Hebrew whenever a person competent to do so was present. He describes the Chants as sung by the whole Choir. The Antiphonal singing was introduced by St. Ignatius at Antioch, and became universal by the time of Constantine. He writes at a time when the threefold Ministry and Sacrament was the accepted order of the Church, and before the sevenfold view became dominant at the end of the second century. He speaks of persecutions and martyrdoms, and of Apostolic Sees, as already occupied by successors of the Apostles. Apollonophanes wrote a *letter*¹ abusing Dionysius as a "turncoat," who used the Greek learning against the Greek Philosophy. Dionysius replies that Polycarp should remind Apollonophanes that he had witnessed with himself the miraculous darkness in Egypt, which he had discovered to be coeval with the Crucifixion. The works are Attic in phraseology, and teem with technical terms of Athenian law. They abound in newly coined words, expressing with marvellous precision in the language of Plato and Aristotle the newly revealed Christian truths. To appropriate the perfect description of Bishop Westcott, "they"² present the thoughts of one who lived in an age of transition, and strove to save from the wreck of ancient philosophy truths which he seemed to find coherent with the Christian Faith." Whilst gladly acknowledging the truth in Greek philosophy, he ¹ The origin of that letter was no doubt the conversion of Statonice, the wife of Apollonophanes, on account of which St. Paul was cast into chains at Philippi. corrects its errors by teaching that "the universe was created, not by any subordinate or rival power, but by an act of love of the One Infinite God, and that evil therefore is not inherent in matter, but due to the will of responsible creatures. He maintains that God is imminent in the world, and separate, though not alien from it. That the world was originally and essentially good." Further, the "*Ecclesiastical*¹ Hierarchy" was written when the Bishop was Celebrant, and completed every other Sacrament by the administration of the Holy Communion; but when the celebration was beginning to be committed to the Priest—when the Bishop officiated at funerals, and decided, by his own authority, whether the departed had lived and died in such a manner as to justify the use and to be benefitted by the rites of Christian burial—when the Bishop alone consecrated the holy oil—when the names of those who had previously been buried were recited at a funeral,² which soon ceased to be practicable—Dionysius wrote at a time when the term *Episcopus*³ was not yet applied to the Bishop. He uses the word Hierarches, head of the hierarchy, for Bishop, Hiereus for Priest, Leitourgos for Deacon. Dionysius regards the laborious search after truth, by means of intellectual study, as only an inferior method, and much lower in degree than that by which, detaching ourselves from everything earthly, we lie passive in the presence of God, and, without mental effort, receive the divine communication of light as our spiritual condition will permit in ever increasing degree as we advance more and more towards oneness with God. Prayer is better with him than reading, and repose under the circumambient glory of God is better than all. Everything false or evil places a barrier to the passage of the Divine Light, which will not enter until the "strong man armed" is cast out, and the allegiance to God becomes entire. Such is the teaching of Dionysius, who writes throughout with the freedom and fearlessness of conscious truth.

EXTERNAL EVIDENCE.

First Century.—St. Luke records the conversion at Athens of certain illustrious men, and singles out one of them by name—Dionysius the Areopagite. He thus marks Dionysius as pre-eminently distinguished. Hierotheus was probably one of those illustrious men. He was an Areopagite, like Dionysius. As Dionysius was sent to Gaul, so Hierotheus was sent to Spain. He settled permanently in Segovia, A.D. 69.⁴ If then, Hierotheus were one of the "illustrious" men from whom Dionysius is distinguished by name, there must have been some reason for such distinction. The treatise on the "Divine Names" was written about A.D. 58. The ninth chapter of the "Celestial Hierarchy" was written when Timothy was already a Bishop. The Acts of the Apostles terminates with St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, A.D. 65. Those treatises, therefore must have been known to St. Paul and to St. Luke, before A.D. 65. From the letters preserved, asking the meaning of certain phrases in the writings of Dionysius, we know that his works were extensively circulated. I submit, then, that the reason which led St. Luke to distinguish Dionysius the Areopagite by name, was not merely his noble birth,¹ deep learning, and exalted position, but also the value of the works being written by him—worthy, like those of Hierotheus, to be considered as only second, after the Apostles, because they contained Apostolic teaching. Literary criticism may fairly infer a presumptive proof that Dionysius at least wrote some celebrated works. Plato was described by Numenius, a Pythagorean philosopher, as "Moses speaking Attic Greek." If we find Dionysius writing Christian truths in Attic Greek, it is only what we might reasonably expect.

Second Century.—Ignatius² in his letter to the Trallians, enumerates some of the deep mysteries of the Christian Faith, respecting the holy angels, the extent of the ages, the pre-eminence of the Cherubin and Seraphin, the exaltation of the Spirit, the Kingdom of the Lord, and the incomparable nature of the all-powerful God. He not only quotes the very words found in Dionysius, but shows a thorough acquaintance with his works. In the "Celestial Hierarchy," and in the "Divine Names," the mysteries spoken of by Ignatius are exhaustively described and explained. What Ignatius merely alludes to, Dionysius writes a treatise upon in the sixth chapter of the Celestial Hierarchy and twelfth of Divine Names. We must therefore conclude that Ignatius quotes from Dionysius, whose works were therefore in circulation in the early part of the second century.

Third Century.—Anastasius of Antioch³ and Maximus⁴ the martyr, both affirm that Dionysius, the famous Bishop of Alexandria, wrote scholia upon the works of Dionysius the Areopagite. Maximus, in his commentary on the fifth chapter of the "Celestial Hierarchy," when speaking upon the word ὁσιώας, as applied in that chapter to the holy Angels, says, "The great Dionysius, the Bishop of Alexandria, who had been a rhetorician, in the scholia which he made upon the blessed Dionysius, his namesake, thus speaks. "The external philosophy was accustomed to call all invisible nature, uncreated, and the personalities, beings—ἀγεννητον πᾶσαν ἀόρητον φύσιν, ὁμοίως καὶ οὐσίας τὰς ὑποστάσεις—and hence says that expressions of this kind are used by the holy Dionysius inappropriately καταχρηστικῶς, after the manner of the external philosophers"—the Greeks. Maximus is writing a commentary upon Dionysius the Areopagite. He alludes to a word in the text. He says that Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, in commenting upon the use of that word in the text, affirms that the divine Dionysius uses that word in the sense of the Greek philosophers, and not quite exactly. Maximus further proves that the Dionysius of Alexandria was the Bishop of the third century, by describing him as having been a rhetorician—the characteristic¹ of the Bishop of Alexandria, who was a pupil of Origen.

Fourth Century.—The first Council of Nicea² directs that in the reception of a lapsed person, the prayer of Dionysius the Areopagite should be used. That prayer is alluded to in the last chapter of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. The Fathers of Nicea, therefore, regarded Dionysius the Areopagite as an ecclesiastical authority, and, as so well known, that it was not regarded as necessary to give the prayer in full. In the same century Dara, a learned Syrian theologian, wrote a commentary upon the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite. The Syrian was one of the most learned portions of the Church. Volumes of most rare theological learning in Syriac lie entombed in our libraries.

Fifth Century.—Photius,³ Patriarch of Constantinople, describes a book, written by Theodore (400), in which he answers the difficulties raised by some against the genuineness of the works of Dionysius. Photius regarded the objections as inconclusive. In speaking of the synodical epistle of St. Sophronius, he says, "There were found collected the testimony of Ancient Fathers, Leo . . . and Dionysius, disciple of St. Paul, martyr of Christ, and Bishop of Athens, great in expression, but greater still in thought."

Sixth Century.—In the sixth century Gregory⁴ the Great not only quotes Dionysius in a manner which shows the most intimate acquaintance with his works, but speaks of him thus: "Dionysius the Areopagite, the ancient and venerable father." Gregory's writings so breathe the spirit of Dionysius, that some, in their desire to attribute the works to any author but their own, have foolishly suggested that Gregory the Great might have written them, and through humility have attributed them to Dionysius the Areopagite. Gregory would at least have enjoyed the joke.

Seventh Century.—The second Council of Nicea¹ quotes the very words of Dionysius, as those of ὁ μέγας Διονύσιος, and says “that the divinely transmitted oracles are the very essence of our hierarchy, i.e., in the true science and knowledge of things divine.” “ὁρία γὰρ τῆς καὶ ἡμᾶς ἱεραρχίας ἐστὶ τὰ θεοπαράδοτα Δόγματα.” Ec. Hier. c. i., s. 4.

Eighth Century.—The one man, whose opinion upon the works of Dionysius is entitled to the greatest consideration and confidence, is St. John Damascene.² The most learned of the Greek ecclesiastical writers, he has left, amongst other numerous works, an Exposition of the Orthodox Faith, gathered from the writers of previous centuries, in whom none was more versed. He regards Dionysius as first and best of all. He quotes frequently his very words, and considers his authority as only second to that of the Apostles. St. Thomas Aquinas made known to the west the treasures of theological learning contained in St. John Damascene, and speaks of the works with the same confidence as those of Dionysius the Areopagite, the convert and faithful disciple of St. Paul. It must suffice to say that Maximus and Pachymera wrote Scholia, which remain to this day as a testimony of their belief in the genuineness and value of Dionysius. Five Greek Fathers wrote lives and martyrdoms of the Areopagite. Time and space would fail to tell of St. Ephrem and Constantine the Philosopher, John of Salisbury and Robert of Lincoln, Peter Lombard and Alexandre de Hales, Guillaume de Paris and Vincent de Beauvais, St. Anselm and Albert le Grand, Bernard de Clairvaux and Scotus Erigena, Bonaventura and Gerson, Denis le Chartreux and Thomas a Kempis, Dean Colet and Fabure d’Etaples, Milton and Dante, Bessarion and Budæus, Darboy and Pusey, Dom Pitra and Dulac—all of whom have either written commentaries upon, or translated, or reproduced the doctrine of this Apostolic man.

But has there been no discordant note to mar the celestial harmony of this illustrious testimony? Oh dear, yes! The middle³ Age proclaimed its wisdom by its repudiation of Origen. This modern time displays its advance in learning by its ignorance of Dionysius. Here are some of the elevating names which have been rescued from oblivion by their crude objections to the genuineness of the writings of Dionysius:—Grocinus, Scultetus, Scaliger, Baumgarten, Morinus, Daillé. These are the distinguished names under cover of which modern scholars repose with so much confidence, that they complacently regard, as ignorant of the early centuries one whose temerity permits him to affirm in the nineteenth century, that the writings of Dionysius are genuine.

Grocinus¹ thought the works were not genuine, but with the instinct of a scholar carefully avoided giving any reason in proof by which the value of his groceries might be tested.

Scultetus² thought that because certain rites and ceremonies in the administration of the Sacraments are described in order that their spiritual meaning may be explained, the works must have been written later than the Areopagite. Scultetus, in spite of his refined knowledge of the Gospel, overlooked the fact that during forty days our Saviour instructed the Apostles in the things concerning the Kingdom of God; that St. Paul set in order the Divine Service in the Churches visited by him, and that he quotes from an existing Liturgy in one of his Epistles.³ Dionysius occupies about six pages in describing the rites and ceremonies of the Holy Communion, Baptism, and Chrism. Scultetus thought such rites and ceremonies implied an undue exaltation of Sacraments instituted by Christ Himself. St. Paul said to his converts, "By one Spirit were ye all baptized into one body;" "As oft as ye eat this bread and drink of this cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death until He do come." Baptism and the Lord's Supper would doubtless not have held a position so exalted in the Gospel according to St. Scultetus.

Scaliger.—Scaliger was a very exalted Episcopalian—when it served his purpose. Unlike some Episcopals, he deemed the dignity of the Episcopate its most essential feature, and a theological virtue to be the most jealously guarded. Scaliger, therefore, could not believe that Dionysius the Areopagite, an older man, and his chief instructor, would address Timothy under the endearing name of παῖς—"my son." St. Paul, it is true, tells Timothy to "let no man despise his youth," and to hold his own. St. Paul sends Timothy, but entreats Titus. But to suppose that Dionysius, who armed Timothy against the Greek philosophers of Ephesus, should address a brother presbyter and a future Bishop as "My son," shewed a familiarity and affection unbecoming the dignity of the Episcopal order. Daillé could be very hard upon the Acephaloi, and Scaliger could be very Episcopalian, when it served their purpose against the truth.

Baumgarten.—The pupils of the Baumgarten Academy were taught that Dionysius was a Pagan, who ennobled the Christian religion by introducing the secret doctrines of the Eleusinian mysteries. Dionysius speaks of himself⁴ as being brought, by his conversion to the Christian religion, from darkness to light. In the logic of the Baumgarten Academy, the conclusion would appear to have been not necessarily contained in the premise.

Morinus.—Morinus¹ first proves the works written in Asia. Then by ridiculous assumptions he pretends to prove that they were written in Gaul. Then, as initiating the new criticism and as proof of critical acumen he triumphantly asks why, then, were they not written in Latin and not in Greek. He indicates his youthful education by not knowing that all early Christian literature was in Greek, that Arles was the centre of Greek trade before it became a Roman colony, and that the Druids² used Greek as their hieroglyphic language.

Daillé.—"O, that mine enemy would write a book," was the despairing aspiration of Job, in the midst of his affliction. Dionysius, however, in spite of his martyrdom, was more fortunate in this respect. Daillé³ obtained for himself the characteristic of those "who rush in, where angels fear to tread." He has the proud distinction of being the only man in Christendom who wrote a book⁴ to prove that the writings of Dionysius and Ignatius were unknown to early Christendom, and therefore spurious. He produces sixty-six so-called arguments (unhappily not 666), "id que ultimum," as he says, to show that the Ignatian Epistles were unknown to any early Father or Historian of the Church. Given the assumption that every evidence to the contrary is either a forgery or a fraud, and it is easily done. Bishop Lightfoot, however, after a more mature examination, demonstrated the futility of his method, with regard to the Ignatian Epistles, by proving them to be the genuine writings of the Bishop and Martyr, in spite of the sixty-six⁵ statements to the contrary, whose very number, like an army in confusion, becomes a source of weakness. His method with regard to Dionysius is the same, or even worse, than his treatment of Ignatius. He modestly only produces 42 against Dionysius. Here is an example. To establish the assumed position that the writings of Dionysius were unknown before A.D. 532, he must deny the assertion of the learned Anastatius, and the martyr Maximus, that Dionysius, the famous Bishop⁶ of Alexandria, wrote scholia upon them, about A.D. 250. Maximus, for the purpose of affirming with greater accuracy that the Dionysius who wrote the scholia was the famous Bishop of Alexandria, describes him as having been a rhetorician. That description corresponds exactly with the account given of him in Smith's Greek and Roman Biography.

St. Augustine had been pretty much the same, as also Justin Martyr and Ambrose of Milan. Daillé was a bitter Presbyterian, but he affects so much consideration for the dignity of the Episcopal office, that he cannot bring himself to believe that one holding the exalted position of Bishop of Alexandria could have been described as a rhetorician. Maximus merely says he had been a rhetorician before his consecration. Daillé, having denied that Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria wrote the scholia, was bound to find some rhetorician of the name of Dionysius to whom the scholia on the Areopagite might be attributed. But such a man, he confesses, cannot be found, except as he said in the imagination of Maximus and Pachymera—he should have said except in the imagination of Daillé. Having fabricated himself this imaginary rhetorician, he imputes fraud to Maximus the Martyr, and to the learned Pachymera by affirming that they attributed the scholia of this unknown man to the exalted Bishop of Alexandria, in order that they might magnify their Dionysius the Areopagite. That was a famous saying of Tennyson, "We always impute ourselves." Another specimen of the 42—"id que ultimum"—statements of Daillé against Dionysius must suffice. "Ex duobus disce omnes." A Conference¹ was held at Constantinople in A.D. 532, between Asiatic and African Divines, to appease the controversies then disturbing the Church on the hypostatic union, or one personality of Christ. The Athanasian Creed describes that personality as "one altogether," "not two." It is a union in person, and not an alliance of two personalities. The Council of Chalcedon declares that out of two whole and perfect natures there is one Christ. It was a deep mystery. Each side witnessed to a phase of truth, and each side was liable to lean towards error—Nestorianism or Monophysitism. The African Divines naturally quoted the phrase from Dionysius θεωδωρικὴν ἐνέργειαν as proving the one Christ. Hypatius, who perhaps leaned to that Nestorian party which had corrupted² the text of Chalcedon, being unable to resist the force of the expression, suggested that the works might have been corrupted. They even waxed so bold as to affirm that the works were unknown to Cyril, and were therefore probably spurious. They were informed that Cyril, in his book against Theodorus, had spoken highly of the works. They wished to see the book. They were informed that it was in the library at Alexandria, but that the African Divines had not thought it necessary to bring with them a book so well known. There were at most five persons of the Hypatian party which Daillé calls "the Catholic party." From these premises Daillé draws the triumphant conclusion that the works of Dionysius were repudiated by the whole Catholic body.

Fortunately for truth, but unfortunately for Daillé, a Greek and Latin Council was held at the Lateran, A.D. 660,³ to defeat the attempt of Cyrus to change καὶ into μία in the letter of Dionysius to Gaius. The works were produced from the Vatican Library, and the original text examined, and the true reading pronounced to be καὶ. There was not a word said against the genuineness of the works, which were assumed as beyond question the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite. So trustworthy is Daillé in saying that the writings attributed to Dionysius were repudiated by the whole Catholic body.

Laurentius Valla¹ says that many learned men in his day thought the works might have been written by Apollinaris the heretic. It would be impossible to find a more precise refutation of the heresy of Apollinaris than in the writings of Dionysius. Erasmus repudiated the opinion of Valla, and said that he did not believe that the works were written by Apollinaris or any other heretic. Erasmus said that some learned men thought the works were written by another Dionysius, but when challenged to produce the names of such learned men, he could only instance Valla and Grocinius. He was also careful not to say who the other Dionysius was. Erasmus apologized for the evident fraud if the works were not written by Dionysius the Areopagite by saying that "pious people were accustomed to commit forgery for the glory of God." It was a lamentable characteristic of that age of this age, that such idiotic blasphemy could be uttered without blighting the most illustrious reputation. Dupin² and Tillemont³ would seem to have followed without serious examination such reasoning as I have indicated. Such is the blind following of error in this century, that all reasonable men are said to regard the writings of Dionysius as spurious. I cannot deny the fact, but I appeal to all rational men to decide whether that fact reflects credit upon the good sense and learning of the modern West.

For myself, grateful to Almighty God for the clear vision of the truth conveyed to my mind by these priceless works, I thankfully present them to the English people in my native tongue. They present the Christian Faith and the Christian Service as they existed in the first century, and before the Church was torn by schism, and its faith soiled by controversy. They show how an ideal Christianity may be realized in fact. They present the truth which men blindly grope after, under the name of evolution, kenosis, theosophy, and ritualism. They shew the true Atonement as that by which we become at one in ourselves, by becoming one with God. They show the canonical Scriptures in circulation in the first century, and therefore as written by those whose name they bear. As with the Bible, so with Dionysius, the best evidence of genuineness is in the works themselves, devoutly read and intelligently understood. No ecclesiastical writer knows his own mind so well, or expresses that mind so clearly, as Dionysius. No man states an objection so unflinchingly, or accepts the whole Bible so thoroughly as he. No man is so ready to admit that there are some things to be honoured by silence, as being beyond the mind of man to conceive. No man realized, or expressed so clearly, the mutual coherence of the Old and New Testament as he. ¹ ἡ μὲν ἔφη τὰς ἰσομύνας Ἰησοῦ θεουργίας, ἡ δὲ ἐτέλεσε contains a volume of theology. No man shews such unflinching charity towards those who oppose themselves to the truth, or to himself. No one so clearly presents the Church of Christ, the City of God, as a reflection of the divine order in God. Everything is a Trinity with him. Order is God's first law. Goodness is the cause and origin of all things, and the mainstay of their continued existence. Evil is the failure to attain some fancied good—a falling from our first estate. Without some good ² in itself, nothing could continue to exist.

CELESTIAL HIERARCHY.

CAPUT I.

TO MY FELLOW PRESBYTER TIMOTHY.
DIONYSIUS THE PRESBYTER.

That every divine illumination, whilst going forth lovingly to the objects of its forethought under various forms, remains simplex. Nor is this all. It also unifies the things illuminated.

“VERY good gift¹ and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights.”

Further also, every procession of illuminating light proceeding from the Father, whilst visiting us as a gift of goodness, restores us again as an unifying power to a higher spiritual condition, and turns us to the oneness of our conducting Father, and to a deifying simplicity. For² all things are from Him, and to Him, as said the Sacred Word. Invoking then Jesus, the Paternal Light, the Real, the True, “which lighteth³ every man that cometh into the world,” “through⁴ Whom we have access to the Father,” Source of Light, let us aspire, as far as is permissible, to the illuminations handed down by our fathers in the most sacred oracles, and let us gaze as we may upon the Hierarchies of the heavenly minds manifested in them symbolically for our instruction. And when we have received, with an unearthly and unflinching mental vision, the gift of Light, primal and superprimal, from the supremely divine Father, which manifests to us the blessed Hierarchies of the Angels in types and symbols, let us then, from this gift of Light, be restored again to its unique splendour.⁵ For this never loses its own inherent unity, but multiplied and going forth, as becomes its goodness, to educate and unite the objects of its care, it remains firmly and solitarily centred within itself in its unmoved sameness; and elevates, according to their capacity, those who aspire to itself, and makes them one after the example of its own unifying Oneness. For it is not possible that the Divine Ray should otherwise illuminate us, except so far as it is enveloped, for the purpose of sacred instruction, in variegated veils, and arranged naturally and appropriately, for such as we are, by paternal forethought.

Wherefore, the sacred institution which fixed the Holy Rites transmitted to us our most Holy Hierarchy, having deemed it worthy of a celestial imitation of the Heavenly Hierarchies, and depicted the aforesaid immaterial Hierarchies in material figures and bodily forms, in order that we might be borne, as far as our capacity permits, from the sacred pictures to the mystical meaning and likenesses without symbol and without type. For it is not possible for our mind to be raised to that immaterial representation and contemplation of the Heavenly Hierarchies, without using the material guidance suitable to itself, by counting the visible¹ beauties as reflections of the invisible comeliness; and the sweet² odours of the senses as emblems of the spiritual bounties; and the material³ light, as a likeness of the gift of the immaterial enlightenment; and the explicit sacred instructions,⁴—of the feast of contemplation within the mind; and the ranks⁵ of the orders here—of the harmonious and regulated habit, with regard to Divine things; and the reception of the most Divine Eucharist—of the partaking⁶ of Jesus, and whatever other things may be transmitted to heavenly Beings supernaturally, but to us symbolically.

For the sake, then, of this our deification, according to our capacity, the first institution of sacred mysteries, out of its love for man, whilst manifesting the Heavenly Hierarchies to us, and constituting our Hierarchy as fellow-ministers with them, through an imitation of their Godlike priestliness,⁷ so far as in us lies, described under sensible figures the celestial minds, in the inspired descriptions of the oracles, in order that he might lead us through the sensible to the spiritual, and from sacred symbols to the simple sublimities of the Heavenly Hierarchies.

CAPUT II.

That Divine and Heavenly things are appropriately represented, even through dissimilar symbols.

It is necessary then, as I think, first to set forth what is the scope of every Hierarchy, and what benefit each confers upon its followers. Next to celebrate the Heavenly Hierarchies according to their description in the oracles. Then, following these oracles, to say in what sacred forms the divine descriptions of the oracles depict the celestial orders, and to what kind of naked truth we must be carried through the representations; in order that we may not, like the vulgar, irreverently think that the heavenly and Godlike minds are a kind of four-footed¹ and many-faced² creatures, or moulded to the brutish form of oxen,³ or the savage form of lions,⁴ and fashioned like the hooked beaks of eagles,⁵ or the feathery down of birds,⁶ and should imagine that there are a certain kind of wheels⁷ of fire above the heaven, or material thrones⁸ upon which the Godhead may recline, or certain many-coloured⁹ horses, and leaders of the host bearing spears,¹⁰ and whatever else the oracles declare to us under multifarious symbols for our instruction.

And indeed, the Word of God, artlessly, makes use of many poetic representations of sacred things, out of regard to our intelligence, so to speak, consulting a mode of education proper and natural to it, and moulding its instructive descriptions with reference to it.

But if anyone think well to accept the sacred compositions on the ground that things uncompound are unknown in their own nature, and cannot be seen, but thinks the imagery of the holy minds in the oracles is incongruous, and all this is, so to speak, a rude scenic representation of angelic names; and if he further says that the theologians when they have come to the bodily representation of creatures altogether without body, ought to represent and display them by appropriate and as far as possible cognate forms taken from the most honoured and immaterial, at any rate, and exalted beings, and ought not to clothe the heavenly and Godlike simple essences with the many forms of the lowest creatures to be found on the earth (for this, too, would perhaps be more adapted to our instruction, and would not degrade the celestial explanations to incongruous dissimilitudes), but this other both does violence to the Divine powers without authority, and likewise leads astray our minds through dwelling upon these irreverent descriptions. And perhaps he will also think that the heavenly places are filled with certain herds of lions, and troops of horses, and bellowing songs of praise, and flocks of birds, and other living creatures, and material and less honourable things, and whatever else the similitudes of the oracles in every respect dissimilar, describe, for a so-called explanation, but which verge towards the absurd, and pernicious, and impassioned. Now, in my opinion, the investigation of the truth demonstrates the most sacred wisdom of the oracles, in the descriptions of the heavenly minds, taking forethought, as that wisdom does, wholly for each, so as neither, as one may say, to do violence to the Divine powers, nor at the same time to enthrall us in the grovelling passions of the debased imagery. For anyone might say that the cause why forms are naturally attributed to the formless, and shapes to the shapeless, is not alone our capacity, which is unable immediately to elevate itself to the intellectual contemplations, and needs appropriate and cognate instructions which present images suitable to us of the formless and supernatural objects of contemplation; but further, that it is most agreeable to the revealing oracles to conceal, through unutterable and sacred enigmas, and to keep the holy and secret truth respecting the celestial minds inaccessible to the multitude. For it is not every one that is holy, nor, as the oracles affirm, does knowledge belong to all.¹ But if anyone blame the descriptions as being incongruous, and says it is shameful to attribute shapes so repugnant to the Godlike and most holy Orders, it is enough to reply that the method of the Divine manifestation is twofold—one, indeed, as is natural, representing through likenesses that are similar, and of a sacred character, but the other, through anomalous shapes, fashioning them into entire unlikeness and incongruity. No doubt, the mystical teaching of the revealing oracles sometimes describes the august blessedness of the super-substantial Deity as word² and mind³ and Being,⁴ manifesting its God-becoming reason and wisdom, and as really being existence, and true cause of the existence of all things. They also describe it as light.⁵ While such sacred descriptions are more reverent, and seem in a certain way to be superior to the material images, they yet, even thus, in reality fall short of the divinely supreme similitude. For it is above all being and life. No light, indeed, expresses its character, but every description and mind incomparably falls short of its similitude.

But at other times its praises are divinely sung by the oracles themselves, through dissimilar descriptions, when they affirm that it is invisible⁶ and infinite⁷ and incomprehensible⁸; and when there is made known, not what it is, but what it is not. For this, as I think, is more appropriate to it, since, as the secret and Hierarchical tradition used to teach, we rightly describe its non-relationship to things created, but we do not know its super-substantial, and inconceivable, and unutterable indefinability. If, then, the negations respecting things Divine are true, but the affirmations are inappropriate, the explanation as regards things invisible, through dissimilar descriptions, is more appropriate to the hidden mystery of things unutterable. Thus the sacred descriptions of the oracles honour, and do not expose to shame, the celestial Orders, when they make them known by dissimilar pictorial forms, and demonstrate through these their supernatural superiority to all material things. But I do not suppose that any sensible man will gainsay that the dissimilar representations elevate our mind rather than the similar, for there is a likelihood, with regard to the more sublime representations of heavenly things, that we should be led astray so as to think that the celestial Beings are a certain sort of creatures with the appearance of gold, and a sort of men with the appearance of light,¹ and glittering like lightning,² handsome³ clothed in bright shining raiment, shedding forth innocuous flame, and so with regard to all the other shapes and appropriate forms with which the Word of God has depicted the celestial minds.

In order that men might not suffer from this by thinking they are nothing more exalted than their beautiful appearance, the elevating wisdom of the pious theologians reverently conducts to the misrepresenting dissimilarities, not permitting our earthly part to rest fixed in the base images, but urging the upward tendency of the soul, and goading it by the unseemliness of the symbols. For it is neither lawful, nor has it the appearance of truth, even to the most earthy conceptions, that the most heavenly and Divine objects of our contemplation are actually like things so base. Above all, this must particularly be borne in mind, that not even one of the things existing is altogether deprived of participation in the beautiful, since, as is evident and the truth of the oracles affirms, all things are very beautiful.⁴ It is, then, possible to frame in one's mind, good contemplations from everything, and to depict from things material the aforesaid dissimilar similitudes, both for the intelligible and the intelligent; since the intelligent hold in another fashion, things which are attributed to creatures of sense otherwise. For instance, anger in the irrational creatures takes its rise in the passions, and their movement which takes the form of anger is full of all kinds of unreasonableness. But with regard to the intelligent, we must think of the angry impulse in another fashion, as denoting, according to my judgment, their masculine reasonableness, and the determined persistence in their Godlike and unchangeable steadfastness. In like manner we say, with regard to the irrational creatures, that lust is a sort of un-circumspect and earthy passionate attachment, arising incontinently from an innate movement, or intimacy in things subject to change, and the supremacy of the bodily impulse, which drives the whole organism towards the object of sensual desire. But when we attribute lust to spiritual beings, by clothing them with dissimilar similitudes, we must think that this is a craving for the immaterial above expression and thought, and the inflexible and determined longing for the supernally pure and passionless contemplation, and for the perpetual and spiritual fellowship in that pure and most exalted glory, and the abiding and beautifying comeliness. And the incontinence we may take for the persistent and inflexible craving which nothing can repulse, on account of the pure and changeless love for the Divine beauty, and the whole tendency towards the really desirable. With regard to the irrational living beings, or soulless matter, we appropriately call their irrationality and want of sensibility a deprivation of reason and sensibility. With regard to the immaterial and spiritual beings, we rightly acknowledge their superiority, as celestial beings, over our transitive and bodily speech; and the earthly perception, which is alien to the incorporeal minds. It is, then, permissible to depict forms which are not appropriate to the celestial Beings, even from portions of matter which are the least honourable, since even matter itself had its beginning from the Essential Beauty. And throughout the whole range of matter there are some echoes of the spiritual comeliness. And it is also possible through these to be led to the immaterial archetypes—the similitudes being taken, as has been said, in a different manner, and the same similitudes being defined, not in the same way, but harmoniously, and appropriately, as respects the peculiar natures of the spiritual and sensible beings. Under such descriptions as these, we shall find the mystic theologians depicting in their sacred sketches, not only the celestial Orders, but sometimes also the Godhead itself.

At one time, indeed, they celebrate the Godhead under exalted imagery, as Sun¹ of Righteousness, as Morning² Star rising divinely in the mind, and as Light³ shedding spiritual splendour so that it cannot be hid. At other times through ordinary phenomena, as Fire,⁴ shedding its innocuous light; as Water,⁵ furnishing a fulness of life, and, to speak symbolically, flowing into a body, and bubbling forth rivers which flow with an irresistible force. At other times from things of the lowest type, as sweet-smelling Myrrh,⁶ as Head Corner-stone.⁷ But they also clothe it in forms of wild beasts, and attach to it the properties of a Lion,⁸ and Panther,⁹ and say that it shall be a Leopard,¹⁰ and a rushing Bear.¹¹ But, I will also add, that which seems to be more dishonourable than all, and the most to misrepresent. Distinguished theologians have shewn it to us as representing itself under the form of a worm.¹² Thus do all the godly wise, who are interpreters of the secret inspiration, separate the most holy of all things from the uninitiated and the unholy, to keep them undefiled, and prefer the dissimilar descriptions so that Divine things should not be easily reached by the profane, and that those who diligently contemplate the Divine imagery should not rest in the types as though they were true. And so Divine things are honoured by negations which teach the truth, and by comparisons with the lowest things which are diverse from their proper representation. For the reasons assigned, there is nothing absurd if they depict even the celestial Beings under dissimilar similitudes which misrepresent them. For perhaps not even we should have come to an investigation, through an accurate inquiry into Divine things (from its difficulty, no doubt, but also for instruction), unless the deformity of the descriptions representing the Angels had shocked us, not permitting us to linger in the discordant representations, but rousing us utterly to reject the earthly proclivities, and accustoming us to elevate ourselves through things that are seen to their celestial meanings. Let these things suffice to have been said respecting the material and incongruous descriptions of the holy Angels in the Holy Scriptures. But next, it is necessary to define what we think the Hierarchy is in itself, and what benefit those who possess a Hierarchy derive from the same. But let Christ lead the discourse, if it be permitted to me to say—He Who is mine, the Inspiration of all Hierarchical teaching. But thou, my son, after the pious rule of our Hierarchical tradition, do thou religiously listen to things religiously uttered, becoming inspired through instruction in inspired things; and when thou hast enfolded the Divine things in the secret recesses of thy mind, guard them closely from the profane multitude as being uniform, for it is not permitted, as the oracles say, to cast to swine the unsullied and bright and beautifying comeliness of the spiritual pearls.

CAPUT III.

What is Hierarchy? and what the use of Hierarchy?

Hierarchy is, in my judgment, a sacred order and science and energy—assimilated, as far as permissible, to the likeness of God, and conducted to the illuminations granted to itself from God, in due order, with a view to the Divine imitation. Now the Divine attractiveness, as being uncompounded, as good, as source of initiation, is altogether free from any dissimilarity. But it imparts its own proper light to each according to their fitness, and perfects in most Divine initiation in proportion to the unvarying likeness of those who are being initiated into harmony with itself. The scope, then, of Hierarchy is the assimilation and oneness with God, holding Him as the Leader of all religious science and energy, looking unflinchingly to His most Divine comeliness, and moulding itself as far as possible, and perfecting its own followers as Divine images, as mirrors luminous and without flaw, receptive of the primal light and the Divine ray, and devoutly filled with the radiance committed to itself, but, on the other hand, spreading this radiance ungrudgingly to those after it, in accordance with the Divinely-fixed regulations. For it is not permitted to the initiators in Divine things, nor to those who are being religiously initiated, to practise anything whatever beyond the sacred regulations of their own function. Nor even must they attempt otherwise, if they desire to attain its deifying splendour, and if they regard it in a religious light, and mould themselves after the example of each of the holy minds. He, then, who mentions Hierarchy describes a certain, altogether Holy Order, an image of the Divine Beauty, which performs the mysteries of its own illumination in due order and with religious science, derived from the Hierarch and which is assimilated to its own proper author as far as permissible.

For each of those who have been called into the Hierarchy find their perfection in being carried to the Divine initiation¹ in their own proper degree; and, what is more Divine than all, as the oracles say, in becoming a fellow-worker² with God, and in shewing the Divine energy dwelling in itself, manifested as far as possible to others. For it is an Hierarchical regulation that some are purified and that others purify³; that some are enlightened and others enlighten⁴; that some are perfected and others perfect. So that each one will accomplish the Divine imitation in his own several manner. The Divine Blessedness, then, to speak after the manner of men, is unstained by any dissimilarity,⁵ but is filled with invisible light⁶—perfect,⁷ and needing no perfection; cleansing, illuminating and perfecting. Yea, rather it is a holy purification and illumination and perfection—above purification, above light, pre-eminently perfect, self-perfection, and cause of every Hierarchy, but elevated pre-eminently above every holy thing. It is necessary then—as I think that those who are being purified should be entirely perfected, so as to be without stain—that those who are being illuminated should be filled with the Divine Light, conducted to the habit and faculty of contemplation in all purity of mind; that those who are being initiated should be separated from the profane, and become recipients of that science which makes perfect the holy men who are initiated into the highest mysteries.

Further, that those who purify should impart from their own abundance of purity their own proper holiness; that those who illuminate, as being luminous intelligences, whose function it is to receive and to impart light, and who are joyfully filled with holy gladness, that these should impart, in proportion to their own overflowing light, to those who are worthy of enlightenment. But that those who make perfect, as being skilled in the impartation of perfection, should perfect those who are being initiated, through the holy instruction, in the science of holy men who have been initiated in the higher mysteries. Thus each rank of the Hierarchical Order is led in its own degree to the Divine co-operation by performing, through grace and God-given power, those mysteries which are essentially and super-essentially in the Godhead, and are accomplished by It supernaturally, and are manifested to us through our Hierarchy for its imitation of the God-loving minds¹ to the highest permissible extent.

CAPUT IV.

What is meant by the appellation "Angel"?

Now that the nature of the Hierarchy has been, in my judgment, sufficiently defined, we must next celebrate the angelic Hierarchy, and we must contemplate with celestial vision its sacred descriptions contained in the oracles, in order that we may be borne aloft through the mystic representations to their most Godlike simplicity, and may celebrate the Author of all Hierarchical science, with God-becoming reverence and with thanksgivings to the origin of mysteries. First of all, however, let this truth be spoken—that it was through goodness that the superessential Godhead, having fixed the essence of created things, brought them into being. For this is the peculiar characteristic of the cause of all things, and of goodness surpassing all, to call created things to participation in itself, as each order of existences was determined from its own analogy. For all created beings that exist share in a Providence, bubbling forth from the super-substantial Godhead, Creator of all things. For they would not be, unless they had participated in the essence and origin of things created. All things then, without life, participate in it, by their existence. For the Being of all things is the Godhead, which is above all Being. Things with life participate in the life-giving power which is itself above all life. Things rational and intellectual participate in the self-perfect and pre-eminently perfect wisdom which is above all reason and mind. It is evident, then, that all those Beings dwell around Him, who have participated in Him, in many forms. The holy ranks, then, of the heavenly Beings, share in the participation of the Divine gifts in a higher degree than things which merely exist, or which lead an irrational life, or which are rational like ourselves. For by moulding themselves intellectually to the Divine imitation, and looking from the earthly to the Divine likeness, and striving to mould their own spiritual likeness after its example, they naturally have more ungrudging communications with it, being near and ever moving upwards, as far as permissible; they elevate themselves with the intensity of the Divine unswerving love, and receive the primal illuminations without earthly stain and by moulding themselves to these, their whole life becomes spiritual. These, then, are they who, at first hand, and under many forms, participate in the Divine, and, at first hand, and under many forms, make known the hidden mysteries of the Godhead. Wherefore, beyond all, they are deemed pre-eminently worthy of the angelic appellation on the ground that the Divine illumination comes to them at first hand, and through them there pass to us manifestations above our capacities.

Thus, then, the Law, as the Word of God affirms, was given to us through the ministration of Angels¹; and Angels led our illustrious fathers² before the Law, and after the Law to the Deity. Either by leading³ them to what was to be done, and separating them from error and an unholy life to the straight way of truth,⁴ or by making known to them sacred ordinances,⁵ or hidden visions of celestial mysteries,⁶ or certain Divine predictions through the Prophets.⁷ But if anyone should say that Divine manifestations were made directly and immediately to some holy men,⁸ let him learn, and that distinctly, from the most holy oracles, that no one hath seen, nor ever shall see, the hidden nature of God as it is in itself.⁹ But Divine manifestations were made to those holy men as befits revelations of God, that is to say, through certain holy visions adapted to those who saw them. Now the Word of God, in the fulness of its wisdom, for the instruction of those who are contemplating the Divine, naturally names "Divine manifestation," that special vision which manifests that Divine image, depicted in itself, as clothing in form things without form. As though a Divine illumination were made through this to the spectators, and the godly persons themselves receive some religious initiation. But our illustrious fathers were instructed in these Divine visions, through the mediation of the heavenly powers. Does not the teaching given to us in the oracles describe the holy legislation of the Law, given to Moses, as coming straight from God, in order that it may teach us this truth, that it is a type of a Divine and holy economy. But the Word of God, in its wisdom, teaches this also—that it came to us by the mediation of Angels. As though the Divine regulation were laying down this rule, that through the first, the second are brought to God. For not only with regard to the superior and inferior minds, but even amongst those who are of the same rank, this Law has been established by the supreme Law-giver—that within each Hierarchy there are first and middle, and last ranks and powers. And that the more Divine are the instructors and conductors of the inferior, to the Divine access, and illumination, and participation. But I observe that Angels first revealed the Divine mystery of the love of Jesus towards man, since through them the gift of knowledge passed to us. Thus for example, the most Divine Gabriel instructed Zachariah,¹ the High Priest, that the son who was to be born by Divine grace, from him, beyond hope, should be a prophet, of the ² God-incarnate work of our Jesus to be manifested to the world for its salvation, as becomes the Divine goodness. But he revealed to Mary,³ how, in her, should take place the Divinely-originated mystery of the unutterable God-formation. Yet another Angel instructed Joseph⁴ how in very truth were fulfilled the things Divinely promised to his ancestor David. Another announced to the shepherds,⁵ as being purified by their separation from the multitude and their quiet life, and with him a multitude of the heavenly host, announced to those on earth that often sung doxology. Let us then ascend to the highest manifestations of light contained in the oracles, for I perceive that even Jesus⁶ Himself, the supersubstantial cause of the highest heavenly Beings, after He had come to our condition without change in Himself, did not overstep the good order which becomes mankind, which Himself arranged and took, but readily subjected Himself to the dispositions of the Father and God, through Angels, and through their mediation was announced to Joseph the departure of the Son to⁷ Egypt, which had been arranged by the Father, and again the return to Judæa⁸ from Egypt. We see Him further, subjecting Himself to the Father's decrees. But I forbear to speak, as addressing one who knows the teaching of our hierarchical tradition concerning the Angel⁹ who strengthened Jesus Himself; or that even Jesus Himself, when He had come to manifest the good work of our salvation, was called Angel¹⁰ of Great Counsel. For, as He Himself says, after the manner of an Angel, "Whatsoever He heard from the Father, He declared to us."¹¹

CAPUT V.

For what reason all the heavenly Beings are called by the common names of Angels.

This, then, in our judgment, is the reason for the angelic appellation given in the oracles. We must now enquire for what reason the theologians call all¹ the heavenly Beings together "Angels;" but when they come to a more accurate description of the celestial orders, they name exclusively as angelic order that which completes the full tale of the Divine and heavenly hosts. Before this, however, they range as superior the Orders of Archangels and the Principalities, Authorities, and Powers, and all the Orders that the revealing tradition of the oracles recognize as their superior.² Now, we affirm that throughout every sacred order the superior ranks possess the illuminations and powers of the subordinates, but the lowest orders have not the same powers as those who are above them. The theologians, then, call the most holy ranks of the highest Beings "Angels," for even they make known Divine illumination. But there is no reason to call the lowest order of the celestial minds Principalities, or Thrones, or Seraphin. For this order does not possess the highest powers, but, as it were, by its own proper function conducts our inspired Hierarchs to the splendour of the Godhead known to itself. Thus, then, the saintly powers of the Beings above this act as conductors towards the Divine of that order which completes the angelic Hierarchies. Perhaps some may say this also, that all the angelic appellations are common in so far as all the celestial powers possess, in a less or a greater degree, a fellowship in the likeness of God and in the gift of light from God. But, in order that the question may be thoroughly investigated, let us reverently examine the saintly characteristics assigned to each celestial order in the oracles.

CAPUT VI.

Which is the first Order of the celestial Beings? which the middle? and which the last?

How many, and of what sort are the Orders of the supercelestial Beings, and how the Hierarchies are initiated amongst themselves, I affirm the Divine Author of their initiation alone distinctly knows. Further, that they know their own proper powers and illuminations, and their sacred and supermundane regularity. For it is impossible that we should know the mysteries of the supercelestial minds and their most holy perfections unless, someone might say, so far as the Godhead has revealed to us through them who know perfectly their own condition. We, then, will utter nothing as from ourselves, but whatever angelic visions have been gazed upon by the holy Prophets of God, we, as interpreting these, will set forth as best we can. The Word of God has designated the whole nine celestial Beings by appellations which shew their functions. These our Divine Initiator divides into three threefold orders. He also says that the first is that order which tradition declares to be always around God, and united closely and immediately to Him before all the rest. For he says that the teaching of the holy oracles declares that the Most Holy Thrones and the many-eyed¹ and many-winged² ranks named in the Hebrew tongue Cherubin³ and Seraphin⁴ are established immediately around God, with a nearness superior to all. This threefold order, then, our illustrious Guide affirmed to be one, and of equal rank, and really first, than which there is not another more God-like or immediately nearer to the earliest illuminations of the Godhead. But he says that the second is that which is composed of the Authorities, and Lordships, and Powers; and the third, as being the lowest of the celestial Hierarchies, is the Order of the Angels and Archangels and Principalities.

CAPUT VII.

Concerning the Seraphin and Cherubin and Thrones, and concerning their Hierarchy, which is first.

We, whilst admitting this as the arrangement of the Hierarchies, affirm that every appellation of the celestial minds denotes the Godlike characteristic of each; and those who know Hebrew affirm that the holy designation of the Seraphin denotes that they are fiery or burning; but that of Cherubin, a fulness of knowledge and stream of wisdom. Naturally, then, the first of the heavenly Hierarchies is ministered⁵ by the most exalted Beings, holding, as it does, a rank which is higher than all, by the fact that it is established immediately around God, and that the first-wrought Divine manifestations and perfections pass earlier to it, as being nearest. They are called, then, Burning and Thrones and Stream of Wisdom—by a name which explains their Godlike dispositions. The appellation of Seraphin plainly teaches their ever moving around things Divine, and constancy, and warmth, and keenness, and the seething of that persistent, indomitable, and inflexible perpetual motion, and that vigorous transformation of the subordinate, by precept and example, as giving new life and rekindling them to the same heat; and purifying through fire and burnt offering, and the light-like and light-shedding characteristic which can never be concealed or consumed, and remains always the same, which destroys and dispels every kind of obscure darkness. But the appellation of the Cherubin denotes their knowledge and their vision of God, and their readiness to receive the highest gift of light, and their power of contemplating the Divine comeliness in its first revealed power, and their being filled with the impartation which maketh wise, and their ungrudging communication to those next to them by pouring forth the wisdom given to themselves. The appellation of the most exalted and pre-eminent Thrones denotes their manifest exaltation above every grovelling inferiority, and their celestial tendency towards higher things; and their unswerving separation from all remoteness; and their invariable and firmly-fixed settlement around the veritable Highest, with the whole force of their powers; and their capacity for receiving the approaches of the Godhead, through the absence of all passion and earthly tendency, and their bearing God; and the ardent expansion of themselves for the Divine receptions. This, then, is the explanation of their names, so far as we can give it; but we ought to say what we think their Hierarchy is. For I suppose we have sufficiently shown above that the purpose of every Hierarchy is an unswerving devotion to the imitation of the Divine Likeness, and that every Hierarchical function is set apart for the sacred reception and distribution of an undefiled purification, and Divine Light and perfecting science.

But now I pray that I may speak worthily of the most exalted minds—how their Hierarchy is exhibited through the oracles.

One must consider, then, that the Hierarchy belongs properly, and is in every respect like, to the first Beings, who are established after the Godhead, who gave them Being, and who are marshalled, as it were, in its very vestibule, who surpass every unseen and seen created power. Now, so far as they are pure, we must regard them, not as though they have been freed from unholy stains and blemishes, nor as though they were unreceptive of earthly fancies, but as far exalted above all stain of inferiority and every transient holiness in accordance with the highest degree of purity—established above the most Godlike powers, and clinging unflinchingly to their own self-moved and same-moved order in their invariable love of God, conscious in no respect whatever of any declivity to a worse condition, but having the invariable fixity of their own godlike identity—never liable to fall, and always unmoved.

Again, so far as they are contemplative, we must not regard them as contemplating sensible signs intellectually, nor as being led to the Divine by the varied texture of holy representations written for our meditation, but as being filled with all kinds of unearthly knowledge of higher light, and satiated, as permissible, with the beautifying and princely beauty superessential and thrice manifested. Thus, deemed worthy of Communion with Jesus, they do not stamp the deifying similitude in the bodily forms of divinely-pictured images, but as being in very truth near to Him in first enjoyment of the knowledge of His deifying illuminations. Further, because the imitation of God is given to them in the highest possible degree, they participate, so far as possible, in His God-wrought and philanthropic virtues, in the power of a first manifestation. But, so far as they are perfected, we must not think of them as being illuminated with a sacred subtlety according to analytic science, but as being filled with a first and pre-eminent deification, as following from the most exalted science of the Divine operations which Angels can possibly possess. For, not through other holy Beings, but from the very Godhead, are they directed in spiritual things, by their elevation to Itself immediately, by their power, and order, and rank surpassing all. They are both planted near the All-Holy without any shadow of turning, and are conducted for contemplation to the unearthly, immaterial, and spiritual comeliness as far as possible, and to the reasons which make known the Divine operations, and as being first around God they are instructed from the source of mystery itself, and supremely directed in Divine mysteries. This, then, the theologians distinctly shew that the subordinate Orders of the heavenly Beings are taught by the superior, in due order, the deifying sciences, and that those who are higher than all are illuminated from the Godhead itself, as far as permissible, in revelations of the Divine mysteries. For they introduce some of them as being religiously instructed by those of a higher rank, that He, Who was raised to Heaven¹ as befits man, is the Lord of the heavenly Powers and King of Glory. Others, as putting the question to Jesus Himself, and as desiring to learn exactly the nature of His Divine work on our behalf, and Jesus, as instructing them directly, and shewing to them at first hand the work of His goodness out of love to man. "For I, He says, am pondering over righteousness and judgment of Salvation."² Now I am astonished that even the first of the Beings in Heaven, and so far above all others, should reverently strive after the Divine illuminations, as though they were intermediate Beings. For they do not ask directly, "Wherefore are Thy garments red?"³ but they first raise the difficulty among themselves, thus shewing that they desire to learn, and crave the deifying knowledge, but not impeding the Divine illumination given to them after a Divine procedure.

The first Hierarchy, then, of the heavenly minds is purified, and enlightened, and perfected by being religiously directed by the Author of initiation Himself, by its elevation to Himself immediately, and by being filled, according to its degree, with the most holy purification of the unapproachable Light of the most perfect source of initiation, and being unstained by any inferiority and full of primal Light, and perfected by its participation in first-given knowledge and science. But to sum up, I may say this, not inappropriately, that the reception of Divine Science is both purification, and enlightenment, and perfecting—purifying, as it were, from ignorance, by the knowledge of the more perfect revelations imparted to it according to its fitness, but enlightening by the self-same Divine knowledge, through which it also purifies that order which did not before contemplate the things which are now made manifest through the higher illumination; and perfecting further, by the self-same Light the abiding science of the mysteries made clearly manifest. This, then, according to my most accurate knowledge, is the first rank of the heavenly Beings which encircle and stand immediately around God, and without symbol, and without interruption, dances around His eternal knowledge in the most exalted and ever-moving stability; viewing with pure eyes many and blessed contemplations, but illuminated with unique and immediate splendours; filled with a Divine nourishment—numerous indeed in its first-given profusion, but one in the unvariegated and unifying oneness of the Divine Food. It is thus deemed worthy of much participation and co-operation with God, by the assimilation to Him, as far as possible, in excellent habits and energies. They thus know many Divine things pre-eminently, and participate in Divine science and knowledge to the utmost. Wherefore the Word of God has transmitted their hymns to those on earth, in which are Divinely shewn the excellency of its most exalted illumination. For some of them, to speak after the manner of men, proclaim as the “voice of many waters,” “Blessed is the glory of the Lord, from His place.”¹ But others cry aloud that frequent and most august word of God, “Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of Sabaoth,” “The whole earth is full of His glory.”² These most excellent hymnologies of the super-celestial minds, we have already unfolded to the best of our ability in the Treatise concerning the Divine hymns, and have spoken sufficiently concerning them in that Treatise, from which, by way of remembrance, it is enough to produce so much as is necessary to our present purpose, namely, “That the first Order, having been instructed in theological science from the Divine Goodness itself, as a Hierarchy reflecting that Goodness, transmitted it to the Order next after itself." To speak briefly, it teaches this—"That the august Godhead—itself both above praise and all praiseworthy—is rightly eulogised by the minds who receive God, so far as He is permitted to be known and sung. For they, according to the oracles,¹ as images of God, are the Divine places of the Divine repose.² Yea further, they affirm that He is alone, and One of three-fold subsistence,³ sending forth His most kindly forethought to all created things, from the supercelestial minds to the lowest of the earth; as Prince above principality and cause of all creation, and grasping all things supernaturally in His resistless embrace.

CAPUT VIII.

Concerning Lordships and Powers and Authorities, and concerning their middle Hierarchy.

Let us now pass to the middle order of the heavenly minds, gazing as far as we may, with celestial vision, upon those Lordships and the truly terrible visions of the Divine Authorities and Powers. For each appellation of the minds above us denotes those characteristics by which they Divinely imitate the Divine Likeness. I think, then, that the explanatory name of the Holy Lordships denotes a certain unslavish tendency to higher things, free from all grovelling subserviency, which does not submit in any way whatever to one single imperious force dissimilar to itself, as befits the freedom of unbending Lordship; superior to every kind of cringing slavery, indomitable to every lower tendency, and elevated above every dissimilarity, ever seeking the true Lordship, and source of Lordship; and moulding as an image of goodness, itself and those after it, to His Lordly Likeness, turning itself wholly to none of the things that vainly seem, but to the Lordly Being, and ever sharing in the Lordly Likeness of God. The appellation of the Holy Powers denotes the possession to the highest possible extent of a certain masculine and unflinching manliness towards all those Godlike energies within themselves—not feebly weak, for the reception of any of the Divine illuminations vouchsafed to it—vigorously conducting itself to the Divine imitation; not forsaking the Godlike movement through its own cowardice, but unflinchingly looking to the superessential and powerful making Power; and becoming an image of this, as far as is permissible, in the likeness of His power, and powerfully turning itself to this as Source of Power, but issuing forth to those next in degree, in its gift of Power and in its likeness to God. But the appellation of the Holy Authorities denotes their being of the same rank as the Divine Lordships and Powers, their beautiful and unconfused good order with regard to the Divine receptions, and the marshalling of the celestial and spiritual Authority, not using their authoritative powers imperiously for base purposes, but conducting themselves in the highest possible degree towards Divine things in due order, and conducting those after them benignly ; and being assimilated, as far as permissible to the Authority giving Source of Authority, and making this visible, as is possible to Angels, in the well-ordered regulations of the Authority giving power. The middle order of the heavenly minds, having these Godlike characteristics, is purified and illuminated in the manner described, through the Divine illuminations vouchsafed to it at second hand, which pass through the first Hierarchical Order, and through this middle as a secondary manifestation. Without dwelling upon that message, which is said to pass through one angel to another, let us take it as a symbol of a message delivered from afar, and obscured in its passage so as to become a secondary revelation. For, as men skilled in our initiation say, the knowledge of Divine things, manifested directly to ourselves, is more perfect than the Divine contemplations imparted through others. Thus, I think, with regard to the angelic ranks, the immediate participation in knowledge of those elevated to the nearest proximity to God, is more clear than that of those who are initiated through the instrumentality of others. Wherefore, by our sacerdotal tradition, the first minds are named, perfecting, illuminating, and purifying Powers, of the subordinate on the ground that these are conducted through them to the superessential Origin of all things ; and are placed in possession, as far as is permissible to them, of the consecrating purifications, and illuminations, and perfections. For this is absolutely fixed by the Divinely-established law of consecration, that through the first, the second should partake of the Divine illuminations. This you will find declared by the theologians in many ways. For when the Divine and Paternal Love towards man had chastened in a remarkable manner, His people Israel, with a view to their spiritual salvation, and had delivered them to terrible and savage nations for correction, by every kind of providential training to better things, He both liberated them from their misery, and led them back, through His compassion, to their former state of comfort. Then, one of the theologians, Zechariah, saw in a vision one of the first Angels, as I think, around God (for the name of Angels is common, as I said, to them all), who learned from God Himself the comforting words, as we say, concerning this matter. But he saw another Angel, of inferior rank, advancing to meet the first Angel, for the purpose of receiving and explaining an illumination. Then, from him, instructed as from a Hierarch, and charged to reveal to the theologian, that Jerusalem should be abundantly occupied by a multitude of people.¹ But another theologian, Ezekiel, says that this was righteously ordained by the glorious Godhead itself, exalted above the Cherubin.² For the Paternal Love towards man, whilst conducting Israel through an education to better things, by a righteousness worthy of God, decided to separate the guilty from the guiltless. This is revealed to one first after the Cherubin³—He who was bound about the loins with a sapphire,⁴ and wore displayed the hierarchical robe coming down to the feet as a symbol of Hierarchical Office. But the other Angels, who bore the battle-axe,⁵ the Divine Government compels to be instructed from the former, as to the Divine judgment in this matter. For, to one, He said that he should go through the midst of Jerusalem, and place the sign upon the forehead of the just men. But to the others, "Go into the city after him and strike, and spare not your eyes, but to every one upon whom is the sign draw not near."

What would any one say concerning the Angel who said to Daniel,⁶ "The word has gone forth?" or concerning him of the first Order, who took the fire from the midst of the Cherubin; or what is more remarkable than this, foreshowing the good order that reigns amongst the Angels, the Cherubin casts the fire into the hands⁷ of him wearing the sacred stole; or concerning him who called the most Divine Gabriel, and said to him, "Make this man understand the vision,"⁸ or whatever else is recorded by the holy theologians concerning the Godlike Order of the celestial Hierarchies, to which the good order of our Hierarchy, after being assimilated to the greatest possible extent, will bear the likeness of the angelic comeliness, as it were, in reflection, taking its whole form from this, and conducted to the superessential source of order in every Hierarchy.

CAPUT IX.

Concerning the Principalities, Archangels and Angels, and concerning their Hierarchy which is last.

There remains for our religious contemplation an Order which completes the Angelic Hierarchies, which is composed of the Godlike Principalities, Archangels, and Angels. I think it necessary, first to declare the meaning of their sacred appellations. For the appellation of the heavenly Principalities denotes their ruling and guiding after the Divine example with religious order most befitting the Princely Powers, and their being wholly turned to the Principality above Principality, and their directing others in a princely fashion, and their being moulded to the distinguished Principality itself, the Maker of Princedom, and that they make manifest their superessential Source of order by the regularity of their princely powers.

The Order of the Holy Archangels is of the same rank with the heavenly Principalities. For there is one Hierarchy and rank, as I said, of themselves and the Angels. But since there is not a Hierarchy which does not possess first and middle and last powers, the holy order of Archangels occupies the middle position in the Hierarchy between the extremes. For it belongs alike to the most holy Principalities and to the holy Angels. To the Principalities because it is turned in a princely fashion to the superessential Prince, and is moulded to It as far as possible, and unites the Angels after the fashion of its own well-regulated and marshalled and invisible Leadership. But it belongs to the Angels because it is of the prophetic Order, receiving in a sacerdotal fashion the Divine illumination from the first powers, and conveys the same to the Angels after the example of God, and through Angels manifests them to us in proportion to the sacred aptitude of each one of the godly persons illuminated. For the Angels, as we have already previously said, complete the whole series of celestial minds as being the last Order of the heavenly Beings, who possess the Angelic characteristic. Yea, rather, they are more properly named Angels by us than those of higher degree. Especially because their Order is occupied in making known, and is more particularly concerned with the things of the world. For the very highest Order, as being placed in the first rank near the Hidden One, we must consider as directing in spiritual things in a more hidden fashion than the Order next to itself. But the second Order, which is composed of the holy Lordships and Powers and Authorities, directs the Hierarchy of the Principalities and Archangels and Angels more clearly indeed than the first Hierarchy, but more hiddenly than the Order after it. We must bear in mind that the more revealing Order of the Principalities, Archangels, and Angels presides through each other over the Hierarchies amongst men, in order that the instruction, and conversion, and communion, and union with God may be in due order, and, in short, that the procession from God vouchsafed in a manner becoming His goodness to all the Hierarchies, and passing to all in common, may be in a most sacred regularity. Hence, the Word of God has assigned our Hierarchy to Angels, naming the distinguished Michael as Ruler of the Jewish people, and others over other nations. For the Most High established borders of nations according to number of Angels of ¹ God. But if anyone should say, "How then were the people of the Hebrews alone conducted to the Divine illuminations?" we must answer that we ought not to throw the blame of the other nations wandering after those which are no gods, upon the faithful superintendence of the Angels. But they themselves, by their own declension, fell away from the faithful conduct towards the Divine, through self-conceit and self-will, and through their irrational reverence for things which appeared to themselves worthy of God. Even the Hebrew people are testified to have suffered the same thing; for He says, "Thou ² hast cast away knowledge of God, and hast gone after thine own heart."³ For neither have we a life governed by necessity, nor, on account of the free will of those who are objects of providential care, are the Divine rays of the providential illumination blunted. But the inaptitude of the mental visions makes the overflowing gift of Light, which comes from paternal goodness, either altogether unparticipated or impenetrable to their resistance, or makes the participations of the one fontal ray, diverse, small or great, obscure or brilliant, although that ray is one and simple, and always the same, and ever overflowing. For even over the other nations, from whom even we have emerged to that boundless and bounteous sea of Divine Light, which is expanded for the ready reception of all, there were not placed certain alien gods. But there is one Prince of all, and to Him the Angels who religiously direct each nation conduct those who follow them. Let us consider Melchizedek ⁴ as being a Hierarch, most dear to God; not of gods which are not, but of Him Who is truly most high God. For the godly wise not only speak of him as being dear to God, but also as Priest, in order that they may clearly shew to the wise that not only was he himself turned to the true God, but further, that he became as Hierarch, a guide to others, in that wisdom which leads to the true and only Godhead.

Let me also recall this to your Hierarchical judgment—that both to Pharaoh,⁵ from the Angel who presided over the Egyptians, and to the Babylonian ⁶ Prince, from his own Angel, the watchful and ruling care of the Providence and Lordship over all was made known in visions. And leaders who were worshippers of the true God were appointed over those nations. For the interpretation of things shaped by angelic visions was made known from God through Angels to holy men akin to the Angels—Daniel and Joseph. For there is one Prince and Providence over all. And never must we think that the Godhead guides Jews by lot, but that Angels, independently, or as of equal rank, or as in opposition, or that certain other gods preside over the other nations. But that particular phrase of the Divine Word, must be accepted according to its very religious intention ; not as though God had divided government amongst men with other gods or Angels, and had been elected by lot to the government and leadership of Israel, but in this sense—that, whereas there is one and the same forethought of the Supreme over all, which has assigned all men for their salvation to the elevating guidance of their own Angels, yet Israel, almost alone in comparison with the rest, turned itself to the Light-gift, and recognition of the true Lord. Hence the Word of God, in order to shew that Israel himself elected for the worship of the true God, says this, “He became¹ the Lord’s portion.” But as shewing that he was distributed equally with the other nations, to one of the holy Angels, for the recognition through him of the one Prince over all, he said, “That Michael² was the Leader of the Jewish people.” From this it is evident that there is one Providence for the whole, pre-eminently established above all powers, unseen and seen, and that all the Angels who preside over each nation elevate as far as possible those who follow them with a willing mind, to Itself as their proper Head.

CAPUT X.

A Repetition and Summary concerning the Angelic Order.

We have concluded, then, that the most exalted order of the minds around God, whilst being sanctified by the perfecting illumination, is purified, and illuminated, and perfected by a gift of light, at once more hidden and more manifest—more hidden, indeed, as being more intellectual, and more simplifying, and more unifying—more manifest, as being a first gift and a first manifestation, and more complete, and more shed forth to it as being more transparent. But from this order again, in due degree, the second, and from the second, the third, and from the third our Hierarchy is religiously conducted to the Beginning above beginning, and End of all good order, according to the self-same law of well-ordered regularity, in Divine harmony and proportion. But all Angels are interpreters of those above them. The very highest, indeed, of God, Who moves them, but the rest in due order of those who have been moved by God. For, to such an extent has the superessential harmony of all things provided for the religious order, and the regulated conduct of each of the rational and intellectual beings, that each rank of the Hierarchies has been placed in sacred order, and we observe every Hierarchy distributed into first and middle and last Powers. But to speak accurately, He divided each order itself, by the same Divine harmonies, on which account the theologians say that the most Divine Seraphin cry one to another,¹ indicating distinctly, as I think, by this, that the first impart their theological knowledge to the second. I might add this not inappropriately, that each celestial and human mind has within itself its own special first and middle and last rank and power, corresponding to the foresaid peculiar instructions of the several Hierarchical illuminations made known in due order, in accordance with which each one participates, so far as is lawful and permissible to himself, in the most spotless purification, the most copious light, the pre-eminent perfection. For there is nothing that is self-perfect, or absolutely without need of perfecting, except the self-perfect and pre-eminently perfect One.

CAPUT XI.

For what reason all the celestial Beings, in common, are called celestial Powers.

Now that we have defined these things, it is worthy of consideration for what reason we are accustomed to call all the angelic Beings together, celestial Powers. For it is not possible to say, as with regard to the Angels, that the Order of the holy Powers is last of all. The Orders of the superior Beings share in the holy illuminations of the last; but the last in no degree of the first; and on this account all the holy minds are called celestial Powers, but never Seraphin and Thrones and Lordships. For the last do not enjoy the whole characteristics of the highest. For the Angels, and those above the Angels, Archangels, and Principalities, and Authorities, whilst being placed after the Powers, by the Word of God, are often called by us, in conjunction with the other holy Beings, heavenly Powers. But we affirm that whilst often using the appellation of celestial Powers for all in common, we do not introduce a sort of confusion of the characteristics of each Order. Now, inasmuch as all the Divine minds are divided into three, in the celestial description given of them—into substance, and power, and energy—when we speak of them all, or some of them, indiscriminately, as celestial Beings or celestial Powers, we must consider that we describe those about whom we speak in a general way, from the substance or power of each of them. For we must not apply the superior characteristic of those holy Powers, whom we have already sufficiently distinguished, to the Beings which are entirely inferior to them, so as to overthrow the unconfused order of the angelic ranks. According to the correct account which we have already frequently given, the superior Orders possess abundantly the sacred characteristics of the inferior, but the lowest do not possess the superior completeness of the highest. For the first-manifested illuminations are revealed to them, through the first Order, in proportion to their capacity.

CAPUT XII.

Why human Hierarchs are called Angels.

But this is sometimes also asked by diligent readers of the oracles. Since the lowest Orders do not possess the completeness of the superior, for what reason is our Hierarch named by the oracles "Angel of the Lord Omnipotent"?¹ Now the statement, as I think, is not contrary to what has been before defined, for we say that the last lack the whole and pre-eminent Power of the most exalted Orders. For they possess in part and degree according to the one harmonious and binding fellowship of all things. For example, the Order of the holy Cherubin possess wisdom and knowledge in a higher degree. But the Orders of the Beings beneath them possess also themselves wisdom and knowledge, but nevertheless partially as compared with them and in a lower degree. For the possession of wisdom throughout is common to all the spiritual which bear the image of God. But the being near and first, or second and inferior, is not common, but as has been determined for each in its own degree. This also one might safely define respecting all the spiritual Minds, for, as the first possess abundantly the goodly characteristics of the inferior, so the last possess those goodly qualities, not indeed in the same degree, but subordinately. There is, then, as I think, nothing absurd if the Word of God calls our Hierarch Angel, since he participates, according to his own capacity, in the prophetic characteristic of the Angels, and elevates himself, as far as possible, to the likeness of their interpreting powers. But you will find that the Word of God calls gods, both the celestial Beings above us, and the holy men² amongst us, who are most beloved of God,³ although the Divine Hiddenness is transcendently elevated and established above all; and no created Being can properly and entirely be said to be like unto It, except those intellectual and rational Beings who are entirely and wholly turned to its Oneness as far as possible, and who elevate themselves indomitably to its Divine illuminations by their imitation of God, if I may so speak, according to their power, and are deemed worthy of the same appellation as God.

CAPUT XIII.

For what reason the Prophet Isaiah is said to have been purified by the Seraphin.

Come, then, let us examine this as best we can, why one of the Seraphin¹ is said to be sent to one of the theologians. For some one may object that not one of the inferior Angels, but one himself enrolled amongst the very highest Beings cleanses the Prophet. Some, indeed, do affirm that, according to the definition already given of the mutual relation of all the Minds, this portion of the Word of God does not name one of the highest around God as having come for the cleansing of the theologian, but that some one of the Angels placed over us as a sacred Minister of the Prophet's cleansing is called by the same name as the Seraphin, on the ground that the removal of the fault spoken of and the restoration of him who was cleansed to the Divine obedience² was through fire; and they say that this oracle speaks simply of one of the Seraphin, not of those who are established around God, but of the Powers established over us for the purpose of cleansing. Now another brought forward to me a by no means foolish defence of this present position. For he said that that great One, whoever he might be—the Angel who formed this vision—for the purpose of teaching the theologian Divine things, referred his own cleansing function to God, and after God, to the first working Hierarchy. And was not this statement true? For he who said this affirmed that the Divine Power passes to all in its frequent visitations, and penetrates all irresistibly, and yet is invisible to all, not only as being superessentially elevated above all, but as secretly transmitting its providential energies to all; yea, rather, it is manifested to all the spiritual Beings in due degree, and conducts its own gift of Light to the most reverend Beings, through whom, as being of the first Order, itself distributes in due order to the subordinate in proportion to the power of each Order to bear the vision of God. Or to speak more strictly, and through familiar illustrations (for if they fall short of the Glory of God, Who is exalted above all, yet they are more instructive to us), the transmission of the sun's ray passes most easily to matter of the first Order, as being more transparent than all, and through this lights up its own splendour more brilliantly. But when it strikes more dense matter, its transmitted brilliancy becomes more obscure, from the inaptitude of the matter illuminated for the transmission of the gift of Light. And from this it is, little by little, contracted so as to almost perfectly exclude the passage of Light. Again, the heat of fire transmits itself chiefly to things that are more receptive, and yielding, and conducive to assimilation to itself. But, as regards repellent substances, either it leaves none, or a very light trace of its fiery energy. More than this, when it comes in contact with things not congenial, through substances favourable to its proper action—First, if it chance to enflame things easily changed to its heat, and through them, either water or some other substance which is not easily heated, it heats them in proportion to their capacity. After the same rule, then, of Nature's well ordered method, the primal regulation of all good order, both visible and invisible, manifests supernaturally the brightness of its own gift of Light to the most exalted Beings in abundant streams of first-manifestation, and through these the Beings after them partake of the Divine ray. For these, as first knowing God, and striving pre-eminently after Divine virtue and to become first-workers, are deemed worthy of the power and energy for the imitation of God, to the utmost degree. And these lovingly elevate the beings after them to an equality with themselves as far as possible, by imparting ungrudgingly to them the splendour which rests upon themselves, and these again to those subordinate. Throughout every Order the first rank imparts its gift to that after it. The Divine Light thus rests upon all, in due proportion, with providential forethought. There is, then, for all those who are illuminated, a Source of illumination—God, that is, naturally, and really, and properly, as Essence of Light, and Cause of Being and Vision itself. But, by ordinance and by Divine imitation, the superior Order is successively the Source to that Order which follows it, by the fact that the Divine rays are poured through this to that. All the remaining Angels, then, naturally regard the highest Order of the heavenly minds as Source of every sacred knowledge and imitation of God, since through them the Divine illumination is distributed to all, and even to us. Wherefore they refer every holy energy of Divine imitation to God indeed as Cause, but to the first Godlike minds as being first authors and teachers of Divine things.

The first Order, then, of the holy Angels, possess more than all, the characteristic of fire; and the distribution of the streams of Divine wisdom; and the faculty of knowing the highest science of the Divine illuminations; and the characteristic of Thrones, exhibiting their expansion for the reception of God. But the ranks of the subordinate Beings possess the faculty of fire, of wisdom, of knowledge, of Divine reception—but in a lower degree. And looking to the first, and through them, as being worthy of the Divine imitation in the first degree, they are conducted to the highest possible likeness of God. The aforesaid holy characteristics, then, which the Beings after them possess through the first, they attribute to those Beings themselves as Hierarchs after God.

He who said this, was accustomed to affirm that this vision was shewn to the Theologian¹ through one of the holy and blessed Angels who are set over us, and from his illuminating direction that he, the Prophet, was elevated to that spiritual vision in which he saw the most exalted Beings, to speak symbolically, fixed under God, and with God, and around² God, and the Supreme Eminence above all eminence, elevated unspeakably above all, seated on high in the midst of the most exalted Beings. The Theologian then learned, from the things seen, that as compared with every supéressential pre-eminence, the Divine was seated above every visible and invisible power, and that He is exalted above all, as Absolute—not even comparable to the first of created Beings. Further also, that He is the very Being of all, and Cause of all cause, and unalterable centre of the undissolved continuance of all, from Whom is both the being and the well-being of the most exalted Powers themselves. Then he was instructed in the God-like qualities of the most holy Seraphin, whose sacred appellation signifies the Fiery, concerning which we shall shortly speak, so as to shew as best we can, the hidden mysteries of the empyrion faculty which leads to Divine imitation. But when the holy Prophet viewed the free and most exalted restoration to the Divine, in first, middle, and last conceptions, as depicted in the representation of the six wings; and further, when he contemplated their innumerable feet and many faces, and their extended wings—some under their feet, and the other over their faces, and their perpetual movement of their middle wings—he was brought to the intellectual knowledge of the things seen. Since there was manifested to him the power of the most exalted minds for deep penetration and numerous contemplation, and their sacred reverence which they have, above earthly Beings; for the bold, and courageous, and impossible scrutiny into higher and deeper mysteries; and the incessant and high-flying perpetual movement in their orderly striving after the Divine imitation, but he was also taught the hidden mysteries of that Divine and much esteemed heavenly Hymn of Praise—the Angel, whilst forming the vision, imparting, as far as possible, his own Divine knowledge to the theologian. He also taught him this, that the participation, as far as possible, in the Divine and radiant purity, is a purification to the pure, in whatever degree. But this being accomplished from the very Godhead by most exalted causes to all the sacred Minds by a supernatural Hiddenness, is in a manner more manifest, and exhibits and distributes itself in a higher degree to the highest powers around itself. But with regard to the second, or us the lowest intellectual powers, as each is distant as regards the Divine likeness from itself, so it contracts its brilliant manifestation to the single unknowableness of its own hiddenness. But he illuminates the second, severally through the first; and, if one must speak briefly, he is firstly brought from hiddenness to manifestation through the first powers. This, then, the Theologian was taught by the Angel who was leading him to Light—that purification, and all the Divine energies, being made known through the first Beings, are distributed to all the rest, according to the aptitude of each for the deifying participations. Wherefore also, the characteristic of purification by fire he naturally attributed to the Seraphin after God. There is nothing, then, absurd if the Seraphin is said to purify the Prophet. For, as God purifies all, by being cause of all purification, yea, rather (for I use a familiar illustration) as our Hierarch, when purifying or enlightening through his Deacons or Priests, is said himself to purify and enlighten, since the Orders consecrated through him attribute to him their own proper functions; so also the Angel who effected the purification of the Prophet attributed his own purifying science and power to God, as Cause, but to the Seraphin as first-operating Hierarch. As any one might say with Angelic reverence, whilst teaching one who was being purified by himself, “There is a pre-eminent Source, and Essence, and Worker, and Cause of the cleansing wrought upon you from me—He Who brings both the first Beings into Being, and holds them together by their fixity around Himself, and keeps them without change and without fall; moving them to the first participations of His own Providential energies. For this He who taught me these things used to say that this shews the mission of the Seraphin. Now that Hierarch and Leader after God, the Glory of the most exalted Beings, from whom I was taught to purify after the example of God—this is He, Who cleanses thee through me—through Whom the Cause and Creator of all cleansing brought forth His own provident energies from the hidden Abyss, even to us.” These things, then, he taught me, and I impart them to thee. Let it be a part of thy spiritual and discriminating skill, either that each of the reasons assigned should be freed from objection, and to honour one before the other as having likelihood and good reason, and perhaps the truth: or from yourself, to find out something more allied to the real truth, or to learn from another; God, of course, giving the Word, and Angels supplying it; and to reveal to us, the friends of Angels, a more luminous view, if it should be so, and one to me specially welcome.

CAPUT XIV.

What the number attributed to the Angels signifies.

This also is worthy, in my opinion, of spiritual consideration—that the teaching of the oracles concerning the Angels, affirms that they are thousand thousands, and myriad myriads; cumulating and multiplying respecting them the supreme limit of our numbers, and through these shewing clearly that the ranks of the celestial Beings cannot be numbered by us; for many are the blessed hosts of the celestial minds, surpassing the weak and contracted measurement of our mundane calculation. And being definitely known to the celestial and heavenly intelligence and science amongst themselves, which is given to them in profusion by the supremely Divine and infinitely wise Head, and essential Cause and connecting Force, and encompassing Term of all created things together. (Dan. vii. 10.)

CAPUT XV.

What are the corporeal likenesses of the angelic Powers? what the fiery? what the likeness to man? what are the eyes? what the nostrils? what the ears? what the mouths? what the touch? what the eyelids? what the eyebrows? what the prime? what the teeth? what the shoulders? what the elbows? what the hands? what the heart? what the breasts? what the back? what the feet? what the wings? what the wrestler? what the robe? what the shining raiment? what the sacerdotal? what the girdles? what the rods? what the spears? what the battle-axe? what the measuring lines? what the winds? what the clouds? what the brass? what the electron? what the choir? what the clapping of hands? what the colours of transparent stones? what the likeness of the lion? what the likeness of the ox? what the likeness of the eagle? what the horses? what the various kinds of coloured horses? what the rivers? what the chariots of the Angels?

Come, then, let us at last, if you please, rest our mental vision from the strain of lofty contemplations, which is fit for Angels, and when we have descended to the divided and manifold picture of the manifold variety of the angelic forms, let us then return analytically from the same. as from images, to the naked¹ truth of the celestial minds. Let this first be borne in mind, that the explanations of the typical likenesses represent the same ranks of the celestial Beings. as sometimes ruling, and at other times as being ruled, and the last as ruling, and the first as being ruled ; and the same, as has been said, as having first, and middle, and last powers—without introducing anything absurd into the description, according to the following mode of explanation. For if indeed we were to say that some are ruled by those above them, and then that they were ruling the same, and that those above, whilst ruling those below, are ruled by those same, who are being ruled, the thing would manifestly be absurd, and mixed with all sorts of confusion. But if we say that the same rule, and are ruled, but no longer the same, or from the same, but that each Order is itself ruled by those above it, but rules those below it, one might say appropriately that the Divinely pictured forms in the oracles, the self-same may sometimes properly and truly apply to both first and middle and last powers. Now the elevation by being turned to things above, and their being drawn inflexibly around each other, as being guardians of their own proper powers, and their possession, with regard to those after them, of the power to provide for them by a mutual communication, belongs truly to all the heavenly Beings ; although to some pre-eminently and wholly, as we have often said, but to others partially and in a less degree. But we must keep our discourse within bounds, and must search in our first explanation of the types for what reason the Word of God prefers the sacred representation of fire in preference to almost every other.¹ You will find it, then, representing not only wheels of fire, but also living creatures of fire² ; and men flashing like lightning³ ; and placing around the heavenly Beings themselves heaps of coals of fire⁴ ; and rivers of flame, flowing with irresistible force.⁵ But also it says that the thrones are of fire⁶ ; and that the most exalted Cherubin glows with fire, it shows from their appellation ; and it attributes the characteristic and energy of fire⁷ to them ; and everywhere, above and below, it prefers pre-eminently the representation by the image of fire. I think, then, the similitude of fire,⁸ denotes the likeness of the Divine minds to God, in the highest degree, for the holy theologians frequently describe the superessential and formless Being by fire, as having many likenesses, if I may be permitted to say so, of the Divine character, in things visible. For the sensible fire is, so to speak, in everything, and passes through everything unmingled, and is exalted above all, and whilst giving light to everything, is at the same time concealed, unknown in its essential nature, except when it may happen to shew its own proper energy in any matter lying near it. It is both incomprehensible and invisible ; itself subduing all things, and bringing under its own energy anything in which it may happen to be ; unchangeable, imparting itself to all things near it, whatever they may be ; renewing by its rousing heat, and giving light by its illuminations which cannot be hid ; uncontrollable, unmingled, separating, unchangeable, elevating, penetrating, lofty, subject to no grovelling inferiority, ever moving, self-moving, moving other things, comprehending, incomprehended, needing no other, imperceptibly increasing itself, displaying its own magnitude to the materials receiving it, energetic, powerful, present in all, when unobserved seeming not to be, but manifesting itself suddenly, according to its own proper nature by friction, when, as it were, we seek to find it ; and again flying away uncontrollably it remains undiminished, in all the joyful distributions of itself. And one might find many characteristics of fire, appropriate to display the Divine Energy, as it were, in sensible images. Those, then, who are wise in the things of God, knowing this, depict the celestial Beings under the image of Fire, shewing their Godlike nature, and their imitation of God, as far as permissible.

But they also depict them under the likeness of men,¹ on account of their intellectual nature, and their having the faculty of looking to things above, and their straight and erect form, and their innate faculty of ruling and guiding ; and whilst being least in natural power as compared with the powers of irrational Beings, yet ruling over all by their superior power of mind, and by their superiority in rational science, and their innate unslavishness and indomitableness of soul. It is possible, then, I think, to find within each of the many parts of our body images harmonious to the heavenly powers, whilst we affirm that the powers of vision² denote the most transparent elevation towards the Divine light ; and again, the tender liquid and unrepellent, but sensitive, and pure, and unfolded reception, free from all passion, of the supremely Divine illuminations.

But the discriminating powers of the nostrils denote the receptive power of the distributed odours, sweet beyond conception, and the power of distinguishing accurately things which are not such, and entirely rejecting them.³

The powers of the ear denote the conscious participation and reception of the Divine inspiration.

The powers of taste denote the fulness of the intellectual food, and the reception of the Divine and nourishing streams.⁴

The powers of touch denote the skilful discrimination of that which is suitable or injurious.⁵

The eyelids and eyebrows denote the guarding of the conceptions which reveal God.

The figures of manhood and youth denote the perpetual bloom and vigour of life.¹

The teeth denote the dividing of the perfect nourishment given to us. For each intellectual Being divides and multiplies by a provident faculty the unified conception given to it by the more Divine Order, in proportion necessary for the instruction of the inferior.

The shoulders and elbows,² and further, the hands,³ denote the power of making, and striving, and accomplishing.

The heart is a symbol of the Godlike life, dispersing its own life-giving power to the objects of its forethought after the Divine likeness.

The chest again denotes the invincible and protective faculty of the life-giving distribution as being placed above the heart.

The back, the holding together the whole productive powers⁴ of life.

The feet⁵ denote the movement, and quickness, and skilfulness of the perpetual movement advancing towards Divine things. Wherefore also the Word of God represented the feet of the holy Minds as being placed under their wings⁶; for the wing displays the quickness of instruction, and the progress towards the heavenly and higher things, and the elevation above all earthly things for love of higher. But the elevation of the wings denotes their being in no respect earthly, but in all purity raised to the higher things without hindrance.

But the naked and unshod denotes the unfettered, agile, and unrestrained, and free from all external superfluity, and their assimilation to the Divine simplicity as far as attainable.

But since again the simple and variegated wisdom⁷ both clothes the naked and distributes certain implements to them to carry, let us unfold, according to our power, the sacred garments and implements of the celestial Minds. The shining and glowing raiment, I think, signifies the Divine likeness after the image of fire—brilliant⁸—and their distribution of Light, in consequence of their repose in Heaven, where is the Light. And their complete illuminating as superior Beings, and their being illuminated as inferior. But the sacerdotal robe denotes their instruction⁹ in Divine and mystical visions, and the consecration of their whole life. But the girdles signify their guard over their productive powers, and their own collected habit to be turned to Oneness with It, and to encircle It with good order by being drawn around itself by an unbroken identity.

The rods signify the kingly and directing faculty, making all things straight. The spears¹ and the battle-axe² denote the dividing of things unlike, and the sharp and energetic and drastic operation of the discriminating powers. The geometrical³ and technical⁴ articles denote the founding, and building, and completing, and whatever else belongs to the instructing and guiding forethought, for the subordinate Orders. But sometimes the implements of the holy Angels presented to our view are the symbols of God's judgment to ourselves. Some representing His correcting⁵ instruction or avenging righteousness.⁶ Others freedom from peril, or end of education, or resumption of former well-being, or addition of other gifts, small or great, material or intellectual.⁷ Nor would a discriminating mind, in any case whatever, have difficulty in properly adapting things visible to things invisible.

But the fact that they are named winds⁸ denotes their rapid flight, passing almost instantaneously to all things; and their movement in passing from above to below, and again from below to above—their elevating the second to the height above, but moving the first to a common and provident conduct of the inferior Orders. But perhaps someone would say that the appellation of wind, to the aerial spirit, also denotes the Divine likeness of the celestial minds. For this also bears a likeness and type of the Divine energy (as we have demonstrated more fully in the symbolic theology, in our explanation of the four elements) in accordance with the moving and life-producing, and the rapid and resistless procession of Nature, and the unobserved and invisible Hiddenness of the moving springs and terminations. For He says, "Thou knowest not whence it cometh⁹ nor whither it goeth." But also the Word of God attributes to them the appearance of a cloud,¹⁰ signifying through this that the holy minds are filled in an unearthly degree with the hidden Light; receiving the first manifestation without boasting, which they distribute ungrudgingly to the second, as a secondary manifestation, and in proportion to their capacity. Yea, further, that the productive, and life-producing, and increasing, and perfecting power is enshrined in them, in consequence of the spiritual production of showers, which summon the receptive womb of the earth, by fruitful showers, to the life-giving pangs of birth.

Also, the Word of God attributes to the celestial Beings a likeness to Brass,¹ Electron,² and many-coloured stones. Electron, as being partly like silver, partly like gold, denotes the incorruptible, as in gold, with unexpended, and undiminished, and spotless brilliancy, and the brightness as in silver, and a luminous and celestial radiance. But to the Brass, according to the reasons assigned, must be attributed either the likeness of fire or that of gold.

We must consider the many-coloured appearances of stones, denotes either, as white, the luminous ; or as red, the fiery ; or as yellow, the golden ; or as green, the youthful and the full grown ; and within each likeness you will find an explanation which teaches the inner meaning of the typical images.

But since, I think, according to our power, this has been sufficiently said, we will pass to the sacred explanation of the Divine representations of the celestial minds through wild beasts. We must consider that the shape of a Lion³ signifies the leading, and robust, and indomitable, and the assimilation as far as possible to the unutterable Deity, by the concealment of the spiritual footsteps, and by the mysteriously secret covering of the path leading to itself during Divine illumination.

The image of the Ox⁴ denotes the strong and the mature, turning up the spiritual furrows for the reception of the heavenly and productive powers. The Horns the guarding and indomitable.

The representation of the Eagle⁵—the kingly, and soaring, and swift in flight, and quickness, and wariness, and agility, and cleverness in search of the nourishment which makes strong ; and the unimpeded, straight, and unflinching gaze towards the bounteous and brilliant splendour of the Divine rays of the sun, with the robust endurance of its visual powers.

That of Horses represents obedience and docility ; when they are white, brilliancy, and especially their affinity to the Divine Light ; when they are black, the Hidden ; when they are red, the fiery ; when they are black and white, the uniting of the extremities by the power passing through them, and joining the first to the second, and the second to the first, by twining or directing. But if we did not consult the proportion of our discourse, we might, not inappropriately, adapt the particular characteristics of the living creatures spoken of, and all their bodily representations to the heavenly Powers, upon the principle of dissimilar similitudes. For instance, their appearance of anger—to spiritual manliness, of which anger is the last echo, but desire—to the Divine love, and to speak summarily, referring all the senses and many parts of irrational Beings to the immaterial conceptions and unified Powers of the celestial Beings. But not only is this sufficient for the wise, but even an explanation of one of the dissimilar representations would be sufficient for the accurate description of similar things after the same fashion. But we must examine the fact that Rivers¹ are spoken of, and Wheels² and Chariots,³ as associated with the heavenly Beings. The rivers of fire signify the Divine streams providing for them an ungrudging and incessant flow, and nourishing the productive powers of life. The Chariots the conjoined communion of those of the same rank in united fellowship. The wheels as being winged, advancing without turning and without deviation, denote the power of their advancing energy within a straight and direct way, whilst their whole intellectual track is Divinely directed towards the same undeviating and direct way. But it is possible to interpret in another form the sacred description of the spiritual wheels, for the name Gel, Gel, is given to them, as the theologian says. This shows, according to the Hebrew tongue, revolutions and revelations. For the Divine wheels of fire have revolutions, by their perpetual movement around the Goodness itself; but revelations by the explanation of things hidden, and by the instruction of things on earth, and by the descending procession of the sublime illuminations to things below. There remains for accurate explanation, the statement respecting the rejoicing of the celestial Orders⁴; for they are utterly incapable of our impassioned pleasure. But they are said to rejoice with God, over the discovery of what was lost, in accordance with their Divine good nature, and that Godlike and ungrudging rejoicing over the care and salvation of those who are turned to God—with that joy beyond description of which also holy men often partake, whilst the deifying illuminations of the Deity rest upon them. Let it suffice, then, to have said this much concerning the Divine representations, which no doubt falls short of their accurate explanation, but which will prevent us, I think, from servilely resting in the resemblances of the types. But if you should say that we have not mentioned the whole Angelic Powers, depicted in the oracles, or energies, or likenesses, we answer in truth that we do not possess the celestial knowledge of some; and further, with regard to these, we have need of another instructor to guide us into Light. But other things as being parallel to the things said, we have omitted, out of regard to the length of the discourse; and the hidden mysteries, beyond our capacity, we have honoured by silence.

ECCLESIASTICAL HIERARCHY.

CAPUT I.

TO MY FELLOW PRESBYTER TIMOTHY.
DIONYSIUS THE PRESBYTER.

What is the traditional view of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, and what is its scope?

WE must, then, demonstrate, most pious of pious sons, that ours is a Hierarchy of the inspired and Divine and Deifying science, and energy and perfection. This we will do, from the celestial and most sacred oracles—for those who have been initiated with the initiation of the sacred revelation derived from the hierarchical mysteries and traditions. But see that you do not put to scorn the things the most holy. Take good heed, and you will then guard the honour of the hidden things of God by intellectual and obscure definitions, carefully guarding them from the participation and defilement of the profane, and communicating them reverently only to persons the most holy. For thus, as the Word of God has taught us who feast at His Banquet, even Jesus Himself—the supremely Divine and superessential Mind, the Head and Being, and most supremely Divine Power of every Hierarchy and Sanctification and Divine operation—illuminates the blessed Beings who are superior to us, in a manner more clear, and at the same time more fresh, and assimilates them to His own Light in proportion to their ability to receive. As for ourselves, by the love of things beautiful, elevated to Himself, and elevating us, He folds together our many diversities, and by making them into an unified and Divine life, suitable to a sacred vocation both as to habit and action, He Himself bequeaths the power of the Divine Priesthood, from which, by approaching to the holy exercise of the priestly office, we become nearer to the Beings above us, by assimilation, according to our power, to the stability and unchangeableness of their steadfastness in holy things. Hence, by looking upwards to the blessed and supremely Divine Glory of Jesus, and reverently gazing upon whatever we are permitted to see, and being illuminated with the knowledge of the visions, we shall be able to become, as regards the science of Divine mysteries, both purified and purifying—images of Light, and workers with God, perfected and perfecting.

What, then, is the Hierarchy of the Angels¹ and Archangels, and supermundane Principalities and Authorities, Powers and Lordships, Divine Thrones, or Beings of the same ranks as the Thrones—which the Word of God describes as being near, and always about God, and with² God, naming them in the Hebrew tongue Cherubin and Seraphin—what pertains to the sacred Orders and divisions of their ranks and Hierarchies you will find in the books we have written—not as befits their dignity, but to the best of our ability—in which we have followed the Word of God as it describes their Hierarchy in the Holy Scriptures. Nevertheless, it is necessary to say this, that both that and every Hierarchy which we are now celebrating has one and the same power throughout the whole of its hierarchical functions, and that the Hierarchy himself, according to his nature, and aptitude, and rank, is initiated in Divine things, and deified and imparts to his subordinates according to the meetness of each, the sacred deification which comes to himself from God. Likewise, that the subordinates follow the superior, but elevate the inferior towards things in advance; and that some go before, and, as far as possible, give the lead to others; and that each, as far as may be, participates in Him Who is the truly Beautiful, and Wise, and Good, through this Divine and sacerdotal harmony.

But the Beings and ranks above us, of whom we have already made a reverent mention, are both incorporeal and their Hierarchy is intellectual and supermundane. But we observe that our hierarchy, conformably to our nature, abounds in a manifold variety of material symbols, from which, in proportion to our capacity, we are conducted by sacerdotal functions to the onelike deification—God and Divine Virtue. They indeed, as being minds, perceive, according to laws laid down for themselves. But we are led by sensible figures to Divine contemplations as is possible to us. And to speak truly, there is One to Whom all the Godlike aspire. But they do not partake of this One and the Same in one manner, but as the Divine ordinance distributes to each a meet inheritance. Now these things have been treated more systematically in the Treatise concerning “Intellectual and Sensible.” But now I will attempt to describe our Hierarchy, and its head and substance as best I can; invoking Jesus the Head and Perfection of all Hierarchies. Every Hierarchy, then, is, according to our august tradition, the whole description of the sacred things falling under it—a most complete summary of the sacred rites of this or that Hierarchy, as the case may be. Our Hierarchy, then, is called and is the systematic account of the whole sacred rites included within it; according to which the divine Hierarchy, being initiated, will have within himself the participation of the most sacred things, as chief¹ of Hierarchy. For as he who speaks of Hierarchy speaks of the order of the whole sacred rites collectively, so he who mentions Hierarchy denotes the inspired and godly man—one who understands accurately all sacred knowledge, in whom is completed and recognized, in its purity, the whole Hierarchy.

Of this Hierarchy, as supreme Head, is the Triad—the Fountain of Life—the Essence of Goodness—the One Cause of things that be—from Whom both being and well-being come to things that are—through goodness. Of this supremely Divine blessedness—exalted above all—the threefold One—the really existing—the will—inscrutable to us, but known to itself—is the rational salvation of Beings amongst us and above us. But that salvation cannot otherwise take place, than upon the condition that those who are being saved become deified. But the deification is the assimilation and oneness towards God, as far as permissible. Now this is the common end of every Hierarchy—the clinging love towards God and Divine things; a love divinely sanctified into oneness with Him; and for the sake of this, the complete and unswerving removal of things contrary—the knowledge of things as they are in themselves—the vision and clear knowledge of sacred truth—the Divine participation of the uniform perfection, the One itself, as far as permissible; the banquet of contemplation, nourishing intellectually and deifying every man who elevates himself towards it.

Let us affirm, then, that the Divine Blessedness, the self-existent Godhead, Source of deification, from Whom comes the deification of those deified, bequeathed by Divine Goodness the Hierarchy, for the salvation and deification of all rational and intellectual Beings. To the supermundane and blessed inheritors it is bequeathed in a manner more immaterial and intellectual (for God does not move them to Divine things from without, but intellectually, and they are illuminated as to the Divine will from within, with a pure and unearthly brilliancy), but to us—that which is given to them simply, and uniformly, and enveloped—is given from the Divinely transmitted oracles, in a variety and multitude of divisible symbols, as we are able to receive it. For the Divinely transmitted oracles are the very Being of our Hierarchy. But we affirm that these oracles are most august—all such as were given from our inspired initiators in Divinely written letters of the Word of God. And further, whatever our leaders have revealed to us from the same holy men, by a less earthly instruction, very similar to the Heavenly Hierarchy, from mind to mind; through the medium of speech, and so corporeal, but nevertheless more immaterial—without writing. Nor did the inspired Hierarchs transmit¹ these things in conceptions clear to the commonalty of the Divine Service, but in sacred symbols. For it is not every one that is holy, nor as the oracles affirm does knowledge belong to all.²

Of necessity, then, the first leaders of our Hierarchy, after they had themselves been filled with the sacred gift from the super-essential Godhead, and sent by the Divine Goodness to extend the same gift to those without; and they themselves as godly, desiring the instruction and deification of those after them, without grudging imparted to us—by written and unwritten revelations—in accordance with sacred injunctions, things supercelestial in sensible images—the simple and enfolded, in the variegated and multiform; the things Divine, in things human, things immaterial in things material; the superessential in things earthly. Nor did they do this on account merely of the unholy, to whom it is not permitted even to touch the symbols, but because our Hierarchy is, as I said, a kind of symbol adapted to our condition, which needs things material for our more Divine elevation from these to things spiritual. The reasons, however, of the symbols have been revealed to the Divine initiators, which it is not permitted to explain to those who are yet being initiated; as knowing that the Lawgivers for rites Divinely taught deliberately arranged the Hierarchy in well-established and unconfused ranks, and in proportionate and sacred distributions of that which was convenient to each according to capacity. Wherefore, trusting in those Thy sacred promises, for it is well to recall them to your recollection, that, since every Hierarchical doctrine is of supreme importance, you will not commit them to any other but those Godlike initiators of the same rank with yourself, and will persuade them to promise, according to the regulation of our Hierarchy, to touch pure things purely, and to communicate the things of God to the godly alone, and things perfect to those who are perfecting, and the most holy things to the holy; I have entrusted this Divine gift to thee, in addition to many other Hierarchical gifts.

CAPUT II.

Concerning those who are being initiated in illumination.

We have, then, reverently affirmed that the scope of our Hierarchy is this—the assimilation and oneness with God as far as permissible. But as the Divine oracles teach, we shall attain this only by the love and the religious performance of the worshipful Commandments. For He says: "He¹ that loveth Me will keep My Commandments, and My Father will love him, and will come unto him, and make Our abode with him." What, then, is the beginning of the religious performance of the most august commandments? The teaching of the sacred and most Divine regeneration, which forms an aptitude in the habits of our soul for the reception of the other Divine sayings and doings²; the preparation of the way for our ascent to the supercelestial rest.³ For, as our illustrious Leader was used to say, the very first movement of the mind towards Divine things is the love of God, but the very earliest approach towards the religious performance of the Divine commandments is the unutterable creation of our being in God. For if our⁴ being in God is the Divine engendering, never would he know, and certainly not perform any of the Divine instructions, who had not first his beginning to be in God. To speak after the manner of men, is it not necessary that we should first begin to be, and then to do what belongs to us? For he who does not exist at all has neither movement nor even beginning. But he who actually exists does or suffers only those things suitable to his own condition. This, then, as I think, is clear. Let us next contemplate the Divine symbols of the birth in God. And I pray, let no uninitiated person approach the sight; for neither is it without danger to gaze upon the glorious rays of the sun with weak eyes, nor is it without peril to put our hand to things above us. For right was the priesthood of the Law when rejecting Osias,⁵ because he put his hand to sacred things; and Korah,⁶ to things above his capacity; and Nadab⁷ and Abihu, because they treated things within their own province unholily.

² 1 Cor. viii. 7.

II.—Mystery of Illumination.

The Hierarchy, then, wishing⁸ that all men whatsoever should be saved by their assimilation towards God, and come to a recognition of truth, proclaims to all the veritable Gospel—that God being compassionate towards men upon earth, from His own proper and inherent goodness, Himself deigned to come to us with outstretched arms, on account of loving kindness towards men; and, by union with Himself, like as by fire, to assimilate things that have been made one, in proportion to their aptitude for deification. "For as many as received Him, to them gave He power⁹ to become sons of God—to those believing on His Name, who were begotten, not from bloods, nor from will of flesh, but from God."

He who has felt a religious longing to possess these truly celestial gifts, comes to some one of the initiated, and persuades him to act as his conductor to the Hierarchy. He then promises wholly to follow the teaching that shall be given to him, and prays him to undertake the superintendence of his introduction, and of all his life afterwards. But he, though religiously longing for his salvation, when he measures human infirmity against the loftiness of the undertaking, is seized with a shivering and sense of incapacity. Nevertheless, at last, he promises, with a good grace, to do what is requested, and takes and leads him to the chief Hierarchy. He then benevolently receives the man, as a sheep upon his shoulders, and admits the two men, and worships and glorifies, with a mental thanksgiving and bodily prostration, the One Author¹ and Finisher of Good ; from Whom those who are being called are called, and those who are being saved are saved.

He then collects the whole religious Order into the holy Choir for co-operation and common rejoicing over the man's salvation ; but also for thanksgiving to the Divine Goodness. At the commencement he chants a certain hymn found in the oracles, accompanied by the whole body of the Church. And after this, when he has kissed the holy table, he advances to the man standing before him, and demands of him, what has brought him here ? When the man, out of love to God, has confessed, according to the instruction of his sponsor, his ungodliness,² his ignorance of the truly beautiful, his insufficiency for the Divine life, and demands through his holy mediation to attain to God and Divine things, he testifies to him that his approach ought to be entire, as to God Who is All Perfect, and without blemish. When he has expounded to him fully the Divine course of life, and has demanded of him, if he would thus live ; after his promise he places his right hand upon his head, and when he has sealed him, he commands the priests to register the man and his sponsor.

When these have enrolled the names, he offers a holy prayer, and when the whole Church have completed this with him, he unlooses his sandals and removes his clothing by means of the Deacons. Then when he has placed him facing the west, and whilst he beats with aversion his hands towards the same quarter, he thrice commands him to breathe scorn upon Satan, and further, to profess the words of the renunciation. When he has witnessed his threefold renunciation, he turns him to the east, after he has confessed this three times, and has looked up to heaven and extended his hands thitherward, he commands him to be subject to Christ, and to all the Divinely transmitted oracles of God. When the man has done this, he witnesses again for him his threefold confession, and again, when he has thrice confessed, after prayer, he gives thanks and lays his hand upon him. When the Deacons have entirely unclothed him, the Priests bring the holy oil of the chrism. Then he begins the chrism, through the threefold sealing, and assigns the man to the Priests for the anointing of his whole body, while he himself advances to the mother of filial adoption, and dedicates the water within it by the sacred invocations, and consecrates it by three cruciform affusions of the holy myrrh. And when he has invoked three times, as in the injection of the myrrh, the holy melody of the inspiration of the Divinely rapt Prophets, he orders the man to be brought forward. When one of the Priests, from the register, has announced the name of himself and his surety, he is conducted by the Priests over the water to the hand of the Hierarch, being led by the hand to him. Then the Hierarch, standing above, when the Priests have again called aloud, near the Hierarch, within the water, the name of the initiated, the Hierarch dips him three times, invoking the threefold¹ Subsistence of the Divine Blessedness at the three immersions and emersions of the initiated. The Priests then take him and entrust him to the Sponsor and guide of his introduction.

And when they, in conjunction with him, have cast over the initiated appropriate clothing, they lead him again to the Hierarch, who, when he has sealed the man with the most Divinely operating myrrh, declares him henceforward a partaker of the most Divinely initiating Eucharist.

When he has finished these things, he elevates himself from his progression to things secondary, to the contemplation of the first ; as one who at no time or manner turns himself to any other office than those which are peculiarly his own, but who, by gradual advance in Divine things, is persistently and always ranging himself under the banner of the supremely Divine Spirit.

III.—Contemplation.

This initiation, then, of the holy birth in God, as in symbols, has nothing unbecoming or irreverent, nor anything of sensible imagery, but enigmas of a contemplation worthy of God, bearing a likeness to natural images suitable to men. For should it appear in any particular misleading (even though the more Divine account of the religious ceremonies were passed over in silence), its Divine institution might persuade, diligently pursuing, as it does, the good life of the candidate ; announcing to him, in a bodily form, the purification from every kind of evil, through a virtuous and Divine life, by the physical cleansing through the agency of water. This then, even if the symbolic teaching of the religious rites had nothing more divine, would not be without religious value, as I think—introducing a discipline of a well-regulated life, whilst suggesting through the bodily purification by water, the complete purification from an evil life. Let this, then, be for the uninitiated an introductive leading of the soul; separating, as is fit, things sacred and unified from multiplicity, and apportioning our harmonious restoration to the Orders in due degree. But we who have ascended by just gradations to the contemplation of the highest mysteries, and have been religiously taught their hidden meanings, shall recognize of what moulds they are the reliefs, and of what invisible things they are the likenesses. For, as is distinctly shewn in the Treatise concerning “Intelligible and Sensible,” sensible sacred things are reliefs of things intelligible, to which they lead and shew the way. But things intelligible are an archetype and explanation of sacred things, cognizable by the senses. Let us affirm, then, that the goodness of the Divine Blessedness is always the same in condition and object, unfolding the beneficent rays of its own light upon all the intellectual visions without grudging. Either, then, the self-chosen freedom of action might turn away from spiritual light, by closing, through love of evil, the faculties for enlightenment, which naturally reside within it, and might be separated from the light present to it, and not turned from it—but illuminating it, whilst closing itself in darkness—and which generously runs to that which moves itself away. Or should anyone overstep the bounds of the vision given to itself, in due proportion, and rashly undertake to gaze upon the rays superior to its own vision, the light indeed does nothing beyond its own proper functions. But this, as imperfectly approaching the perfect, would not attain to things inappropriate to its condition, but by stupidly disregarding the due proportion, would fail through its own fault.

But as I said, the Divine Light is always unfolded for beneficent purposes to intellectual visions, and it is possible for them to seize it when it is present, and is always most ready for the distribution of its own gift, in a manner becoming the Deity. To the imitation of this, the divine Hierarch is fashioned, unfolding to all, without grudging, the luminous rays of his own divine teaching, and after the Divine example being most ready to enlighten him who comes to him, not using malice or an unholy wrath, for former backslidings or excess; but, after the example of God, always enlightening those who approach him, as becomes a Hierarch, in fitness, and order, and proportion to the aptitude of each for things Divine.

But inasmuch as the Deity is Origin of that sacred order, within which move the holy Minds who know themselves, he who recurs to the proper view of nature will see his proper self in what he was originally, and will acquire this as the first sacred gift from his recovery to light. Now he, who has well looked upon his own proper condition with unbiased eyes, will depart from the gloomy recesses of ignorance; yet, whilst being initiated, he will not of his own accord at once desire the most perfect Oneness and participation of God, but little by little, through things present advancing to things more forward, and through these to things foremost; and having been perfected, he will be carried in order and in a heavenly manner to the Divinely supreme height. An image of this good order is the modesty of the person approaching, and his recognition of his own internal condition in providing the sponsor as leader in his approach to the Hierarchy. The Divine Blessedness receives the man thus conducted into communion with itself, and imparts to him his own light, as a kind of sign, making him also a godly sharer of the inheritance and sacred order of godly men, of which the Hierarchy's seal, given to the proselyte, is a sacred symbol; and the enrolment of the priests, as an image of salvation, registering him amongst those who are in a state of salvation, and placing in the sacred memorials his sponsor and himself—the one indeed, as a true lover and follower of a godly guide in the life-giving journey towards truth; and the other, as an unerring conductor of his neophyte to the Divinely taught directions.

But it is not possible to hold conjointly qualities thoroughly opposed, nor that a man who has had a certain fellowship with the One, should have divided lives, if he clings to the firm participation in the One. But he must be resistless and persistent as regards all separations from the uniform. This it is which the teaching of the symbols reverently intimates, by stripping the neophyte, as it were, of his former life, and unloosing to the very extremities all his habits within that life. It places him naked and barefoot, looking towards the west, and spurning, by the aversion of the hands, the participations in the gloomy evil, and breathing out, as it were, the dissimilar habit which he had acquired, and proclaiming the entire renunciation as regards everything contrary to the Divine likeness. When the man has thus become completely indomitable and separate from evil, he leads him towards the east, declaring clearly that his position and recovery will be in the Divine Light, in the complete separation from evil, receiving his sacred promises of his entire leaning towards the One, as of a man who has acquired the image of the One, through love of the truth. But it is pretty evident, as I think, to those versed in Hierarchical matters, that the spiritual acquire the unchangeableness of the Godlike habit by continuous and persistent struggles towards one; and by the entire destruction and annihilation of things contrary. For it is necessary that a man should not only depart from every kind of evil, but he must be bravely obdurate and ever disdainful against the baneful submission to it. Nor must he at any time become remiss in his sacred love of the truth, but he must, with all his power, persistently and perpetually aspire towards it, always religiously pursuing his upward course to the more perfect mysteries of the supreme Godhead.

Now you may perceive the distinct images of these things in the religious rites performed by the Hierarchy. For the Godlike Hierarchy starts with the holy anointing, but the Priests under him complete the Divine service of the Chrism, summoning the initiated, in type, to the holy contests within which he is placed under Christ as Umpire (since as God He is Framer of the laws of contest); as wise, He placed its laws; but as generous, He fixed the awards suitable to the victors.¹ And this is yet more Divine, inasmuch as being generous, He entered the lists with them, contending, on behalf of their freedom² and victory against the power of death³ and destruction,⁴ he who is initiated will enter the contests as those of God rejoicing. But he will remain fixed in the regulations of the Wise, and will contend, according to them, without transgression, holding fast the hope of the beautiful rewards, as being enrolled under a good Lord and Leader of the contest. But when he has followed in the Divine footsteps of the first of Athletes as regards goodness, and has overthrown, in his struggles after the Divine example, the energies and impulses opposed to his deification, he dies with Christ—to speak mystically—to sin in his Baptism.

But consider this attentively, I pray, with what appropriateness the holy symbols are presented. For since death is with us, not an annihilation of being, according to the opinion of others, but the separation of things united, leading to our being invisible (the soul becoming invisible through being deprived of the body; but the body as being buried in earth, in consequence of one of its various changes, becomes invisible to the sight of man);—appropriately, then, the whole covering by water is taken as an image of death and the darkness of the tomb. The symbolical teaching, then, reveals that the man, baptized according to religious rites, imitates, so far as Divine imitation is permissible to man, by the threefold immersions in the water, the supremely Divine death of the Life-giving Jesus, Who spent three days⁵ and three nights in the tomb, in whom, according to the mystical and secret teaching of the sacred text, the Prince of this world found nothing.⁶

Next, they throw garments, white as light, over the initiated.

For by his manly and Godlike insensibility to contrary passions, and by his persistent inclination towards the One, the unadorned is adorned, and the shapeless acquires shape, being made brilliant by a life entirely reflecting the light.

But the most perfecting unction of the myrrh makes the man who has been perfected of good odour, for the holy perfection of the Divine birth unifies those who have been perfected with the supremely Divine Spirit. Now the spiritual indwelling which makes perfect, and of a good savour, as being unutterable, I leave to the spiritual consciousness of those who are deemed worthy of the sacred and deifying participation of the Holy Spirit within their mind.

At the conclusion of all, the Hierarch invites him who has been perfected to the most Holy Eucharist, and imparts to him the communion of the most perfecting mysteries.

CAPUT III.

Concerning those who are being initiated in the Synaxis.

Courage, then, because we have made mention of this (Eucharist) we may not pass over it to celebrate any other Hierarchical functions in preference to this. For according to our illustrious Leader, it is "initiation of initiations," and one must first give the Divine description of this, before the rest, from the inspired and sacred science of the oracles, and then be borne by the supremely Divine Spirit to its sacred contemplation. First, let us reverently consider this. For what reason that which is common to the other Hierarchical initiations, is pre-eminently attributed to this, beyond the rest. And why it is uniquely called, "Communion and Synaxis." For each consecrating function collects our divided lives into uniform deification, and gives communion and oneness with the One, by the Godlike folding together of our diversities. Now we affirm that the Perfection, which comes from the participation of the other Hierarchical symbols, springs from the supremely Divine and perfecting gifts of this Sacrament. For it scarcely ever happens that any Hierarchical initiation is celebrated without the most Divine Eucharist, at the head of the rites celebrated in each, Divinely accomplishing the collecting of the person initiated to the One, and completing his communion with God by the Divinely transmitted gift of the perfecting mysteries. If, then, each of the Hierarchical initiations, as being incomplete, will not complete our communion and our gathering to the One, even its being initiation is taken away, on account of the lack of initiation. For as the impartation of the supremely

Divine mysteries to the person being initiated is the completion and head of each initiation, naturally the Hierarchical judgment hit upon an appellation peculiar to it, from the truth of the facts. Thus, for instance, with regard to the holy initiation of the Divine birth; since it imparts first-Light, and is supreme head of all the Divine illuminations, we celebrate the true appellation, from the enlightenment conferred. For though it be common to all Hierarchical functions to impart the gift of sacred light to those who are being initiated, yet this gave to me the power of first sight, and through the primal light of this, I was conducted to the view of the other religious rites. Having said this, let us minutely investigate and examine, as becomes the Hierarchy, the perfect administration and contemplation of the most holy initiation.

II.—Mystery¹ of Synaxis, that is, Communion.

The Hierarch having completed a reverent prayer, near the Divine Altar, begins with the incense and proceeds to every part of the enclosure of the sacred place; he then returns to the Divine Altar and begins the sacred chanting of the Psalms—the whole ecclesiastical Order chanting with him the sacred language of the Psalter. Next follows the reading of the Holy Scriptures by the Leitourgoi. After these readings, the catechumens quit the sacred enclosure, as well as the energumanoi and the penitents. But those who are deemed worthy of the view and participation of the Divine Mysteries remain. Of the Leitourgoi, some stand near the closed gates of the sanctuary, whilst others perform some duty or other of their proper function. But chosen members of the diaconal Order, with the Priests, place the sacred Bread upon the Divine Altar, and the Cup of Blessing, whilst the universal Song² of Praise is sung by the whole body of the Church. Afterwards the Divine Hierarch offers a sacred prayer, and proclaims the holy Peace to all. When all have greeted each other, the mystical proclamation of the holy tablets is performed. When the Hierarch and the Priests have washed their hands in water, the Hierarch places himself in the midst of the Divine Altar. But the chosen Deacons alone, after the Priests, stand around. The Hierarch, when he has celebrated the sacred works of God, consecrates the most Divine gifts and brings to view the things celebrated, through the symbols reverently exposed.³ When he has shown the free gifts of the works of God, he himself proceeds to the sacred participation of the same, and turns and exhorts the others. When he has received and distributed the supremely Divine Communion, he terminates with a holy thanksgiving. Whilst the multitude have merely glanced at the Divine symbols alone, he himself is ever conducted by the Divine Spirit, as becomes a Hierarch, in the purity of a Godlike condition, to the holy archetypes of the rites performed, in blessed and intellectual visions.

III.—Contemplation.

After the images, I come now, most excellent son, in due order and reverence, to the Divine reality of the archetypes. To those yet being initiated, I would say this, for the harmonious guidance of their souls, that the varied and sacred composition of the symbols is not without spiritual instruction even to them, when it is merely presented superficially. For the most sacred chants and readings of the oracles teach them a discipline of a virtuous life, and what is more than this, the complete purification from destructive evil. But the most Divine, and general, and peaceful distribution of one and the same both Bread and Cup, enjoins upon them a fellowship in character as well as a fellowship in food, and recalls to their memory the most Divine Supper, and arch-symbol of the rites performed, agreeably with which the Founder of the symbols himself excludes, most justly, him who had joined in the feast of the heavenly things, not piously,¹ and in a manner dissimilar to himself; teaching at once, clearly and Divinely, that the approach to Divine mysteries with a sincere mind, confers on those who draw nigh, the participation in a gift similar to their own character. Let us, then, as I said, leave behind these things, beautifully depicted upon the propylea of the innermost shrine, as being sufficient for those who are yet unfit for contemplation, and let us proceed from the effects to the cause; and then, Jesus lighting the way, let us view our holy Synaxis and the comely contemplation of the spiritual mysteries, which makes manifest the blessed beauty of the archetypes. But, oh, most Divine and holy initiation, uncover the folds of the dark mysteries, enveloping thee in symbols. Be manifest to us in thy bright glory, and fill our intellectual visions with unique and unconcealed light.

We must, then, in my opinion, pass within the All Holy Mysteries, after we have laid bare the spiritual conception of the first of the images, to gaze upon its Godlike beauty, and contemplate with a godly mind the Hierarch, as he goes with fragrance from the Divine Altar to the furthestmost bounds of the holy place, and is again, at the end, restored to the same. For the Blessedness, supremely Divine above all, although through Divine goodness it goes forth to the communion of those who participate in itself, yet it never goes outside its essential unmoved position and steadfastness.

Further, it gives to all, according to their capacity, its Godlike illuminations; always self-centred, and in no wise moved from its own proper identity. In the same manner the Divine initiation of the Synaxis, although it has an unique and simple and enfolded origin, is multiplied, out of love towards man, into the holy variety of the symbols, and travels through the whole range of Divine imagery; yet uniformly it is again collected from these into its own proper Oneness, and unifies those who are being reverently conducted towards it. In the same Godlike manner the Divine Hierarch, even when he benignly deposes to his subordinates his own unique Hierarchical science, by using the multiplicity of Divine enigmas; yet again, as absolute, and not to be held in check by smaller things, he is restored to his own supreme dignity without diminution. And when he has himself made the spiritual entry to the Oneness of himself, he sees clearly the uniform reasons of the religious rites, as he makes the goal of his philanthropic progress to things secondary, the more Divine return to things first. The chanting of the Psalms, which is co-essential to almost all the Hierarchical mysteries, was not likely to be separated from the chief of all. For all holy and inspired Scriptures set forth for those meet for deification, either the originated Beginning¹ and Order from God of things created; or the Priesthood² and polity of the Law; or the distributions³ and possessions of the inheritance of the people of God; or the understanding of sacred judges,⁴ or wise kings, or inspired Priests; or philosophy⁵ of men of old time, indomitable⁶ in the endurance of evils springing up in multitude and measure; or the treasures of wisdom for the conduct of life; or odes or inspired⁷ images of Divine Loves; or the prophetic predictions⁸ of things to come; or⁹ the God-Incarnate works of Jesus¹⁰; or the administrations¹¹ and sacred doctrines of His Apostles given by God for the imitation of God; or the hidden¹² and mystic range of view of the beloved and Divinely sweet disciple; or the supermundane theology of Jesus. These, too, are embedded in the holy and Godlike instructions of the initiations. But the sacred representations of the Divine odes, whose purpose is to celebrate the words and works of God throughout, and to praise the holy words and works of godly men, forms an universal Hymn Narrative of things Divine; which makes in those who reverently recite it a habit suitable for the reception and distribution of every Hierarchical mystery.

When, then, the universal melody of the holy Psalms has harmonized the spiritual condition of our souls to the things which are presently to be celebrated, and by the unison of the Divine odes, as one and concordant chorus of things Divine, has established concord towards things Divine, and ourselves¹ and one another, the things more compounded and obscure in the spiritual language of the mystic Psalms are expanded by the most holy lections of the inspired compositions, through more full and distinct images and narratives. He who devoutly contemplates these will perceive the uniform and one concordant breathing as being moved by One, the supremely Divine Spirit. Hence, naturally, in the history of the world, after the more ancient² tradition—the new Covenant is proclaimed. This inspired order of the Hierarchy teaches this—that the One affirmed the Divine works of Jesus as to come; the other accomplished them, in fact. And as that described the truth in figures, this, on the other hand, shewed it present. For the accomplishment, in fact, of this established the truth of the predictions of that, and the work of God is a consummation of the Word of God.

Those who in every respect have no ear for the sacred initiations do not even recognize their images—unblushingly rejecting the saving revelation of the Divine Birth, and realizing to their destruction the words, “Thy ways I do not wish to know.”³

Now the custom of the holy Hierarchy permits the catechumens and the penitents to hear the sacred chanting of the Psalms, and the inspired reading of the all Holy Scriptures; but it does not invite these to the next religious services and contemplations, but only the perfect visions of the perfected. For the Divine-like Hierarchy is full of reverent justice, and distributes savingly to each, according to their due, the harmonious participation of each in things Divine, in measure and proportion and due time. The lowest rank, then, is assigned to the catechumens, for they are without participation and instruction, in any of the Hierarchical functions; not even having the existence in God after Divine Birth, but are being brought to⁴ Birth by the paternal instructions, and moulded by life-giving formations towards the blessed acquisition of their first life and first light, from Birth in God. As, then, children after the flesh, if whilst immature and unformed they should anticipate their proper delivery, as untimely born and abortions, would fall to the earth without life and without light; and no one, in his senses, would say from what he saw, that they were brought to the light, released from the darkness of the womb (for the medical authority learned in the functions of the body would say that light operates on things receptive of light), thus also science, which knows all about religious rites, brings these first to delivery by the preparatory nourishment of the formative and life-giving instructions. But when it has made their condition ripe for Divine Birth, it gives to them savingly, in due order, the participation in things luminous and perfecting. But at present it separates things perfect from things imperfect, consulting the good order of Divine things, and the delivery and life of the catechumens in a Godlike order of the sacred rites.

As for the multitude of the energumanoi, that indeed is unholy, but it is second above the catechumens, which is lowest. Nor is that on a par, as I think, with the altogether uninstructed and entirely uncommunicated in the Divine initiations, for it has received a certain participation in the most holy functions, but is yet held in chains by contrary qualities, whether enchantments or terrors. Now, as regards these, the sight and participation in the holy mysteries is withdrawn, and very properly. For if it be true that the altogether godly man, the worthy partaker of the Divine mysteries, who is carried to the very summit of the Divine likeness, to the best of his powers, in complete and most perfect deification, who does not follow the things of the flesh, beyond the most necessary requirements of nature, nor these, if it should happen to be superfluous; who will be, at the same time, a temple and a follower, according to his ability, of the supremely Divine Spirit, in the highest deification, labouring to add like to like. Such an one as this, would not be possessed by opposing phantoms or fears, but will laugh them to scorn, and when they approach will throw them and put them to flight, and will act rather than persuade. And besides this, by the passionless and indomitableness of his own character, he will be seen to be a physician to others for similar possessions.¹ But I think further, yea, rather, I know certainly, that the most clear decision of the Hierarchy holds that they are rather possessed with a most detestable possession, whoever, by departing from the Godlike life, become of one mind and one condition with destructive demons; turning themselves from things that really are; and undying possessions, and everlasting pleasures, for the sake of the most base folly, destructive to themselves, by desiring and pursuing the earthly variableness, vexed by many passions, and the perishable and corrupting pleasures, and the unstable comfort in things foreign to their nature, not real but seeming. These first, then, and more properly than those, were shut out by the discriminating authority of the Deacon, for it is not permitted to them to have part in any other holy function, than the teaching of the oracles, in order to turn them to better things. For if the Divine Service of the heavenly mysteries excludes from view the penitents and those who have already approached it, not permitting anything not completely perfect to draw nigh, but proclaims this, in all sincerity, that "I am invisible, and incommunicable to those who are in any respect imperfectly weak as regards the attainment of the highest degree of the Divine Likeness" (for that most impartial voice scares away also those who cannot be associated with the worthy partakers of the Divine mysteries), how much more then will the multitude of those who are under the sway of their passions, be unholy and alien from every view of, and participation in, the holy mysteries. After the uninstructed and uninitiated in the mysteries have been put outside the Divine Temple, and the holy service above their capacity, and with them the apostates from the religious life, and next, those who through want of manliness are easily affected by the fears and fancies of contrary influences, as not having reached the stability and activity of a Godlike condition, through the persistent and indomitable inclination towards godliness; then in addition to these, those who have separated indeed from the contrary life, but have not yet been cleansed from its imaginations by a habit and love, godly and pure; and next, those who are not altogether uniform, and to use an expression of the Law, "entirely without spot and blemish;" then the sacred ministers of sacred things, who love to gaze upon sacred rites, contemplate in all purity the most holy mystery, and celebrate in an universal Hymn of Praise the Author and Giver of all good, from Whom the mysteries were exhibited to us, as images of salvation, which divinely work the sacred deification of the initiated. Now that Hymn some indeed call a Hymn of Praise, others the symbol of worship, but others, as I think more Divinely, a Hierarchical thanksgiving, as giving a summary of the holy gifts which come to us from God. For it seems to me a systematic record¹ of all the works of God, on our behalf, celebrated in song, which, after it had fixed our being and life after the pattern of Divine goodness, and moulded the Divine likeness in ourselves to beautiful archetypes, placed us in possession of a more Divine condition and elevation. But when it witnessed the dearth of Divine gifts, which came upon us by our heedlessness, deigned to call us back to our original condition by the restoration of our blessings, and by the complete assumption of ours, to make good the most perfect impartation of His own, and thus to give to us a participation in God and Divine things.

When the Divine goodness has thus been religiously celebrated,

the Divine Bread is presented, veiled, and likewise the Cup of Blessing. The most Divine salutation is devoutly performed, and the instructive and heavenly proclamation of the holy names written on the tablets. For it is not possible to be collected to the One, and to partake of the peaceful Oneness of the One, when people are divided amongst themselves. For if being illuminated by the contemplation and knowledge of the One, we would be united to an uniform and Divine agreement, we must not permit ourselves to descend to divided lusts, from which are formed earthly enmities, envious and passionate, against that which is according to nature. This unified and undivided life is, in my opinion, established by the Divine Service of the salutation of peace, which roots like to like, and separates the Divine and unified visions from things divided. The reading of the holy tablets, after the salutation, proclaims those who have passed through life holily and have reached the term of a virtuous life without faltering, urging and conducting us to their blessed condition and Divine inheritance through their example. Further, it announces them as living, and, as the Word of God says, "not dead, but as having passed from death to a most divine life."¹ But observe that they are enrolled in the holy memorials, not as though the Divine memory were represented under the figure of a memorial, after the manner of men; but, as one might say, with reverence towards God, within the cherished and unfailing knowledge in God of those who have been perfected in the likeness of God. For "He knoweth," say the oracles, "those that are His,"² and, "dear, in the sight of the Lord, is the death of His saints."³ "Death of saints" being said, instead of perfection in holiness. And bear this religiously in mind, that after the august symbols, through which Christ is signified and partaken, have been placed on the Divine Altar, the reading of the register of the holy persons immediately follows, signifying their inseparable conjunction with His celestial and sacred Oneness. When these things have been religiously performed, according to the regulations prescribed, the Hierarch, standing before the most holy symbols, washes his hands with water, together with the reverend order of the Priests. Because, as the oracles testify, when a man has been washed, he needs no other washing, except that of his extremities.⁴ Through this extreme cleansing, in a sanctified habit of the Divine Likeness, whilst advancing in a goodly manner to things secondary, he will be resistless and free, as altogether uniform, and by turning himself uniquely to the One, he will make his return without spot and blemish, as preserving the fulness and entirety of the Divine likeness. There was even the sacred laver, as we have said, in the Hierarchy of the Law.⁵

But now the cleansing of the hands of the Hierarch and the Priests suggests that. For it behoves those who approach the most hallowed service to be purified even to the remotest imaginations of the soul, and to approach, as far as possible, through likeness to itself. For thus they will shed more visibly the glory of the Divine manifestations, since the celestial rays permit their own splendour to pass more thoroughly and brilliantly into the brightness of mirrors like themselves. Further, the cleansing of the Hierarch and the Priests to their very extremities, takes place before the most holy symbols, as in the presence of Christ, Who surveys our innermost thoughts, and because the utmost purification is enjoined under his most penetrating scrutiny and just and unflinching judgment. Thus the Hierarch becomes one with things Divine, and when he has celebrated the holy works of God, he consecrates the most Divine symbols, and brings them to view whilst their praises are sung.

We will now explain, to the best of our ability, the works of God, of which we have spoken. For we are not competent to extol the praises of all, much less to know accurately and to reveal their mysteries to others. But whatever has been sung and religiously performed by godly Hierarchs, after the oracles, this we will say, as far as permissible, invoking the Hierarchical inspiration to our aid. Immediately after our human nature had thoughtlessly fallen from the good things of God, it was seized by a life vexed with many passions, and, at last, a ruinous death. For, as a natural consequence, the pernicious departure from genuine goodness, and the transgression of the sacred Law laid down in Paradise, delivered him, when fretted with the life-giving yoke, to his own downward inclinations, and the enticing and hostile wiles of the adversary—the adversaries of the good things of God. Hence, he pitiably exchanged for the eternal, the mortal. As then the human race had its own origin in corrupted generations, the end naturally corresponded with the beginning. Now as mankind had willingly fallen from the Divine and conducted life, they were carried to the opposite extremity—the variableness of many passions. Whilst going astray, and turned aside from the strait way leading to the true God, and being subject to a destructive and evil-working diversity, they naturally forgot that they were worshipping, not gods, or friends, but enemies. Now when these had used the human race harshly, according to their own cruelty, it fell into danger of annihilation and destruction. But the boundless lovingkindness of the supremely Divine goodness towards man, did not, in its benevolence, withdraw from us its spontaneous forethought, but taking upon itself a real participation of our entire nature, without sin,¹ and having made itself one with our infirmity, with the unconfused possession of its own properties, entirely without flaw, it gave to us, as members of the same family, communion with itself henceforward, and proclaimed us partakers of his own good things; having, as the secret teaching holds, loosed the power¹ of the rebellious diversity which was against us; not by force, as having the upper hand, but according to the Divine saying, mystically transmitted to us, "in judgment and righteousness."²

Our condition, then, he benevolently changed to the contrary. For the darkness of our mind he filled with perfect and most Divine light, and adorned that which was without likeness with Godlike beauties. The tabernacle³ of our soul, which was all but fallen down, he liberated from most damnable passions and destructive stains through a perfected salvation, and exhibited to us a supermundane elevation, and a Divine course of life in our assimilation to his own holiness, as far as permissible. But how could the Divine imitation otherwise become ours unless the memory of the most holy works of God were perpetually renewed by the holy teaching and service of the Hierarchy. This, then, we do, as the oracles say, "for its remembrance."⁴ Wherefore the Divine Hierarch, standing before the Divine Altar, celebrates the holy works of God, which proceed from the most godly forethought of Jesus on our behalf, which He completed for the salvation of our race, by the good pleasure of the most Holy Father in the Holy Spirit, as the Divine Word affirms.⁵ When he has celebrated their majesty, and gazed, with intellectual vision, upon the spiritual contemplation, he proceeds to the Divine service symbolical of them—and this, as transmitted from God. Hence, after the sacred praise of the works of God, he deprecates his own unworthiness for a service above his merits. First, reverently saying aloud, "Thou hast said, Do this for My remembrance"⁶—then,⁷ having asked to become meet for this holy office of Divine imitation, and to consecrate the Divine symbols, by being made like to Christ Himself, and to distribute them in perfect holiness; and that those who shall partake of those holy mysteries may receive them religiously, he consecrates the most Divine symbols, and brings the mysteries to view through the reverent exposition of the symbols, while their praises are being sung. For when he has unveiled the veiled and undivided Bread, and divided it into many, and has apportioned the Oneness of the Cup to all, he symbolically multiplies and distributes the unity—completing in these a most holy Divine Service. For the unity and simplicity and hiddenness of Jesus, the Divinely supreme Word, by His becoming Man amongst us, came forth, out of goodness and love towards man, to the compound and visible, and benevolently devised the communion which makes us one with Himself, having united in the highest degree our lowliness to His own Godhead ; if indeed we have been fitted to Him, as members to a body, after the identity of a blameless and Divine life ; and have not, by being killed through destructive passions, become unsuited and unattached and unyoked, as regards the godly and healthy members. For if we aspire to communion with Him, we must keep our eye fixed upon His most godly Life in the flesh, and we must retrace our path to the Godlike and blameless habit of mind by being made like It in its holy sinlessness. For thus He will communicate to us an harmonious likeness to Himself.

The Hierarch makes known these things to those who are living religiously by bringing the veiled gifts to view, by dividing their unity into multiplicity, and making the recipients partakers in them, by the utmost Oneness of the things distributed, with those who receive them. For he depicts in these things, visibly, by bringing to Jesus, the Christ, our spiritual life, as in images, coming as He does from the Hiddenness of the Divine Father ; and out of love to man, moulded into our likeness from us, by the perfect and unconfused incarnation in our race, and advancing to the divided condition of ourselves without divergence from His essential unity ; and calling the human race, through this beneficent love of man, into communion with Himself and His own good things, provided we are united to His most Divine Life by assimilation to it, as far as permissible. Thus in very truth we shall have been completed as partakers of God and Divine things. Having received and distributed the Divine Communion, he terminates with the singing of the holy thanksgiving, in which the whole body of the Church take part. For the communion precedes the distribution—and the reception of the mysteries the mystical impartation. For this is the regulation and order of the Divine Mysteries, that the reverend Leader should first partake and be filled with the gifts to be imparted through him, from God, to others, and that thus he should impart to others also. Wherefore, those who rashly content themselves with Divine instructions in preference to a life and condition agreeable to the same are profane and entirely alien from the sacred regulation established. For, as in the case of the bright shining of the sun, the more delicate and luminous substances being first filled with the brilliancy flowing into them, impart their overflowing light to things near them ; thus it is not tolerable that one who has not become altogether Godlike in his whole character, and who has not been proved to govern by the Divine influence and judgment, should become a Leader to others in what is altogether Divine. When the whole order of the Priests have been collected together in sacerdotal order, and have communicated in the most Divine mysteries, they finish with a holy thanksgiving, after they have recognized and celebrated the gifts of the works of God, according to their degree. So that those who have not partaken or recognized the Divine mysteries would not come to thanksgiving; although the most Divine gifts are, in their essential nature, worthy of thanksgiving. But, as I said, not having wished even to look at the Divine gifts from their inclination to evil, they have remained throughout unblessed, as regards the boundless gifts of the works of God. "Taste and see," say the oracles, for, by the sacred instruction in Divine things, the instructed recognize their munificent gifts; and by gazing upon their most Divine height and breadth in the participation, they extol the supercelestial beneficent works of the Godhead.

CAPUT IV.

Concerning the initiatory rites in Myrrh, and those who are perfected in the same.

So great and so beautiful are the spiritual visions of the most holy Synaxis, which, as we have often said, accomplish by religious rites our participation in and collection towards the One. But there is another perfecting Service that occupies the same rank as this, which our Leaders name Initiation of Myrrh. By contemplating its parts in due order, after the rule of sacred images, we shall thus be borne, by religious contemplations, to its Oneness through its parts.

II.—Mystery of Consecration of Myrrh.

In the same way as in the Synaxis, the orders of the imperfect are dismissed, that is, after the Bishop has made the whole circuit of the temple, attended with fragrant incense, and the chanting of the Psalms, and the reading of the most Divine Lections. Then the Hierarch takes the Myrrh and places it upon the Divine Altar, veiled under twelve sacred wings, whilst all cry aloud, with a devout voice, the sacred melody of the inspiration of the God-rapt Prophets. When the Bishop has finished the prayer offered over it, he uses it in the most holy perfectings of things that are hallowed, for the completion of almost every Hierarchical function.

III.—Contemplation.

The introductory teaching, then, of this most perfecting function, through the rites performed respecting the Divine Myrrh, shews this, in my judgment, that that which is holy and of sweet savour in the minds of devout men, is covered, as with a veil, since it is Divinely enjoined upon holy men, to keep their beautiful and well-savoured likeness to the virtue of the hidden God, not made known for the purpose of vain glory. For the hidden and sweet-savoured comeliness of God is undefiled, and is spiritually manifested to the spiritual contemplators only, desiring to keep the unsullied images of virtue in the soul like unto itself. For when a man gazes, with undistracted vision, upon that spiritual and fragrant beauty, the unportrayed and well imitated image of Godlike virtue moulds and fashions itself to a most glorious imitation. And, as in material images, if the artist look without distraction upon the archetypal form, not drawn aside to any other sight, or in any way distracted, he will duplicate, if I may so speak, the very thing that is being engraved, whatever it may be, and will shew the reality in the likeness, and the archetype in the image—each in each, except as regards difference of substance. In the same way, to copyists who love the beautiful in mind, the persistent and unflinching contemplation of the sweet-savoured and hidden beauty, will confer the unerring and most Godlike appearance.¹ Naturally, then, the divine copyists, who unflinchingly mould their own spiritual image after the celestial sweet savour and spiritual comeliness, perform none of their Divinely imitated virtues “to be seen of men,”² as the Divine text expresses it. But they reverently contemplate the most holy things of the Church, veiled in the holy Myrrh, as in a figure. Wherefore, whilst religiously concealing that which is holy and most Divine in virtue, within their Godlike and God-engraved mind, they look to the archetypal conception alone. For not only are they blind to things dissimilar, but neither do they condescend themselves to gaze upon them. Wherefore, as becomes their character, they do not love things which merely seem to be good and just, but such as really are so. Nor do they look to a mere appearance, upon which the multitude unreasonably congratulate themselves; but, after the Divine example, distinguishing the good or evil as it is in itself, they are Divine images of the Supremely Divine Suavity, which, having its true savour within itself, does not turn itself, to the anomalously seeming of the multitude, but moulds its genuineness to true images of itself.

Come, then, since we have viewed the exterior comeliness of this Divine Service, beautiful throughout, let us look to its more godly beauty. Whilst itself, by itself, has uncovered the veils thrown around it, let us contemplate its blessed radiance, shedding its bright beams openly around, and filling us with its fragrance revealed to spiritual men. For the open consecration of the Myrrh is neither shut out from, nor invisible to, those who surround the Hierarchy—but on the contrary is extended to them. But as its contemplation is above the reach of the many, they reverently conceal it; and by Hierarchical direction, it is kept from the gaze of the multitude.

For the splendour of things all holy sheds its light clearly and without symbol to men inspired, as being congenial to the spiritual, and perfumes their intellectual perceptions without concealment. But it does not advance in the same way to the inferior. Further, the deep contemplators of the spiritual conceal it under the enigmas of the wings, without ostentation, so that it may not be defiled by the impure. Through these sacred enigmas the well-ordered ranks of the subordinate are conducted to the degree of holiness compatible with their powers. The holy consecration, then, which we are now extolling, is, as I said, of the most perfecting order and capacity of the Hierarchical functions. Wherefore our Divine Leaders arranged this as being of the same rank and effect, with the holy perfecting of the Synaxis, with the same figures, for the most part, and mystical regulations and lections. And you may see in like manner the Hierarchy bearing forward the sweet perfume from the more holy place into the sacred precincts beyond—and teaching, by the return to the same, that the participation in things Divine comes to all holy persons according to their fitness, but that it remains undiminished and altogether unmoved, and stands unchangeably in its identity with a Divine fixity. In the same way the hymns and readings of the lections bring to birth those not yet perfect for the life bringing adoption of sons. They also form a religious inclination in those who are possessed with accursed spirits. They dispel the opposing fear and effeminacy from those possessed by a spirit of unmanliness; shewing to them, according to their capacity, the highest pinnacle of the Godlike habit and power, by following which they will, the rather, scare away the opposing forces, and will take the lead in healing others; and, following the example of God, whilst unmoved from their own proper gifts, they will not only be active against those opposing fears, but will themselves give activity to others. They also impart to those who have departed from evil to a religious mind, a sacred persistence, so that they should not be again enslaved by evil. They purify completely those who need to become altogether pure. They lead the holy to their own Divine likeness, and contemplation, and communion. They also establish those who are entirely holy in blessed and spiritual visions, completing their uniform likeness of the One, and making them One. What, then, shall I say further? Is it not those orders that we have mentioned, which are not entirely pure, that the present religious service excludes without distinction, in the same way as the Synaxis, so that it is viewed by the holy alone, in figures, and is contemplated and ministered by the perfectly holy alone, without symbols, through instructions given by the Hierarchy? Now this has already been so often mentioned that it is superfluous, as I think, to recur to the same statements. Those, then, who see with a Divine vision may appropriately contemplate the Hierarchy, holding the Divine Myrrh, veiled under twelve wings, and devoutly completing the holy service of consecration. Let us then affirm that the composition of the Myrrh is a combination of sweet-smelling materials, which has in itself abundantly fragrant qualities, with which those who partake become perfumed, in proportion to the degree in which they partake of its sweet savour. Now we are persuaded that the Supremely Divine Jesus is superessentially of good savour, filling the spiritual part of ourselves with a Divine sweetness, by spiritual bequests. For if the reception of the sensible odours makes us feel joyous, and nourishes, with much sweetness, the sensitive organs of our nostrils—at least, if they be sound and well apportioned to the sweet savour—in the same way, anyone might say that our spiritual faculties, being soundly disposed with regard to the subjection to evil, in the strength of the distinguishing faculty implanted in us by nature, receive the sweet savour from God, and are filled with a holy comfort and most Divine nourishment, in accordance with Divinely fixed proportions and the suitable turning of the mind towards the Divine. Wherefore, the symbolical composition of the Myrrh, as expressing in form things that are formless, depicts to us Jesus Himself, as being a well-spring of the wealth of the Divine sweetness,¹ distributing in degrees fixed by God, to the most Godlike of spiritual persons, the most Divine perfumes; from which the minds, satiated with a most comforting joy, and filled with holy receptions, enjoy a spiritual nourishment, by the entrance of the savoury² gifts into their spiritual nature, according to a Divine participation. But it is evident, as I think, that the distribution of the primal perfume to the Beings above ourselves, as being more Divine, is, as it were, nearer, and manifests and distributes itself better to their luminous transparency, and overflows without stint the healthy capacity of their minds for its reception, and enters them much more abundantly. But as regards the subordinate minds, which are not so receptive, it piously conceals the highest vision and participation, and is distributed in a Divinely fixed proportion, in fragrance corresponding to the recipients. Amongst the holy Beings, then, who are above us, the highest exalted order of the Seraphin is represented under the figure of the twelve wings, as established and fixed around Jesus, giving itself to the most blessed contemplation as far as permissible, and filled with spiritual distributions through holy receptions, and, to speak after the manner of men, crying aloud, with never silent lips, the frequent Hymn of Praise.¹

For the sacred knowledge of the celestial minds is both untiring and possesses the Divine love without intermission, and is at the same time superior to all baseness and forgetfulness. Whence, as I think, that phrase, "unceasing cry," suggests their perpetual and persistent science, and conception of things Divine, with full determination and thanksgiving. Now we have, as I think, sufficiently contemplated, in the description of the Heavenly Hierarchy, the distinctive features of the incorporeal Seraphin, Divinely described in the Scriptures, under sensible figures, explanatory of the spiritual Beings; and we have made them evident to your intellectual vision. Nevertheless, as they who stand reverently around the Hierarch, reflect that same order, the highest of all in science, we will now view their most Godlike glory with unearthly visions.

Their numberless faces then, and many feet, demonstrate, as I think, their property of viewing the Divine illumination from many sides, and their conception of the good things of God, as ever active and abundantly receptive. But the sixfold arrangement of the wings, of which the Scripture speaks, does not, as I think, denote a sacred number, but that the first, and second, and last of the spiritual and Godlike powers of the highest existence and Order around God are elevating, and entirely free, and supermundane. Hence the most holy wisdom of the Scriptures, when Divinely describing the formation of the wings, places the wings around the heads,² and the middle, and their feet, suggesting their complete covering with wings, and their faculty of leading to the Truly Existing.

But if they cover their heads and their feet, and fly by their middle wings only; bear this religiously in mind, that the Order, so far exalted above the highest Beings, is circumspect respecting the more lofty and deep of its conceptions, and raises itself, in due proportion by its middle wings, to the vision of God; placing its own proper life under the Divine yokes, and by these is well directed to the knowledge of itself. But as regards the statement of Holy Scripture, that "one cried out to the other," that shows, I think, that they impart to each other ungrudgingly their own visions of God. And this we should deem worthy of religious recollection, that the Hebrew word in the Holy Scriptures names the most holy Seraphin; by an explanatory appellation signifying their glowing and seething, in a Divine and ever moving life.

If, then, as those who have learned Hebrew say, the most

Divine Seraphin are named by the Word of God, "glowing" and "heating," by a name expressive of their essential condition, they possess, according to the symbolical description of the Divine Myrrh, ever moving powers, calling into evidence its distribution of exhilarating perfumes. For the incomprehensible, benign Being loves to be moved by the glowing and most pure minds into manifestation, and imparts its most Divine breathings in cheerful distributions to those who thus devoutly call it forth. Thus the most exalted Order of celestial Beings did not fail to recognize ¹ the supremely Divine Jesus when He descended for the purpose of being sanctified, but contemplates Him lowering Himself in our nature through Divine and inexpressible goodness; and when it had seen Him sanctified in a manner befitting man, from the Father ² and Himself ³ and the Holy Spirit, ⁴ recognized their own supreme Head as being essentially unchanged in whatever He did, according to His supreme Deity. Hence the teaching of the sacred symbols places the Seraphin near the Divine Myrrh when it is being consecrated, recognizing and describing the Christ as unchanged in the complete incarnation amongst us in the truth of our nature. And what is still more Divine, it uses the Divine Myrrh for the perfecting of every religious function, distinctly shewing, according to the Divine saying, the sanctified Sanctifier as always the same in Himself throughout the whole course of His Divine Beneficence. Wherefore the completing gift and grace of the Divine regeneration is completed in the Divine perfecting of the Myrrh. Hence, as I think, the Hierarch pouring the Myrrh upon the purifying font, in the form of a cross, brings to view for contemplative eyes the Jesus descending to death itself through the cross, ⁵ for our birth in God, and drawing up from the jaws of a destructive death, by the same Divine and resistless descent, those who, according to the mysterious saying, "are baptized into His death," ⁶ from the former gulf of a destructive ⁷ death, and renewing them to a godly and eternal existence. ⁸

But further, the perfecting unction of the Myrrh gives to him who has been initiated in the most sacred initiation of the birth in God, the indwelling of the supremely Divine Spirit; the sacred imagery of the symbols suggesting, as I think, the gift of the Divine Spirit, by Him Who for our sakes has been sanctified as man, by the Divine Spirit, in an unaltered condition of His essential Godhead. And bear this also most religiously in mind, that the Law of the most holy completion completes the sacred consecration of the Divine Altar by pure effusions of the most holy Myrrh. But the work of God, at once supercelestial and supernatural, is head and being and perfecting power of all the deifying holiness within ourselves. For if our most Divine Altar is Jesus—the supremely Divine sanctification of the godly minds—in Whom, according to the saying, “being sanctified and mystically offered as a whole burnt offering, we have access,”¹ let us gaze with celestial eyes upon the self-same Altar (in Whom things being perfected are perfected and sanctified), as being perfected from the self-same most Divine Myrrh. For the all-pure Jesus sanctifies Himself on our behalf and fills us with every purification, since the things completed² in Him during the Divine economy, pass afterwards in their beneficent effects to us, as children of God. Hence, as I think, the Divine Leaders of our Hierarchy in conformity with an Hierarchical conception received from God, have wisely named this august service, completing of Myrrh—from “being completed.” As one might say, completing of God—celebrating its Divine completing work in both senses. For His completion is both the sanctification of Himself as Man, on our behalf, and the completing and sanctifying of all things, by His power as God. As for the sacred melody of the inspiration of the God-rapt Prophets, it is called by those who know Hebrew, “Praise of God,” or “Praise ye the Lord.” Since then, every Divine manifestation and work of God is religiously portrayed in the varied composition of the Hierarchical symbols, it is not unbefitting to mention the Divinely moved song of the Prophets, for it teaches at once, distinctly and reverently, that the beneficent works of the Divine Goodness are worthy of devout praise.

CAPUT V.

Concerning sacerdotal consecrations.

Such, then, is the most Divine perfecting work of the Myrrh. But it may be opportune, after these Divine functions, to set forth the sacerdotal Orders and elections themselves; their powers, and energies, and consecrations, and the triad of the superior Orders under them; in order that the harmonious Order of our Hierarchy may be demonstrated as entirely rejecting and excluding the disordered, the unregulated, and the confused; and, at the same time, manifesting the regulated, and ordered, and well-established in the gradations of the sacred orders within itself. Now we have shewn, as I think, in the Hierarchy already celebrated by us, the threefold division of every Hierarchy—when we affirmed, as our sacred tradition holds, that every Hierarchical function is divided into (1) the most Divine initiations, and (2) the inspired experts and teachers of them, (3) and those who are being religiously initiated by them.

Therefore the most Divine Hierarchy of the heavenly Beings has for its initiation its own proper and most immaterial conception of God and things Divine, according to its capacity, and a complete likeness to God, and a persistent habit of imitating God, as far as permissible. But its illuminators and leaders to this sacred consecration are the very first Beings around God. For these generously and proportionately transmit to the sacred ranks, subordinate to themselves, the knowledge given to themselves, and always deifying, by the self-subsisting and supreme Deity, who governs the Divine minds that impart wisdom to man. But the ranks who are subordinate to the first Beings are, and are truly called, the initiated orders, as being religiously conducted through those to the deifying illumination of the supreme Deity. After this the heavenly and supermundane Hierarchy, the supreme Deity gave the Hierarchy under the Law, for the purpose of imparting its most holy gifts, for the benefit of our race, as it were, to children,¹ giving an apportioned light, so as not to wound weak visions; and copies,² far from the Archetypes, and hard to understand³; and types, whose hidden meaning was not easily discerned.⁴ Now the initiation of the Hierarchy under the Law is the restitution to spiritual worship.⁵ Our conductors to this were men religiously instructed as to the holy tabernacle⁶ by Moses, the first initiator and Leader of the Hierarchs under the Law. Now, in reference to this tabernacle, when describing, for purposes of instruction, the Hierarchy under the Law, he called all the sacred services of the Law an image of the type shewn to him in Mount Sinai.⁷ But "initiated" are those who are being conducted from the symbols of the Law, in proportion to their capacity, to a more perfect revelation. The Word of God calls our Hierarchy the more perfect revelation, naming it a fulfilment⁸ of that, and a holy inheritance. It is both celestial and legal, participating in common, as a mean between extremes—with the former by spiritual contemplations, and with the latter, because it is variegated by sensible signs, and through these is reverently led to the Divine. There is likewise a threefold division of the Hierarchy, which is divided into the most holy services of the initiations, and into the Godlike ministers of holy things, and those who are being conducted by them, according to their capacity, to the holy rites.

But each of the threefold divisions of our Hierarchy, like that of the Law, and of the Hierarchy which is more Divine than ours, is arranged as first, middle, and last in rank, each carefully guarding the proportion of religious rites, and the well-ordered fellowship which keeps in harmonious order and binds all things together. The most holy service of the initiations, regards the sacred cleansing of the imperfect as a first Godlike rank—the illuminating instruction of those who have been purified as the middle—the perfecting of those who have been instructed in an exact knowledge of their own revelations as the last, which is a summary of the two former. The Order of Ministers, in the first rank, cleanses the uninitiated through the initiations. In the middle rank, it imparts light to those who have been cleansed; and in the last, and highest of the ministering ranks, it completes those who have been made partakers of the light, by the perfect skill in the illuminations contemplated. The first rank¹ of those who are being initiated is that of those who are being purified; the next is that of those who are being illuminated after purification, who contemplate some sacred mysteries²; but the last, which is more Divine than the others, is that which is being illuminated with the most perfecting science of the sacred illuminations contemplated. The threefold rank of the holy service of the initiations is celebrated, since the Birth in God is exhibited in the oracles, as a purification and light-giving illumination; and the initiation of the Synaxis and the Myrrh, as a perfecting knowledge and science of the works of God, through which the unifying elevation and most blessed communion towards the Godhead is reverently perfected. But now let us next examine the sacerdotal order, which is divided into a purifying, and illuminating, and perfecting discipline. This, then, is the sacred Law of the Deity—that, through the first, the second are conducted to its most Divine Light. Do we not see the material substances of the elements, first approaching, by preference, things which are more congenial to themselves, and through these diffusing their own energy to other things. Naturally, then, the head and foundation of all good order, invisible and visible, causes the Divinely wrought rays to approach first the more Divine Beings, and through them, as being more transparent minds, and more properly adapted for reception and transmission of Light, transmits his light and manifestations to those who are subordinate, in proportions suitable to them.

⁶ Heb. ix. 11. ⁷ Ex. xxv. 40. ⁸ Matt. v. 17.

It is, then, the function of these, the first contemplators, to exhibit ungrudgingly to the next order, in proportion to their capacity, the Divine visions reverently gazed upon by themselves, and to reveal the things relating to the Hierarchy (since they have been abundantly instructed with a complete science in all matters relating to their own Hierarchy, and have received the effectual power of instruction), and to impart sacred gifts according to capacity of reception, since they possess Hierarchical completeness in the highest degree of knowledge and attainment. The Divine order of the Hierarchs, then, is the first of the contemplative orders; but it is, at the same time, highest and lowest; inasmuch as every order of our Hierarchy is summed up and fulfilled in it. For as we see every Hierarchy is terminated in Jesus, thus we see each order summed up in its own godly Hierarchy. Now the power of the Hierarchical order permeates the whole sacred body, and through every one of the sacred Orders performs the mysteries of its proper Hierarchy. But pre-eminently to this, the Divine institution assigned the more Divine Services of the Sanctuary, rather than to the other Orders, for his special work. For these are the perfecting images of the supremely Divine Power, completing all the most Divine symbols and all the sacred orders. For though some of the august symbols are consecrated by the Priests, yet never will the Priest effect the Divine Birth without the most Divine Myrrh; nor will he consecrate the mysteries of the Divine Communion, unless the symbols of Communion have been placed upon the most Divine Altar. But neither will he be Priest himself, unless he has been designated to this by the Hierarchical consecrations. Hence the Divine Institution has uniquely assigned the dedication of the Hierarchical orders, and the consecration of the Divine Myrrh, and the complete consecration of the Altar, to the perfecting powers of the inspired Hierarchs. It is, then, the Hierarchical Order which is furnished with the perfecting faculty, which pre-eminently completes the perfecting functions of the Hierarchy, and reveals lucidly the sciences of the holy mysteries, and teaches their proportions, and sacred conditions and powers. The illuminated order of the Priests, however, conducts those who are being initiated, under the direction of the inspired Hierarchy, to the Divine visions of the initiations, and in co-operation with this, reverently ministers its own religious ministrations. Whatever this order may do, in shewing the works of God, through the most holy symbols, and in perfecting those who draw nigh, in the Divine contemplations, and in the participation in the hallowed initiations, it yet sends to the Hierarchy those who crave the exact knowledge of the religious service which they have witnessed. The Order of the Leitourgoi, that which purifies, whose function it is to separate the unfit, previous to the Divine Service of the Priests, purifies those who are drawing nigh, making them entirely pure from opposing fashions, and suitable for the sanctifying vision and communion. For which reason, during the service of Regeneration, the Leitourgoi strip him who draws nigh of his old clothing, and even take off his sandals, and make him stand towards the west for renunciation. And again, they lead him back to the east (for they are of the purifying order and function), commanding those who approach to entirely cast away the coverings of their former life; and, showing the darkness of their former conduct, and teaching those who have said farewell to darkness, to transfer their allegiance to the Light. The Order of the Leitourgoi, then, is for purification, leading those who have been purified to the bright services of the Priests, both purifying and bringing to the Birth the uninitiated, by the purifying illuminations and teachings of the oracles, and further, sending away from the Priests the unholy, without respect of persons. Wherefore the Hierarchical institution places them over the holy gates, suggesting that the approach of those who come to holy things must be with complete purification, and conducting the approach to their reverent vision and communion, through the purifying functions, and admitting them through these without spot.

We have shewn, then, that the order of the Hierarchs is perfecting and completing—that of the Priests illuminating and conducting to the light—that of the Leitourgoi purifying and discriminating; that is to say, the Hierarchical order is appointed not only to perfect but at the same time to enlighten and to purify. The rank of the Priests has within itself, along with the illuminating, the purifying science. For the inferior cannot step over to the superior functions, and in addition to this it is not permitted for them to undertake such quackery as that. But the more Divine Orders, in conjunction with their own, possess also the sacred science of the subordinate orders. Nevertheless, since the sacerdotal orders are images of Divine Energies, they are arranged in Hierarchical distinctions, shewing in themselves the regulated illuminations into the first and middle and last sacred energies and orders of the well regulated and unconfused order of the Divine Energies; manifesting, as I have said, in themselves the well ordered and unconfused character of the Divine Energies. For since the supreme Deity first cleanses the Minds which He may enter, then enlightens, and when enlightened, perfects them to a Godlike perfection; naturally the Hierarchical image of the Divine divides itself into well defined orders and functions, shewing clearly the Divine Energies firmly established without confusion in most hallowed and unmixed ranks. Now, since we have spoken as permitted to us, of the sacerdotal orders and completeness, their powers and energies, let us now contemplate their most holy consecrations as well as we can.

II.—Mystery of sacerdotal consecrations.

The Hierarch, being led to the Hierarchical consecration after he has bent both his¹ knees before the Altar, has upon his head the God-transmitted oracles, and the Hierarch's right hand, and in this manner is consecrated¹ by the Hierarch who consecrates him with all holy invocations. The Priest, after he has bent both his knees before the Divine Altar, has the Hierarch's right hand upon his head, and in this manner is dedicated² by the Hierarch ordaining him with hallowing invocations. But the Leitourgos, after he has bent the one of two knees before the Divine Altar, has upon his head the right hand of the Hierarch who ordains him, being ordained³ by him with the consecrating invocations used in the ordination of the Leitourgoi. Upon each of them the cruciform seal⁴ of the ordaining Hierarch is impressed, and at each ordination the sacred proclamation of name takes place, and the concluding salutation, since every sacerdotal person present, and the Hierarch who ordained, salute him who has been consecrated to any of the aforementioned Hierarchical orders.

III.—Contemplation.

These things, then, are common to the Hierarch, and to the Priests, and to the Leitourgoi—the conducting to the Divine Altar and kneeling—the imposition of the Hierarch's right hand—the cruciform seal—the announcement of name—the completing salutation.

But the special and select rite for the Hierarchs is the placing of the oracles upon the head, since the subordinate orders have not this—but for the Priests the bending of both knees, since the consecration of the Leitourgoi has not this—for the Leitourgoi, as has been said, bend the one of two knees only. The conducting and kneeling before the Divine Altar suggests to those who are being sacerdotally consecrated that their own life is entirely placed under God as Author of consecration, and that their whole intellectual self approaches to Him all pure and hallowed, and that it is of one likeness; and, as far as possible, meet for the Divine and most hallowed Victim⁵ and Altar, which purifies through religious ministrations the Godlike mind. But the imposition of the Hierarch's right hand signifies at once the protection of the primal consecrator, by whom, as holy children, they are cherished paternally, whilst it gives them the sacerdotal habit and function, and drives away their opposing powers. But it teaches at the same time also that all sacerdotal operations are effectual in so far as those who have been consecrated are acting under God, and have Him as Leader in every respect of their own life. But the signing with the sign of the Cross manifests the inaction of all the impulses of the flesh, and the life of Divine imitation which looks unflinchingly to the life of Jesus, at once manly and most godly, Who has come even to the Cross and death, with a supremely Divine sinlessness, and stamps those who thus live as of the same likeness by the cruciform image of his own sinlessness.

But the Hierarch calls aloud the name of the consecrations and of the consecrated. The mysterious meaning of which is, that the holy consecrator, beloved of God, makes manifest the supremely Divine choice—not of his own accord, or by his own favour, leading those who are consecrated to the sacerdotal consecration, but as being moved by God to all the Hierarchical dedications. Thus Moses, the consecrator under the Law, does not lead Aaron, his brother, to sacerdotal consecration, though thinking him both beloved of God and hallowed, until moved by God to this, in submission to God as chief consecrator, he completed by Hierarchical rites the sacerdotal consecration.¹ But our supremely Divine and first consecrator (for Jesus, out of His great love to man, became even this), did “not glorify Himself,” as the Scriptures say, but He Who said to Him, “Thou² art Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.” Wherefore also He Himself, when leading the disciples to sacerdotal consecration, although, being as God, chief consecrator, nevertheless refers the Hierarchical completion of the work of consecration to His most holy Father, and the supremely Divine Spirit, by admonishing the disciples not to depart from Jerusalem, but to “await the promise of the Father, which ye heard of me, that ye shall be baptized in the Holy Ghost.”³ And indeed, the coryphæus of the disciples himself, with the ten, of the same rank and Hierarchy with himself, when he proceeded to the sacerdotal completion of the number of the disciples to twelve, reverently left the selection to the Supreme Deity, saying, “Shew⁴ whom Thou hast chosen,” and received him, who was Divinely designated by the Divine choice, into the number of the twelve Hierarchs. Now concerning the Divine lot, which fell as a Divine intimation upon Matthias, others have expressed another view, not correctly, as I think, but I will express my own sentiment. For it seems to me that the Scriptures name “lot” as a certain gift from God, pointing out to that Hierarchical Choir, him who was designed by the Divine election. More particularly because the Divine Hierarch must not perform the sacerdotal consecration of his own motion; but, as subject to God, moving him to accomplish these consecrations, with religious rites and heavenly intimations.

Now the salutation at the end of the consecration has a religious significance. For all the members of the sacerdotal orders present, as well as the Hierarch who has consecrated them, salute the men ordained. For when by sacerdotal habits and dispositions, and by Divine call and dedication, a religious mind has attained to sacerdotal consecration, he is dearly loved by the most holy orders of the same rank ; elevated, as he is, to a most God-like comeliness ; loving the minds similar to himself, and religiously loved by them in return. Hence it is that the mutual sacerdotal salutation is performed, proclaiming the religious communion of minds of like character, and their loving benignity towards each other, which keeps, by sacerdotal training, their most Godlike comeliness in complete perfection.

These things, as I said, are common to the whole sacerdotal consecration. The Hierarch, however, as a distinctive mark, has the oracles most reverently placed upon his head. For since the perfecting function and science of the whole Priesthood is conferred upon the inspired Hierarchs by the supremely Divine and perfecting goodness, naturally the Divinely transmitted oracles are placed upon the heads of the Hierarchs—oracles which explain completely and scientifically all theology—work of God, manifestation of God, sacred word, sacred work : in one word, all the Divine and sacred works and words bequeathed to our Hierarchy by the beneficent Deity. Since the Godlike Hierarch, having partaken entirely of the whole Hierarchical power, will not only be illuminated in the true and God-transmitted science of all the holy words and works committed to the Hierarchy, but will also transmit them to others by Hierarchical teaching, and will perfect in most Divine knowledge and the highest instruction, through his power as Hierarch, all the most perfecting functions of the whole Priesthood. But the distinctive feature of the ordination of Priests, as contrasted with the ordination of the Leitourgoi, is the bending of the two knees, as that order bends only the one, and is consecrated by this religious symbol. The bending denotes the submissive approach of the man who draws nigh, who places under God that which is religiously presented. But since, as we have often said, the three orders of the consecrators, through the three most holy initiations and functions, preside over the three orders of the initiated, and accomplish or religiously perform their saving approach under the Divine yoke, naturally the order of Deacons, as being merely puritive, religiously performs the one approach of those who are being purified, placing it under the Divine Altar, as though the minds who are being purified were being transcendently hallowed in himself. But the Priests bend both their knees, because those who are religiously brought nigh by them are not only being purified, but have been religiously perfected by their most luminous instructions into a contemplative habit and power. But the Hierarch, bending both his knees, has upon his head the God-transmitted oracles, as leading, through his office of Hierarch, those who have been purified by the Leitourgoi, and enlightened by the Priests, to the exact knowledge of the things contemplated by them, in proportion to their capacities; and through this knowledge perfecting those who are brought nigh, into the most complete holiness of which they are capable.

CAPUT VI.

Concerning the Ranks of the Initiated.

These, then, are the sacerdotal ranks and vocations, their powers, and functions, and consecrations. We must next explain the Triad of the ranks initiated, which are subordinate to them. We affirm then that the multitudes who are dismissed from the Divine Services and Consecrations, which we have mentioned, are Orders undergoing a course of purification; for one is being moulded and fashioned to a living existence, by the Deacons through the oracles which bring to birth; another is already called back to the holy life, from which it had departed, by the wholesome discipline of the good oracles; another, as being already terrorized through want of manliness by opposing fears, is being fortified by the strengthening oracles; another, as being led back from evil counsels to holy efforts; and another as having been led back, indeed, but not yet having a chaste fixedness in more God-like habits and tranquillity. For these are the Orders under purification, by the nursing and purifying powers of the Leitourgoi. These, the Leitourgoi perfect, by their sacred powers, for the purpose of their being brought, after their complete cleansing, to the contemplation and participation in the most luminous Divine Services. The middle is the contemplative order, which participates in certain Divine Offices in all purity, according to its capacity, and is assigned to the Priests for its enlightenment. For it is evident, in my opinion, that this order, after having been cleansed from all unholy impurity, and when it has acquired the immovable steadfastness of its own mind in perfect purity, is led back, through priestly functions, to the habit and power of contemplation, and communicates in the most Divine symbols, filled with all holy joy in their contemplations and communions, mounting to the Divine love of their highest knowledge, through their instructions and functions, as far as their capacity admits. This, I say, is the order of the holy people, which, as having passed through complete purification, is deemed worthy, as far as permissible, both of the reverent vision, and participation of the most luminous Sacraments. But, the order higher than all the initiated is the sacred order of the Monks, which, as regards an entirely purified purification, with all its power and completely purified energies, has acquired a spiritual contemplation and participation in every Divine Service, which it is permissible for it to contemplate; and is being conducted by the most perfecting functions of the Hierarchs, and taught by their inspired illuminations and hierarchical traditions respecting the Divine Services of the holy Sacraments, viewed by them, according to their capacity, and elevated by their sacred science, to the most perfecting perfection of which they are capable. Hence our Divine leaders have deemed them worthy of sacred appellations. Some, indeed, call them "Therapeutæ," but others "Monks," from their pure service and fervid devotion to the true God; and from the undivided and unified life, as making them one, by folding together their divided qualities into a God-like isolation, and God-loving perfection. Wherefore the Divine institution accorded them a perfecting grace, and deemed them worthy of a certain invocation for their consecration—not hierarchical—for that is confined to the sacerdotal orders alone, but hallowing,¹ as being hallowed, by the pious Priests, by the hierarchical consecration in the second degree.

II.—MYSTERION.

Mystery of Monastic Consecration.

The Priest stands before the Divine Altar and religiously pronounces the invocation for Monks. The Monk stands behind the Priest, neither bends both knees, nor one of them, nor has upon his head the Divinely transmitted oracles; but only stands near the Priest, whilst he pronounces upon him the mystical Benediction. When the Priest has finished this, he approaches the man being consecrated, and asks him first, if he bids farewell to all distractions—not of life only, but also of imagination. Then he sets before him the most perfect life, and warns him that it is his bounden duty to surpass the ordinary life. When the initiated has promised steadfastly all these things, and the Priest has signed him with the sign of the Cross, he crops his hair. After an invocation to the threefold subsistence of the Divine Beatitude, he strips off all his clothing, and clothes him anew, and with all the holy men present salutes him, and administers to him the supremely Divine Mysteries.

III.—Contemplation.

The fact that he bends neither knee, nor has upon his head the Divinely transmitted oracles, but stands by the Priest, whilst pronouncing the benediction for Monks, signifies that the monastic order is not for the leading of others, but stands by itself, in an isolated and holy state, after the sacerdotal orders, and is readily conducted by them as a follower to the Divine science of sacred things, according to its capacity. The renunciation of the divided, not only lives, but even imaginations, shews the most perfect love of wisdom in the Monks, which exercises itself in the exact knowledge of the unifying commandments. For it is not, as I said, of the middle order of those who are initiated, but of the higher than all. Therefore many of the things which are done without reproach by the middle order, are forbidden in every way to the unified Monks—inasmuch as they are under obligation to be unified to the One, and to be collected to a sacred isolation, and to be transformed to the sacerdotal life, as far as permissible, as possessing an affinity to it in many things, and as being nearer to it, as compared with the rest of the ranks of the initiated. But the sealing with the sign of the Cross, as we have already said, denotes the inaction of almost all the desires of the flesh. The cropping of the hair shews the pure and unpretentious life, which does not beautify the darkness within the mind by overlarding it with smeared pretence, but shews it leads by itself to the highest likeness of God, not by human attractions, but by single and monastic. The casting aside of the former clothing, and taking another, seems to show a transition from a middle sort of religious life to the more perfect one; just as, in the holy Birth from God, the exchange of the clothing denoted the elevation of a purified life to a contemplative and enlightened condition. But if even now the Priest and all the religious present salute him who has been consecrated, bear in mind the holy fellowship of those who carry the likeness of God, who congratulate each other in a Divine rejoicing. But, as consummation of all, the Priest invites him who has been consecrated to the supremely Divine Communion, shewing through religious ordinance that the consecrated, if he would really attain to the monastic and uniform elevation, he will not merely be contemplative of the sacred mysteries in their essential nature, nor will he come to the communion of the most holy symbols, after the fashion of the middle rank; but with a Divine knowledge of the mysteries received by himself, he will come in a manner different from that of the holy people to the reception of the supremely Divine Communion. Wherefore, the Communion of the most holy Eucharist is also given to the sacerdotal¹ Orders, in their dedication to the Priesthood at the conclusion of their most sacred consecrations by the Hierarch who has consecrated them; not only because the reception of the supremely

Divine Mysteries is the consummation of each Hierarchical reception, but because all the sacred Orders, in accordance with their capacity, partake of the common and most godly gift, according to their own elevation and perfection in deification. We conclude, then, that the holy initiations are, purification, and illumination, and consecration. The Leitourgoi are a purifying Order, the Priests an illuminating, and the Godlike Hierarchs a perfecting Order. The Order which is excluded from the sacred contemplation and communion, as being already under course of purification, is an Order being purified. But the Order of the unified Monks is a purified Order. For thus our Hierarchy, reverently arranged in ranks fixed by God, is like the Heavenly Hierarchies, preserving, so far as man can do, its Godlike characteristics and Divine imitation.

. But you will say that the Orders undergoing purification utterly fall short of the Heavenly Hierarchies (for it is neither permissible nor true to say that any celestial Order is impure), and I would altogether affirm myself that they are entirely without blemish, and possess a purity above this world, unless I had completely fallen away from a religious mind. For if any of them should have become captive to evil, and have fallen from the heavenly, undefiled harmony of the celestial minds, he would be brought to the gloomy fall of the rebellious multitudes. But one may reverently say, with regard to the Heavenly Hierarchy, that the revelation from God, of things hitherto unknown, is a purification to the subordinate Beings, leading them to a more perfect science of the God-derived communications, purifying them from the ignorance of those things of which they had not hitherto the exact knowledge, conducted as they are, through the first and more Divine Beings, to the higher and more luminous splendours of the visions of God. Thus there are ranks being illuminated, and being initiated and purified, and purifying and illuminating, and perfecting, after the example of the Heavenly Hierarchy; as though the highest and more Divine minds were purifying the subordinate, holy, and reverent ranks from all ignorance (in ranks and proportions of the Heavenly Hierarchies), but fitting them with the most Divine illuminations and perfections, in the most pure science of the supremely Divine conceptions. For we have already said, and the oracles Divinely demonstrate that all the heavenly Orders are not alike, in the sacred knowledge of all the illuminations that come from God. But, from God immediately, the first are illuminated; then through these, but again from God, the subordinate, in proportion to their powers, are illuminated with the most luminous glories of the Divine rays.

CAPUT VII.

Concerning the Rites celebrated over those who have fallen asleep.

Having defined these things, I think it necessary to describe the religious rites celebrated over those who have fallen asleep. For there is a difference here also between the sacred and the profane. For, as the form of life is different in each, so also, when approaching death, they differ. Those who have had a religious life, when they look to the unfailing promises of the Deity, inasmuch as they have observed their proof, in the resurrection proclaimed by it, come to the goal of death, with a firm and unfailing hope, in godly rejoicing, as at the conclusion of holy contests—knowing that their rewards will be in a perfect and endless life and salvation, through their future entire resurrection.¹ For the holy souls, which may possibly fall, during this present life, to a change for the worse, in the regeneration will have the most Godlike transition to an unchangeable² condition. Now, the pure bodies of the holy souls, which are enrolled together as yoke-fellows and companions, and fellow-combatants within their Divine struggles, in the unchanged steadfastness of their souls throughout the divine life, will jointly receive their own resurrection.³ For, having been made one with the holy souls to which they were united in this present life, as having become members⁴ of Christ, they will receive the Godlike and imperishable immortality, and a blessed repose.⁵ In this respect, then, the sleep of the just is in comfort and unshaken hope as it draws nigh the goal of the Divine contests.⁶ Now, amongst the profane, some⁷ illogically think to go to a non-existence; others,⁸ that the yoke binding the body to its own proper soul will be severed once for all, not deeming it suitable to them in a Divine life and blessed repose, inasmuch as they have not been sufficiently instructed in the knowledge of Divine things, which teaches that our most Godlike life in Christ has already begun.⁹ But others¹⁰ assign to souls unions with other bodies, committing, as I suppose, this injustice to them, that, after they have laboured together with the godly souls, they unjustly deprive them, when they have reached the goal of the Divine course, of their righteous retribution. But others,¹¹ I do not know how they have strayed to conceptions of such earthly tendency, say, that the most holy and blessed inheritance, promised to the devout, is similar to our life in this world, and unlawfully reject, for those who are equal to the Angels, nourishment appropriate to another kind of life. But no one would ever forsake most reverent men, for such vagaries as these. But knowing that their whole selves will receive the Christlike inheritance, when they have come to the goal of this present life, they see more clearly their road to incorruption as already become nearer, and praise the gifts of the supreme Godhead and are filled with a Divine satisfaction, no longer fearing the fall to a worse condition, but well knowing that they will hold firmly and everlastingly the good things already acquired. But those who are full of blemishes, full of stains, even though they have attained to some instruction, yet, of their own accord, have to their own destruction rejected this from their mind, and have rashly followed destructive lusts, when they have approached the end of their life here, the Divine regulation of the oracles will no longer appear to them as before, a subject of scorn,¹ but when they have looked with other eyes upon the pleasures of their passions destroyed, and have pronounced blessed the holy life from which they thoughtlessly had fallen away, they are, piteously and against their will, separated from this present life, conducted to no blessed hope, in consequence of their shameful life.² But, whilst none of these attain the rest of holy men, the holy man himself, who comes to the end of his struggles, is filled with a holy consolation, and with much satisfaction draws nigh to the path of the holy regeneration. The familiar friends of him who has fallen asleep, as befits their Divine familiarity and fellowship, pronounce him blessed, whoever he is, as approaching, in answer to his prayers, the end crowned with victory. They send up odes of thanksgiving to the Author of victory, praying also that they themselves may come to the same inheritance. Then they take him and bring him to the Hierarch, as to a bequest of holy crowns. He right gladly receives him, and celebrates the rites fixed by reverend men, to be celebrated over those who have piously fallen asleep.

II.—*Mysterion*³ over those who have religiously fallen asleep.

The Divine Hierarch collects the reverend Choir. If the person who has fallen asleep were of the sacerdotal rank, he places him low before the Holy Altar, and offers the prayer and thanksgiving to God. But if he belonged to the rank of the chaste Monks, he places him near the hallowed sanctuary, before the sacerdotal entrance. Then the Hierarch finishes the prayer of thanksgiving to God. Next, the Leitourgoi read the faithful promises concerning our resurrection, which are contained in the Divine Lections, and chant the odes of the same teaching and power, from the Lections contained in the Psalter.⁴ Then the first Deacon dismisses the catechumens, and calls aloud the names of the holy people who have already fallen asleep, amongst whom he deems the man who has just terminated his life worthy of registration, as being of the same rank, and urges all to seek the blessed consummation in Christ. Then the Divine Hierarch advances, and offers a most holy prayer over him, and after the prayer he salutes the defunct, and after him all who are present. When all have saluted, the Hierarch pours the oil upon the defunct, and when he has offered the prayer for all, he places the body in a worthy grave, with other holy bodies of the same rank.

III.—Contemplation.

Now, if the profane should see or hear that these rites were celebrated by us, they will, I suppose, split with laughter, and compassionate us for our folly. But we need not wonder at this. For, as the Scripture saith, "If they will not believe, neither shall they understand."¹ Now, let us who have contemplated the spiritual meaning of the rites celebrated, say—Whilst Jesus leads us to the light, that not without reason does the Hierarch conduct to, and place the defunct in the place with those of the same rank. For it shows spiritually that, in the regeneration, all will be in that inheritance for which they have chosen their own life here. For example, if anyone here had a Godlike and most holy life (so far as the imitation of God is attainable by man), he will be throughout the age to come in a divine and blessed lot. But if he lead a life inferior to the divine likeness in its perfection, but, nevertheless, a holy life, even this man will receive the holy retributions of the same kind. The Hierarch, having given thanks for this Divine righteousness, offers a sacred prayer, and celebrates the worshipful Deity, as subjugating the unjust and tyrannical power against us all, but conducting us to our own most just judgments.

Now, the Chants and Readings of the Divine promises are explanatory of the most blessed inheritances into which those who have attained a Divine perfection shall be appointed. But the inheritances which await the defunct, stimulate those who are still living to a similar perfection. But observe, that not all classes of those who are under purification are dismissed, but only the catechumens are put out of the holy place, for this class is entirely uninstructed in every holy initiation, and is not permitted to view any of the religious celebrations, great or small, inasmuch as they have not received the faculty of contemplating the holy mysteries, through the Birth from God, which is Source and gift of light. But the other classes of those who are being purified have already been under instruction in sacred tradition; but, as they have foolishly returned to an evil course (it being necessary to complete their training to better things), they are reasonably dismissed from Divine visions and communions, even under symbols, for they would be injured, as partaking of them unholily, and would come to a greater contempt of the Divine Mysteries and themselves. But it is not unbecoming that they should be present at the ceremonies now celebrated, as they are clearly taught and see the uncertainty of death amongst us, and the glories of the saints chanted from the unfailing oracles, and that the sufferings reserved to the unholy like themselves will be without end. For it will perhaps be profitable for them to see him who has religiously finished his course reverently proclaimed by the public declaration of the Leitourgoi, as being numbered amongst the saints for ever.¹ And, perchance, they also will come to the like condition, and will learn, from the instruction of the Deacons, that the consummation in Christ is blessed indeed. Then the Hierarch, advancing, offers a sacred prayer over the defunct. After the prayer, both the Hierarch himself salutes him, and next, all who are present. As for the prayer, it beseeches the supremely Divine Goodness to remit to the defunct all the failings committed through human infirmity, and to place him in the light² and land of the living³; in the bosom of Abraham,⁴ and Isaac, and Jacob; in a place where grief and sorrow and sighing are no more. It is evident, then, as I think, that these, the rewards of the holy, are most blessed. For what can be compared to an immortality, entirely without grief, and luminous with light. Especially, if all the promises which pass man's understanding, and which are signified to us by signs adapted to our capacity, fall short in their description of the actual truth. For we must remember that that saying is true, that "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, the things God hath prepared for them that love⁵ him." "Bosoms" of the blessed Patriarchs, and of the other holy men are in my judgment the most divine and blessed inheritance which awaits all godly men, in that consummation⁶ which grows not old, and is full of blessedness.

But you may, perhaps, say that these things are correctly affirmed by us, but you want to know for what reason the Hierarch beseeches the supremely Divine Goodness, asking remission of the faults committed by the defunct, and his admission into the brightest inheritance amongst godly men of the same rank. For, if everyone shall receive, by judgment of God, equivalents for what he has done in the present life, whether it be good or otherwise, and the defunct has finished his activity within this present life, how, from any prayer offered by the

Hierarch, will he be transferred to another lot, besides that suitable to him, as an equivalent for his life here. Now, well do I know, as following the Oracles, that each one will have the inheritance which is like for like, for the Lord, he says, hath concluded respecting him, and each one "shall receive the things done in his body according to that he hath done, whether it be good, or whether it be bad."¹ Yea, the sure tradition of the Oracles teaches us that the prayers, even of the just, avail only for those who are worthy of pious prayers during this present life, much less² after death. Did the prayers of Samuel procure anything for Saul?³ or did the intercession of the Prophet⁴ bring any advantage to the people of Israel? For it is as if, when the sun is shedding its own splendour upon eyes that are sound, anyone should seek to enjoy the meridian splendour, whilst obliterating his own powers of vision. Thus does he cling to impossible and extravagant expectations, who, whilst beseeching the prayers of holy men, diminishes the holy efforts essential to the same, and departs from the most luminous and beneficent commandments through heedlessness of the Divine gifts.

Nevertheless, I affirm, on the authority of the oracles, that the prayers of the just⁵ are in every respect profitable in this life, after the following fashion. If anyone, longing for holy gifts and having a religious disposition for their reception, approaches some one of the pious men, as being conscious of his own insufficiency, and should prevail upon him to become his fellow-helper, and fellow-suppliant, he will be benefitted in every respect, in this way, with a benefit superior to all. For he will attain the most Divine gifts he prays for, since the supremely Divine Goodness assists him, as well as his pious self-knowledge, and his reverence for devout men, and his craving for the religious gifts requested, and his brotherly and Godlike disposition. For this has been firmly fixed by the supremely Divine decrees—that the Divine gifts are given in an order most befitting God to those who are meet to receive them, through those who are meet to distribute them.

If any one then should despise this sacred regulation, and betake himself to a wretched self-conceit, and should deem himself sufficient for the Divine Converse, and look down upon pious men, and if he should further request requests unworthy of God, and not holy, and if he should have a disposition which is not concordant with the Divine, and similar to himself, he will fail in his inexperienced request through his own fault. Now, with reference to the prayer mentioned, which the Hierarch prays over the defunct, we think it necessary to mention the tradition which has come to us from our inspired leaders. The Divine Hierarch, as the oracles say, is the interpreter of the supremely divine judgments. For he is messenger¹ of the Lord God Omnipotent. He has learned then, from the God-transmitted oracles, that to those who have passed their life in piety, the most bright and divine² life is recompensed according to their deserts, by the most just measures, whilst the Divine Love towards man overlooks, through its goodness, the blemishes which have come to them, through human infirmity (since no one, as the oracles say, is pure and without spot).

Now, the Hierarch knew these things to have been promised by the sure oracles. He asks, then, that these things may come to pass, and that the righteous returns may be given to those who have lived piously. At the same time, as being moulded as an image of goodness to the Divine imitation, he beseeches gifts for others as favours to himself. But, at the same time, he knows that the promises will be surely fulfilled, and manifests clearly to those present that the things asked by him, according to Divine law, will be entirely realized, for those who have been perfected in a Divine life. For the Hierarch, the expounder of the supremely Divine Justice, would never seek things which are not most pleasing to the Most Supreme God, and which were not divinely promised to be given by Him. Wherefore, he does not offer these prayers over the unholy departed; not only because in this he would deviate from his office of interpreter, and would presumptuously arrogate, on his own authority, a function of the Hierarchy, without being moved by the Supreme Legislator, but, because also, he would fail to obtain his abominable request, and would, not unnaturally, hear respecting himself, from the Divine Oracle, "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss."⁴ Therefore, the Divine Hierarch beseeches things divinely promised, and dear to God, and which will, in every respect, be given, and demonstrates his own likeness to the good loving God, and declares, as the interpreter of God, the gifts which will be received by the devout. Thus, the Hierarchs have discriminating powers, as interpreters of the Divine Judgments. Not, as though the All-Wise Deity, to put it mildly, were slavishly following their irrational impulses, but, as though they, as interpreters of God, were deciding by the motion of the supremely judging Spirit, those who have already been judged by God according to their deserts. For receive, he says, the Holy Spirit, "whose⁵ sins ye may have remitted, they are remitted; whose ye may retain, they are retained." And to him who was illuminated with the Divine revelations of the most Holy Father, the Oracles say, "Whatsoever thou shalt have bound upon the earth shall be bound in the heavens; and whatsoever thou shalt have loosed on earth, shall be loosed in heaven," inasmuch as He, and every Hierarch who is like Him, receives those who are dear to God, according to the revelations of the Father's judgments resting upon him, as announcing and interpreting the Divine Will, and rejects those who are without God. Further, as the Oracles affirm, He uttered that sacred and divine saying, not as self-moved,¹ nor as though flesh and blood had revealed it, but as one who had been spiritually taught Divine things by God. The inspired Hierarchs then, must so exercise their determinations and all their Hierarchical powers as the Godhead, the Supreme Initiator, may move them. As for the rest, they must so cling to the Hierarchs in their sacerdotal functions as men moved by God. "For he that despises you," He says, "despiseth Me."²

Let us now proceed to that which follows the prayer mentioned. When the Hierarch has finished this, he first salutes the defunct, and next, all who are present. For dear and honoured, to all Godlike men, is he who has been perfected in a Divine life. After the salutation the Hierarch pours the oil upon the defunct. But remember, that in course of the Birth from God, before the most Divine Baptism, the oil of Chrism, as a first participation of the holy symbol, is given to the neophyte, after the entire removal of the former clothing. But now, at the conclusion of all that is done, the oil is poured upon the defunct. The first anointing with the oil summons the initiated to the holy contests; but the pouring of the oil now shows the defunct to have struggled through those same contests, and to have been made perfect.

When the Hierarch has finished these things he places the body in an honourable chamber, with other bodies of holy men of the same rank. For if, in soul and body, the man has passed a life dear to God, there will be honoured with the devout soul also the body which contended with it throughout the devout struggles. Hence, the Divine justice gives to it, together with its own body, the reciprocal inheritances, as companions and participators in the devout or the contrary life. Wherefore, the Divine institution of sacred things bequeaths the supremely Divine participations to them both—to the soul, indeed, in a pure contemplation and in an exact knowledge of the rites celebrated; to the body, by sanctifying the whole man, as in a figure, with the most Divine Myrrh, and the most holy symbols of the Divine Communion, effecting his complete salvation, and announcing that his resurrection will be most complete by entire sanctification. Now, as regards the consecrating invocations, it is not permitted to explain them in writing, nor may we bring their mysterious meaning, nor the powers working in them from God, from their secrecy to publicity. But, as our sacred tradition holds, by learning these, through quiet instructions, and by being perfected to a more Godlike condition and elevation, through Divine love and holy duties, you will be borne by the most perfect illumination to the most exalted knowledge of them.

Now the fact that even children, not yet able to understand the Divine mysteries, should become recipients of the holy Birth from God, and of the most holy symbols of the supremely Divine Communion, seems, as you say, to the profane, a fit subject for reasonable laughter, upon the supposition that the Hierarchs teach Divine things to those not able to hear, and vainly transmit the sacred traditions to those who do not understand. And this is still more laughable—that others, on their behalf, repeat the abjurations and the sacred compacts. But your Hierarchical judgment must not be too hard upon those who are led astray, but you should persuasively, and for the purpose of leading them to the light, reply affectionately to the positions alleged by them. When you have brought forward this fact, in accordance with sacred rule, that not all Divine things are comprehended in our knowledge, but many of the things unknown by us have causes worthy of God, which, although unknown to us, are yet well known to the Orders above us. Many things also escape even the most exalted Beings, and are known distinctly by the All-Wise and Wisdom-Giving Deity. Further, also, concerning this, we affirm what our God-like instructors conveyed to us, what they had learned from the early¹ tradition. For they say, what is also a fact, that infants being brought up according to a Divine institution will attain a religious disposition exempt from all error, and inexperienced in an unholy life. When our Divine leaders came to this conclusion, it was determined to admit infants upon the following conditions, viz. :—that the parents of the child to be presented should transfer him to some one of the instructed, who is a faithful teacher of children in Divine things, so that the child should lead the rest of his life under his instruction, as under a godfather, and security for his religious safe-keeping. The Hierarch requires him who promised to bring up the child according to the religious life, to pronounce the renunciations and the religious confessions. Not, as they would jokingly say, as instructing one instead of another in Divine things. For he does not say this, “on behalf of this child, I make myself the renunciation and the sacred profession,” but that the child renounces and consents itself; i.e., I promise to persuade the child, when he has come to a frame of mind capable of religious impressions, through my instructions in Divine things, to renounce entirely contrary things, and to promise and perform the Divine confessions. There is nothing absurd, then, in my judgment, if the child is brought up in a religious training, in his having a guide and religious surety, who implants in him a disposition for Divine things, and keeps him inexperienced in things contrary.

The Hierarch imparts to the child the sacred symbols in order that he may be nourished by them, and may not have any other life, besides that of always contemplating Divine things; and that, being made partaker of them, in a religious progress, he may have a religious disposition in these matters, and may be devoutly brought up by his Godlike surety. So great, my son, and so beautiful, are the uniform visions of our Hierarchy, which have been presented to my view. But from others, perhaps, of a more clear-sighted mind, these things have been viewed, not only more clearly, but also more divinely. And to you, as I fancy, more brilliant and divine beauties will shine forth, whilst you use the foregoing as stepping stones to a higher ray. Impart then, my friend, yourself also, to me, a more perfect illumination, and show to my eyes the more comely and uniform beauties that you may have been able to see, for I am confident that, by what has been said, I shall strike the sparks¹ of the Divine Fire which lie dormant in you.

THANKS BE TO GOD.

NOTE 2.—Thanksgiving before the consecration, translated from a Latin Version of the Liturgy of Dionysius the Areopagite.

“Sacerdos inclinatus.” For truly the celebration of Thy benefits, O Lord, exceeds the powers of mind, expression, and thought; nor can any lip, or mind, or tongue worthily praise Thee. For by Thy word the heavens were made, and by the breath of Thy mouth all the supernal powers, all lights which are in the firmament—sun and moon, sea and dry land, and whatever is in them. Things without voice, by their silence—things articulate by their voice through speech and hymns perpetually praise Thee, because Thou art essentially good, and above praise, existing incomprehensibly in Thy essential nature. (Elevating his voice.) This sensible creation praises Thee, O Lord, as well as those intellectual Beings placed above our material sense. Heaven and earth glorify Thee. Sea and air proclaim Thee. The sun in its predestined course praises Thee. The moon in its regulated changes venerates Thee. The multitudes of Archangels and the hosts of Angels, and those Virtues, seated above the world and the power of our conceptions, send their benediction to Thy throne. The Splendours of exceeding and hidden light send forth their Sanctus to Thy glory. Principalities and Orders praise Thee with Jubilate Powers and lordships venerate Thee. Virtues, Thrones, and Seats inaccessible—bright images of eternal light—mirrors without flaw—holy beings and recipients of wisdom sublime—pre-eminently searchers after that will kept secret from all—these exalt Thee by clear movements of tones inimitable, and by voices worthy of rational creatures. Many-eyed Cherubin, most highly exalted, bless Thee. Seraphin, with their enfolded wings, and full of feathers, call Thee Holy—those same beings who cover their faces with their wings, and veil their feet with their wings, and flying around and clapping their wings one to another, in order that they may not be consumed by Thy devouring heat, sing sweet and pure chants in a universal harmony, offering eternal glory to Thee, crying in a hymn worthy of God, and saying (Populus) "Holy, Holy, Holy."

(Priest bending low.) Holy art Thou, God the Father, Omnipotent Maker and Creator of every creature, invisible and visible and sensible. Holy art Thou, Only-Begotten Son—Power and Wisdom of the Father, Lord and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Holy art Thou, God the Holy Spirit, Perfecter and Sanctifier of Saints. Holy and Indivisible Trinity, co-essential and of equal glory, Whose compassion to our race is abundantly poured forth, Thou art Holy and sanctifying all: Who hast not left this our race in exile from Paradise, when it had become entangled in every kind of sin, but hast been manifested to it by the Word, which endured extremest poverty before the world. That Nature the Word took, made in all things like unto it sin excepted, that He might make it prepared unto holiness, and disposed to this life-giving feast. (Raising his voice.) Who conceived, formed, and moulded by the Holy Spirit, both from the Virgin blood of the Virgin Mary, Holy Mother of God, and from the pure and most holy body of the same, was born indeed Man, as Author of life, and receiving the Godhead in the flesh (whilst the law and properties of Nature were preserved, but in a manner above Nature), was acknowledged as God in Spirit and Man in flesh. And in so¹ far as the Word was before the worlds began, from Thee, in a manner worthy of God, He was born, and by signs and miracles such as became the Maker of All, was proved to be such, since He has abundantly provided complete healing and perfect salvation for the whole human race. But at the end and completion of His own dispensation, for our sake, and previous to His own saving Cross, He took Bread into His own pure holy hands, and looked up to Thee, God the Father, giving thanks, He blessed, sanctified, and brake, and gave to His own disciples, the holy Apostles, saying, "Take and eat from this, and believe² that the same is My Body, which for you and for many is broken and given for expiation of faults, remission of sins, and eternal life."

N.B.—I give this as example from a Liturgy full of interest, and preserved in the East, as that of Dionysius, Bishop of Athens, Disciple of St. Paul.
